"The natural tendency for people of that age is to drink all they can because they paid X amount of money," said Mahony.

-Associated Press

COURTESY USBSUN.COM

Bar patrons can expect a 'no open-bar policy this holiday season.

Local family continues to search for answers

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The family of two Springfield teenagers killed in separate shootings held a party over the weekend to mark what would have been their 20th birthday, hoping that someone among the dozens of people present at one of the killings might name the shooter.

Sheila A. Shepard organized Saturday night's party for the friends and family of her twin boys, Darnell and Daylan Shepard. Darnell was shot in May, at a friend's 16th birthday party in front of 100 guests. Daylan's death followed in July on a city street corner.

Two men, Porfirio Morales, 25, and Leo White, 20, have been arrested and have pleaded innocent in connection with Daylan's murder. According to police, Daylan was targeted because he was a stranger in the neighborhood he was passing through.

But there have been no arrests in Darnell's shooting, and their mother hoped that the birthday party would spur one of the dozens of people present when Darnell was shot to step forward.

On Saturday night, guests had little to say about the shooting.

"Everybody knows who it was," Arlington J. Dixon, 19, told The Republican newspaper.

But Dixon, an old family friend of the Shepards and companion of the twins who has since moved to New York City to attend college, refused to name the suspect.

Dylan and Darnell's father, John Shepard, had originally opposed the idea of the party at Cottage Hill Banquet Hall.

"I didn't want any kind of celebration until they found Darnell's killer. I have no good words to say," he said, surveying the room, which had begun to fill with the boys' teenage friends and family members.

The Shepards' death sparked vigils, political mobilization and calls for reform. But the killings devastated and stumped the boy's family, who said street violence has never been a part of their lives.

"Our family is educated. We are all college graduates. These boys had supportive parents. âThey had the Boys and Girls Club. Our family doesn't fit that," said the twins' aunt, Nancy Shepard, of Springfield.

Telea Y. Shepard, the twins' older sister, had rushed from work to attend the party and dish out chicken and spaghetti from the buffet line. A Springfield College senior, she said her family has grown closer since her brothers' deaths.

"We used to hardly talk even though we all lived in the same city. Now we talk every day," she said. "My dad's taken it the hardest. He misses his boys, and that guilt gets up inside him."

-Associated Press

Explosion in China kills dozens of people

By Audra Ang
Associated Press

BEIJING — An explosion tore through a coal mine in central China on Sunday, killing at least 25 miners and trapping 141 others in tunnels and shafts below without communications, the government said.

Some 127 workers managed to escape the state-owned mine, the Xinhua News Agency said, citing the State Bureau of Production Safety. Some 45 were hospitalized, five with serious injuries, Xinhua said.

The blast rocked Chenjiashan coal mine in Shaanxi province at 7:20 a.m., when 293 workers were underground, the official Xinhua News Agency said. The explosion was centered around coal pits five miles from the mine entrance, it said.

Most of the miners who escaped were working close to the entrance, Xinhua said, and many suffered from carbon monoxide poisoning. High levels of carbon monoxide was preventing rescuers from reaching parts of the tunnels.

Witnesses said they saw "huge amounts of thick smoke pouring from the mine's ventilation vents," hampering rescue efforts, according to the Web site of the Communist Party's People's Daily newspaper.

Staff at Chenjiashan said communications with the trapped miners were cut off, the site said.

On its evening newscast, state television showed ambulances rushing to the scene as huge crowds of people gathered outside the mine's main gate.

President Hu Jintao urged rescuers to employ "all effective measures" to save the trapped workers, China Central Television said.

Premier Wen Jiabao, who arrived at the ASEAN summit in Laos on Sunday, said he was "extremely upset" over the accident.

He said the cause of the explosion would be thoroughly investigated and the government would continue to push for safer working conditions in the mines.

According to Xinhua, Chenjiashan is capable of producing 1.3 million tons of coal a year.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Peter Foundas
MANAGING EDITOR Andrew Merritt
BUSINESS MANAGER Rich Pacheco
PRODUCTION MANAGER Cory Rosenberg
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Cameron Woods
ADVERTISING MANAGER Tiffany Sugalski
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Samantha Nielsen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Meghan Healy
COPIES EDITOR Alison Fillmann
EDITORIAL EDITOR Page Cram
NEWS EDITOR Erika Lowley
PHOTO EDITOR Matthew Reid
SPORTS EDITOR Mike Marrelli
CIRCULATION MANAGER Kristen Weiss
CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING Marty Pappo
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Josh Kiggins
FINANCE MANAGER Hirak Shah
ACCOUNTING CLERK Virginie Frecaut
HUMAN RESOURCES Sandra Marquez
ASSISTANT OPERATORS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Josh Greenberg
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Jaclynn Sorenson
ASSISTANT FINANCE Thomas Hecht
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Rachael Bruno
GRAPHICS ADVISER Charlie Higgins
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Mike Bunsch
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Monique Jemmott
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Yousef Munayyer
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Allison Edles
ASSISTANT NEWS Julie O'Donnell
ASSISTANT NEWS Dan O'Brien
ASSISTANT SPORTS Robert McGovern
ASSISTANT SPORTS Jeff Howe

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE. BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1918 AND THE DAILY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN AROUND SHORT SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL 545-3500 BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 5:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Michael Marzelli
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Mathew Reid
COPY EDITOR
Matt Elder
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Samantha Nielsen
PRODUCTION STAFF
Alyson Zillman/ Mollinator

Work for Day Graphics!
Contact Chris or Richard
545-1864

Stores gear up for holiday shoppers

SHOPPING from page 1

"We'd heard about how special this day is in America, so we thought we'd check it out," Szczesniak said. "We were pretty amazed to see people running to stores when we came in."

Massachusetts retailers expect a 4 percent increase in holiday shopping season sales this year. The state's Boston-based retailers association predicts Massachusetts sales will total $20 billion in November and December, with $5.5 billion of the total associated with holiday gifts.

The projected increase, which is based on a survey of the association's 2,500 members, would fall below the 5 percent rise posted for the state last year. But it would surpass the 2 percent growth in 2002, and exceed the current inflation rate, the association said this week.

Justices could see forced retirement

WASHINGTON (AP) — Six in 10 Americans say there should be a mandatory retirement age for Supreme Court justices, according to an Associated Press poll.

The survey found public support for an idea that has arisen periodically in Congress without ever making headway.

Only one of the nine current justices, Clarence Thomas, is younger than 65. Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, 80, appointed to the court by President Nixon, has thyroid cancer. In the survey, people were asked if they could identify what job Rehnquist held, and 59 percent did not know.

The appointment of justices without term limits or a mandatory retirement age historically has helped to insulate the court from politics, said Dennis Hutchinson, a Supreme Court expert from the University of Chicago Law School. At the same time, that can have the unintended consequence of letting some justices serve beyond their most effective years.

People over 65 were among those most likely to favor mandatory retirement, according to the poll conducted for the AP by Ipsos-Public Affairs.

The question on retirement mentioned no specific retirement age. Lifetime appointment of Supreme Court justices is dictated by the Constitution and could be changed only by an amendment.

COURTESY WWW.USCOURTS.GOV

In a recent poll a majority of Americans believe that supreme court justices should be forced to retire.

Voter fraud suspected in Ukraine

BUSH from page 1

"Hopefully it will help," Bush said of his telephone diplomacy. "Anything I can do to help keep the process moving forward, I'm more than willing to do so."

The United States and other Western nations contend that massive fraud marred the presidential runoff election Sunday in Ukraine, and the country's highest court has ordered election officials not to publish the results until an appeal is heard next week. Earlier this week, Secretary of State Colin Powell cited reports of fraud in the election in saying the United States cannot accept the results of presidential elections in Ukraine.

"There's just a lot of allegations of vote fraud that placed their election, the validity of their elections, in doubt," Bush said. "The international community is watching very carefully. People are paying very close attention to this, and hopefully it will be resolved in a way that brings credit and confidence to the Ukrainian government."

Bush did not directly answer a question about what consequences Ukraine might face if the dispute is not resolved to his satisfaction. Powell said there would be consequences for U.S.-Ukraine relations if the government there did not act "immediately and responsibly" to find a solution that respected the will of its people.

As Bush spoke, several dozen Ukrainian protesters stood across the street, waving their country's flag and calling on Bush to press for a fair election result. "Will President George W. Bush now stand up to Russia's blatant imperial overreach in Ukraine?" wrote Michael Balahutrak of Houston in literature distributed at the gathering.

Halliburton Co. faces audit

By JOHN SOLOMON
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — A third or more of the government property Halliburton Co. was paid to manage for the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq could not be located by auditors, investigative reports to Congress show.

Halliburton's KBR subsidiary "did not effectively manage government property" and auditors could not locate hundreds of CPA items worth millions of dollars in Iraq and Kuwait this summer and fall, Inspector General Stuart W. Bowen reported to Congress in two reports.

Bowen's findings mark the latest bad news for Vice President Dick Cheney's former company, which is the focus of both a criminal investigation into alleged fuel price gouging and an FBI inquiry into possible favoritism from the Bush administration.

The Associated Press reported Wednesday that FBI agents have extensively interviewed an Army contracting officer who last month went public with allegations that the Bush administration was improperly awarding contracts to Halliburton without competitive bidding.

Halliburton and the Pentagon deny wrongdoing, and say they are cooperating in all investigations.

Company spokeswoman Cathy Gist said Friday that KBR recently conducted a "wall-to-wall" review of all property it is managing for the Pentagon in war zones including Iraq and Afghanistan and produced results far better than Bowen's findings.

"We are pleased to report that this total inventory review confirmed 99.4 percent accountability of all property," she said. "The facts show that KBR has adequately managed property for this mission by aggressively monitoring its property management functions, above and beyond what is required."

The U.S-backed CPA officially dissolved after a year in power in Baghdad when an interim Iraqi government took control of the country this summer. But Bowen's office continues to review how money was spent and it gave a tough assessment of KBR's performance.

KBR won a key logistics contract to manage everything from trucks and generators to computers.

Bowen reported that an audit earlier this summer found KBR had lost track of more than $18 million worth of equipment in Iraq. Investigators could not track down 52 of 164 randomly selected items in an inventory of more than 20,000 items overseen by KBR, including two electric generators worth nearly $1 million, 18 trucks or SUVs and six laptop computers.

Pentagon and Halliburton officials have been searching since the summer for the missing items and have tracked down many of them. Some were found in the hands of "unauthorized users" and 111 vehicles had not been returned for required check-in, they said.

Bowen's auditors found the problems extended beyond Iraq's borders. More recently, auditors sought to determine how well KBR managed the inventory and supplies of the CPA offices and warehouses in neighboring Kuwait, initially sampling 90 items from an inventory of more than 3,000.

The auditors found 30 of the 90 items could not be accounted for, and then reviewed additional documents and projected a total of 1,297 of the 3,032 property items, or 42.8 percent, could not be accounted for or were missing.

The inspector general said 108 additional items were on hand but not properly recorded in inventory. The audit projected more than 400 required hand receipts for property were not available or weren't filled out.

"This occurred because KBR did not effectively manage government property: specifically, KBR did not properly control CPA property items. Further, the KBR property records were not sufficiently accurate or available to properly account for CPA property items," Bowen reported to Congress.

"As a result, the CPA-IG projected that property valued at more than $1.1 million was not accurately accounted for or was missing," it added.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 2004

"The author must keep his mouth shut when his work starts to speak."
-Friedrich Nietzsche

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Dark reality check brings light

Becky Martins

Experience alone will prove nothing is for certain. Material objects we own, freedoms we possess, and people we love can be taken away at any moment. Thus, it is important to appreciate our lives in their entirety, for life is too short to be taken for granted.

Last Tuesday, I received some unexpected news. Phil, a friend from home who had been fighting leukemia for the better half of his adolescent life, had relapsed and fallen seriously ill. Despite his lengthy remission from the disease, and all the efforts modern medicine could provide, nothing proved useful. By early Tuesday, a hard-fought battle for survival was lost as Phil passed peacefully in his sleep, loved ones by his side.

Upon learning of his death, my initial reaction was shock. Though Phil had dealt with his cancer for years, he had lived the past couple in good health. He had fought through many of the horrors brought on by the disease and seemed to have made it through. Despite his ailments, he continued to pass along his contagious smile, laugh, and personality to anyone he encountered. No one expected life to take such a tragic turn.

Oftentimes, we get wrapped up in our day-to-day lives, putting importance on petty things, instead of what truly matters.

Only in his early 20s, Phil left behind too much: a family who loved him, best friends who were like brothers, and a bright future that would never be. After hearing the news from my best friend, I could not stop thinking how unfair life was. The good always go first, it seems. Why should we ever bury a friend, relative or loved one under such circumstances as these?

After ending my phone conversation in which I had learned of my friend's death, I was unable to move. The light that had flooded into my dorm room soon faded. I was left sitting in the dark and staring out the window, deep in thought. Phil and I were not close, but we were definitely on good terms, with many mutual friends in common. When I had learned of his passing, I did not instantly feel the desire to cry. Yet, as I sat there thinking, my eyes welled and tears began to roll down my cheeks. I was surprised at my sudden bout of physical mourning. I realized I was crying for Phil and for those experiencing deep pain brought on by his absence. I also realized my tears were in regards to my own life; as I remembered those I had lost over similar circumstances, as well as those I could not ever fathom losing.

Phil's death has proved to be an enlightment of sorts. Oftentimes we get wrapped up in our day-to-day lives, putting importance on petty things instead of what truly matters. If we are lucky, our lives are put back into perspective before they are beyond the point of repair. But in other instances, people are forced to live life regretting the past, without having the luxury to ever make it right again.

In the past week, I have tried to reevaluate my life and fix what needs work. I got in touch with old friends who had become distant. I watched my temper and tried to avoid fights that would only lead to ill will. Although I am extremely stubborn, I made a conscious effort to let things go; calling to reconcile with an old friend, over reasons I once thought were beyond the point of forgiving. I now realize how irrelevant petty misunderstandings and disagreements are. They should never stand in the way of an otherwise good relationship with someone. If they do, we take the risk of being forced to live life only aware of the 'what-ifs' and 'what could have been's'. Anything good that may have existed with someone will forever be overshadowed by what never will be.

In the spirit of Thanksgiving, we should appreciate what life holds today, since there is no guarantee for tomorrow. Live life each day satisfied that if everything were to end, no loose ends would remain untied. Learn to let go of grudges and appreciate people for the goodness they bring. And as Phil did, grin and bear what our lives throw at us, for life is precious and meant to be cherished.

In the words of Abraham Lincoln, "In the end, it's not the years in your life that count. It's the life in your years (that matter)."

Becky Martins is a Collegian columnist.

When shopping think local

Ramzi Kanazi

The holiday season is upon us, and now that the elections are over we still have one of our greatest powers as Americans to affect change in the world. We are consumers, and as such, we can vote with our wallets.

This past Friday is commonly termed "Black Friday," also less prevalently known as "Buy Nothing Day." The latter is less realistically descriptive of the day after Thanksgiving, a day when more Americans hit the stores to shop than any other. It is the busiest shopping day of the year and gets its name because many retailers move from being financially "in the red" to profitability.

Ironically, one major advocate of Buy Nothing Day, Adbusters Media Foundation, was (as far as I could tell) taking subscriptions for its publication this November 26. It also charges about eight bucks for its magazine on newsstands. It can be pretty expensive to read about buying nothing. To be fair though, it is a not-for-profit organization that does not take, but spoofs, corporate advertisements.

So what can we do during this busy time to make a difference? Since, as Americans, it is clearly our collective obligation to overconsume, we can begin by doing so with a bit of social responsibility. Shop locally!

Instead of wasting your time and gas to navigate through seas of people in one of those sweatshop retailers at the outlet malls, buy your sweatshop goods from the guy down the street. Actually, there are even a number of local establishments in the Northampton/Amherst area that personally know who makes their products. Some even make their own.

Skip the large corporate businesses on Route 9 this winter, and now that the elections are over try to pick something up from one of the many bookstores and novelty shops in this area. Rather than hastily shopping at an office superstore, take a look around North Pleasant Street in Amherst. As an alternative to buying flowers from one of the grocery chains, support the local florists. Make a fruit basket with one of the organic farms in the area.

There are even a number of local establishments in the Northampton/ Amherst area that personally know who makes their products. Some even make their own.

While there are many alternatives to purchasing from companies that put local merchants out of business, as college students we tend to find these retail conglomerates more convenient and less expensive. It is true that some items cost less at the larger stores, and they may stock a larger selection of products overall, but the alternatives may surprise you.

The large chains try to lure people in with the sales listed in their circulars, but they do not price all of their items as those they advertise. The difference in cost is often minimal too. If you are on a quest for one or two specific items, like CDs, it may not be worth it to search a huge store and suffer through a long line to save a couple of dollars when you can pick them up across the street after having dinner downtown. Although the music shops in Amherst probably don't sell toothpaste and dog collars, they do maintain a better selection of music.

Why else should you bother to shop locally? I won't delve into the political reasons concerning the importance of this activity, but there are many benefits for shoppers who purchase from small, locally owned businesses. Buying at one of these stores can be a much more pleasant experience.

There is a greater possibility that you will find knowledgeable salespeople who care about the products they sell. They can also give more accurate information about them. Perhaps you will buy directly from the owner. The individuals who run these establishments tend to be much more concerned about your experience than those who manage the larger corporate entities.

You might even have a good conversation with someone who could actually be there the next time you show up. That person may remember you and probably won't have a script to wish you a "happy holiday" while offering you a special rate on a new credit card.

Well, it is the near the end of the semester, and I am sure that most of you are much less concerned about where to shop than with finishing up your work at school, but try to give some of these ideas a little thought this winter. There are so many benefits to supporting local organizations, not only during the holiday season, but also throughout the year.

Ramzi Kanazi is a Collegian columnist.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

LAW SCHOOL MERGER BENEFICIAL

The proposed merger of UMass Dartmouth and Southern New England School of Law makes good sense, and deserves support from citizens of the Commonwealth.

It is somewhat backwards that a state with such a concentration of higher education institutions is one of only five in the nation without a public law school. Opponents of the merger claim that there are too many law schools in the state, when there is clearly enough demand for legal education to support them all. They also conveniently forget that the merger will not create a new law school, but will merely convert an existing institution from private to public, with no immediate plans to raise enrollment.

While the state may not need more lawyers en masse, it certainly needs more public interest lawyers. UMass Law would specialize in public interest, maritime, and immigration law, all fields in need of additional lawyers and all fields not adequately served by the state's private schools. The new public law school would provide tuition breaks to students making a commitment to public service or non-profit work, which helps the citizens of Massachusetts.

The union of the two schools makes financial sense as well. SNESL is already a fully functional, degree granting law school needing only minor improvements to become accredited by the American Bar Association. The school has made significant progress in recent years, and these efforts will continue to be funded through student tuition. SNESL's finances are in order, as the New Bedford Standard-Times recently reported that the school currently has a budget surplus and contingency funds on hand.

Such a merger would also be good for SNESL students and alumni. It would allow SNESL to attain accreditation quicker, and would give the school an immediate marketing boost. The UMass moniker and state backing would allow the law school to attract better students and faculty, and would give Massachusetts residents a public school they could attend with pride. In addition, tuition at SNESL is currently lower than that of Harvard, BC, BU, Suffolk, Northeastern, Western New England, and New England School of Law.

The proponents of such a merger have provided thorough answers to critical questions and have been open about the potential costs and benefits. Supporters include President Wilson, the majority of the Board of Trustees, several state legislators, former Governor Weld, and SNESL students. Its opponents, mostly affiliates of private law schools fearing competition from UMass Law, have spewed nothing but rhetoric. A public law school will give the UMass system a tool to keep graduating law students in Massachusetts and boost the numbers of public interest lawyers to promote the University's mission of service.

Undergraduates and others interested in law school should get involved to help promote the merger and ensure its success. Write letters to the Board of Trustees, the Board of Higher Education, and state legislators to show your support. It's possible that within a few short years a UMass graduate will be able to receive an affordable legal education from an accredited state school. For this reason and many others, the merger is the right thing to do.

Justin Cormier
UMass Amherst alum

GARGANO LIES AGAIN

While it's nice to see that Vice Chancellor Gargano denied allegations that he is withholding statistical information about the University from student leaders (both graduate and undergraduate), the State of Massachusetts begs to differ. According to the Supervisor of Records of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, the administration has yet to comply with the request for these public records. It's confusing how Gargano can continue to make this claim in the face of such evidence, and confusing that the Collegian will still print his rather obvious untruths – especially when the ruling was printed a week ago in the Graduate Voice. Look it up!

As for this requested information being referred to as "ALANA stats", I wonder why the mere mention of "ethnicity" in the request automatically blankets it entirely as an "ALANA" matter. If you actually read the request (also in the Graduate Voice), you'll see that it asks for not only ethnic information, but place of residence, gender, and class data as well. In fact, the focus of the informational request is on the amount of financial aid that students are receiving, and the departments that they belong to. This isn't simply an "ALANA" issue – it's about figuring out exactly who is accepted into the University, who stays in the University, and who can afford it. Stop throwing down the race card whenever you can't be bothered to read the rest of the appropriate information.

The latter half of the "ALANA stats" article talks about the former Speaker of the SGA, Patrick Higgins and Gargano addressing "the legality of the ALANA caucus seats earlier this summer via a series of emails." What the article fails to mention is that this was no innocent discussion. Higgins and Gargano were actively conspiring to do away with the ALANA caucus permanently. The leaked emails (the content of which Gargano has noticeably failed to deny) clearly show that General Council Terrence O'Malley had, in fact, given his opinion with regard to the legality of the ALANA caucus over the summer, and that opinion was approving of the Caucus and its charter. The emails also describe just how Higgins planned to go about withholding this information from the rest of the student body as "there is no record that this passed through the VC's office."

Gargano is taking advantage of this student forum. He knows you'll print whatever he says without questioning it or seeking a dissenting opinion. This kind of slimy, self-interested attitude is exactly the reason why the SGA senate passed an overwhelming vote of no confidence in Gargano last week.

I urge all students (and especially those who may consider themselves critical reporters) to take what he says with a mountain of salt!

Andres Gomez
Umass Student

SUBMIT A LETTER OR OPINION

editorial@dailycollegian.com
413-545-3699
Letters to the Editor
113 Campus Center
Amherst, MA 01003

How much I hate reality TV

What is the craze about reality TV that has come up over the last couple of years? Apparently some of us enjoy watching people get tortured on national TV. The rise of reality TV has turned the audience into a sadistic mass of people. Even when the viewer wants one of the contestants to win, the contestant is still going through the torture that is prescribed to him or her by the show. The contestants on these shows compete for fame and prizes, and they are willing to do anything to get it. The reality TV shows take advantage of this and they put the contestants through a living hell.

The contestants jump from high places, eat worms, and swim through sewer tunnels, and suffer many more indignities. The torture that the contestants are going through entertains the viewer.

The first style of reality TV that emerged was the game show. Everyone remembers watching Wheel of Fortune and Jeopardy. Game shows were a national phenomenon. Today there are so many game shows that there is a Game Show Network. There is nothing sadistic about watching a traditional game show since you want one contestant to win. Unless you want one person to lose, there is no sadistic pleasure in watching these shows.

Another type of "reality TV" that has emerged is the talk show. On talk shows like Oprah, there is a sense of decency in the treatment of the guests. However on shows like Jerry Springer and Maury Povich, the guests get into violent confrontations with each other (very violent on the Springer show). Lives of the guests are changed in these types of shows and the Springer audience just throws one insult after another at the guests.

On the Maury Povich show, women are not sure as to who their baby's father is and whether they are cheating on their spouse or not. After DNA testing and giving a lie detector test, at least one person is crushed on national TV and the audience looks on and considers this entertainment.

The Jerry Springer show has been voted the worst show in the history of television and the fans still love it. The guests are brought from the bottom rung of society and are humiliated on the air in some way or another. Almost every story deals with infidelity and love triangles. The guests usually get so violent that they have to be restrained. The guests are made into fools on national television and are jeered by the audience at the end of the show. What is really sick is that if a woman (or man) shows off her breasts in public, she gets a necklace of Springer beads. There is a bell that is occasionally rung, which triggers the guests to attack each other like animals. The Springer show has one of the most sadistic audiences on the air.

After game shows and talk shows, a new kind of reality TV has been put on the air. There is a program called the Simple Life, which has its second season. It has mega fortune heiresses Paris Hilton and Nicole Ritchie either live in a small town or drive cross-country. Either way they make complete fools out of themselves and they get more fame and public attention because of it. The Simple Life entertains us but it also makes the rich and famous richer and more famous.

There is a show that is now on the FX network called Scare Tactics. This is a game show that embraces the new style of reality TV. The contestants jump from high places, eat worms, and swim through sewer tunnels, and suffer many more indignities. The torture that the contestants are going through entertains the viewer. If this isn't sadistic, I don't know what is.

There were days when people watched Star Search and were entertained by the critics finding the next star. Today there is a program called American Idol which pretty much does the same thing, except a judge, Simon Caldwell is the harshest critic in TV history. It is as if he enjoys crushing the hopes and dreams of the contestants.

Every season, another reality TV program comes on the air. There is always a challenge for the contestants. The challenges become more cruel as time goes on and the more sadistic the challenges get, the more the viewer is entertained. This is reminiscent of ancient Rome when the prisoners were eaten by lions in the Coliseum.

Arka Sen is a UMass Student.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 2004 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

By Jeffrey Horowitz
Collegian Staff

There are plenty of typical action movie complaints with the preposterous plot, the absurd chase scenes, the corny montages at building suspense and the overwhelming majority of the hero defeating the villain, winning the girl, and saving the day. Loyal moviegoers can make a map of this kind of film, marking all the predictable twists and turns as unsuspecting every corny surprise. It's exhausting watching the same movies every week and we long for something new every once in a while. Rarely do we get it. "National Treasure" is just like the typical action movie, but it's the only typical movie I can think of where the words "convenient" and "obligatory" turn up this often. That's an accomplishment.

"National Treasure" stars Nicolas Cage as Benjamin Franklin Gates, a treasure hunter who heard a story about vast treasures from his grandfather when he was a child. Now he is a grown man and not only still looks for the treasure, but has convinced fellow grown men, that the treasure, his Grandpa John used to speak of is real. They all devote their lives and careers to hunting this treasure that may or may not exist while his father (Jon Voight), a snotty older grown man, scoffs at the idea. How very sad it would be if Ben Gates was a real person. How would he support himself? That's right, in these kinds of films you don't need a job or an income just a purpose to serve as the movie hero. A hero comes complete with a very nice apartment furnished with top-secret gadgets to decode the clues. His lab must have been paid for by, I don't know, investors he promised a cut of the treasure.

The movie revolves around him finding all these clues with his buddy Riley (Justin Bartha), the electronic genius, who provides a double whammy by being the brain and the comic relief. They are both chasing this treasure that was buried long ago by the founding fathers of America and guarded by Knights, and moved dozens of times, by people that were generous enough to leave behind clues in case someone like Ben ever wanted to find it.

The most laughable scenes are the scenes where Ben decodes the clues while Riley stares at him, like the rest of us, with a blank face wondering how he extracts such a logical conclusion, so clear, from something so vague. I don't know how Cage kept a straight face in those scenes. He appears like the old Adam West type "Batman and Robin" characters trying to decode the enigmas of the evildoer, The Riddler. In one scene, he gets a code from a scribe containing letters written in the 1800's. It says something to the effect of "the cast of dye set the twelfth hour of a written cat will find you the sun of the golden map." In this like the rest of the mind-boggling scenes, he decodes the impossible clues, like the one above, with awe-inspiring intelligence in explanations that go something like this: "'Cast' obviously means ink! Dye is a kind of ink! But why would they say ink twice? They must mean blood! 'Twelfth hour' is another word for fifth year!" "Written on"? They didn't write on cats. The cat must have written it! 'Golden sun of the map'. The map is golden and the sun shines on the map! I've got it! The map must be on Pleasant Street under the street light entitled Golden Cat! "

There are a lot of scenes like that one. The film of course needs an obligatory villain (Sean Bean) as well as a hot girl for the treasure hunter to smooch at the end. So the film begins as they find a clue helpfully labeled under the snow as the exact thing they were looking for. (That will happen a lot, things being helpfully labeled just in case Ben happens to dig in

See TREASURE on page 5

'National Treasure'
Directed by Jerry Bruckheimer
Starring Nicolas Cage, Jon Voight
Walt Disney
Rated PG
145 mins.
Grade B-

'National Treasure' comes up short with premise and plot

TREASURE from page 4

a particular location). During this treasure excavation he gets into a fight with one of his treasure hunting colleagues who decide they want to steal the Declaration of Independence because the next clue might be on the back. Ben tells him not to. The villain whips out a gun. He says he's going to steal it anyway and tries to kill Ben, who miraculously survives with Riley. Ben concludes the only rational explanation. He must go to Washington with Riley and steal the Declaration of Independence. He must steal it to protect it because if he doesn't, the bad guy will steal it and that will be unfortunate, because you shouldn't steal the Declaration of Independence without good intentions.

So Ben first tries to warn a National Archives woman that the bad guy is going to steal the Declaration of Independence. Her name is Abigail (Diane Kruger), a young blonde with a nice figure and exceptional cleavage. Not some 60 year old grandmother who's paid her dues to get such a job, because Cage wont end the film kissing an old lady. Of course, she doesn't believe him about a bad guy plotting to steal the Declaration. But he gives her a pin that George Washington once wore and she likes the crusty old thing so she develops a crush on him. Ben inevitably steals the Declaration because the National Archives is going to be having a ball, during which they are going to dry clean the Declaration, which they do on a weekly basis anyway to keep it nice looking. Security isn't very tight during the ball because the plot needs Ben to steal it.

Ben steals the document and almost gets caught. Abigail tries to stop him but gets herself whisked away into the adventure — with acting so bad, viewers may start to yearn for the 60-year-old grandmother. When the bad guys steal the Declaration from Ben, it's actually a fake one because Ben tells us, "I kept the real one in my coat! I thought I might need a fake so I bought an imitation at the gift shop, just in case." Uh huh.

They will continue to hunt for the treasure throughout the movie, the Declaration is merely one of the maps, although the trailer would have us think otherwise. The bad guy and his crew of bad guy henchmen, will follow them, trying to kidnap Ben, Riley and Abigail, and threaten them with guns that if they don't give them their latest clues they'll shoot them down, in which case they wouldn't find the treasure anyway.

If they originally split up because Ben wouldn't steal the Declaration, but now he has stolen it, why not just make amends and hunt for the treasure together, like in the olden days? That would be too easy. The movie needs chase sequences that are tiresome, FBI agents that don't belong and lots of deceptions for the good guy to set up for the bad guy that are too elaborate to work.

I love one scene where they need another clue, so they send a fifth grader to write it down because the bad guys are near. He writes the scientific codes down with no problem. They decode them in one of those ridiculous riddle solving scenes and go to a bell, which soon turns into a clock because it's in an ivory tower. The clock casts a shadow which leads Ben down stairs to look around, notice one of the bricks are loose in the wall, take it out, find some x-ray glasses and use them to read the map. The map tells them crucial clues, but only with these glasses, which they wouldn't have found unless all those measures were performed to a tee. It's a good thing these characters never miss a thing.

How did they make this movie and keep a straight face? Why did they attempt to make this movie a serious action film? Sure it makes fun of itself, on and off, for comic relief. But how do they even attempt to keep any of the plot, melodrama or clue discussion sincere? How do these actors have the ability to pretend so frantically that finding the treasure is crucial. How did someone with the integrity of Cage keep a straight face while acting it? How did the filmmakers keep a straight face while filming it? How did I keep a straight face while watching it?

Well that last one is easy.

I couldn't.

COURTESY WALT DISNEY

Bartha, left, and Cage star in Walt Disney's predictable and unplausible action film "National Treasure."

List leaves much to be desired

By Tony Hicks
Knight Ridder

Rolling Stone magazine says Bob Dylan's "Like a Rolling Stone" tops its list of the 500 greatest songs of all time in its new issue, which was released Friday.

They wish.

Disclaimer alert: Such lists mean absolutely nothing. There's no mathematical formula, based on sales, spins, notes, chords or strength of drugs the artist was or wasn't on when recording. These are totally subjective decisions made by a bunch of writers and editors.

So invite people over and argue about it until you can't talk. Sever friendships, get divorced, write the kids out of the will. In the long run, none of it matters. Because we're all right. And wrong.

But really, what are these people thinking?

They want to irritate music lovers for a week or two, Eminem isn't available for the cover every week.

Anyway, their Top 10 goes like this: After "Like a Rolling Stone," the Rolling Stones come in second with "Satisfaction." (Rolling Stones follow "Like a Rolling Stone" for Rolling Stone magazine. Hmmm.) OK. Third is John Lennon with "Imagine." Fourth is Marvin Gaye's "What's Going On," followed by Aretha Franklin's "Respect." Which isn't as good as Otis Redding's original, but, OK.

Then comes the Beach Boys' "Good Vibrations," a good song, but not Top 30. Seventh is Chuck Berry's "Johnny B. Goode," which only pretty much started this whole rock 'n' roll thing. Then comes "Hey Jude." Paul McCartney closes his shows with this. People cry. The RS staffers probably raise their lighters. Fine.

Nirvana's "Smells Like Teen Spirit" is ninth, which is acceptable. Ray Charles' "What'd I Say," is 10th, indicating the RS staff wrote this minutes after weeping through a free sneak preview of the new Ray Charles movie. Suckers. I'm not saying money changed hands, but…

The rest of the list goes something like this: Bob Dylan, Beatles, Beatles, Bob Dylan, Rolling Stones, Rolling Stones. Glen Campbell, Bob Dylan. Actually, Campbell did make the list, twice, which is two more than Pearl Jam. You figure that one out.

Instead of picking apart this list until we either die or run out of newsprint, I'll now hit some highlights/lowlights, and pretend that you think I'm right.

What's wrong with this list:

-Age: Apparently, there are no RS writers under the age of 70. The Beatles and Stones, with 590 songs on the list, deserve most of their spots. Dylan, with the other 110, probably doesn't. So much weight is given to age, and there are no clear criteria. As in, are we talking the most influential songs? The best songs? Or simply the songs rock critics think make them look good? Because if I have to hear about the genius of The Band anymore, I may take my own life.

-More on ageism: Somehow RS wants us to believe that borderline one-hit wonders in the '50s and '60s are infinitely better than one-hit wonders of the '80s, '90s and 2000s. In other words, Dexy's Midnight Runners took it in the shorts.

-15. "London Calling," the Clash. Of course it's good, but it's also possibly the most overrated song on this list. I realize, to be cool, you have to consider the Clash nothing short of genius. But not that genius.

-18. "Maybellene," Chuck Berry. OK, we already paid tribute. He was a trailblazer, but he really just wrote that one song over and over and over. Bump "Johnny B. Goode" to No. 1 and let's move on with our lives.

-70. "Walk On By," Dionne Warwick. Above "California Girls," "Summertime Blues," "Supersition" and "Whole Lotta Love"? Someone call the Psychic Hotline and ask Dionne if she foretold this.

-103: "Hot Stuff," Donna Summer: Disco rules and all, but this is 86 song spots higher than "Stayin' Alive." Criminal.

-158: "Rock Around the Clock," Bill Haley & His Comets: An oldie worth defending. Maybe I just watched too much "Happy Days," growing up, but listen to that guitar.

-200: "Loser," Beck: Yeah, yeah, this was cute. He's a loser, kill him, blah blah. He break-dances and he's white. But if one feels the need to represent Beck on a best song list, surely one can do better.

-314: "Comfortably Numb," Pink Floyd: What, none of these RS writers smoked pot in the '70s? Putting "Wish You Were Here," two spots later reeks of "Hey, uh, guys … we forgot to include Pink Floyd. Quick, jam something in there."

-257: "Wild Thing," the Trogs: This song should be outlawed.

There were more, to be sure. You can figure it out by calling your friends and starting the debate.

HIGH RISK STUDENTS, FACULTY & STAFF
GET A FLU SHOT AT THE UHS OPEN FLU CLINIC
THURSDAY, DECEMBER 2
10 A.M. TO 4 P.M. COST: $15
CAMPUS CENTER ROOM 163-C
UMassAmherst UNIVERSITY HEALTH SERVICES

Celebrities shun famed holiday parade

By Gillian Flaccus
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — The biggest stars at the Hollywood Christmas Parade this year will be the marble ones under the feet of spectators.

The annual parade, which winds past the Hollywood Walk of Fame, was once a tradition as rich and famous as the celebrities who graced its floats: Jimmy Stewart, Bob Hope, Mary Pickford and Gregory Peck, to name a few.

But the event's cachet has declined so much in recent years that the Hollywood personality generating the most excitement for the 73rd parade on Sunday is a cartoon character, SpongeBob SquarePants.

The other big names? Female boxer Laila Ali, the winners of the reality show "The Amazing Race 5" and out-of-tune "American Idol" loser William Hung.

"The parade used to be huge, a million people would come and there were huge stars," said Michael Levine, author and publicist to the stars. "But today there's no sense of obligation to anyone except yourself and the immediate. It's a shame. The celebrities are missing a great opportunity."

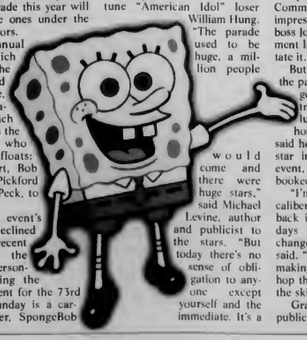
The event has been in such dire straits recently that the Hollywood Chamber of Commerce called celebrity impresario and Walk of Fame boss Johnny Grant out of retirement last year to try to resuscitate it.

But even Grant, who rescued the parade in 1978 and kept it going for 20 years, has had trouble restoring its faded luster. The 81-year-old honorary Hollywood mayor said he called "just about every star in town" for this year's event, but most were already booked.

"I'm not sure we have the caliber stars today that we had back in the era of the golden days of Hollywood. It has changed drastically," Grant said. "Today the young kids are making a lot of money and they hop the charter jet to Miami or the ski slopes or wherever."

Grant hopes that with more publicity, the parade will return to its glory days, when he could call the biggest Hollywood names directly and ask them to appear. In those days, he said, celebrities would fight to be in the parade because it was a sign they had arrived.

"Arnold Schwarzenegger told me once that he spent his first night in Hollywood sitting on the curb watching the Hollywood Christmas Parade and wondering if he would ever get in it," Grant said. The governor has since appeared in the parade, but last year he couldn't commit to be grand marshal.



The history of the parade is as storied as Hollywood itself. The first, called the Santa Claus Lane Parade, was staged in 1928 by merchants who wanted to drum up holiday business on Hollywood Boulevard. It consisted of a sleigh on wheels pulled by two live reindeer, with starlet Jeanette Loff on board.

In 1946, Gene Autry heard the children along the parade route shouting for Santa Claus and was inspired to write the holiday classic "Here Comes Santa Claus." The parade has been held every year except for 1930 and three years during World War II. In 1978, the event started to lose its appeal and then-TV personality Grant swooped in with financial backing from Autry to revive it. He renamed it the Hollywood Christmas Parade to draw attention to its star quality and to generate national interest.

But the event has faltered in the five years since Grant stepped down as executive producer, losing live television coverage, corporate sponsors and much of its star power. In 2002, NBC decided to ignore the parade in favor of a one-hour "variety show" taped a week earlier.

Grant hopes his involvement this year will show Hollywood's A-list that they have a vested interest in Tinseltown's past.

"I don't think we've done a very good job telling them how important a tradition this is," he said.

The University of Massachusetts Amherst
Commission on Campus Diversity
and
Chair Orlando Taylor

Extend an invitation to the UMass Amherst Community to attend a Public Forum on Campus Diversity and listen to presentations from the Campus Community

Thursday, December 9
7:00 to 10:00 p.m.
Curry Hicks Gymnasium

For more information, including how to register as a presenter, visit the Campus Diversity website

www.umass.edu/campusdiversity

Minutewomen split pair with intra-state rivals, earn first win

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

This Thanksgiving break saw the Massachusetts women's basketball program show off two different teams.

There was the team last Tuesday in Worcester that erased a halftime deficit to deliver an exciting, last-second victory over Holy Cross. Then, there was the Minutewoman squad that held close with the No. 20 Boston College Eagles until late in the game on Saturday.

BC	62
UMass	47

UMass	61
Holy Cross	60

Tuesday's match with the Crusaders saw a sudden burst of second-half intensity by the Maroon and White. And while they completely extinguished their slowly built eight-point lead against Holy Cross (3-2) in the final two minutes of the game, Pam Rosanio's layup with six seconds to go allowed the Minutewomen (1-3) to escape the Hart Center with a 61-60 victory in front of a crowd of 1,179.

"What I would have liked to have seen was for us to keep our cool after taking that seven-point lead," coach Marnie Dacko said. "But at the same time, our defensive effort was terrific, our rebounding was outstanding and we're starting to believe that we can win."

Freshman Rosanio led all scorers for the second time in three games, nailing 10 to go along with two assists, two rebounds and a 50 percent night from both the floor and the charity stripe. Sophomore Brittany Keil led the Crusaders with 16 points of her own, including four-of-five from downtown, to go with a five-rebound and three-assist performance in the losing effort.

The first half saw a back and forth exchange of baskets that had Holy Cross in an advantage. Slowly but steadily, on the efforts of Keil's hot hand, the Crusaders led by as much as seven midway through the first. It seemed that every time the Maroon and White made an attempt to cut down the lead, the Crusaders simply tossed the ball out to Keil, who was set outside the three-point line.

UMass went into the half trailing 33-34, but when they re-emerged from the locker room, it was an entirely different squad.

"We were really hungry," center Patrycja Gulak said. Gulak was UMass's other double-figure scorer on the night, draining 13 to go with six rebounds and two blocks. "We really wanted to win [tonight], especially coming back to our home court [Saturday]."

And that hunger paid off as the Minutewomen slowly but steadily built an eight-point lead as the second half progressed. It was a different, more aggressive, more up-tempo UMass squad. Different, that is, until the final two minutes of the game, when the Minutewomen literally came within inches from a sudden collapse.

Leading 59-51 with just under three minutes to go, Ashley Sharpton took a crucial charge, and it seemed all but sure that the Minutewomen would escape with victory. But then, the Crusaders went on a 9-0 run, aided by contributions from Sarah Placek, Maggie Fontana, Keil and culminating with the go-ahead trey by Ashley McLaughlin with 63 seconds to go.

Then, trailing 60-59 with under 10 seconds left, Tamara Tatham wrestled down a long rebound and kicked it out Rosanio who, streaking along the left side of the court, went up for a break-away layup and gave the Minutewomen the lead 61-60 with 6.7 seconds to go.

Holy Cross had one last chance, but Fontana missed a six-foot jumper as time expired, and UMass escaped with a dramatic win.

The Maroon and White weren't as fortunate on Saturday, however, as the Eagles used a second half scoring surge to pull away from the Minutewomen in a 62-47 defeat at the Mullins Center in front of a crowd of 1,238.

Brooke Queenan led all scorers on the afternoon, dropping 21 points for the Eagles (3-1) to go with an eight-for-15 night from the floor and six rebounds. Point guard Jess Doherty put up 14 points in the BC win, while shooting 50 percent from the floor and tallying six rebounds.

Tatham put out her best performance of the young season, leading the Minutewomen with 14 points — including a perfect six-for-six from the foul line—and also contributing four rebounds and a steal. For the third time in four games, Rosanio hit double figures. This time, the frosh from Southampton, P.A. went six-for-12 in field goals and one-for-three from the line for 13 points.

Anthony Anderson and the Minutemen return to action Wednesday night at home against Northeastern.

UMass stomps Yale

MEN'S HOOPS from page 8

tributed 12 points and six assists. Lappas said that the incident was "not a big deal", and indicated that Maxwell will likely return to his starting role when the Minutemen host Northeastern Wednesday night at 7 p.m. Senior guard Chris Chadwick replaced Maxwell in the starting lineup and had five points and three assists in 24 minutes.

Freshmen forwards Lawrence Carrier and Jeff "Big Deli" Salovski also continue to make significant contributions as well. Carrier took advantage of his first significant playing time of the season, scoring 10 points and adding six rebounds in 16 minutes, while Salovski scored four points and hauled in six rebounds in 10 minutes.

"Big Deli," who has become an instant fan favorite, also ignited the small but spirited crowd when he dove after a loose ball and successfully called for time out to secure possession midway through the first half.

"We had two freshmen come in and give us a tremendous lift, Lawrence Carrier and Jeff Salovski," Lappas said. "We had four sophomores, two freshmen out there. It's great to see them go out there and play like that together."

Sophomore Art Bowers also chipped in with six points for UMass while classmate Stephane Lasme posted 10 rebounds and six points as well.

Center and former Princeton transfer Dominick Martin led the Bulldogs with a game- and career-high 23 points but was the lone Yale player in double figures. Guards Edwin Draughan and Alex Gamboa each tossed in eight points while Worcester Academy product Sam Kaplan scored seven points.

Trailing 15-9 halfway through the first half, UMass embarked on a 17-4 run that gave it a lead it did not relinquish. After five points from Carrier sandwiched around a Freeman lay-up gave the Minutemen their second lead of the game at 16-15, Gamboa responded with a driving lay-up of his own to put Yale back out in front.

The Maroon and White then regained control of the contest for good, using a baseline jumper by Freeman and a leaning one-hander from Chadwick to jump out in front 20-17 with 5:11 to play in the half.

After a Chadwick free throw and a transition dunk by Maxwell, the Bulldogs responded with a hoop from Caleb Holmes before Anderson came right back with a 3-pointer that pushed UMass' lead to 26-19 with just over four minutes to play.

The Minutemen then closed the half on a mini 6-2 run, culminating with a strong post move by Freeman that resulted in the final basket of the half with 30 seconds to play, securing a 32-26 halftime lead.

After UMass scored the first seven points of the second half, Yale cut its deficit to six before the Minutemen pulled away for good, opening up leads as large as 17 before eventually sealing the victory.

Freshman pair look to chip in

FRESHMEN from page 8

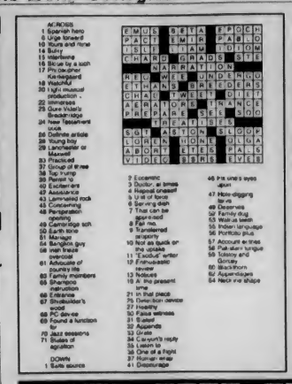
ly," Lappas said. "We have such a strong nucleus of guys around them that they can both grow and get better in our system and really make us that much better now and down the line."

For Carrier, who sat out last season as an academic non-qualifier, Sunday's game was the first chance for the 6-foot-8 forward to showcase the skills that made him a top-five recruit nationally in high school. Known as a deadly long-range shooter, Carrier shot 50 percent from beyond the arc (2-for-4) but also showed good prowess in getting to the hoop on three separate occasions, including a solid basket cut and lay-up in the second half.

"It felt great [to contribute]," Carrier said. It doesn't matter if I score or not; I'm out there just to try to get rebounds. Everyday in practice I am competing against these guys so it helps me get more confidence in my game."

"The Big Deli", meanwhile, made a strong first impression on the Mullins Center faithful when he entered Tuesday night's contest late in the second half and hit two crucial free throws to help ice a victory. He then continued to assert himself as a fan favorite on Sunday, scoring four points and grabbing six boards in his 10 minutes of play before showing his tenacity by diving for a loose ball on the floor in the first half.

"I just want to get better and help the team each game," Salovski said following the win over BSC. "All I can do is work hard and hope that I can continue to do my part in helping us be successful."



Amherst Computerworks, Inc.
PC & Laptop Sales/Service/Repair 5-College Certified Vendor
Laptop & LCD Projector Rentals
Repairing Macs and all brands of PC's
Selling new Custom desktop & laptop PC's
9 East Pleasant St. Amherst, MA 01002
Phone: (413) 548-8900 Fax: (413) 548-8030
Est. 1990 aci@acipc.com

DO YOU HAVE A Favorite Academic Advisor? nominate them for the Outstanding Academic Advisor Award
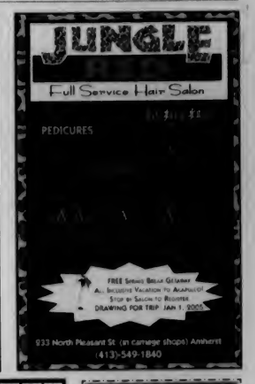
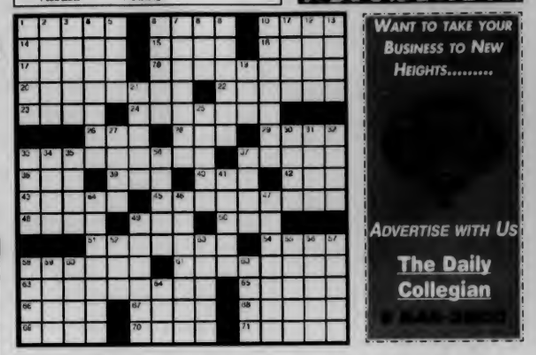
The Nominating Committee for the 2004-2005 Outstanding Academic Advisor Award invites all students, faculty and staff to nominate undergraduate academic advisors whose practices distinguish them from otheer advisors. The characteristics of an outstanding advisor include but are not limited to:
•Building strong relationships with students
•Monitoring students' progress toward academic and career goals
•Making appropriate referrals
•Knowing and understanding institutional regulations, policies and procedures
Nominations of faculty and staff who advise undergraduate students should be submitter to:
Outstanding Academic Advisor Award Committee
Office of the Provost
362 Whitmore Building
Nominations (in writing, by phone, or by e-mail to getinde@provost.umass.edu) should be recieved by Friday 12/3/04. For further information, call the Provost's Office at 545-2554.

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE UMASS, AMHERST
HELPING STUDENTS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS
Free Legal Advice, Referrals, Representation and Counseling for UMASS Students
Student & Workers Rights, Family & Criminal Law, Landlord/Tenant & Consumer Disputes
CALL 545-1995 or stop in at 922 Campus Center



UMASS OXFORD SUMMER SEMINAR
TRINITY COLLEGE
OXFORD UNIVERSITY
JULY 3-AUGUST 12, 2005
There will be a general information meeting for students interested in learning more about the UMass Oxford Summer Seminar on Tuesday, November 30 at 4:30 pm in Campus Center Room 803
The UMass Oxford Summer Seminar offers courses in liturature, international law, history, film and politics. All students reside in Trinity College, one of Oxford's most beautiful colleges, and all faculty members are British academics, most of them currently teaching at Oxford. Students may earn up to eight undergraduate credits. Tuition, room and board for the six week program is $5500. A limited amount of merit-based financial aid is available.
For more information about the program, visit www.umass/oxford or email the program at oxford@english.umass.edu.



ACROSS
1 Spanish hero
6 Urge forward
10 Yours and mine
14 Bullfight
15 Bring to bay
16 Move by a sash
17 Pre-Columbian Ice-dweller
18 Wasteful
20 Light musical production
22 Immerses
23 Guns Violet's Beaker-ridge
24 Near Tewkesbury town
26 Dolmens and the like
28 Young boy
29 Actor Keitel or Maxwell
30 Practiced
32 Group of three
36 Top Trump
38 Pervert's
40 Exciter's aire
42 Assistance
43 Laminated rock
45 Concerning
48 Perigeanbish
49 Cambridge lash
50 Earth time
51 Manage
54 Bangkok guy
56 Irish Yeats overcoat
61 Advocate of country life
62 Family members
65 Shamless instructors
66 Entrance requirement's need
68 PC device
69 Found a function for 70 Jazz sessions
71 Blades of agitation

DOWN
1 Bells sauce
2 Eccentric
3 Duolor, at times
4 Hapless shakespeare
5 Unit of force
6 Lyric's high
7 Tree can be found
8 Fair mix
9 Transferred property
10 Not as quick or the uptake
11 "Exodus" writer
12 Enthusiastic review
13 Notices
19 At the present
21 In that place
25 Detection device
27 Hostility
30 False witness
31 Baked
32 Appends
33 Grate
34 Canute's reply
35 Learn to
36 One of a Flight
37 Roman wine
41 Discourage
46 Pin one's eyes upon
47 Hole-digging tennis
48 Deserves
50 Family dog
53 Wait as seen
55 Indian language
56 Portfolio plus
57 Account entries
58 Put down tongue
59 Tommy and Ginsley
60 Blackthorn
62 Supercargoes
64 Hold in or shape

Want to take your Business to New Heights.....
Advertise with Us
The Daily Collegian

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You're going to catch some weird disease from those sheets.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Time for you to lay off the sweets and start eating real food.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Don't get too serious too fast with that new love interest of yours.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Watch what you say. You don't want to jinx yourself.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Take up knitting. It's the new cool thing to do.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You need to avoid falling into the same traps over and over again.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Sometimes you just have a way of stinking.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Today you will find more evidence that your roommate is in some sort of cult.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You should start worrying about your money because you don't have a whole lot.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You are such a typical scorpio. So mysterious.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Yes, people are laughing at you. You are not paranoid.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Today you will find all the answers. Like why you keep losing your change...

Quote of the Day

"Once someone asked me what pleasure I got out of riding my bike for so long. Pleasure? I asked. I don't understand the question. I didn't do it for pleasure. I did it for pain."

-Lance Armstrong

Don't let your business get swept away by waves of competitors
Advertise with the Collegian
545.3500

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Announcements

Linguistics Department seeks native speakers of Arabic (preferably Egyptian Arabic) and Singapore English for speech experiments. Experiments last about 1 hour w/participants paid $8/hr. Arabic speakers contact kawahara@linguist.umass.edu; Singapore English speakers contact mwolf@linguist.umass.edu

Apartment for Rent

Need an Apt. for 2nd Semester? Short Term Leases, Free Heat, Huge Bedrooms Call The Boulders 256-8534

Apartment for Rent

Spacious 2 bedroom apartment pay only 1 month to move in now offering flexible lease term discounted rent on select styles free heat and hot water, free cable and high speed internet, fully applianced kitchens, washer / dryer in select styles. On bus route, cat friendly call today 665-3856 visit www.sugarloafestates.com Monday – Friday 8-5:30pm on Saturday 10-4 Limited Time Offer

Brandywine Apts. 1 Bedroom units Available Jan 1, 2005 First come, first serve. Get them while they last.

Apartment for Rent

www.brandywineapts.com Stop by or call 549-0600

Computers

Pentium Laptop $99- Pentium III Desktop $99- 413-584-8857

Employment

Winter Break Employment at the Boston University Bookstore. Many temp jobs available! Kenmore Square location. Applications accepted Dec. 7 & 8 at the UMass Campus Center Concourse or email your resume to bnhmnres@bu.edu

Employment

SPRING INTERNSHIPS Student Legal Services Office offers a hands-on experience in the Legal field, working directly with attorneys and clients. No experience in the legal profession necessary – training provided. Work 32 hours a week and earn 12 academic credits. Deadline to begin the application process is Nov 24. Contact SLSO today: 545-1995 922 Campus Center.

"Bartending" $300/Day Potential. No Experience Nesc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

For Sale

MP3 $50 Avon Special MP3 & 100's of gifts under $10. Buy or Sell Kat ISR 413-585-1581.

Roommate Wanted

325/month inclusive call 413-775-9997

Services

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

Services

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house Certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

Travel

1SPRING BREAK Largest selection of Destinations, including Cruises! VIP Club Parties & FREE trips. Epicurean Tours 1-800-231-4-FUN www.BREAKNOW.com

Travel

Spring Break Bahamas Celebrity Party Cruise! 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Nassau, Jamaica, From $459! Panama City & Daytona $159! www.SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Spring Break 2005- Travel with STS, America's #1 Student Tour Operator to Jamaica, Cancun, Acapulco, Bahamas and Florida. Now hiring on-campus reps. Call for group discounts. Information/Reservations 1-800-648-4849 or www.ststravel.com.

Travel

StudentCity.com The Ultimate Spring Break Experience. 1-888-SpringBreak, or www.StudentCity.com to reserve today.

SPRING BREAK '05
SAVE $100 PER ROOM
Clip & Send or Use Code: PRMW, Online
1 800 626 7710

Wanted

Snowboard events intern $50/day stipend. For job description email jfriends@deerfield.edu

Collegian Advertising 545-3500

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS MONDAY

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 2004 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Getting off on the right foot

Freeman leads UM to 2-0, past Yale

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

One of the Massachusetts men's basketball team's major flaws in struggling through an 11-17 campaign last season was its inability to rebound both offensively and defensively — a problem often exploited by bigger, stronger and more physical teams as the year wore on.

On opening night against Birmingham Southern, the Minutemen showed more of the same, losing the battle of the boards on both ends before eventually securing a 64-60 victory. Yet, on Sunday afternoon against Ivy League foe Yale, UMass showed a newfound tenacity on the glass with help from the unlikeliest of sources, as Anthony Anderson grabbed 13 rebounds to help spark a 70-56 non-conference victory before 2,675 at the William D. Mullins Center.

UMass	70
Yale	56

The Maroon and White improved to 2-0 on the season with the win while the Bulldogs fell to 1-3. UMass returns to action on Wednesday night for a 7 p.m. tip-off against in-state rival Northeastern at the Mullins Center.

"We did a great job on the glass...I was very pleased," UMass fourth-year head coach Steve Lappas said. "I was upset at having only four offensive rebounds in the first half. We did a much better job of rebounding the ball in the second half."

"We crushed them on the glass," added sophomore forward Rashaun Freeman, who led the Minutemen with 21 points and grabbed five rebounds. "Going into the A-10, there is not that many big men, so we can crush them on the glass and be successful."

For Anderson, who had seven rebounds in the game's first 12 minutes and nine in the first half, the double-figure rebound total was the first of his career. The senior captain also added six points and four assists in a team-high 36 minutes of play.

"What else do you say about Anthony Anderson? He had thirteen rebounds in the game. It's great to see Anthony have six points in the game and win," Lappas said. "We couldn't have won a game like this in a million years with Anthony Anderson only scoring six points."

Sophomore guard Maurice Maxwell, who was suspended for being five minutes late to a team meeting on Friday and did not start, played 25 minutes and con-

See MEN'S HOOPS on page 6

MATTHEW REISWIG/COLLEGIAN

Senior point guard Anthony Anderson led UMass with a career-high 13 rebounds.

Freshmen fit into rotation

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

One is affectionately known to a cult following in and around Massachusetts men's basketball as "The Big Deli," while the other is simply known to his teammates as "I.C." They are the new faces of Massachusetts men's basketball.

Neither, however, brings any college basketball experience to a young, up-and-coming Minuteman team looking for more pieces to the puzzle of success — one head coach Steve Lappas feels he can finally piece together this season.

Therefore, when the individual performances of Jeff Salovski and Lawrence Carrier in Saturday's win over Yale translate into "contributor" being added to the list of words that describe the pair of rookies, things may be looking bright for the Minutemen these days.

"[Salovski and Carrier] have helped us in each of the first two games," Lappas said. "They're guys who don't need to come in and take over a game right away, but any contribution we get from them obviously helps us a lot...we feel they are both going to be very good players."

In the win over Yale, the pair combined for 14 points and 12 rebounds in 26 minutes of play after amassing just two points and three rebounds in seven minutes in the season opener against Birmingham Southern. It's the type of improvement Lappas hopes will only continue to manifest itself over the course of the season and the type of improvement he expected when he signed both players.

"When we brought both guys in, we knew they were going to be very good players eventual-

See FRESHMEN on page 6

Cahoon's squad has hit a lull two months into the season

Andrew Merritt

You can throw the loss to Connecticut out as an anomaly, a product of simmering problems facing a team it assumed to be lesser. But make no mistake; this is the low point for the Massachusetts hockey team thus far. In their last four games, the Minutemen have looked nothing like the team most expected them to be — the team that tied No. 1 Boston College two nights before chasing Mercyhurst out of its house.

Starting with the beating they took at Maine on Nov. 19, and continuing through a downright disastrous showing at Vermont, onto their failed western expedition, the Minutemen have quickly found themselves on the wrong side of the overall ledger at 6-8-1. While that 3-3-1 Hockey East record didn't suffer any blemish in Colorado, the trio of games against unpredictable Providence, burgeoning Boston University, and big brother New Hampshire don't exactly feel like opportunities right now. The Hockey East matchups that will end the 2004 conference calendar feel something more like a trip to the principal's office, looming with the possibility that all of UMass' current faults, diminished by their manifestation against non-conference opponents, might continue against the teams that really matter.

Oh, and while we're setting the record straight about the Minutemen's current status, let's address the previous statement. The words "at-large" should no longer be involved in any discussion about this team because losses to Vermont, Denver, Colorado College, and of course UConn have all but eradicated any hopes of sneaking in the back door of the NCAA Tournament as the Minutemen almost did last year. If these skating revolutionaries have any designs on actually participating in the on-ice festivities at the NCAA Regionals, to be held at the Mullins Center in late March, the berth will almost certainly have to come via a trophy-lifting experience at the FleetCenter.

That's right, just run through the regular monoliths of Hockey East — Boston College, Maine, New Hampshire — who will almost certainly be calling for hotel reservations near Causeway Street in a few months, not to mention the one or two dark horses that always pop up in February. The bet here is those pesky Terriers, who could end up hoisting the Beanpot and the Lamoriello Trophy over the Fleet Ice this year.

But before any thoughts of March can start to develop, the Minutemen will have to take a good hard look in the mirror over the next few weeks and find the team that may or may not be hidden within. Sure, one could excuse this weekend's sweep as a couple of losses that won't really matter come February and March, since that, well, you-know-what bid has gone running off into the wilds of northern New York, or perhaps the Midwest.

However, the reason that it might be time to at least take the cover off of the panic button is that the Minutemen have looked mostly dreadful in the last four games. Friday night against Colorado College was the exception, as UMass genuinely looked like the equal of the No. 5 team in the country, but as coach Don Cahoon put it, "found a way to give up a couple of goals." Otherwise, though, there has been a severe lack of upside to the last two weekends. Cahoon has done a number of things to re-ignite the pilot light, like shuffling lines and starting sophomore Mike Waidlich Saturday, in his first collegiate action since the 2002-03 season.

No matter what coaching tricks Cahoon might have up his sleeve, though, the Minutemen simply haven't responded. Scoring has become a rarity, and while there are very few on the team who could be cited for a lack of effort (though there are some), there's no clicking, no cohesion, none of those peculiar abstracts of hockey that don't make any stat sheet but have as much to do with success and failure as any number. Scoring opportunities were available all night Friday, and there was little result. Conversely, the Minutemen and Pioneers traded just 39 shots Saturday, and UMass couldn't put together the few chances they saw.

UMass has struggled in shootouts like the 76-shot affair with Connecticut and has also come up empty in defensive battles like the one on Oct. 15 against Minnesota when the two teams combined for just 38 attempts. The Minutemen have lost to teams they should have beaten (hello again, Huskies), and reeked out a tie against a BC team everyone expected would flirt with double-digit scoring.

In the first few weeks of the 2004-05 season, the Minutemen struggled to find an identity, playing like a different team every night, sometimes very good, sometimes not as much. But the Jekyll-and-Hyde team of a few weeks ago isn't even what we're seeing now. Dr. Jekyll seems to have skipped town, and the ugly Mr. Hyde team has taken over.

Andrew Merritt is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at asmerritt@dailycollegian.com.

KAREN KING/COLLEGIAN

P.J. Fenton has been one of the sole bright spots early on in the UMass hockey season. The Minutemen are in the midst of a four-game skid.

Minutemen fall flat in weekend double-dip

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

DENVER, Colo. — A heavy snowstorm fell here yesterday, locking up highways and air travel. For the Massachusetts hockey team, however, the avalanche came Friday and Saturday, as the Minutemen fell to Colorado College 3-1 on Friday and were run out of Magness Arena by the Denver Pioneers by a 6-1 score Saturday.

UMass falls to 6-8-1 on the season and is mired in a four-game losing streak that stretches back to its 6-2 loss at Maine on Nov. 19. The Minutemen have averaged fewer than two goals a game during that streak, and have given up an average of five tallies.

Denver	6
UMass	1

While the Minutemen stayed with Colorado College (10-2-0) for most of Friday night's game, despite giving up a few untimely goals, Saturday's clash was anything but, as the Pioneers (8-5-0) outdid their guests throughout.

"I think the biggest problem we have now is that we've found ways to self-destruct," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "As good as Denver can be, we certainly, by making some of the decisions we made and some of the plays we made early in the game, beat ourselves as much as they beat us. We put ourselves in the position we did with some fundamental breakdowns."

Colorado Coll.	3
UMass	1

Saturday's game started with a small surprise, as Cahoon opted to bench both Gabe Winer and Tim Warner, who have combined to start every game in net for the Minutemen this season, in favor of Michael Waidlich, who made his first appearance for the Minutemen in more than a year.

Waidlich, who spent last year with the Lincoln Stars of the United States Hockey League, put together a few impressive saves Saturday, and while his goals against average (6.00) isn't going to raise anyone's eyebrows, the majority of the pucks that got past him did so due to a number of outside influences, with Denver skaters camping out in the slot in front of him and picking off cross-ice passes to go in alone on him, as defenseman Brett Skinner did in the second period.

"Mike's been working real hard," said Cahoon, who currently does not plan to alter his two-goalie rotation of Winer and Warner. "He's competed real well in practice. I thought it was important to get him a real look, a test, before Christmastime, and not go into the second semester without being sure that I got that look. I thought that the amount of travel that we have done, and the games that the other two have had, that this seemed like a logical choice to throw him right into the wolves, and I thought he played very well ... and it wasn't until we started running around that he started to let down a little bit, too."

The Pioneers earned the winning margin early, scoring their first and second goals in a 1:34 span late in the first period. After Jeff Drummond scored on a fluky play to tie the game at one, J.D. Corbin, in the right wing corner, found Adrian Veideman enjoying a few minutes in the slot, and Veideman one-timed the pass through Waidlich to give the Pioneers a 2-1 lead heading into the first intermission. They would hold on, thanks to steady goaltending from Peter Mannino (15 saves) and a defense that held the Minutemen mostly away from Mannino's net.

From there, the hosts poured it on in the attacking zone, getting two goals from junior Gabe Gauthier, and little resistance from a Minuteman squad that seemed to struggle with their opponents, as well as the differing style of the WCHA officials compared to Hockey East referees.

For the second time in two nights, the Minutemen got on the board early, and at Denver it was without the burden of an even earlier score by the opposition. David Leaderer scored his first career goal, taking a feed off of an attacking zone faceoff and firing a slapshot from the left wing that zipped past Mannino to make it 1-0 at the 5:41 mark.

The Pioneers, however, tested Waidlich throughout the first period and finally found a way past him at 14:11, when Drummond caught an aerial pass at the blue line, and made a quick fake before ripping a forehand wrister past Waidlich's stick hand.

Denver came back a minute-and-a-half later with Veideman's goal, taking a lead it never relinquished.

Denver continued to pepper Waidlich in the second while the Minuteman attack, which matched the Pioneers stride-for-stride for most of the first, was somewhat dormant. Denver added two goals in the period, starting when Brett Skinner was the happy recipient of a giveaway by Mark Matheson in the UMass zone, with a player from each team in the box. Skinner, all alone in the slot, wristed a shot past Waidlich to increase the Pioneer lead to 3-1 at the 6:35 mark.

Denver added another tally on the power play, as Drummond set up a Skinner slap shot from the point, and Gabe Gauthier deflected it in the slot to make it 4-1 with 1:19 to go in the middle frame.

Gauthier added a rebound goal two minutes into the third period, and Mike Handza capped off the scoring with a hard wrister from the right wing that blistered between Waidlich and the nearside post.

While Friday night's contest was much closer, it was again the Western hosts who got the better end of the stick, as Colorado College edged the Minutemen 3-1 at the Colorado Springs World Arena.

The Minutemen and Tigers got the scoring started early in the first period, trading goals in the first 1:20. Colorado College got it started when Scott Polaski slid a pass out to Aaron Slattengren in the slot, giving Slattengren a point-blank opportunity on Winer. Slattengren promptly backhanded the puck home for a 1-0 CC lead just 18 seconds into the game.

The Minutemen fired back almost as quickly, as Stephen Werner cashed in on a feed from Craig MacDonald at the 1:17 mark, knotting the game at one goal apiece. It stayed that way until there were 19 seconds left in the opening frame when Boston Bruins draftee Mark Stuart centered a pass to Marty Sertich in the low slot with Winer scrambling to cover the gaping net. Winer didn't arrive in time, and Sertich flicked the puck home to send the teams to the locker rooms with a 2-1 Tiger lead.

Slattengren struck again for the Tigers late in the second when he zoomed into the zone along the left wing boards, half-eluded one defender and as he was falling to the ice one-handed his stick at the puck, knocking it under Winer to make it 3-1 Colorado College.

NOTES: It was a bad weekend overall for the two Hockey East teams on western vacations, as Boston University fared no better against Denver and Colorado. The Terriers fell to the Pioneers 4-1 on Friday, and then had the doors blown off the wagon by the Tigers, who skated to a 7-3 victory Saturday.

Pixies to play the Mullins Center
ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 4

TODAY • High: 48 • Low: 34
WEDNESDAY • High: 47 • Low: 28
THURSDAY • High: 44 • Low: 20
DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

Lack of support ends the Madness
SPORTS, PAGE 8

The Daily Collegian

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 2004 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXIV ISSUE 58

UMass professors develop solutions for industrial wastewater treatment

By Sean Whelan
Collegian Correspondent

Sarina Ergas and David Reckhow, professors of civil and environmental engineering at the University of Massachusetts, recently developed custom-tailored methods for treating some of the most polluted water in America – the spent dyebath from textile mills. The methods dramatically ease the environmental impacts, and are very economical to the companies that implement them.

The dyebath that wastewater textile mills create is one of the highest-rated pollutants among all industrial sectors. The pollution load consists of heavy metals, toxic solids, and has notoriously high color content. It becomes useless in the manufacturing process, and is generally released with minimal treatment to wastewater facilities or nearby water supplies through National Pollutant Discharge Elimination Systems permits. Larger facilities can release upwards of 2 million gallons a day.

Ergas and Reckhow, with the help of numerous students, collaborated with 15 textile companies in Massachusetts to confront the problems they generate. Utilizing funding from the National Environmental Technology Institute, as well as private contribution, they developed these methods with a concept of a zero-discharge policy. Adopting these methods recycles the water back into the manufacturing process and leaves little impact on the environment, according to Reckhow. "These companies' motives are not driven by legislation; they stem from economic survivability," said Ergas.

Currently there are 217 facilities operating within the state and supplying 15,000 people with jobs. The methods created for these 15 facilities have dramatically slashed energy bills, reduced wastewater treatment costs and prevented numerous pollutants from entering the water supply. The overall slashing of operating costs makes these methods "highly desirable to the rest of the industry that has predominately moved to Asia or Mexico in order to drive up profits due to little environmental regulation," Reckhow said.

To reach the economic objectives, criteria centered on an inexpensive and efficient method to make 75 percent of the water recyclable. Three years and the testing of eight different methods concluded that "two were found to meet that criteria: electrochemical oxidation, which passes the spent dyebath through an electrolytic cell that in this case is supplied by Zappi Water Purification Systems of Amherst, New York; and ozonation, in which an industrial-strength ozonator is applied to the used dye water," said Ergas.

Profitability wasn't the only concern among many of the companies involved. "Many of these companies are genuinely concerned with our environment. They are run by people with good hearts, who have been integral parts of their communities for hundreds of years and in numerous ways. Being one of the largest employers in their respective communities, the company's survival is parallel to the communities. And the environmental concerns affecting those communities becomes a top priority," Reckhow said. He said that a lack of technology was the only obstacle in the past.

Reckhow was predominantly referring to Malden Mills, based in Lawrence. The company is headed by Aaron Feuerstein and produces high-performance Polartec climate-control fabrics, most commonly found in L.L. Bean and Lands' End clothing products.

The name Malden Mills has been synonymous with corporate responsibility to the communities they operate in. In an industry quick to move overseas to appease stockholders, Feuerstein steadfastly stood by the company's tradition of community responsibility. Their facilities were destroyed by a fire in the late '90s, and the business world expected them to rebuild overseas. In an unprecedented move by most standards, they rebuilt, initiated no layoffs, and extended full benefits during the construction period. In return, their employees are known to be some of the hardest-working in the industry, and profitability has remained.

Three years of hard work and collaboration between Ergas and Reckhow produced results to set an industry standard. The company's motives ranged from profitability to acting in accordance with its conscience. When asked about environmental legislation being a driving force, Ergas said, "If legislation is on the horizon, then our methods are the only chance of survivability [for the Mass. textile industry]."

Serena L. Ergas is a professor at UMass, and the chief undergraduate advisor in the department of civil and environmental engineering. David Reckhow is currently the director of the Environmental Institute on campus, and a professor of numerous environmental engineering courses at UMass.

"Over the past three years, we've spent half of our time in the labs and half in the classrooms," Reckhow said.

This unidentified textile mill is one of the 217 in Massachusetts that provide over 15,000 jobs.

UMass patent library celebrates 20 years

The University of Massachusetts' W.E.B. DuBois library celebrated its 20th anniversary as a federally-designated patent and trademark depository this weekend.

The depositories are responsible for receiving and housing copies of U.S. patents and trademarks with their respective research materials. They are also responsible for making this material available to the public and educating them in how to use it.

When the patent library first opened in 1984, it was the 55th library of its kind in the country. Currently, there are 86 in the nation. The library houses patents including a traffic signal with adjustable light cycles that allows it be adjusted to the flow of traffic, a steering alignment system for a toy car, and a hyper-wash dishwasher that uses 210-degree-Fahrenheit water to clean dishes.

Patent depository librarian Leonard Adams said all the patent records were recorded on paper. When it first opened, people had to search for materials by hand, a process made very difficult and sometimes tedious by the amount of material present. This process was greatly improved when they began to upload material to the Internet. "People had to come here. Now all you have to do is go online," said Adams.

Today, almost all of the records are available for the public to view online, and the database is constantly being updated. "Almost all of it is online," said Adams.

With the information recorded online, people have an easier time searching through it for the information they need. They also no longer have to physically visit the library to access information. "Most of the people who come here [for research] are people from outside the University," said Adams.

Adams says he sees this as the way of the future. He believes that someday the entire process will be completely automated, allowing people to be able to search and register for patents and trademarks online with the click of a mouse. "It's a constant process of putting more and more information online," he said.

The depository was located in the Physical Sciences and Engineering Library, which is now known as the Integrated Sciences and Engineering Library. The depository was moved this year to the sixth floor of the DuBois library when the former patent depository librarian, Cindy Spell, retired. Adams, who is also the government documents librarian, is her replacement.

-Hayden Marx

Ukraine court wants proof of election fraud

By Natasha Lisova
Associated Press

KIEV, Ukraine — Ukraine's Supreme Court gave the prime minister's legal team until Tuesday to study evidence of fraud presented by the opposition in last week's presidential election, while outgoing President Leonid Kuchma endorsed the idea of a new vote "to preserve peace" in the bitterly divided former Soviet republic.

COURTESY CNN.COM

The Ukraine Supreme Court debates the results of the allegedly fraudulent country's presidential election yesterday.

Kuchma said Monday a new vote might be the only way to resolve the weeklong standoff in which tens of thousands of opposition supporters have blocked official buildings in the capital and eastern provinces are threatening to seek autonomy.

The demonstrations continued Monday night as throngs packed snowy Kiev's Independence Square, waving Ukrainian flags and orange flags showing their support for opposition candidate Viktor Yushchenko, who addressed them. The defense minister said the army would not use force against the people, the Interfax news agency reported.

If we really want to preserve peace and accord, if we really want to build a democratic state ... let's hold new elections," Kuchma was quoted as saying by Interfax. He said Ukraine needs a "legitimate president."

Yushchenko, who claims he was robbed of victory, has called for a new election on Dec. 12 under international auspices.

Ukrainian Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych, who was declared winner of the disputed Nov. 21 runoff vote by the nation's Central Election Commission, offered lukewarm support for a new vote, saying he would accept it if the opposition's allegations of fraud were proven.

Yanukovych added that he had not seen any evidence of fraud, and he suggested that another vote would be illegal.

"If there is evidence of falsification, I will agree with this decision," Yanukovych said while meeting with Kuchma and top officials from eastern Ukraine. He stressed allegations of fraud must be proven by a "clear, honest and transparent" investigation.

Yanukovych also said he would call on voters in Donetsk and Luhansk to participate. Lawmakers in Donetsk, Yanukovych's native region, voted Sunday to hold a referendum on autonomy for the province.

The United States and the European Union have agreed the presidential election results were marred by massive fraud and cannot be accepted. Secretary of State Colin Powell told Kuchma on Monday it was important to keep the country intact.

"If we can keep things calm and allow the leaders and the politicians and members of the international community who are trying to help the Ukrainians all come together then, hopefully, a peaceful solution will be found," Powell said in Washington.

At the White House, presidential spokesman Scott McClellan called on the international community to unite in support of a peaceful, democratic process in Ukraine "and of Ukraine's sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity."

Yushchenko's team is asking the Supreme Court to throw out the presidential election results, cancel the election commission's decision and name Yushchenko the victor because he narrowly won the Oct. 31 first-round vote.

The Supreme Court began considering his appeal but said Monday a decision could take days.

The ruling could pave the way for a new vote or remove the only barrier to the inauguration of Yanukovych, who was declared the winner by a margin of 871,402 votes.

Justice Anatoliy Yaremа said the court would give Yanukovych's lawyers until 10 a.m. Tuesday to study additional evidence presented by Yushchenko's team.

Under Ukrainian legislation, the court cannot rule on the overall results but can declare results invalid in individual precincts. A Yushchenko aide, Mykola Katerinchuk, said the appeal focused on results in eight eastern and southern Ukrainian regions.

A key Yanukovych aide, Stepan Havrysh, said his side was expecting a "fair decision ... taken without emotion."

"I expect that the judges will not overstep the law because it could end in a civil war," he said.

Thousands of supporters of both sides massed outside the court as the session started.

Yushchenko has rejected government appeals to call off the tens of thousands of protesters who have thronged the capital since last week, instead urging his backers to maintain their round-the-clock vigil and blockades of the Cabinet building and the presidential administration.

Yushchenko's more radical ally, Yuliya Tymoshenko, also warned that opposition supporters would block Kuchma's movements if he did not fire Yanukovych and governors of eastern regions threatening to push for self-rule by late Monday.

The crisis has deepened the political tug-of-war between the West and Moscow, which considers this energy-dependent nation of 48 million people part of its sphere of influence and a buffer between Russia and NATO's eastern flank.

Private orders for stun guns soaring

By Anabelle Garay
Associated Press

PHOENIX — From Korean Air flight crews to U.S. police and corrections officers to beat cops in Britain, the orders are pouring in for stun guns made by Taser International Inc.

The Scottsdale company even recently launched a metro Phoenix ad campaign urging private citizens to arm themselves with the weapons, which temporarily paralyze people with a 50,000-volt jolt.

Yet while Taser's stock has soared with the booming business, concerns are growing about whether the shock-inducing guns are truly as non-lethal as advertised.

In a report being released Tuesday, Amnesty International says stun guns are being abused by police and wants more scientific study done to determine whether the devices are safe.

Amnesty says at least 74 people have died in the United States and Canada in the past four years after being shocked with Tasers.

The group also says officers have turned stun guns on the mentally disturbed, children and the elderly.

"Not only do we not know the impact of these weapons on human beings under various conditions, we are also concerned about the gratuitous use of these weapons," said Gerald Le Melle, deputy executive director of Amnesty International USA

A Defense Department-sponsored report also calls for more testing, and some health professionals are expressing concern that the potential for cardiac arrest could be too high.

Amnesty worried that "the deployment of Tasers, rather than minimizing the use of force, may dangerously extend the boundaries of what are considered 'acceptable' levels of force."

Similar to a device first developed the 1970s, the Taser became available to consumers in the early 1990s and is now used by more than 6,000 law enforcement agencies worldwide as well as the U.S. military, which has used them in Iraq and Afghanistan and ordered nearly $2 million worth of stun guns and accessories this summer.

Taser officials bill the guns, which shoot two barbed darts up to 21 feet whose current can penetrate up to two inches of clothing, as among the safest ways of subduing violent individuals in high-risk situations.

"We get e-mail from police every week ... thanking us for developing a weapon so they didn't have to shoot somebody," said company chairman Phil Smith. "We're saving lives every day and cops love them."

Phoenix police officers credit Tasers with helping police shootings drop by more than half and fatal shootings by 31 percent last year.

"We've seen them reduce injury to suspects ... who in the past we would have had to strike multiple times with fists or batons," said Sgt. Randy Force, a department spokesman.

KNIGHT RIDDER

President Bush pets Biscuits the turkey during the annual presidential pardoning of the turkey on Thanksgiving Day.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Fountas
Managing Editor Andrew Merritt
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Cameron Woods
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Meghan Healy
Campus Editor Alyson Zilmann
Editorial Editor Paige Crem
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Matthew Reid
Sports Editor Mike Mazzelli
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Ruggiero
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Frecaut
Human Resources Sandra Marquez
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Jaclynn Sorenson
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Advisor Charlie Higgins
Asst Arts & Living Mike Bonack
Asst Arts & Living Monique Jemmott
Assistant Editorial Yousef Munayyer
Assistant Editorial Allison Ellis
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Sports Robert McGovern
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts academic semester. The Collegian is entirely student-funded, operating on semesterly revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life. Became the College Signal in 1907, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Bi-Weekly Collegian in 1936. Published daily since 1967, The Collegian has been broadsheet since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call 545-3500, Monday between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Cameron J. Woods
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Alex Desmothe
COPY EDITOR
Sarah Maples
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Cory Rosenberg
PRODUCTION STAFF
Nate Freedman, Elliott Chong

Write for news today!
Call Erika
545-1762

Insurgents increase attacks

By Robert H. Reid
Associated Press

COURTESY CNN.COM
U.S. soldiers patrol streets in Baghdad last weekend.

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Insurgents stepped up attacks on Iraq's fledgling security forces, killing seven Iraqi police and guardsmen Monday in a suicide bombing hours after storming a police station north of the capital. Two U.S. soldiers died in a bombing in Baghdad.

In addition, two U.S. Marines were killed in a weekend bombing south of the capital, a U.S. official said Monday. U.S., British and Iraqi forces have been sweeping through the area to clear Sunni insurgents from a string of towns and cities between Baghdad and the Shiite shrine cities of Najaf and Karbala.

Military offensives in Fallujah and elsewhere have made November the second deadliest month for U.S. troops since the March 2003 invasion, with at least 130 American dead.

Monday's suicide attack occurred in Baghdadi, a Euphrates River town about 120 miles northwest of the capital, where a driver detonated his vehicle near a police checkpoint, police Lt. Mohammed al-Fehdawi said. A hospital official, Hatim Ahmed, confirmed seven police and Iraqi National Guard members were killed and nine were wounded.

Late Sunday, gunmen stormed a police station west of Samarra, 60 miles north of Baghdad, looted the armory, commandeered several police cars and fled after encountering no resistance, Iraqi officials said.

U.S. troops went to the police station Monday morning and arrested two dozen people, police said. American officials had no comment. U.S. and Iraqi troops recaptured Samarra from insurgents in September, but the city remains tense.

Two American soldiers from Task Force Baghdad were killed and three wounded Monday in a roadside bomb explosion in northwestern Baghdad, the U.S. command said. One American soldier died and two were injured in a vehicle accident 30 miles northwest of the town of Kut in eastern Iraq, the military said.

Attacks have increased against U.S., Iraqi and other targets on the road leading from the center of Baghdad to the city's international airport, located on the western outskirts of the capital.

The British Embassy announced Monday that its staff would no longer be permitted to travel on the airport road, which the U.S. State Department has identified as one of the most dangerous routes in Iraq.

"We advise against all but essential travel to Iraq," the British Embassy said in a statement. "We urge all British nationals in Iraq to consider whether their presence in Iraq is essential at this time. Even essential travel to Iraq should be delayed, if possible."

Online retailers lead in sales

NEW YORK — Computer-savvy consumers did plenty of online shopping over the Thanksgiving weekend, giving companies like Amazon.com and walmart.com the same kickoff to the holiday season as department stores and malls had.

The pickup in business on the Web was the result of online merchants using marketing tricks like their brick and mortar counterparts plying consumers with special discounts to get them to shop early.

Online sales excluding travel shot up 100 percent to $133 million on Thanksgiving Day compared to the same day last year, said comScore Networks Inc., an Internet research company. On Friday, online sales hit $250 million, up 41 percent from a year ago.

"We certainly expected a strong performance during the holiday weekend, but these are impressive figures," said Dan Hess, senior vice president at comScore.

Historically, the online shopping season has begun the Monday after Thanksgiving, when consumers begin buying from their workplace computers. But the early start this year can be attributed to two phenomena: Merchants are working harder to get online sales, and millions of homes have converted to high-speed Internet connections, making it easier to shop from home.

About 53 percent of those consumers who have access to the Internet currently have high-speed Internet connections, compared with 40.9 percent a year ago, according to Ken Cassar, an analyst at Nielsen/NetRatings Inc.

Associated Press

Osama bin Ladin's deputy vows to keep fighting U.S.

By Salah Nasrawi
Associated Press

CAIRO, Egypt — Osama bin Laden's top deputy vowed in a videotape aired Monday to keep fighting the United States until Washington changed its policies.

In a brief excerpt broadcast on Al-Jazeera television, Ayman al-Zawahri offered Americans "one last advice" for dealing with Muslims, adding, "I am sure that they will not heed it."

"You have to choose between one of two methods to deal with Muslims: either on mutual respect and exchange of interests, or to deal with them as if they are spoils of war," al-Zawahri said. "This is your problem and you have to choose yourself. You have to realize that we are a nation of patience and endurance. We will stand firm to fight you with God's help until doomsday."

The bearded and bespectacled al-Zawahri sat before a brown background, with a gun leaning against the wall. One shoulder was covered by a brown blanket. His voice sounded calm and steady, as in previous tapes.

A U.S. intelligence official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said authorities have "a high degree of confidence" the message was from al-Zawahri.

The intelligence official noted this video resembles one made in September, featuring a similar brown fabric background and weapon. But, the official added, that does not mean it was made at the same time or actually is the same video.

In a reference apparently showing that the latest tape was made before the Nov. 2 presidential election in the United States, al-Zawahri said there was no difference between President Bush and Democratic nominee Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts.

"As for elections in America, the two candidates are competing to win the satisfaction of Israel," saying that fact proved "there will be no solution with America without forcing it to surrender to justice."

He added: "The results of the elections do not matter for us. Vote whoever you want, Bush, Kerry or the devil himself. This does not concern us. What concerns us is to purge our land from the aggressors."

Days before the election, bin Laden said in similar video footage that the United States must stop threatening the security of Muslims if it wanted to avoid "another Manhattan" — referring to the Sept. 11 attacks. Addressing the American people, bin Laden also said, "Your security is not in the hands of Kerry, Bush or al-Qaida. Your security is in your own hands .... Any state that does not mess with our security has naturally guaranteed its own security."

It was unclear if Al-Jazeera planned to show more of the latest al-Zawahri tape.

The United States has offered a $25 million reward for the capture of bin Laden and al-Zawahri, who are believed to be hiding in the border area of Afghanistan and Pakistan.

COURTESY CNN.COM
Ayman al-Zawahri, shown in this recent video excerpt, is the top deputy of Osama bin Ladin.

Boston University
School of Medicine
MENTAL HEALTH AND BEHAVIORAL MEDICINE PROGRAM
A two-year Master of Arts Program, leading to License Eligibility in Mental Health Counseling
Also available
A Specialization in Sports and Exercise Psychology
OPEN HOUSE SESSIONS
Friday, December 3, 2004
Saturday, January 22, 2005
Monday, February 28, 2005
Saturday, March 26, 2005
Friday, April 29, 2005
All informational sessions are from 10 a.m. - 12:30 p.m.
Program Interviews will begin starting Saturday, January 22, 2005 From 10 a.m. - 2 p.m. for selected applicants
To R.S.V.P. or for more information, contact Bernice R. Mark at Boston University School of Medicine
715 Albany Street
Robinson Building, Suite B-2903
Boston, MA 02118
617-414-2320 • nicey@bu.edu
www.bumc.bu.edu/mhbm
BOSTON UNIVERSITY
An equal opportunity affirmative action institution

Hadley Sunoco
"Specializing In All Your Automotive Needs."
457 Russell St.
Hadley MA. 01035
(413) 253-4623
HadleySunoco@yahoo.com
Front Brake Special $69.95
•Includes Brake Pads, Labor and inspection of front rotors and calipers
Most Cars, Light trucks & SUVS
GET A FREE TIRE ROTATION WITH ANY BRAKE JOB!!!!!!
Regular Price: 84.95
Offer valid with Collegian AD only
Not to be combined with any other Brake discounts or offers
Offer Expires 12/1/04
SPECIAL
10% Student Discount On Labor With a Valid College ID
WE WILL BEAT ANY COMPETITOR'S WRITTEN ESTIMATE!!!!!
Come try us out today
FREE ESTIMATES!
Some of the many other services we specialize in are: Brakes, tires, CV-shafts, alternators, starters, belts, tune-ups, timing belts and exhaust repair.

Amherst Computerworks, Inc.
PC & Laptop Sales/Service/Repair 5-College Certified Vendor
Laptop & LCD Projector Rentals
Repairing Macs and all brands of PC's
Selling new Custom desktop & laptop PC's
9 East Pleasant St.
Amherst, MA 01002
Phone: (413) 548-8900
Fax: (413) 548-8030
aci@acipc.com
Est. 1990

UMASS OXFORD SUMMER SEMINAR
TRINITY COLLEGE
OXFORD UNIVERSITY
JULY 3-AUGUST 12, 2005
There will be a general information meeting for students interested in learning more about the UMass Oxford Summer Seminar on Tuesday, November 30 at 4:30 pm in Campus Center Room 803
The UMass Oxford Summer Seminar offers courses in liturature, international law, history, film and politics. All students reside in Trinity College, one of Oxford's most beautiful colleges, and all faculty members are British academics, most of them currently teaching at Oxford. Students may earn up to eight undergraduate credits. Tuition, room and board for the six week program is $5500. A limited amount of merit-based financial aid is available.
For more information about the program, visit www.umass/oxford or email the program at oxford@english.umass.edu.

HAMPSHIRE FITNESS club
90 Gatehouse Road, Off Rt. 9, Two miles East of Amherst Center
On the Bus Route • TEL: 256-6446
Shopping for a health club? • Do your homework first
JOIN NOW!
for our Winter Special
15 weeks - For Students: $179!
Inclusive membership / No additional fees / Includes free T-Shirt
Hampshire Fitness Club has it all for you
•FULL SIZED INDOOR POOL •AQUA AEROBICS •CYBEX, NAUTILUS CIRCUIT •BOXING STUDIO
•CYBEX FREE WEIGHTS •FULL COURT BASKETBALL •VOLLEYBALL •INDOOR TENNIS
•YOGA/PILATES •AEROBICS/STEP/BOSU •JACUZZI/SAUNAS •CARDIO-VASCULAR EQUIPMENT
Open: 6am to 10pm Mon-Fri 8am to 9pm Sat-Sun

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
EDITORIAL OPINION
Tuesday, November 30, 2004
"The author must keep his mouth shut when his work starts to speak." -Friedrich Nietzche
Editorial@dailycollegian.com

Proposal puts student privacy in jeopardy

Students' privacy is once again in jeopardy after a proposal from Congress has been issued requesting a federal database be made containing students' information upon their enrollment in a college or university. Currently, schools only have to give the government data on their students if they qualify for and are receiving federal financial aid. The purpose of this database is to improve the available statistics regarding college students' enrollment, graduation, etc. for tax payers and said policy makers. Although knowing where tax payers' money is going when given to colleges and universities is important, it does not provide sufficient grounds for creating a database that is unnecessary and increases the government's hold on students while fostering students' paranoia surrounding the government.

Perhaps the largest and most obvious concern about the new database is the government's reasoning behind it. Under the new proposal, students will be able to be tracked through their higher education careers, thus making the government aware of students who drop out, transfer or take longer than the usual four years to graduate, according to The New York Times. Making personally identifiable such statistics regarding students' drop out rates and years beyond the conventional timeline taken to graduate will not better the statistics for the tax payers, but worsen them.

Another terrifying risk and misuse of this database would be the temptation of using the names found in the records for purposes other than gathering statistics. In a New York Times article, the National Center for Education Statistics said, "A department overview of the proposal insisted that data would not be shared with other agencies and that outsiders could not gain access." Contrary to this statement, the article continued to mention that, according to Sarah Flanagan, vice president for government relations at the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities, "officials from some states had already announced they would like to match the data against prison records."

Although the database has been said to be completely confidential, it is almost a certainty that those names will be sought out and compared to other records. In a society where higher education is praised and expected, it is an extremely dangerous thing to have students' private information handed over to the federal government because they did what society expected them to do. The threat of that database affecting students' potential for employment, future educational opportunities and more is too great for this database to be kept secure.

Currently, many employment and college applications ask questions regarding students' previous prison sentences. The questions are phrased so that applicants have an opportunity to answer truthfully and begin to develop an honest relationship with their potential employers. Performing a background check on all applicants by simply looking into this database is misleading to the employer and breaks that truthful relationship right off the bat, not because of employers' curiosity, but because the database is there and able to be misused.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

Time to get over Artest

Dan McDonnell

For the last week or so every sports television channel has been running clips of the "Ron Artest Incident." For those of you who don't know about it, here's a brief recap. During a Detroit Pistons/Indiana Pacers basketball game, tension on the court between the players inevitably led to an altercation between members of the Indiana Pacers and the fans in attendance at the Palace of Auburn Hills in Detroit.

This event has been made out to be one of the biggest, most controversial events in sports of not only this year, but of the last 20 years. Everyone is calling this a black eye on not only the National Basketball Association, but on all sports. They're all saying that athletes are completely out of control and feel like they can get away with anything. They're saying that athletes have been placed on a pedestal, and they need to be knocked down.

Personally, I think everyone needs to relax and move on. I agree that Artest and the other players were in the wrong for going into the crowd and attacking a fan for throwing a beer at the players. A six-and-a-half-foot tall, well-conditioned athlete that spends the bulk of his time in a gym is going to absolutely destroy a 120-pound, drunken man that cannot even spell the word gym let alone work out in one. If Artest wanted to, he could have put this guy in a wheelchair for the rest of his life.

Am I the only one that thinks that this guy got what he deserved? I don't care how big of a fan you are of a team, or how drunk you get at games. Throwing objects at athletes on their field, court, rink, etc., is just asking for trouble. Personally I probably would have reacted the same way Artest did. I have been close enough to the field at a Red Sox game that I could have reached out and slapped Mark McGwire upside his head, but I had the sense enough to hold back (and I'm glad I did because that guy would kill me with one punch).

I am not saying that athletes belong on the pedestal on which society has placed them, but this is what they do for a living. Sports are their career. When is the last time you heard about an athlete showing up at a manufacturing plant to start a fight? Has Ray Lewis ever entered your cubicle and thrown a beer at you? Does Steve McNair show up during your lunch hour to start a "you suck" chant? Athletic competition is an athlete's occupation. It's their career. As fans, we should have enough respect for what these guys do to know better than to throw cups of beer at them.

Athletic competition is an athlete's occupation. It's their career. As fans, we should have enough respect for what these guys do to know better than to throw cups of beer at them.

Sports writers and broadcasters are all saying that the Artest incident is going to drive fans away from the sport of basketball. They're saying that this is the last straw, and everyone is finished with the NBA.

I don't know about you, but this incident has gotten me interested in basketball again. I stopped watching years ago, and now this incident happens, and all of a sudden I'm thinking I have to keep watching to see what happens next. It's almost like watching the Battle of the Sexes; there are so many questions that need answers. Will Mike finally lose his mind again and bring back "The Miz"? Will Shaquille O'Neal try to kill Kobe Bryant after a hard foul? You keep watching because you don't want to miss out on seeing something great.

I'm willing to bet that this incident actually helps the NBA more than it hurts. Controversy always sparks interest. People are going to start watching again. Think about what it will be like when Ron Artest's suspension is over. I guarantee that the NBA will sell out every game that he plays in for at least a month following his return. Fans are going to be chomping at the bit to boo and heckle this guy until they lose their voices. They are going to want to be there to try and get under his skin again and see if they can set him off one more time.

People are saying that this incident shows that more security is needed at sporting events. Alcohol should not be served anymore. Fans need to feel safer from athletes. The list of complaints goes on and on. I say let it go and move on. Events like this happen once every five or 10 years at most.

Think about how many sporting events there are in the country each year. Millions of games played every year. An event like the Artest incident only happens on extremely rare occasions. I say forget about it and move on. He's being punished, so stop worrying about it. If you feel unsafe at a game, give me your ticket. I'd be glad to take it off your hands, especially if it's a game in which Artest will be playing back in uniform.

Dan McDonnell is a Collegian columnist.

Making excuses to the police

Stacy Kasdin

Driving home on Wednesday, I hit all the southbound Thanksgiving weekend traffic. Finally, the traffic let up in New York, and I took advantage of the opportunity to speed up before getting clumped into another chunk of stopped cars. Of course, the second I accelerated a cop was behind me, siren blaring. I prayed he was after someone else and moved into the next lane to let him pass. Unfortunately he stayed behind me, so I pulled off the road. I've been in cars with people when they've gotten pulled over, but this was the first time I'd been pulled over myself. I rolled down the window. I may have been shaking slightly.

A young state cop appeared at my window and asked for my license and registration. He asked if I knew why he had pulled me over. I said I didn't, and he laughed at me. He claimed I was doing 90 mph in a 65-mph area. Thoughts began running through my mind of what people do when they get pulled over for speeding. It's a well-known stereotype that oftentimes females can get out of tickets with male officers if they cry. I entertained the thought of crying, and I'm sure I could have managed to shed a few tears, but that was probably what he was expecting me to do. I needed to catch him off guard.

I began thinking of other ways to get out of a speeding ticket. "Were you in a hurry?" the officer asked. There was no one else in the car, so I couldn't say I was taking someone to the hospital. I couldn't say I was sick, because then he'd say I shouldn't have been driving in the first place. Then I started thinking about excuses that had worked well for me in the past. A scenario with the cop using an excuse that always worked in high school gym class might have gone something like this:

Cop: Are you aware that you were going 90 mph in a 65-mph area?

Me: Well you see officer, this is kind of embarrassing, but I have my period today. I've got terrible cramps and I just don't feel that I'm able to drive the speed limit in this much pain.

Cop: You'll need to get a signed note from the nurse to be excused from following the speed limit due to menstrual cramps.

I don't suppose it would actually work like that, though. I've never heard of nurses assigned to certain sections of the highway, and I imagine using menstrual cramps as an excuse for anything other than getting out of high school gym class only works in England.

Then I remembered a story a classmate of mine once shared with me. He got pulled over for speeding and pulled out a map, faked a southern accent and pretended to be hopelessly lost. His Florida license plate sealed the deal, and the cop had pity, pointed him in the right direction and sent him on his way. My car has a New Jersey license plate. I wouldn't have to work very hard to emphasize my New Jersey accent, but I don't think a New York cop would have pity on someone from the next state over. I suppose I could be driving a borrowed car, but the only accent I can pull off besides Jersey is English, and since I'd been pulled over for speeding and not for being on the wrong side of the road, that probably wouldn't work either.

I suppose I could have tried something completely ridiculous like telling him I was an undercover FBI agent and had forgotten my badge, but that doesn't even work in the movies, let alone real life. Being chased by aliens was pretty much out of the question because he would probably ask where their saucer was, and there would be no saucer to show him. Either that or he'd have me committed, and then I'd miss Thanksgiving dinner and potentially the remainder of my last year of college.

One thing I hadn't considered was how I would get the cop to listen to my chosen excuse. It was the day before Thanksgiving, the worst travel day of the entire year. There were cops all over the road, and every single one of them was pulling someone over. It turned out he had better things to do than listen to my excuses for speeding, like pull over other people who were speeding. The denial of doing 90 mph was barely out of my mouth before he was walking back to his car to write up a ticket. I suppose the moral is that cops have heard every excuse before, and if you're speeding on the busiest travel day of the year, you're asking for a ticket. So just suck it up and take it.

My court date is in late December. Maybe I ought to try out the alien story on the judge. By then the saucer would have been long gone anyway.

Stacy Kasdin is a Collegian columnist.

Surrendering in today's world

Yousef Munayyer

Something happened to the American military mentality since the birth of this nation. This phenomenon may or may not parallel changes in other nations of the world, but as we are the world's strongest superpower, it is surely worth understanding.

This change is signified by the idea of "unconditional surrender." Perhaps it has its roots in the Civil War era, but it was certainly brought to preeminence at the end of the second World War.

There was a point in time, not so long ago, when Western thought viewed war as a way to do business. A little war here, a little land grab there: this was how business was done in much of Europe before the 20th century. Consider the wars that led to German unification. Three wars, which compared to the Napoleonic wars that preceded them and the world wars that followed, do not deserve to be placed in the "war" category. Yet, they were wars fought between sovereign nations. At the end a treaty was signed, land was divided and both sides went home in time for dinner.

Then it happened. Somewhere along the line of the evolution of the military mentality in the Western world and the United States, war became an issue not of business, but of survival. Perhaps bigger and deadlier weapons like machine guns and poison gas, which came into major use during the first World War, contributed to this paranoia and justly so. Also, wars were fought on larger scales with more fatalities. Lastly, we got into the habit of accepting wars of ideas. Whenever an ideologue launched a war, there was no mercy.

States have interests that may conflict with the interests of other states. Yet, to reduce war to ideological competition is to introduce something very dangerous: that is, never-ending war.

Napoleon rushed through Europe bringing liberal ideas with him only until conservatives had a chance to settle Europe in 1815 and put Napoleon in his place: on a secluded island. Rebels in the southern United States put their lives on the line for ideological reasons like "states' rights" (which at the time meant the state's right to implement the inhumane practice of slavery), and they were crushed by the North, who was not about to let its southern half disappear for ideological reasons. Fascism spread through Europe like wildfire (or German tanks), and Hitler's ideas of a superior race were not accepted. He, too, was forced back and crushed. When wars are fought on the basis of ideas, there is only one victor. Or at least that is the mentality that we have today.

You see, we live in a world that talks about good and evil, us or them. There is a struggle for the survival of an idea: in this case, the American idea. This may mean democracy, or capitalism, or Western values or a variety of other things depending on the enemy against whom it is being defined. What evolves is a struggle for the survival of an idea. Is it democracy or fascism, capitalism or communism, Western values or ... Islam?

Perhaps this is a post-Cold-War syndrome. Having survived this tense period, American ideology has learned to define itself in contradiction to an enemy's. There is no such thing as business anymore. We don't live in a world of business partners; we live in a world of competitors.

It seems that we have accepted that no enemy can survive, because its survival means our downfall. Maybe this is for fear of returning to a bipolar system. Maybe this is the paranoia of an empire. Whatever it may be, it is causing problems in our ability to craft successful military and foreign policy.

Can we envision a war that we can walk away from as winners, without destroying the enemy? The Vietnamese sure can. However, we have difficulty with this. It has been bred into our mentality. Both world wars and the Cold War ended with the complete collapse or destruction of our enemy. Us or them, two options, you choose.

The problem with this is it is unrealistic. We do not live in a black and white world or a world of good and evil. States have interests that may conflict with the interests of other states. Yet, to reduce war to ideological competition is to introduce something very dangerous: that is, never-ending war.

Unconditional surrender never really ends a problem. It may bring the end to a government, a regime or an empire, but care must be taken to make the actual issues that lead to war go away. This mistake was made in the 1860s. Sure, work was done to reengage the south in the political structure, but is this country much less divided today? The lines even look the same. This mistake was made after World War I when the overly punitive treaty of Versailles laid the framework for the Second World War. Again, this mistake was repeated with the punitive U.N. resolution that ended the first Gulf War.

The idea of unconditional surrender, in a world filled with competing ideologies, creates a very dim future. If this strategy is to be applied in future conflicts, we can expect to be engaged in war forever. To avoid this fate, we must try to understand the interest of state actors instead of labeling them good or evil. We need to bring professionalism back to war and take radicalism out. Surely, we could hope for no war at all, but that is a naive thought today. Rather, the best bet for a safer future is to learn to make war businesslike again. It is, after all, more civilized that way.

Yousef Munayyer is a Collegian editor.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 2004 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

THE PIXIES It's Education

COURTESY ELEKTRA

Band with UMass ties visits Mullins Center for historic performance

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

UMass is in for a history lesson tonight, as the recently reunited Pixies come to the Mullins Center in the first New England date of their reunion tour that started in April. Not only is this the region's first chance to see the legendary indie-rock pioneers in ten years, but it marks a return home for the Boston-bred band.

Lead singer Black Francis/Frank Black/Charles Thompson and guitarist Joey Santiago formed the band when they were roommates here at UMass. Though the band never had hit records or big singles during their heyday (though they did reach a level of popularity overseas), their fan base has grown exponentially over the years. Granted, the Pixies' large fan base now could be due to the fact that their music was far ahead of its time and decidedly non-commercial, but they have no doubt won many fans from the glowing praise that the band receives from artists such as U2's Bono and Radiohead's Thom Yorke (U2 took the Pixies out as an opening band in the early '90s, and Radiohead has long said that their first few albums were nothing more than Pixies imitations).

Bands like Weezer, Local H, and Eve 6 took part in a Pixies tribute album, and Brad Pitt, Edward Norton, and David Fincher were very excited to have the Pixies classic "Where Is My Mind?" close out their film "Fight Club." However the commotion should be even bigger at the Mullins Center tonight; after all, not only are half of the Pixies from UMass, but they even have a track titled "Umass" on their last album, 1992's "Trompe Le Monde" (the song, a tribute to the kids of the school and a diss to Western Mass. "rednecks," features the screamed chorus, "It's educational!").

The band formed with bassist Kim Deal and drummer David Lovering in 1986, and they released the raw, edgy "Come On Pilgrim" EP in 1987. The band was a mix of influences, from current college rock like R.E.M. to progressive punks like Husker Du, and classic '50s and '60s rock and pop from Buddy Holly to the Beatles. The band was the real punk-pop, not at all like the music that is commonly referred to as pop-punk today, mixing distorted guitars and insane screams with catchy hooks and pretty melodies.

"Come On Pilgrim" was followed by the band's first LP, "Surfer Rosa." While every Pixies fan is different, "Rosa" is widely regarded as the classic album and spawned future fan favorites such as the model Pixies track "Bone Machine," the Deal-sung "Gigantic," and the aforementioned "Where Is My Mind?" After the minor success of "Rosa," the band was signed to Elektra Records and released their next album,

See PIXIES on page 5

Party too hard? Ask an attorney

Ask the Attorney
Michele L. Leaf

Q: I got a letter from the Dean of Student's Office informing me that I am suspended from the university effective immediately. After one of the Red Sox victories, I was chanting "Go Red Sox!" along with many other students, but did not participate in any rioting. Although the police have claimed that an order to disperse was given, I never heard it. I was grabbed from behind by a plain-clothes officer and arrested for disorderly conduct and failure to disperse. How can the Dean suspend me before I have been found guilty?

A: While it certainly looks and feels like this is the case, the Dean is not finding you "guilty" by taking this action to suspend you. You can be prosecuted in criminal court and charged with violating the Code of Student Conduct (CSC) for the same behavior. Although the protections are not as extensive as for a defendant in criminal court, a student accused of violating the CSC is guaranteed due process by the Fourteenth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution.

Many of the students who were arrested at gatherings after the Red Sox games have been charged with violating the CSC by engaging in endangering behavior, and failure to comply with the directions of university officials. Under normal circumstances, students accused of code violations are entitled to notice and a hearing before an impartial board before a serious sanction like suspension can be imposed. In extraordinary circumstances, the Dean can take immediate action and does not have to follow the usual due process guarantees.

Courts have upheld interim actions by universities when there is an imminent danger of serious harm. In the case of students who are alleged to have been involved in riotous behavior at the Red Sox victory celebrations, the Dean's Office has taken the position that this is the case. The Dean is exercising power under a special section of the CSC, which states that interim restrictions are available whenever there is ground to believe that the student is an "imminent threat" or the cause of "serious disruption" to the university community. Such interim restrictions are for the purpose of protecting the university community from further harm, and not considered to be a punishment for the charged student.

However, since the consequences are severe – because the effect of the interim restriction is loss of educational credits, tuition and university housing – this power must be used sparingly. Despite the University's concern about preventing and punishing riotous behavior, the interim restrictions should not be an excuse to deny students their rights to due process guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution and provided for in the Code of Student Conduct.

The information contained in this article refers to Massachusetts law and does not constitute legal advice.

Please submit legal questions to asktheattorney@stuaf.umass.edu. If you need legal advice, seek out an attorney who can give you advice based upon your circumstances and applicable law. Fee-paying UMass Amherst students with questions may call the Student Legal Services Office at 545-1995 to arrange an appointment, or come to 922 Campus Center to pick up more information.

'GREAT' acting but new Stone film falls short on historical accuracy

By Spencer Ziegler
Collegian Staff

It's only fitting that Oliver Stone's "Alexander," like the kingdom of the great conqueror, suffers from stretching itself too thin.

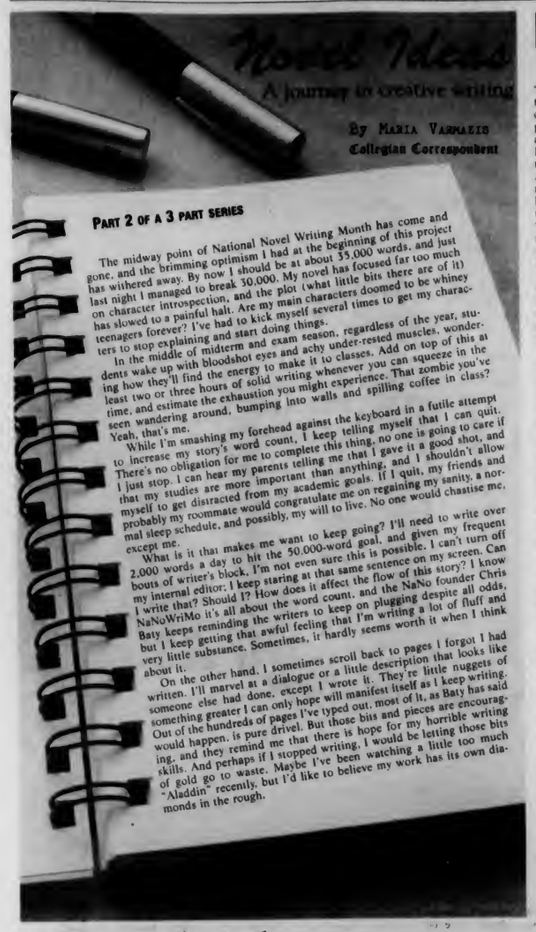
'Alexander'
Directed by Oliver Stone
Starring
Colin Farrell
Angelina Jolie
Walker Brothers
Rated R
253 mins.
Grade
C+

The movie has some positive attributes — almost every actor gives a superb performance and the visualizations of these lost lands are astounding — but ultimately, it is the films shortcomings — its over-the-top dialogue along with its painfully long and convoluted plot — that drag the three-hour epic into mediocrity.

The problem isn't entirely that Oliver Stone is taking himself too seriously — though this is a large part of it — but also that Alexander's life, and that of any historical figure for that matter, does not translate well to the silver screen.

History rarely flows in typical plot patterns, leaving directors with two choices: to fabricate the past and force it into a more palpable plot or to give the audiences an irregular movie and hope the positives outweigh the difficult plot. Fortunately, Stone stays true to Alexander's remarkable life. Unfortunately, the movie does not have enough positives to make up for the difficulty in creating a historical epic.

Perhaps the difficulties with the plot could have been solved by only analyzing one section of Alexander's life. From his birth to the time of his father's death would have made a great movie. Likewise, a movie focusing solely on Alexander's conquests would have been quite interesting. The first could analyze Alexander's rise and the second his fall, but in trying to combine these two segmented portions of Alexander's life, Stone is left with a story too complex for even the greatest director to tell. Sad as it may be, Stone is no longer in that category, so the viewer is left with a movie that contains a tiresome plot on top of a number of other shortcomings.



The script fails not only with the plot but also with the dialogue. It comes out forced and pretentious, sounding like fortune cookie proclamations. Of the few lines that do work — such as, "And this is the man that will take you from Greek to Persia? He can't even make it from one couch to the next" — the writers can't even claim that the real Alexander said them.

Despite the difficult material, most of the actors give impressive performances. Colin Farrell's pompous nature is perfect for the self-proclaimed god Alexander the Great. Val Kilmer and Angelina Jolie do a great job portraying the complexity of Alexander's parents, despite the clunky dialogue they are given. The only actor whose performance is sub par is Anthony Hopkins, but this is because his character is completely unnecessary. Ptolemy is the narrator of the movie

See A... page 5

COURTESY WARNER B...

By Maria Varmazis
Collegian Correspondent

PART 2 OF A 3 PART SERIES

The midway point of National Novel Writing Month has come and gone, and the brimming optimism I had at the beginning of this project has withered away. By now I should be at about 33,000 words, and just last night I managed to break 30,000. My novel has focused far too much on character introspection, and the plot (what little bits there are of it) has slowed to a painful halt. Are my main characters doomed to be whiney teenagers forever? I've had to kick myself several times to get my characters to stop explaining and start doing things.

In the middle of midterm and exam season, regardless of the year, students wake up with bloodshot eyes and achy under-rested muscles, wondering how they'll find the energy to make it to classes. Add on top of this at least two or three hours of solid writing whenever you can squeeze in the time, and estimate the exhaustion you might experience. That zombie you've seen wandering around, bumping into walls and spilling coffee in class? Yeah, that's me.

While I'm smashing my forehead against the keyboard in a futile attempt to increase my story's word count, I keep telling myself that I can quit. There's no obligation for me to complete this thing, no one is going to care if I just stop. I can hear my parents telling me that I gave it a good shot, and that my studies are more important than anything, and I shouldn't allow myself to get disracted from my academic goals. If I quit, my friends and probably my roommate would congratulate me on regaining my sanity, a normal sleep schedule, and possibly, my will to live. No one would chastise me, except me.

What is it that makes me want to keep going? I'll need to write over 2,000 words a day to hit the 50,000-word goal, and given my frequent bouts of writer's block, I'm not even sure this is possible. I can't turn off my internal editor; I keep staring at that same sentence on my screen. Can I write that? Should I? How does it affect the flow of this story? I know NaNoWriMo it's all about the word count, and the NaNo founder Chris Baty keeps reminding the writers to keep on plugging despite all odds, but I keep getting that awful feeling that I'm writing a lot of fluff and very little substance. Sometimes, it hardly seems worth it when I think about it.

On the other hand, I sometimes scroll back to pages I forgot I had written. I'll marvel at a dialogue or a little description that looks like someone else had done, except I wrote it. They're little nuggets of something greater I can only hope will manifest itself as I keep writing. Out of the hundreds of pages I've typed out, most of it, as Baty has said would happen, is pure drivel. But those bits and pieces are encouraging, and they remind me that there is hope for my horrible writing skills. And perhaps if I stopped writing, I would be letting those bits of gold go to waste. Maybe I've been watching a little too much "Aladdin" recently, but I'd like to believe my work has its own diamonds in the rough.

Pixies, a winter highlight at the Mullins Center

PIXIES from page 4

"Doolittle," also considered one of the Pixies' best. The album is more commercial, featuring the über-poppy "Here Comes Your Man" and bizarro-pop "Monkey Gone To Heaven," both songs that cracked the top 10 modern rock charts in America. However, "Doolittle" was no sell-out album, proven by songs like the bass-driven "Tame" and the frantic "Dead." If anything, "Doolittle" saw the band stretching in every direction and going new places, such as the slow, slide guitar-based "Silver."

1990's "Bossanova" came next, and the title matched the album. The band still had a hard punk edge, but they found themselves more attracted to surf-guitar riffs and more experimental sounds and moods. This album didn't spawn any hits to the same degree as "Doolittle," and a good amount of Pixies fans see this as a step down from the first albums. If anything, though, "Bossanova" is an underrated gem with no weak moments and some of the Pixies' best songs in their entire catalogue, such as the bombastically rocking "Dig For Fire," the alien-themed "The Happening," the dynamic "All Over The World," and the flat-out screamer "Rock Music." The Pixies have long been known for their soft/loud dynamics, but "Bossanova" perhaps took these to the extreme. One moment Thompson would be singing softly and sweetly, if a little eccentrically, and then with just a squeal of Santiago's guitar the whole band would explode.

In 1991 the band released what would be their final album, "Trompe Le Monde." This was the most experimental Pixies album in their career and turned out to be their most polarizing. While some fans saw it as a large step down, others think it is the band's finest moment.

The meaty rocker "UMass" is a fan favorite, even outside of the UMass community, and "Alec Eiffel" is a poppy track with a heavy keyboard sound to it. Like "Bossanova," some of the album's least-known tracks are its best, such as "Letter to Memphis" and "Motorway To Roswell" (another alien-themed track).

During the making and following the release of "Trompe Le Monde," tensions within the band, most famously between Thompson and Deal, grew. There were on-stage fights and backstage bickering, and soon the band broke up via an infamous fax than Thompson sent the band. Soon Frank Black was born from Thompson's original alter ego, and a string of solo albums followed (Black is working on the follow-up to 2003's outstanding "Show Me Your Fears"). Deal formed the Breeders, who had a major hit in the mid-90s with the track "Cannonball." Santiago formed a band of his own, The Martinis, and assisted Black with his solo work. And Lovering became a magician (for real).

The Pixies, along with other contemporary legends such as Sonic Youth and Nirvana (who made a major point of proclaiming the large influence the Pixies had on the band, especially the soft/loud dynamic that Nirvana is often credited with creating), are considered the forefathers and pioneers for what we now understand as alternative, grunge, and indie rock. They have had a such massive impact on rock and pop music that there is no doubt their influence will be felt for decades to come.

Fortunately this past spring, after years of speculation, rumors, and pleading by the band's fans, the Pixies did what many thought was impossible: they reunited. Not only that, but they did so in top form. The reunion tour, which has taken the band all over the world, has been one of the biggest selling tours of the year, finding the Pixies playing to audiences far bigger than they ever had before. Rumors of a new album have been alleged, hinted to, confirmed, and denied (not necessarily in that order) by the notoriously media-shy band, but a new song, written and sung by Deal, called "Bam Thwok" was offered up on iTunes earlier this year. The band also recorded a cover of "Ain't That Pretty At All" for the recently released Warren Zevon tribute album.

While fans are still hoping that more new material from the band will surface, no one is complaining about the reunion tour. No doubt the Mullins Center will be filled with frenetic fans from all over New England (and perhaps fans from all over the world who have come to see the historic homecoming) to see The Pixies live, in person, and in action.

The Bennies and very notably, Mission Of Burma, will open the show. Burma are also recently reunited Boston punk legends whose new album "Onoffon" has successfully lived up to all the hype surrounding their reunion. Like The Pixies, Burma was underappreciated in their time and saw their fan base grow after they broke up.

In addition to the show tonight at the Mullins Center, the Pixies will be at the Tsongas Arena in Lowell tomorrow and Thursday. Then they will tour the Northeast for a few more weeks before finishing up with a string of shows in New York. Future plans have not been announced, but rumors of a 2005 tour have been mentioned.

HIGH RISK STUDENTS, FACULTY & STAFF
GET A FLU SHOT AT THE UHS OPEN FLU CLINIC
THURSDAY, DECEMBER 2
10 A.M. TO 4 P.M. COST: $15
CAMPUS CENTER ROOM 163-C
UMassAmherst UNIVERSITY HEALTH SERVICES

'Alexander' the not so great

ALEXANDER from page 4

and appears to have the role of proclaiming to no one in particular the lines and themes that the writers could not fit into the actual plot.

The movie's depiction of ancient lands is another plus. India, Greece and the various Alexandrias all feel incredibly authentic. But the most impressive setting in the movie is definitely Babylon. The movie does a great job in showing that if Alexander did not overextend his empire, this extraordinary city really could have been the center of the known world, as is suggested in the film.

The acting and the settings exceed expectations, but ultimately are not enough to save Oliver Stone's sloppy epic, which perhaps would have been more aptly titled, "Alexander the Mediocre."

COURTESY WARNER BROTHERS

Colin Farrell has received rave reviews for his role as the historical legend Alexander the Great.

CENTER SERIES WINTER 2004

Experience it all
from the edge of your seat!

November 21
Ying String Quartet
Beethoven Quartet Cycle
The Quartet will perform Beethoven's Opus 18, No. 1, Opus 18, No. 2 and Opus 130. Plan to join the quartet for a pre-concert talk at 6:45 p.m. Viennese coffee and desserts will be available for purchase.
Bowker Auditorium at 7:30pm

December 3 and 4
St. Petersburg Ice Ballet: The Nutcracker
Enjoy this traditional holiday classic in an entirely new way- on ice, on stage at the Fine Arts Center! On blades, The Nutcracker becomes effervescent, irrepressible. The cast's credentials, combined with a story that takes place in a winter wonderland, make St. Petersburg's production magical. What better way to see snowflakes dance than on ice?
Sponsored by Easthampton Savings Bank, FamilyFun Magazine, Coca Cola, The River 93.9, and The Daily Hampshire Gazette
Concert Hall at 7:30pm

THE FINE ARTS CENTER UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST
For Tickets: 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMAS
WWW.FINEARTSCENTER.COM

STRATTON/OKEMO
COLLEGE PASS
Only $299*

MORE MOUNTAIN. LESS MONEY.
With a combined 1,184 rideable acres of terrain, 203 trails, and 34 lifts, you can't beat this deal. Take a break from the books and get free with the Stratton/Okemo College Pass. Ski and ride two of Southern Vermont's best mountains all season long for as little as $299*. College students must provide proof of full-time status with documentation from Registrar's Office.
PURCHASE BY 12•3•04
OKEMO MOUNTAIN RESORT
1-800-78-OKEMO
okemo.com
STRATTON VT
1-800-STRATTON
stratton.com
*If purchased before ... $399 after. Tax not included. Must be 25 or under.

Ebersol's 14-year-old son dies

By John Marshall
Associated Press

MONTROSE, Colo. – The 14-year-old son of NBC Sports chairman Dick Ebersol was presumed dead Monday in a chartered jet that crashed while taking off in light snow and fog.

Ebersol and his oldest son emerged on their own from the wreckage of the 18-seat aircraft, which crashed Sunday morning after leaving Montrose Regional Airport in southwest Colorado, not far from the Telluride Ski Area. Two crew members also were killed but a third survived.

The plane slid sideways into a road and the impact ripped the cockpit from the fuselage. Ebersol's 21-year-old son, Charles, helped his 57-year-old father through the gap, a witness said.

Matt Ellis, Montrose County chief deputy coroner, said Monday that a "complete and thorough search" revealed no sign of the second son on the plane, 14-year-old Edward, anywhere around the crash site.

"We believe at this time that the boy has probably perished within the crash," Ellis said. He said the search in the wreckage would get underway when federal crash investigators arrived later Monday.

A heavy snowstorm had eased up before the plane prepared to take off for South Bend, Ind., where Charles Ebersol is a senior at Notre Dame. There was no immediate word if the weather was a factor in the crash.

Steve McLaughlin of MTJ Air Services, which de-ices private planes at the airport 185 miles southwest of Denver, said the company did not de-ice Ebersol's plane before it took off. Airport Manager Scott Brownlee said de-icing would have been the pilot's decision; he said at least one commercial jet had de-iced before taking off Sunday.

The wreckage came to rest about 100 yards from the end of the runway in an open, snow-covered field.

The pilot and a flight attendant were killed, said Michael O'Connor, regional duty officer with the Federal Aviation Administration in Washington state. The co-pilot was hospitalized in Denver, while Dick and Charles Ebersol were hospitalized in Grand Junction, witnesses said.

Ebersol's wife of 23 years, "Kate and Allie" star Susan Saint James, was not on the plane. The family lives in Connecticut.

The Ebersols were returning from a family gathering in Los Angeles, where Charlie's school, Notre Dame, played football Saturday night against Southern California, where 18-year-old son Willie is a freshman. They stopped to drop off Saint James in Colorado, where they have a home.

Neither NBC Sports nor St. Mary's Hospital released any information on Dick and Charles Ebersol's conditions.

Eyewitness Chuck Distel told The Associated Press by phone that he was driving on a highway parallel to the runway when he saw the plane skid sideways through a fence and brush before hitting a road that ripped the cockpit from the fuselage.

Distel said Charles helped his father through the front of the plane and that the pair were walking around when Distel and an airport official arrived. He said Ebersol didn't say a word but the younger man cried and yelled "Oh, my God! Oh, my God!"

"I had to think for a second, 'who are these people?'" he said. "They weren't severely injured, they were in shock." Distel said Charles was able to climb into an ambulance, while the elder Ebersol was loaded onto a stretcher.

A weekend storm that covered most of the state dumped more than 3 feet of snow in the Montrose area, and Distel said there was light snow and fog at the time of the crash.

The plane was a CL-602 Challenger, registered to Jet Alliance of Millville, N.J.

Known as a television innovator, Ebersol has a long history at NBC and has been influential in giving the Olympics a home on the network.

He became the network's director of late-night programming in 1974 and replaced Lorne Michaels for a rocky tenure as executive producer of "Saturday Night Live" in the early 1980s. Ebersol became president of NBC Sports in 1989 and recently signed a contract that keeps him at the network through 2012.

Flavin and Booth shine

A-10 NOTEBOOK from page 8

Dayton was hoping for the same kind of turnaround after a 3-25 campaign in 2003-2004, but even without Jabir the Flyers have already matched that total through four games. Last Saturday in Toledo, UD improved to 3-1 with a 62-20 defeat of the Toledo Rockets. It was their third consecutive road win after falling in the final seconds to Chicago State in their home-opener.

All-America Watch

Prior to the start of the 2004-2005 season, Street & Smith named Xavier's Tara Boothe and Richmond's Kate Flavin to Honorable Mention All-American honors. So far in the young season, the duo is living up to the expectations.

The junior Boothe was named A-10 Player of the Week on Sunday after averaging 19.5 points and 15 rebounds in the Provident Bank Xavier Invitational Tournament on Nov. 26 and 27. On the season, she is averaging 16 points per game, 10.3 rebounds per game and is shooting 45% from the floor.

Flavin was named A-10 Player of the Week prior to Boothe (Nov. 21) after draining a career high 33 points — 25 coming in the first half — en route to a 91-71 thumping of Southwest Missouri State. Thus far, the Colorado native is averaging 18.3 points per game while shooting 67.9 percent from the floor, and she's doing all of this while averaging only 27 minutes per game.

Sox, Mirabelli agree to terms

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

Courtesy The Examiner-Enterprise

The Boston Red Sox and backup catcher Doug Mirabelli have agreed to a two-year contract.

BOSTON — The Boston Red Sox have reached an agreement in principle with backup catcher Doug Mirabelli, who would become the first of the World Series champions' 16 free agents to re-sign.

Mirabelli and the Red Sox have agreed to the parameters of a $3 million, two-year contract but have not yet completed the details, a person with knowledge of the negotiations said Monday on the condition of anonymity.

Red Sox general manager Theo Epstein did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

Mirabelli made $825,000 last season, when he batted .281 with nine homers and 32 RBIs in 160 at-bats as Jason Varitek's backup and the regular catcher for knuckleballer Tim Wakefield.

Mirabelli had sought work as a regular catcher. Instead, he nearly doubled his pay to stay with the Red Sox, who are also trying to re-sign Varitek.

Varitek's agent, Scott Boras, has said he wants a five-year deal for $50 million.

The Red Sox have 14 unsigned free agents remaining, including Varitek, pitchers Pedro Martinez and Derek Lowe and shortstop Orlando Cabrera.

Boston has reportedly offered Martinez a two-year contract worth about $25 million with a third year that could become guaranteed to bring the deal to $38 million. Cabrera is seeking a multiyear deal, but the Red Sox don't want to commit long-term because prospect Hanley Ramirez could be ready as soon as 2006.

Lack of fans stops the Madness lack of fan support given to the Minutemen will be directly correlated to the insufficient attention given by the school to hype up its team.

MCGOVERN from page 8

But it takes two to tango.

Over the past two seasons, fewer and fewer fans are showing up for games. Granted, the team has seen its share of ups and downs, but there has been a heavy emphasis on the downs.

The last Midnight Madness, which took place before the 2002-03 season, got little to no attention. The school lost money and as the fans left the Mullins Center that night, there was an overwhelming feeling of apathy in the air. Sure enough, the team struggled, as did the attendance.

This year there was nothing, and maybe it was all for the better. No one really showed up at the Blue Wall, no one has come to the games, and now that the Minutemen are 2-0, no one is really paying attention. So maybe UMass doesn't deserve Midnight Madness yet. It seems as though the general student population isn't willing to support its basketball team. It appears that they don't want to get hurt, as they don't want to take the chance of actually cheering for their alma mater because there is a chance it will lose.

With a season of high aspirations, the Minutemen will attempt to build energy on their own. There will be no Hummers, no laser-lit dunks, and no boisterous introduction.

Maybe it's time for students to buckle down and get to know their team.

— Bob McGovern is a Collegian Editor

Celtic's Delonte West breaks hand

ORLANDO, Fla. (AP) — Boston Celtics guard Delonte West is out indefinitely after breaking his right hand.

West was hurt in the second quarter of Boston's 106-104 loss at Miami on Sunday night. It was only the rookie's second game since coming off the injured list. He broke his right thumb in the preseason.

In limited action, West had seven points, four assists and three rebounds.

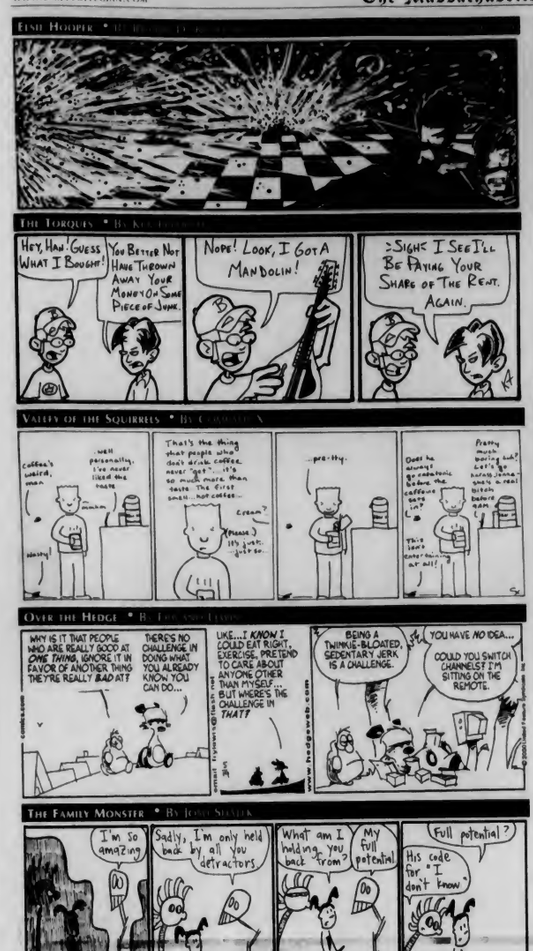
The injury put a damper on Monday night's reunion between West and Jameer Nelson _ the backcourt mates who lifted St. Joseph's to an undefeated regular season last year.

Nelson, the consensus college player of the year, is averaging 4.5 points and 2.2 assists as Orlando's backup point guard.

— Associated Press

FREEDOM OF SPEECH:
WHAT ARE THE LIMITS?
An Educational Forum

University of Massachusetts Amherst 1863



Incidents both on our campus, and throughout the nation, spark discussion concerning freedom of speech, hate crimes and the role of symbols in our society. Please join us for a forum with the following panelists as we explore these issues:

- Frank Flannery, Northwest District Attorney's Office
- Lt. Chip Thrasher, UMass Amherst Police
- Janice Healy, Massachusetts Attorney General's Office
- Bill Newman, American Civil Liberties Union

Moderator: Debora Ferreira, Office of Equal Opportunity and Diversity

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 1, 2004
CAMPUS CENTER - 163C
UMASS AMHERST
7:00 TO 9:00 P.M.
FREE ADMISSION

University of Massachusetts Amherst
This event is co-sponsored by Office of H... Office of ...

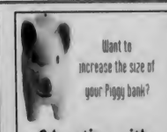
Quote of the Day



"I thought maybe we could make ginger bread houses, and eat cookie dough, and go ice skating, and maybe even hold hands."

-Buddy, Elf

BLOW away your competitors, advertise with The Collegian
545-3500

Want to increase the size of your Piggy bank?
Advertise with The Daily Collegian
and watch your profits grow
Contact our advertising dept. 545-3500

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
To reveal your true fortune, consult the little man in your phone.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You should change those sneakers. You're tracking goose poop everywhere.

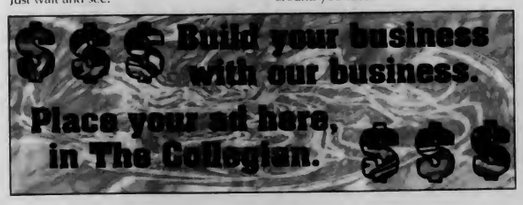
aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Take a nap in the afternoon. You never do anything productive anyway.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Someone has to pick up the phone. Today it is your turn.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
You always think that you're right, but for once you're wrong.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
One day the geeks shall rule the world. Just wait and see.

leo • Jul., 23-Aug. 22
Sweet dreams are made of this. You know what I mean.



virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Listen to your mom's advice. She will always know best.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You're on camera. You might not want to pick that wedgie.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You have to get rid of that inner dialogue that keeps playing in your head.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
It's always a good day for hiking, so pack your bags and go.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Your decorative skills are giving others around you ideas.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Linguistics Department seeks native speakers of Arabic (preferably Egyptian Arabic) and Singapore English for speech experiments. Experiments last about 1 hour w/participants paid $8/hr. Arabic speakers contact kawahara@linguist.umass.edu; Singapore English speakers contact mwolf@linguist.umass.edu

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Need an Apt. for 2nd Semester? Short Term Leases, Free Heat, Huge Bedrooms Call The Boulders 256-8534

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. 1 Bedroom units Available Jan 1, 2005 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com Stop by or call 549-0600

COMPUTERS

Pentium Laptop $99- Pentium III Desktop $99- 413-584-8857

EMPLOYMENT

Need money for the Holidays? Local moving company looking for mature responsible individuals to work between Thanksgiving and Christmas, and after. Part time hours available. Call 584-4746

EMPLOYMENT

Winter Break Employment at the Boston University Bookstore. Many temp jobs available! Kenmore Square location. Applications accepted Dec. 7 & 8 at the UMass Campus Center Concourse or email your resume to bnhmnres@bu.edu

SPRING INTERNSHIPS Student Legal Services Office offers a hands-on experience in the Legal field, working directly with attorneys and clients. No experience in the legal profession necessary – training provided. Work 32 hours a week and earn 12 academic credits. Deadline to begin the application process is Nov 24. Contact SLSO today: 545-1995 922 Campus Center.

EMPLOYMENT

"Bartending" $300/Day Potential. No Experience Nesc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

FOR SALE

MP3 $50 Avon Special MP3 & 100's of gifts under $10. Buy or Sell Kat ISR 413-585-1581.

ROOMMATE WANTED

325/month inclusive call 413-775-9997

SERVICES

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house Certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

SERVICES

Need money for the Holidays? Local moving company looking for mature responsible individuals to work between Thanksgiving and Christmas, and after. Part time hours available. Call 584-4746

TRAVEL

Spring Break Bahamas Celebrity Party Cruise! 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Nassau, Jamaica. From $459! Panama City & Daytona $159! www.SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

TRAVEL

StudentCity.com The Ultimate Spring Break Experience. 1-888-SpringBreak, or www.StudentCity.com to reserve today.

1SPRING BREAK Largest selection of Destinations, including Cruises! VIP Club Parties & FREE trips. Epicurean Tours 1-800-231-4-FUN www.BREAKNOW.com

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, Florida. Campus Reps Wanted! Free Meals & Parties! 1-800-234-7007 endlesssummertours.com

TRAVEL

Spring Break 2005. Travel with STS, America's #1 Student Tour Operator to Jamaica, Cancun, Acapulco, Bahamas and Florida. Now hiring on-campus reps. Call for group discounts. Information/Reservations 1-800-648-4849 or www.ststravel.com

SPRING BREAK '05
SAVE $100 PER ROOM
Clip & Send or Use Code: PRMG Online
Cannot be combined with any other offer $100 off based on quad room. Only valid for trips with airfare. Expires
1 800 426 7710

WANTED

Snowboard events intern $50/day stipend For job description email jfriends@deerfield.edu

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 2004 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Where's the Madness?

Bob McGovern

November is an interesting time in college sports. The slow transformation from fall to winter begins to take place, college football starts to wind down, and college basketball starts to creep into the heads of every Joe and Sally college student.

As they have done for the last 34 years, the Maryland Terrapins kicked off their season with Midnight Madness, a spectacle that injects excitement into the team's fan base. A rock concert, high-flying dunking acrobats, and even a look-alike contest of head coach Gary Williams took place for the 17,950 at the Comcast Center.

Midnight Madness at college campuses across the country has fans buzzing with excitement. It is the first sight of the changing of the guards and the introduction of the age-old question to whether this year is actually "The Year."

Yet, on the biggest stage for college basketball in the Pioneer Valley, the lights were off, the Mullins Center silent.

For the last two years there has been no Midnight Madness at the University of Massachusetts. Aside from the warm-up exhibition game, and a sparsely populated gathering at the Blue Wall last Monday, there is no true introduction to the team.

In 2001-02, a season that saw the Minutemen go 4-0 to start the year, the attention was there. Head Coach Steve Lappas, then in his first year, was introduced in a Hummer, and the UMass basketball team came in to a musical lights show that had the crazed students and fans in attendance going wild.

Jameel Pugh shocked everyone with his gravity-defying dunks, and a team that was a little better than average was pumping up the entire campus.

Now, with one of the most talented teams in the last five years, the Minutemen are getting no pre-season recognition. In a seemingly direct correlation, the attendance for the first three games (including the exhibition) has been poor at best.

Granted, two of the three games were around Thanksgiving break, but there is a definite lack of interest this year. You can see it when you look over at the student section that has only a few dozen die-hards in attendance.

Many will put this one on the shoulders of the UMass Athletic Department. There will be more complaining, and the

See MCGOVERN on page 6

MATTHEW REDUS/COLLEGIAN

The Minutemen's starting point guard and captain Anthony Anderson is one of the remaining players that has participated in Midnight Madness at UMass. Anderson is averaging 10 points and seven rebounds this year for the Maroon and White.

A-10 falters against elite

By BRENDAN HALL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

FRIGHT IN THE SPOTLIGHT

It appears UMass wasn't the only Atlantic 10 team to falter against a top 25 team this weekend.

On Nov. 23, No. 1 Tennessee and No. 2 LSU squared off against arguably two of the A-10's best squads, and proceeded to pummel them.

The Lady Vols, on the efforts of a 14-point, six-assist performance from junior Shanna Zolman, were able to cruise by the George Washington Colonials on opening night with a 71-41 defeat. Tennessee was not so fortunate over the next two games, first getting stunned by No. 4 Texas 74-59 on Thanksgiving Day and then narrowly escaping defeat at the hands of Temple (inching by the Owls 52-48 only after two crucial Zolman free throws were made in the final ten seconds).

As for the Tigers, they had no trouble downing the Owls 65-51 in Philadelphia on the same night the Vols took on GWU. LSU, led by the efforts of freshman Sylvia Fowles (17 points, 16 rebounds) and junior Seimone Augustus (16 points, two assists), went on a 17-4 run late in the first to take a 13-point halftime lead and never looked back.

Rhode Island took the worst beating on the national stage, getting handed a shell-shocker of a loss by the 14th-ranked Vanderbilt Commodores, 108-53.

Jabir taking a leave of absence

The University of Dayton announced on Nov. 3 that head coach Jim Jabir is taking a medical leave of absence, and assistant Greg Williams has taken the interim spot in the mean time. The length of leave has not been determined yet.

Jabir, 42, has been diagnosed with cardiac arrhythmia, a condition that affects a person's heart rate. To treat the condition, Jabir has undergone surgery to be fitted with an internal defibrillator.

Dayton was hoping for a lot of success with the hiring of Jabir. Before coming to UD, Jabir was most noticeably instrumental in the turnaround of the women's basketball program at Marquette. After winning just seven games in his first season (1990-91), Jabir led the Golden Eagles to a 16-win season the following year and eventually registered two NCAA appearances in his seven-year tenure.

Jabir has also coached on the professional level, most recently with the WNBA's Detroit Shock in the 2001 and 2002 seasons.

See A-10 NOTEBOOK on page 6

Boggs on HOF ballot

NEW YORK (AP) — Five-time AL batting champion Wade Boggs, eight-time All-Star Darryl Strawberry and two-time NL batting champion Willie McGee are among 12 players who will appear on the Hall of Fame ballot for the first time.

Ryne Sandberg, Bruce Sutter, Jim Rice, Andre Dawson and Rich Gossage head the returning players on the ballots, which will be mailed this week to eligible voters in the Baseball Writers' Association of America.

Also among the newcomers announced Monday are three-time All-Star outfielder Chili Davis, 1993 AL Cy Young Award winner Jack McDowell, three-time All-Star reliever Jeff Montgomery, four-time All-Star pitcher Mark Langston and longtime knuckleballer and ESPN.com analyst Tom Candiotti.

Pete Rose, once again, will not be on the ballot because he is on baseball's permanently ineligible list, the result of a 1989 agreement that followed an investigation of his gambling.

Rose, who earlier this year admitted he bet on baseball while managing the Cincinnati Reds in the 1980s, must gain reinstatement within the next year to appear on the 2006 ballot, the final year he would be eligible for the BBWAA vote.

While Rose applied for reinstatement in 1997, baseball commissioner Bud Selig has not ruled and will not give a timetable for a decision.

Paul Molitor and Dennis Eckersley were elected to the Hall last year, while Sandberg was 71 votes short of the required 75 percent needed for election.

Boggs, a 12-time All-Star during 18 major league seasons with Boston, the New York Yankees and Tampa Bay, is 23rd on the career list with 3,010 hits, and he was the only player to homer for his 3,000th hit.

Boggs had a .328 career average and set an AL record by reaching 200 hits for seven straight seasons, and won two Gold Gloves at third base.

McGee, a four-time All-Star outfielder, was a .295 career hitter with 2,254 hits and 352 steals

-Associated Press

COURTESY CNNSI.COM

Wade Boggs, who had 3,010 hits in his career, is eligible for the Hall of Fame this year. Also in the 2004 class is Darryl Strawberry.

With wins OU and USC will likely meet

By RALPH RUSSO
ASSOCIATED PRESS

If Auburn can't get to the Orange Bowl with a 12-0 record, the Bowl Championship Series has no plans to pair the Tigers with Utah and create a second match-up of unbeaten teams.

The Tigers are still stuck behind first-place Southern California and second-place Oklahoma in the BCS standings released Monday.

If USC (11-0) wins at UCLA on Saturday and Oklahoma (11-0) beats Colorado in the Big 12 title game in Kansas City, Mo., the Trojans and Sooners will likely play for the BCS championship in the Orange Bowl on Jan. 4.

That would leave Auburn (11-0) out, no matter what it does against Tennessee in the Southeastern Conference title game in Atlanta.

"We still need to see results of the games, but that's the system we have," Big 12 commissioner and BCS coordinator Kevin Weiberg said Monday. "Until you go down the path of some system that involves the playing of extra games, we're not going to sort out that kind of situation."

Utah (11-0), which finished its season two weeks ago, remained sixth in the latest standings and is positioned to become the first team from outside the BCS conferences to play in one of the four big-dollar bowl games.

Auburn would be contractually obligated to play in the Sugar Bowl if it wins the SEC and does not reach the national championship game. The Atlantic Coast Conference champ would be the Tigers' likely opponent.

Utah would likely be the first choice of the Fiesta Bowl if it must replace Big 12 champion Oklahoma. Pittsburgh, which is a win away from securing the Big East's BCS bid, will likely face the Utes.

For Utah and Auburn to play each other, either the Sugar or Fiesta would have to acquiesce.

Weiberg said the BCS could step in to create an Auburn-Utah game, but he isn't anticipating it.

"But I think it would be very unusual to have pairings altered unless there is some compelling reason to do so related to the alignment of interests of a number of parties. I just don't really at this juncture believe that's likely to happen," he said.

"We have to listen to see what others may say about it. That's part of the way our process works. We'll take input from bowls, we'll take input from the television network, and weigh that information. It would be premature to make comments about whether any particular match-up is better or worse."

USC improved its BCS grade in the standings this week to .9834, and padded its lead over Oklahoma (.9611). Auburn has a grade of .9342.

While Oklahoma and Auburn were idle last week, the Trojans beat Notre Dame 41-10 to regain some support in The Associated Press Top 25 and coaches' poll.

The polls each count for a third of a team's BCS grade. A compilation of six computer rankings are used to determine the other third.

USC holds a big lead in both polls, ahead of No. 2 Oklahoma and No. 3 Auburn. The Sooners and Tigers are separated by a total of only 17 points in the two polls, but the BCS computers have pegged Oklahoma as the No. 1 team in the country with USC second and Auburn third.

California (.8431) barely held on to the fourth spot ahead of Texas (.8418) after the Longhorns ended the season with a 26-13 victory over Texas A&M last week.

The Golden Bears will lock up an at-large spot in the BCS by beating Southern Mississippi on Saturday. The Bears would play in the Rose Bowl for the first time in 45 years if USC ends up in the Orange Bowl.

Texas is again on the verge of being left out of the BCS, despite being ranked among the top teams.

Sixth-place Utah (.8224) is guaranteed an at-large bid as a team from a non-BCS conference with a top-six finish in the BCS standings. The Utes (11-0), from the Mountain West Conference, finished their season two weeks ago and are sure to become the first team from a mid-major conference to play in the BCS.

Last season, Texas was bumped from an at-large BCS bid when Kansas State upset Oklahoma in the Big 12 title game to give the Wildcats an automatic berth and make the Sooners an at-large team.

Boise State (.6510) dropped from seventh to eighth in the BCS standings behind Georgia (.6948). The Broncos (11-0) from the Western Athletic Conference were trying to join Utah in the top six and grab a spot in one of the four bowl games worth more than $14 million.

LOUIS DELUCA/DALLAS MORNING NEWS

Oklahoma's Jason White fires a pass during the Sooners' 35-0 victory over Baylor in Waco, Texas, on Saturday, Nov. 20, 2004.

DECEMBER

Pearl Jam's Greatest Hits album is a hit with the fans

ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 4

WEDNESDAY	THURSDAY	FRIDAY
High: 51 Low: 32	High: 48 Low: 27	High: 44 Low: 23

DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

UMass faces off against Northeastern tonight

SPORTS, PAGE 8

The Daily Collegian

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 1, 2004 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXIV ISSUE 59

'Riot UMass' computer game creator makes less violent game after pressure

By DAN O'BRIEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In the wake of considerable media attention, much of it negative, University of Massachusetts freshman Grant Cerulo made the decision to pull his "Riot UMass" computer game off his University-provided Web site this past weekend. But he still said, "it's just a game."

The 18-year-old Ashland, resident sparked controversy after several news reports described the violent assaults the main character made on police officers in the "Riot UMass" computer game. Several television stations in Boston and Springfield interviewed him since the Daily Collegian broke the story in early November.

"[The reporters] just asked me how I made it, what was my inspiration, and do I feel it's in poor taste," he said. "You know, it is controversial, but it's just a game."

Cerulo said he decided to pull the video game because he wanted to have a good relationship with school officials over the next four years. He added that despite the negative portrayal his game received in the news media, he loves the UMass Amherst campus and did not want to tarnish that reputation.

"I love the campus, this is a great place. [The game] is just a reflection of what we see," Cerulo said. "UMass is confused if they think that people don't know riots occur here."

Riot UMass was created in response to several campus disturbances, according to Cerulo, a couple of which turned into riots of celebration after several Red Sox victories over the past couple of years. Over 100 students were arrested this fall in disturbances in the Southwest Residential Area.

The computer game featured a cartoon character posing as a University student in a Red Sox baseball cap, punching riot police officers until they succumbed to their injuries, lying in a pool of blood. The student could also pick up weapons dropped by police officers along the way to use to fight cops. A bottle of beer was used to measure how much life the character had remaining.

Cerulo's new game, simply called "Zoo Mass," features the same main character in the previous game, but on the campus pond, feeding ducks. A player can use the computer space bar to feed the ducks grain. After one duck is fed, it gleefully runs away while the player is bombarded with more ducks to feed. The point of the game is to feed as many ducks as possible. In this version, the player's life is measured in apple juice.

Cerulo said Zoo Mass is a mockery of Riot UMass.

"People are calling [Riot UMass] ultra violent. I mean, the game is not ultra violent. Ultra violent is like, guns and 'Kill Bill,' so [Zoo Mass is] kind of just making a mockery of people getting over excited about it," he said.

Cerulo said he was not completely surprised that his game received media attention, but did not think it would escalate much.

"I never even finished the game when people started looking at it. It's not like a professional creation. It's just kind of this silly thing," he said. "It surprised me that it got so much attention."

Cerulo claimed that all the response he has personally received about the game has been positive.

"Alumni have e-mailed me with support. People who went here in the 70's they played it and they were saying things like you handled the situation well. Kids, and everyone I've talked to — all my friends love it," he said.

However, the response to his creation has not been so positive on feedback forums on mainstream media sources.

"There's been… people saying in the [Boston] Herald on forums that I've been raised by wolves," he said.

He said he takes all the criticisms in stride.

"I kind of laugh at it because I know there are people out there who don't get the big picture … You just gotta ignore them."

After the game received considerable media attention across the state, University officials released statements condemning the game.

"We find it regrettable and

See GAME on page 2

COURTESY PEOPLE.UMASS.EDU/GCERULO/RIOTUMASS.HTML

A student feeds ducks in freshman Grant Cerulo's new "Zoo Mass" computer game. The object of the game is to feed as many ducks as possible. It takes place on the UMass campus pond.

Professor disects 'Bahston' accent

By ADRIENNE BOSSI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

One characteristic of the Boston accent, according to John McCarthy, a professor of linguistics, includes misplaced R's. McCarthy's lecture, "Pahk Your Cah in Hahvahd, Yahd: A Biography of the Boston dialect," was the second speech in this year's University of Massachusetts's Distinguished Lecture series.

McCarth focused on a topic familiar to many UMass students — the Boston accent.

"I'm originally from Medford," McCarthy said and then correcting himself, "I mean Mefud." However, it wasn't until 1979 when McCarthy began teaching at the University of Texas in Austin that he began studying the Boston accent.

The student evaluations, "all pointed something out that as a linguist you'd think I already knew. The students wrote that they couldn't understand me. And to be honest, I couldn't understand them, either," McCarthy said.

McCarthy surveyed the packed Massachusetts room at the Mullins center with four questions used by his linguistics 101 class to determine who in the room spoke the Boston dialect.

"What do you call beverages like Coca Cola, Sprite, and Pepsi," McCarthy asked. "Tonic."

"What do you call a drink with milk, ice cream, and flavored syrup blended together? A frappe."

"When you order a regular coffee, what do you expect to get? Coffee with cream and sugar."

"And, what do you call the thing you push around a supermarket that you carry your groceries in? A carriage."

McCarthy showed survey results from past linguistics classes spread throughout the state. Graphs illustrated that the existence of the Boston dialect seemed to fade in the western part of the state and nearly disappear once crossing the Connecticut River.

Using maps from the 1700s, McCarthy showed that when settlers were colonizing the state, they came from two distinct areas. They either entered through ports in and around Boston and spread out from there. Or, they came from the Connecticut Valley and moved up the river, exactly the border for the Boston accent.

"By the 1800s," McCarthy said as he showed a roadway map from that century, "All roads led to Boston up until the Connecticut River. The river was a formidable barrier." Boston was then in communication with only the parts of the state the roadways could traverse, thus enforcing the accent's border. And, by the 1800s, there is evidence of an R-dropping Boston accent already forming. Written in a 1794 publication, "The Young Ladies Accidence" girls are told that the proper pronunciation of the word "wharf" is not "woff."

McCarthy then went on to discuss the linguistics of the missing and misplaced letter "R." "R is stronger when followed by a vowel. It has more oomph," he said. Misplaced Rs come only after certain vowel sounds; "uh", "aw" and "ah", and are only added to the end of a word, like "sawring" for "sawing". "The first rule has priority as in, this tuner is rotten versus this tuna seems rotten," McCarthy said as an example.

Misplaced Rs are not to be confused with the common problem of overcorrecting the Boston accent. "It's not something we can really control so it's often overdone, hyper-corrected. Like when John Kerry says 'idear' and Ted Kennedy said 'Cuber' (Cuba)," McCarthy said.

McCarthy has tried hard to hide his accent by adopting the standard American English dialect characteristic of Midland states like Ohio and Pennsylvania. "I'm now bi-dialectical." McCarthy joked, "But I still don't know any other way to say 'Nomah Gahciaparrra.'"

Homeland Secretary Tom Ridge resigns

By Katherine Pfleger Shrader
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge, whose name became synonymous with color-coded terror alerts and tutorials about how to prepare for possible attack, resigned Tuesday.

Ridge submitted his resignation in writing to President Bush on Tuesday morning, but indicated he will continue to serve until Feb. 1. "I will always be grateful for his call to service," Ridge said.

Ridge said that for the future he intends to "raise some family and personal matters to a higher priority," including attending his son's rugby games.

In an e-mail circulated to Homeland Security officials, Ridge praised the department as "an extraordinary organization that each day contributes to keeping America safe and free." He also said he was privileged to work with the department's 180,000 employees "who go to work every day dedicated to making our country better and more secure."

Among those mentioned as possible candidates for Ridge's replacement are Bernard Kerik, interim Minister of the Interior for Iraq and former New York City police commissioner, former Federal Emergency Management Agency Director Joe Allbaugh and Environmental Protection Agency Administrator Mike Leavitt and White House homeland security adviser Fran Townsend. Others are also believed to be interested in the job, including Asa Hutchinson, undersecretary for border and transportation security in the Homeland Security Department.

Six other Bush Cabinet figures are leaving, including Attorney General John Ashcroft, Commerce Secretary Donald Evans, Education Secretary Rod Paige, Agriculture Secretary Ann

See RIDGE on page 3

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Holiday green

Workers secure the Capitol Christmas Tree on the West Lawn of the White House on Monday.

Ukrainian opposition blocks talks after no-confidence vote in elections rejected

By NATASHA LISOVA
ASSOCIATED PRESS

KIEV, Ukraine — Opposition supporters on Tuesday abruptly broke off compromise talks over Ukraine's disputed presidential election after pro-government lawmakers blocked a no-confidence motion seeking to topple the prime minister, who was declared the victor in last week's vote despite allegations of massive fraud.

The opposition's rejection of the talks raises pressure on Ukrainian authorities, while Russian President Vladimir Putin said the crisis in the former Soviet republic must be resolved without foreign meddling.

The Supreme Court was wrapping up a second day of hearings with no sign of a decision on an opposition appeal to annul the results from the Nov. 21 runoff election, which put Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych ahead by 871,402 votes.

The moves came after outgoing President Leonid Kuchma, who did not run in the election, spoke out harshly against any steps that would divide this nation of 48 million and said he would support a new vote.

President Bush said Polish President Aleksander Kwasniewski will lead a delegation to Ukraine "to encourage the parties to reject violence and to urge the parties to engage in dialogue toward a political and legal solution to the current crisis."

"Our common goal is to see the will of the Ukrainian people prevail," Bush said during a joint news conference with Canadian Prime Minister Paul Martin in Ottawa.

Ukraine's government has been paralyzed since the election results sent hundreds of thousands into the streets of the capital for round-the-clock protests to support opposition candidate Viktor Yushchenko, who claims he was robbed of victory.

Putin told German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder that "an exit from the crisis should be found in a democratic way, that is, on the basis of observing the law and not under external or internal pressure based on political passions," the Kremlin press service said in a statement.

Schroeder and Putin also discussed the possibility of new elections in Ukraine and agreed that any results should be "strictly respected," according to the German leader's office.

COURTESY CNN.COM

Yushchenko's supporters hold flags outside Parliment yesterday afternoon in the snow.

Jury still out on Scott Peterson's fate

REDWOOD CITY, Calif. (AP) — The start of the penalty phase in the Scott Peterson murder trial was delayed Tuesday after a bartender claimed he overheard a juror discussing the case, a defense source told The Associated Press.

The judge met behind closed doors with attorneys from both sides throughout the morning. At one point, a man identified by the source as the bartender and his attorney entered a closed chamber in the courtroom.

The lawyer, Ian Loveseth, declined to identify his client but said he had been subpoenaed in the Peterson case.

The defense source, who requested anonymity, said the court had subpoenaed a bartender who claimed to have heard at least one juror discussing the case in his bar. The source did not say when the alleged discussion took place or how many jurors were involved.

Jurors are not allowed to discuss the case outside of the jury room.

The penalty phase was to start Tuesday after the state Supreme Court on Monday denied a petition by Peterson's defense lawyers to delay it and seat a new jury in another county.

Defense attorney Mark Geragos argued the jury that found Peterson guilty is now tainted by public opinion. In his appeal for a new jury, Geragos also cited the ousting of two jurors during deliberations.

By Brian Skoloff – Associated Press

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Peter Foundas
MANAGING EDITOR Andrew Merritt
BUSINESS MANAGER Rich Pacheco
PRODUCTION MANAGER Cory Rosenberg
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Cameron Woods
ADVERTISING MANAGER Tiffany Sugalski
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Samantha Nielsen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Meghan Healy
COMICS EDITOR Alyson Zillmann
EDITORIAL EDITOR Paige Crum
NEWS EDITOR Erika Lovley
PHOTO EDITOR Matthew Reid
SPORTS EDITOR Mike Marzilli
CIRCULATION MANAGER Kristen Weiss
CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING Marty Pappa
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Josh Kiggans
FINANCE MANAGER Hirak Shah
ACCOUNTING CLERK Virginie Frecaut
HUMAN RESOURCE Sandra Marquart
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Josh Greenberg
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Jaclynn Sorenson
ASSISTANT FINANCE Thomas Hecht
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Rachael Bruno
GRAPHICS ADVISOR Charlie Higgins
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Mike Bonack
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Monique Jemmott
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Yousef Munayyer
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Allison Edles
ASSISTANT NEWS Julie O'Donnell
ASSISTANT NEWS Dan O'Brien
ASSISTANT SPORTS Robert McGovern
ASSISTANT SPORTS Jeff Howe

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 5:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
S.J. Port
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Andrew Roberts
COPY EDITOR
Peter Foundas
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Molly Eggleston
PRODUCTION STAFF
Lauren Egavian, Melody Natal

Missing U.S. Air Force plane found

KABUL, Afghanistan — (AP) Rescuers found the wreckage of a missing plane used by the U.S. Air Force and recovered the bodies of several Americans who were aboard when it crashed in snow-covered mountains over the weekend, Afghan police said Tuesday.

The transport plane, which was carrying three U.S. soldiers and three American crew members, was located southeast of Bamiyan in the heart of the Hindu Kush mountains, said Ghulam Mohammed, a senior police official in Bamiyan.

"They found pieces of the engine and the wheels scattered on top of Baba Mountain, which rises to 16,600 feet and was covered in fresh snow," Mohammed said.

He said several bodies were recovered and taken to the main U.S. military base at Bagram, north of the capital, Kabul, from where the plane departed Saturday.

Mohammed had no information on the identity of the bodies found. There was no suggestion that anyone survived.

The American military announced earlier Tuesday that the plane was missing and that search-and-rescue teams were struggling to reach the area where they suspected it went down.

A spokesman declined Tuesday evening to say whether the plane had crashed or whether any of its occupants were killed.

The CASA 112 transport plane was operated by Florida-based Presidential Airways and was contracted to the U.S. Air Force in Afghanistan, U.S. military spokesman Mark McCann said.

By Stephen Graham – Associated Press

The Capitol Vistor Center costs rising

By JIM ABRAMS
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The cost of the new Capitol Visitor Center could run as high as $559 million, more than double the estimated cost when the construction project broke ground in 2000.

The Government Accountability Office, the investigative office of Congress, also predicted in an analysis that the opening for the three-floor underground facility, originally scheduled for the end of 2005, would be further delayed. It said current plans to open in the summer of 2006 were optimistic.

The GAO analysis is the latest of several assessments to drive up the price tag of what is the most ambitious and expensive construction project in the history of the Capitol.

In concluding that the real costs could be as much as $100 million above the $454 million currently budgeted, the analysis cited management problems for the project, which is being overseen by the architect of the Capitol, and low bid estimates.

Jennifer Hing, spokeswoman for Rep. Jack Kingston, R-Ga., who heads the Appropriations subcommittee responsible for the project's budget, said both Kingston and Rep. Jim Moran, D-Va., the top Democrat on the panel, "are very concerned" about the latest analysis "and plan to take a long hard look at it."

She said they plan hearings on the cost overruns and delays when the new Congress convenes next year.

November marks the worst month for U.S. troops in Iraq

By STEPHEN MANNING
Associated Press

COURTESY WASHINGTONINSTATE.EDU

Martha Burger weeps at a service for her son who was killed in Iraq on Nov. 14.

Cpl. Dale Burger Jr. and his father shared more than just a name. Both joined the Marines at 17 and both were combat veterans. As a boy, Burger dressed up in his dad's uniform for Halloween. He helped care for his father after the older man became an invalid a decade ago.

Father and son now share one last thing — a grave site. Killed Nov. 14 in Iraq, Dale Jr., 21, of Bel Air, Md., was buried Monday at Arlington National Cemetery next to his father, a Vietnam veteran who died in May at 54.

"He said, 'If anything happens to me, I want to be buried near my dad,'" said the younger man's mother, Martina Burger.

The Pentagon reported at least 135 U.S. troops killed in November as of Tuesday morning, matching April of this year for the deadliest month since fighting began in March 2003. Many died in the street-to-street fight to retake the insurgent stronghold of Fallujah or during gun battles in cities such as Baghdad and Mosul. Others were killed by snipers, in accidents, or from shrapnel sprayed by roadside bombs. Some died where they were hit; others succumbed at stateside military hospitals.

Twenty were from California, and 13 were Texas natives. Puerto Rico suffered its 11th fatality. Six were from the 1st Battalion, 3rd Marine Regiment, based in Hawaii; seven others from that battalion were killed Oct. 30.

The dead include Marine Cpl. Jarrod Maher, 21, who had helped his father plant soybeans at their Shenandoah, Iowa, farm on his last visit home in May.

Another was Brian Baker, 27, of West Seneca, N.Y., an Army specialist based at Fort Drum who was about to become the father of identical twin girls.

Army National Guard Spc. Quoc Binh "Bo" Tran was sent a care package by his mother containing his favorite dried noodles — "the Asian kind that are really good," according to his 25-year-old sister, Kristie. Tran, 26, was killed Nov. 7 by a bomb in Baghdad. His family is not sure he got the noodles.

Tran's father was once an officer in the South Vietnamese army. Sent to a re-education camp after the Vietnam War, he escaped from Vietnam with his family in 1986 by trudging through the jungle. They later settled in Mission Viejo, Calif.

Tran was a dutiful eldest child who helped with chores around the house. He joined the military because he liked to fix things. In the National Guard, he was a mechanic.

His family went out to his grave Sunday. Thanksgiving was the first time that one of them had missed a holiday gathering.

"It is completely unreal," his sister said. "Every day we imagine him and think about him and cry."

Spc. David Roustum, 22, was in his last semester of college when he got a call to active duty with the Army National Guard in March. His father, a native of Syria, urged him go there instead to avoid the fighting.

"He looked at me and said, 'Dad, I would never even consider it,'" Russ Roustum recalled.

David Roustum was just a few months from finishing a degree in accounting at the University of Buffalo. At Orchard Park High School outside Buffalo, he was quarterback of the football team and captain of a club hockey squad.

He was killed Nov. 20 in an ambush in Baghdad. Three other soldiers from his 108th Infantry Regiment were wounded. The mothers of the wounded told his parents they believe Roustum saved their sons' lives.

In a call a week before his death Nov. 12 in combat, Lance Cpl. David Branning, 21, told his stepmother that eight Marines had been killed in his company from the Hawaii-based unit. He said he was OK during the call to Tia Steele in Baltimore.

"It was like he didn't want to quit talking, but he couldn't say what was happening," she recalled. "He was a Marine, so he couldn't say he was scared. I thought he was going to come out of it. And he didn't."

Branning loved to cook, and worked his way up from dishwasher to a line cook at a restaurant while in high school. He enlisted in 2002, a year after graduating from Dulaney High, wanting to see the world beyond Baltimore.

Dale Burger Jr. took part in the initial assault on Iraq in 2003. He was just days away from the end of his second tour of duty when he died. He was wounded in the arm by shrapnel recently but told his mother he planned to return to the fighting. She urged him not to, but he said his unit was short on men and he was needed.

"He died doing what he believed in," Martina Burger said. "He's my hero. I'm just so proud of him."

Student pulls 'Riot UMass' and creates new 'duckey' game discouraging that a student had designed a game that involves making University police officers targets," said UMass spokesman Ed Blaguszewski. "It doesn't reflect well on the relationship we'd like to build between students, police and the community as a whole."

GAME from page 1

Despite the University's concerns, they admitted Cerulo was within his first amendment rights to post the computer game on his Web site.

"We don't have the authority to remove the game or censor it," Blaguszewski said. "That doesn't mean we endorse it or support its distribution — we clearly don't. But based on the legal advice we received, it's not within our domain to remove the game."

"I respect what they said. I didn't want to set a bad example," he said. "If people were going to look at me for a model of what to do, then I thought the best decision, overall, was just to take it off."

COURTESY OF WWW.UMASSGEAR.COM

In "Riot UMass," the player's goal was to beat to death as many riot police officers as possible. The player can pick up weapons as well.

Student Activities Center
UMassAmherst
UP TO THE MINUTE

December 1:
Music injecton Wednesdays:
Bring your lunch and recieve a healthy dose of music between classes.
Student Union, Cape Cod Lounge, 11am -1pm.

December 2:
Under the Radar, Off the Charts!
Hip hop, spoken word, Afro-beat, jazz, reggae.
Sponsered by WMUA, UPC, & BMCP.
Student Union Ballroom, 8pm. FREE

Tomboys!
A documentary film profiling tomboy subjects and exploring how class, ethnicity, and sexual orientation help shape our definitions. Talk to the film maker Christian McEwen. Sponsored by the Stonewall Center.
Hasbrouck 124, 7pm. FREE

December 1, 2, & 3:
Annual Holiday Craft Fair:
Unique hand-crafted gifts at reasonable prices. Sponsored by the Student Union Craft Center Campus Center Concourse, 10am - 4pm.

December 3:
Something Every Friday: Collateral,
with Tom Cruise.
Top of the Campus Center, 9pm. FREE

December 5:
Sunday Night Movie: Collateral,
with Tom Cruise.
Top of the Campus Center, 8pm. FREE

THE MONKEY BAR

Thursday
FEATURING
DJ Menace

Drink Specials

Wodka & Tonic $3.00
Gin & Tonic $3.00
Sex on the Beach $3.00
Long Island Tea $4.50
Special Beer
Irish & Mixed Up Pitcher $6.00

Friday
Ladies Night
No cover
FEATURING
DJ Trend

Saturday
FEATURING
A Guest DJ

Private Parties:
call : 413.259.0006

The Monkey Bar 63 N. Pleasant St. 413.259.1600

policelog

Caller alerted to car in Conn. River, K-9 aids in three arrests

MondayNovember 15

12:24 a.m. After investigating loud banging noises around Tobin Hall, an officer found subjects playing dodge ball. A marijuana pipe was confiscated from one of the subjects.

12:25 p.m. A vehicle parked in the parking lot behind the bus garage was reported to have its passenger side window shattered. The car also had damage to the dashboard, and its stereo was missing.

3:10 p.m. A party reported someone was watching them while they were in the shower.

6:56 p.m. An officer reported that a subject was trying to access a police cruiser. The officer advised the subject that they could be charged with attempted breaking and entering.

8:38 p.m. Following a traffic stop for an expired inspection sticker, Jeremy Barrett, 18, of Millbury, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license.

TuesdayNovember 16

1:10 p.m. A party at the Campus Center stated that someone broke into the game machines and stole money.

9:48 p.m. A party stated that someone threw a rock or another object through a plate-glass window at Hills House. Three people were hit by flying glass, but were not injured.

WednesdayNovember 17

6:41 p.m. A caller in Van Meter Hall stated that someone stole their clothes from the laundry room.

8:31 p.m. A caller stated that several people were riding a wheeled dolly in traffic on Clark Hill Road. An officer investigated, but could not find the people.

ThursdayNovember 18

12:45 a.m. An officer observed four subjects entering vehicles parked in the parking lot next to the football stadium. After being seen, the subjects fled on foot. The UMPD K-9 unit as well as the Massachusetts State Police K-9 unit assisted in finding, and arresting, three of the subjects: Joset Leaf, 22, of Springfield, was arrested for breaking and entering, Possession of a class D substance, and malicious destruction of property.
Ricardo Ramos, 19, of Springfield, was arrested for breaking and entering, possession of a class D substance, and malicious destruction of property.
Israel Aponte, 19, of Springfield, was arrested for breaking and entering, Possession of a class D substance, and malicious destruction of property.

9:03 p.m. A party stated that cash from their wallet was stolen at Boyden Gymnasium. The wallet was found, but $20.00, a UCard, and two credit cards were taken.

10:19 p.m. An officer stated a stereo was missing from a car parked in the parking lot next to Dickinson Hall.

FridayNovember 19

5:43 p.m. A party stated three ski hats were stolen from the Boyden Gymnasium.

7:30 p.m. A party reported a DVD stereo was stolen from their vehicle in the parking lot behind the Mullins Center.

9:30 p.m. After being observed carrying alcohol in Patterson Hall, Scott Selenow, 19, of Sharon, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol.

SaturdayNovember 20

1:01 a.m. Following a traffic stop on Massachusetts Avenue, Amanda Pettijean, 18, of Melrose, was arrested for operation a motor vehicle under the influence of alcohol and Christopher Leone, 18, of Medford, was arrested for disorderly conduct.

2:47 a.m. A party reported a fight involving 20 to 30 people on Sunset Avenue. An officer stated one subject possibly had a broken nose.

3:04 a.m. Following a traffic stop, Joseph Panarese, 21, of Yarmouth, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license.

3:41 a.m. A party in Van Meter Hall stated a subject with a bleeding hand fled to the bathroom after they punched a window.

4:47 p.m. Following a traffic stop, Constance Splitter, 26, of Marlborough, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license.

10:08 p.m. A party stated that the passenger side window of their vehicle was smashed, the stereo was missing, the dashboard was destroyed, and the trunk was damaged and could not be opened. The car was parked in the parking lot behind Sylvan Hall.

10:37 p.m. After being requested for their date of births, Sean Gerrish, 19, of Bridgewater, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol and John Turner, 19, of Bridgewater, was arrested also arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol.

SundayNovember 21

12:59 a.m. A party told the UMPD that they had been notified by the Northampton Police that their vehicle was located in the Connecticut River.

4:22 a.m. A party stated that there was an intoxicated person knocking on their door, refusing to leave. The subject was transported off campus.

7:07 p.m. A party stated that an unknown subject had jumped up and down on the roof of their vehicle, across the street from Whitmore. An officer stated that the roof of the vehicle was caved in.

-Compiled by Brendan Heck

Ridge vows to stay until Feb. if needed

RIDGE from page 1

Veneman; Secretary of State Colin Powell and Energy Secretary Spencer Abraham. Bush has chosen national security adviser Condoleezza Rice for the State Department, White House counsel Alberto Gonzales for the Justice Department and Carlos Gutierrez for Commerce.

In October 2001, Ridge became the nation's first White House homeland security adviser, leading a massive undertaking to rethink all aspects of security within the U.S. borders in the wake of the terror attacks of September 2001.

Congress subsequently passed legislation establishing the Homeland Security Department, merging 180,000 employees from 22 government agencies. Ridge became the department's first secretary in January 2003.

He has presided over six national "orange alerts" when the government boosted security out of concern that an attack may be coming. An attack in the United States never happened on his watch.

www.dailycollegian.com
HIGH RISK STUDENTS, FACULTY & STAFF
GET A FLU SHOT AT THE UHS OPEN FLU CLINIC
THURSDAY, DECEMBER 2
10 A.M. TO 4 P.M. COST: $15
CAMPUS CENTER ROOM 163-C
UMassAmherst UNIVERSITY HEALTH SERVICES

Regency Hair Stylists
Full Highlights™
$20 Off
Call for an appointment with Marna, Megan or April
Mention this ad
253.9526
Next to Pleasant Street Theater
Amherst
Marna
April
Megan

It's your life... tune in.

learn more at www.dhmc.org
... where great opportunities are just the beginning.

Every New Graduate nurse hired between now and June 1, 2005 receives an iPod®.
And if you think that's cool ... just wait.

DARTMOUTH-HITCHCOCK MEDICAL CENTER

New Hampshire's Only Academic Medical Center • Lebanon, New Hampshire • nursejobs@hitchcock.org

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 1, 2004

"The author must keep his mouth shut when his work starts to speak."
-Friederich Nietzche

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Don't lose your head this upcoming holiday season

It is December 1, and although stores and radio stations have been prepared since before Thanksgiving, today marks the official start of the holiday season. In the coming 24 days, we will be bombarded with commercials, Christmas music, TV specials and the overall madness that the holidays bring to our society.

Those not gleaming with cheer and good will during these expectations filled and fueled days are often the loneliest. Instead of fulfilling our capitalist economy's consumerist requirements for the season keep your eyes open for the lonely soul who needs your company more than a present.

We lead busy lives, and so it seems impossible to manage all of our decorating, gift buying, cooking and travel plans in just over three weeks. It is this thought that creates the hectic frenzy that could make anyone hate this most wonderful time of year.

For us as college students, it is easier to avoid this frenzy; we are so bogged down in final papers and exams that we don't even have time to think about Christmas until it is all over. However, as the wind blows a little colder and the days get a little shorter, it's easy to panic and start feeling more like the Grinch than the embodiment of holiday merriment, Tiny Tim.

The thing that people seem to so easily forget in the weeks leading up to Dec. 25 is that it really isn't about the decorations or the presents. Holidays are a time to celebrate some time off, to be with the loved ones we have and remember those we used to. They're about eating, drinking and being merry, joys which easily get lost in a consumer driven world that tries to make it about cards, candy and wrapping paper.

This year, we'd like to challenge all of our readers to approach the holidays a little differently this year: don't allow the commercialism to ruin your spirit. Make hot chocolate, hope for snow and hang decorations with those you love, but don't spend the next 24 days obsessing over what to get for each and every person on your gift list. Bottom line: even making it to the gift list shows you care, and no matter what you give to people, it really is the thought that counts.

So let yourselves have an enjoyable and stress-free season for a change. Remember the less you expect of other the less they may expect from you and the easier it is on all of us to enjoy the chestnuts roasting. And remember, if your gifts don't make a hit, there's plenty of time on Dec. 26 to make exchanges.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

This one's for the UMMB

Let's not kid ourselves.

We attend a university that is flooded with the ugly.

Zach Oelschlegel

We have a Student Government Association that basically seems to amount to scandal followed by scandal, teacher's contracts that always seem to be up in the air, and a vice-chancellor [for student affairs and campus life] whose resignation is constantly called for. We had a fair amount of riots this year, a whole lot of tree burning, general campus destruction, people throwing bricks at police and numerous arrests and costs due to student stupidity. There is too often a negative aura that hangs over the campus.

It's fairly easy to get depressed considering what is on the front page of this newspaper every day. So when you need a pick me up from the campus madness, I say look no further than our University of Massachusetts Minuteman Marching Band. When everyone around you makes it seem like nothing productive ever happens on this campus, just tell them that we have a band full of the hardest working studs (not geeks) you will ever see. When everything screams at you to think negatively about UMass, think about our band studs.

The band contains so much of what the school needs. There are so few students at UMass who truly love their school. We don't cheer when the football team wins, we don't congratulate ourselves when our hockey team whips another Hockey East opponent, and it's largely because we don't take pride in our school. UMass should be part of our identity, to the point where our friends back home should think "UMass" when they hear our names, yet in reality, it's more or less just a small stop along our personal journeys of life that apparently don't warrant much conversation.

The band embodies the exact opposite. Just by the fact that they show up for school a week early, losing sleep and sweating off a few pounds during some of the most grueling practices, shows a commitment most students couldn't make, in terms of basic class attendance. That they practice to the point where they seem like a varsity team, and pledge themselves to weekend long trips to cities as far as Indianapolis is just one more way the band exemplifies what our students should look like.

Every single time that I have seen this band, I come back to my dorm room fired up for this school. I come back excited for what we do have at UMass instead of what we don't.

Then there's the swagger these studs carry. They don't call themselves the "Power and Class" just because they like the way it sounds. They don't yell the phrase "with pride" when asked how their eyes should look for a couple giggles. And the very thing they are so prideful about is a supporting role. I've never heard any talk around campus about our incredible drum major, how comical our tubas are or how loud the band cheered when RJ Cobbs ran in for that touchdown last Saturday. The ultimate team player is our typical band stud because he rises to the occasion only when his fellow studs do as well, and because he is supporting more than just the football team.

It's not something we read about all too often. It's rare that you find an article in The Collegian about a band event, and it's rare that you would expect a band stud to expect such an article. Essentially, they play their hearts out because they love this school, and make sure they show UMass' finest every Saturday as they burst onto Alumni Stadium's field. Any accolades they receive are purely bonus, since they realize that they are not the main event.

Hence, this is where I come in. Every single time that I have seen this band, I come back to my dorm room fired up with spirit for this school. I come back excited for what we do have at UMass instead of what we don't. This isn't a sporting event where I can come home either completely satisfied or completely disgusted. There's no alternative to what I am getting when I see them strut onto the field for the fifth quarter to perform for the remaining faithful who stay and watch.

I often think that with the fair amount of people leaving immediately after the game, the band could get a little discouraged considering some of the smaller crowds they have entertained on Saturdays past. I want to let them know that this writer and everyone else who attends the fifth quarter is in awe every time we see them, and to keep up the good work. I want the band to know how proud I am to say that I go to the school with the Power and Class.

To you band studs, congratulations on another tremendous season. Thanks for loving this school as much as I do. The things you do, ranging from the field positions to the small nuances that make you truly great, don't go unnoticed. Thanks for being a bright spot on a university that too often doesn't seem to have one. I can't wait for next year's team.

Zach Oelschlegel is a Collegian columnist.

No condom? No deal. Sorry.

The last two guys I hooked up with wanted to move beyond the generic grab, suck and fondle to sex. That's not shocking. What is shocking was that both males attempted to persuade me to have intercourse without a condom. One claimed not to have any condoms; the other just didn't want to get out of bed to grab one.

S.J. Port

I'm sorry. I had no idea we'd cured AIDS, hepatitis and genital warts! Why didn't anybody inform me that the plague of sexually transmitted illnesses that for most of our lives have run rampant from loin to loin was eradicated from the earth? Somebody should have told me that we are all now free to have casual sexual intercourse without concern.

Furthermore, how presumptuous of these men to assume that I was on birth control and that nine months down the line they wouldn't be straddled by the burden of a junior.

You're in the moment and it looks like your three days (or months) of celibacy are about to conclusively climax. You want to get laid and, guess what, so does she! But my guess is neither of you wants to end up with diseased sexual organs or the responsibility a pregnancy brings.

Whether you can count the number of people you've slept with on one hand or don't have enough fingers and toes combined to total the records up, sex remains an exciting venture. It also remains an act in which you open up a part of yourself to vulnerability.

They're small and come in a myriad of colors, sizes, textures and flavors. You can get handfuls free from your resident advisor, or if you're off-campus, the pharmacy at University Health Services stocks big boxes for low prices. Can you guess what they are?

Since high school I've carried a condom in my purse at all times – upon mother's orders – in the hope that if I were ever attacked by a rapist, I might be able to convince him to use a condom. In an age in which AIDS has become an epidemic and Human Papalo Virus is the leading cause of cervical cancer in young women, condoms have become necessary weapons of defense.

If you are mature enough to enjoy sex, you're mature enough to know the health risks and how to avoid them.

Take the moment to put the condom on. Not just for her sake, but for yours. Who knows where that girl has been, or rather with whom she's been. She may look "clean," "healthy," or "safe," but she also probably looked different before you had those beers.

"Pulling out" before ejaculation will not protect you from STIs or from impregnating the babe you've just involved yourself with. Did you want to involve yourself with her for a few hours, months or the rest of your lifetime?

Don't assume that every female is on birth control. True, a majority of the college-attending women in our generation are on one form or another of chemical birth control. However, this is not an absolute guarantee: not every woman is on the pill or the patch.

Either way, just because the coed your dying to seduce is on chemical birth control, it still doesn't mean she is taking the pills correctly. In order to be at their most effective, birth control pills must be taken at the same time, within a one-hour window, every single day. How many days in a row do you manage to do something at the exact same time?

Perhaps, it's because the majority of unwed college-aged women fear pregnancy as much as they fear contracting a sexual disease that women are more likely to take the pill and to insist on the condom. That said, when are we going to stop making excuses for men? When will men stop making excuses for themselves? And when will women stop accepting the paltry excuses men make? If I have to swell up and bleed once a month, give up my body to produce our child or undergo a painful procedure to end the life of that child, then you can get your act together enough to remember a condom.

If you are mature enough to enjoy sex, you're mature enough to know the health risks and how to avoid them.

Just because a girl gets naked, or removes the majority of her clothing, does not mean it is a green light to initiate sexual intercourse without a condom. There are many things to do when naked that don't involve intercourse ... unless of course you've got a condom.

S.J. Port is a Collegian columnist.

Up against the Wal-Mart

Julie Deffenbaugh managed Wal-Mart's jewelry department in the Arlington, Texas store from 1990 to 1994. In 1992, she began a relationship with a fellow employee named Truce Williams, which culminated in their marriage two years later. Several supervisors knew of their relationship, and she was called to a meeting in 1993, in which one of them declared that Deffenbaugh, "would never move up with the company being associated with a black man and that Wal-Mart frowned upon fraternization with[in] the company," according to Williams v. Wal-Mart Stores (1998). Early in 1994 she was fired, on trumped-up charges of "shopping on the clock." Abuse of workers is common at the company that employs over 1 million Americans: Wal-Mart.

Andrew Freeman

Wal-Mart is the world's largest and most powerful retailer. Its revenue in 2003, over $256 billion, is only slightly less than the value of all the goods produced in Colombia ($263 billion), according to the New York Times. It has grown to be that size through a variety of measures, from greater use of technology to an extremely aggressive business strategy, but the essential thrust is to single-mindedly reduce costs. The result of this ruthless corporate mentality is wholesale exploitation of the company's workers.

Without unions to advocate for, or to defend them, Wal-Mart employees are disadvantaged in everything from wages and job security to healthcare.

While the retail industry in general is one of the poorest paying professions, Wal-Mart is particularly parsimonious, giving most of its "associates" only $7.50 to $8.50 per hour, often less than $1,000 a month.

In addition to low wages, workers are often required to work off the clock without pay, during breaks or as overtime. To give one example, 596 pharmacists suing for damages claimed their work weeks were 60 hours rather than the 40 that Wal-Mart recorded, and that they were not compensated for this overtime.

Part of the reason workers are exploited like this is that there is essentially no union presence at Wal-Mart. The company aggressively prevents union formation, with the government issuing more than 60 complaints at the National Labor Relations Board, encompassing everything from illegal firings of unionizing workers to threats and surveillance of them. Without unions to advocate for or to defend them, Wal-Mart employees are disadvantaged in everything from wages and job security to healthcare.

Between 41 percent and 46 percent of Wal-Mart's employees are covered by the company's health care program, which has a 6 month waiting period for full-time workers and a two-year period for part-time ones. By contrast, other large firms offered insurance to 66 percent of workers, at an average waiting period of 1.3 months. Furthermore, the plan itself requires employees to pay 42 percent of the costs of their healthcare, versus 16 percent for large-firm workers and nothing for many unionized grocery employees. Many employees simply cannot afford Wal-Mart's healthcare.

Because of abysmal wages and healthcare, workers are often forced to seek assistance from the government. A report entitled, "Everyday Low Wages" by the staff of several Democratic congressmen estimated that a single Wal-Mart employing 200 people would cost the government around $420,750: over $2,100 per employee. These costs would result from having to provide free lunches for children, housing assistance, healthcare and tax credits.

In addition to general worker exploitation, women, who make up 65 percent of hourly employees, are discriminated against, receiving 37 cents less than men in comparable positions. Women have a great deal of difficulty entering management, with an average of 4.38 years to gain a job as Assistant Manager, while men average only 2.86 years. 90 percent of store managers are men, and overall, women make up only a third of all managers. Among Wal-Mart's competitors, women compose over 56 percent of managers.

Even entrance into management does not secure equal treatment, as women management trainees make nearly a thousand dollars less than male counterparts. This inequality persists at the highest levels, with the four female senior vice presidents receiving an average of nearly $280,000, while men in the same position got salaries of almost $420,000.

As a result of widespread discrimination, a massive class-action lawsuit is underway, representing hundreds of thousands of current and former Wal-Mart female employees. Unsurprisingly, Wal-Mart is among the most-sued organizations in the country: in 2001 it was sued 4,851 times, second only to the U.S. government at over 7,500.

Exploitation of workers is hardly new to the world, and Wal-Mart may not be the worst corporate offender, but it is at the present time the largest and most prevalent. Consumers have power and they should exercise it. If you support Wal-Mart's vision of America – a land of low-paying, nonunion, exploitative jobs – then by all means shop there. But if you believe that Americans deserve jobs they can be proud of, shop elsewhere.

Andrew Freeman is a Collegian columnist.

SUBMIT A LETTER OR OPINION

Rap lyrics: more than words

Eminem's last album, "The Eminem Show," opened to mixed reviews among critics and fans, but after giving it a few more chances it became one of his most beloved. The same is true of his new album, "Encore." It needs a few listens before it catches on. What is especially interesting about this album is the fact that the words, "bitch, faggot and nigga" are hardly used, and I didn't miss them. This begs the question, what impact do these words have on people, and subsequently, if the only impact these words have is negative why not eliminate them from a rappers repertoire?

Jake Monte

I'm not talking about burning CD's or censorship. However, I admit the idea of eliminating any words from art poses a problem. If one says we should eliminate some words, then how long before someone else says we should eliminate other words. Before we know it, we'd eliminate cuss words from movies.

We can, however, draw a distinction between necessary pejorative terms and unnecessary ones and ask rappers to act responsibly. The words in the albums of Eminem, Dr. Dre and Snoop Dogg, among others, are unnecessary. Eminem's latest album proves it. If they weren't there, we'd hardly notice it.

These words are different than just cuss words. They are a thorn in the side of today's society. I witness it everyday as a college student. People all over campus are freely using the word "faggot." African American's call their friends the n-word and think nothing of it. Misogyny and the idea that all women are "bitches," can be seen at any frat party. People aren't mature enough to listen to these albums and avoid being influenced. There is a deterioration of sensitivity around these words, and the boundaries between us, and the prejudices that are breaking down.

There is a deterioration of sensitivity around these words, and the boundaries between us, and the prejudices that are breaking down.

When rappers use the words faggot, niggas, and bitch freely, we begin to use them freely as well. In today's culture, most people have an ingrained fear of being homophobic, racist or sexist. Before Eminem, homophobia was taboo. But the fear of being prejudice is disappearing since Eminem made homophobia cool and funny.

The response from the music industry isn't helpful. Eminem tells us that "faggot" refers to a man who has given up his manhood. He says it has nothing to do with homophobia. Snoop Dogg tells us that "bitch" refers to a specific type of women, not all women. And Tupac said that the guys hanging from the ropes are the n-words, but niggas is just your buddies at a club.

These arguments are hardly convincing. More importantly, the distinction between different meanings of these words is lost on people. No one takes the time to draw the distinction. They hear the words and think of the first definition that pops in their head.

In one of Eminem's songs Dr. Dre says, "All bitches are ho's. Even my stinkin' ass Mom," which sounds very inclusive of all women. Marshall says in one song, "Faggot! Talking about I fabricated my past. He's just aggravated I won't ejaculate in his ass!" A man who has lost his manhood? Does anyone buy that this statement doesn't pertain to homosexuals? And many black rappers talk about their friends by saying niggas.

The distinction between this word and the pejorative word is not understood and black people call their friends the n-word. This word is so steeped in shame that it should never be uttered, not from one black person to another or one white person to another. The associations with it are too powerful. And now, thanks to the rappers of today you can hear this word anywhere on campus.

The answer is that the music industry needs to take responsibility for the elimination of these words. They always throw the first amendment at us. But these amendments don't pertain to every situation. In other words, just because the second amendment tells us we have the right to bear arms doesn't mean you'd buy your child a gun for Christmas.

Artists are like parents and audiences are like kids. Parents have a responsibility to their kids. Until teenagers and college students prove they can hear the word faggot from their favorite rapper and not use it in their own life, they deserve the title of kids.

Not everyone will join us in putting a stop to the use of these words, but just like it is possible to save the world one charity at a time, it is possible to save kids from bigotry one rapper at a time. Eminem is the first to join. "Encore" is a good album. The pejorative terms go un-missed. Dr. Dre once said, "We as entertainers have a responsibility to these kids." I say then, at long last, exercise that responsibility.

Jake Monte is a Collegian columnist.

Manufacturing disasters

We have been plagued by disaster through nature and through man. From murder to nuclear war, we have seen death in human lives and traumatizing catastrophes. We have seen structures crumble and explode; ships sink and people run for their lives. We have experienced the havoc of earthquakes, hurricanes, tsunamis, floods, fires, tornadoes and volcanic eruptions. To deviate from these disasters, we have prepared for them and sought to technology to save us from it.

Wesley LaRochelle

But what if technology was not our refuge? What if what we made to be a necessity turned into a horror? What if what we manufactured, was disaster?

"Oh, the humanity!" cried out the reporter as he filmed the flaming Hindenburg crashing to the ground. The misery that overwhelmed his shouts of dismay, mixed with the screams in the night around him. The searing light from the gas-giant that fell in a ball of inferno dissipated into a horrifying mass of the famed airship's metal skeleton.

In the dark night of March 6, 1937 and in the faded, dim, scratchy film you can see the overwhelming fire that engulfs the whole of the hydrogen-infested blimp. You can witness the silhouettes of people jumping from the minute pod at the bottom of the ship before it hits the ground.

Dozens of onlookers and escaped passengers dash from underneath the flaming sky and pounding alloy, running further from the enormous Hindenburg's fall onto the field of Lakehurst, New Jersey. 97 passengers and crew were traumatized by the horrifying crash. 36 of them, you could say, will never have to remember it.

The Exxon Valdez was another disaster waiting to spill over, not only the lives of humans, but of nearly 500,000 sea animals, birds and onshore life. On the night of March 24, 1989, the 987-foot oilrig hit a reef in Prince William Sound, Alaska. When an officer was left to command the ship through a narrow system of shallow reefs, the ship ran aground and spilled 260,000 barrels of oil over 1100 miles of the Alaskan shoreline.

The extensive measures that were taken to clean up the oil-coated rocks, polluted waters and dead animals that were tarnished over the two days that the spill had lasted, still takes place today, nearly fifteen years later.

On the clear day of Jan. 28, 1986 in Cape Canaveral, Florida, the Challenger space shuttle and crew were destined to the heavens above.

We can see the damage that technology does and we can understand the birth of disaster from the birth of a new inspiration of machines.

The day was beautiful as the crowd huddled together patiently fretting over the momentous occasion that was about to hit the history books: It was the day the first civilian, Sharon McAuliffe, a teacher from New Hampshire, would be given the chance to be taken into outer-space.

73 seconds passed after the shuttle left the ground and then it happened: an enormous explosion that sparked from the spot where the Challenger once was. Tiny fragments of this blast ejected like a flurry of meteorites and sprinkled in an umbrella of flames about a thinning cloud of smoke.

The space shuttle challenger exploded and killed the occupants inside. It was a morbid day for the citizens of America and the troubling news report was a shock to the nation. Years later, NASA has had a number of disasters; many just as monumental and costly, but probably none so memorable and devastating to the spirit of the United States.

Nuclear war is another one of man's follies, and it is one of technology's most cunning creations of turmoil and death. Not only does it show the capability of destruction through the evolution of machinery, but It also helped to show the cold-heartedness of mankind.

Other tormenting events, such as the Titanic disaster having killed over 1,500, or the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki that killed and injured over 200,000, are just examples of the many and much more devastating incidences that have taken place throughout history.

We can see the damage that technology does and we can understand the birth of disaster from the birth of a new inspiration of machines. Whether we can stop them from ever happening Is not important; it is whether or not we will try to. Every new construction, every new fabrication into the mind will display what man is capable of.

However, with every disaster from what we make, there is a reminder of what we can do to ourselves. We must learn to control what we form and we must limit ourselves to what we can control. We cannot let the fumble of our hands determine our fate. We cannot let decision and ignorance to rule our dreams.

Whether it is a crash, an explosion, pollution, an accident or a war, we must be careful. When dealing with technology we must not make mistakes. If we don't manufacture necessity, we manufacture disaster.

Wesley LaRochelle is a UMass student.

Searching for inspiration

I don't mind job interviews that much. Despite the fact that, to sum it up in a sentence, a job interview is a short, mindless conversation between one human being and another in which one human being is judging the other based on that short mindless conversation and his or her appearance, it is the interview process that we use, and the questions they ask are usually simple.

Sanam Hakim

However, sometimes I will be asked that one question that I hate answering: the question that I don't even know how to answer. It is a question that shows up at interviews, a question that shows up as a random essay question, and is a question that everyone thinks about at some point or another in their life: who is a leader that you admire or, in other words, who is your hero?

Well, I admire many leaders.

I admire Mohandas K Gandhi, an Indian man who freed India from British oppression through non-violent protest. Despite opposition, he stayed strong, never fought back and, furthermore, inspired those around him to do the same. In the end, he prevailed, and reminded the world that, "Nonviolence is the greatest force at the disposal of mankind. It is mightier than the mightiest weapon of destruction devised by the ingenuity of man."

I admire Albert Einstein, a shaggy haired genius who is now regarded as the greatest physicist of the 20th century. Although his scientific discoveries were an amazing achievement, I am, nonetheless, an English major, and silly words like "quantum physics" or "relativity" don't mean anything to me unless they rhyme with the poem I am writing. I do, however, think he came out with the most brilliant quotes and believe that he reminded people of the importance of imagination, which is something we tend to lose with age.

I admire Rosa Parks, a black woman who made history when she refused to give up her seat to a white man in the 1950s. She was arrested and tried, inspired a 381 day Montgomery bus boycott and was basically the reason why segregated public transportation was found unconstitutional by the Supreme Court in 1956.

I admire Hercules, that scrawny little cartoon god that didn't fit in with the rest of the humans. The bad guy took away his immortality though, so when he realized he was a god, he still had to live with the humans, which was probably really sad for him. I admire his courage and bravery, and the fact that he was willing to die for the girl that he loved at the end of the movie.

We have come to foster a society that puts these uninspiring individuals in leadership positions and makes them the heroic faces of our media.

Yet, when I sit back and think about all the leaders I admire, how many are still alive or in the case of Hercules, ever were? None.

Actually, if the question was rephrased to, "Who is a living leader you admire?" I would be stuck. Who do I have to admire? The leader of our own American nation. George W. Bush, is not an admirable leader by any means. If John Kerry won the presidential race, I would not admire him either. In fact, any person who rises to high leadership positions through dirty politics does not have my respect and admiration.

We have come to foster a society that puts these uninspiring individuals in leadership positions and makes them the heroic faces of our media. After Sept. 11, for example, instead of a large front page article about one of the firemen who died, we had a large front page article with Bush's face on it, talking about the leadership steps he took in response. The firemen got a small tribute in the middle of the paper, and a few collages made it on the cover once or twice.

It seems like the real heroes are not only the furthest away from being our leaders, but they don't even make it to the front-page news. So, to everyone out there without a living hero — find inspiration in the people. In a society that brings fools to the top, don't let inspiration fade.

Admire Nkosi Johnson, an 11 year-old boy in Africa with AIDS who addressed an audience of 10,000 delegates at the international AIDS conference in Durban, encouraging them to help. He has been made a national figure in the campaign, and he will probably die in the next few years.

Admire George Latham, who saved a girl from a burning car.

Admire Judith Blair, who donated one of her kidneys to a man in desperate need.

Admire Olara Otunnu, who helps children in war-torn nations by demanding legislative action, medical treatment and food from the government.

Inspiration and admiration are still alive. Sadly, however, we can't find it in our leaders. Maybe it's heroic leadership qualities they should be asking us about in our job interviews. Since the people we would label heroes are not our leaders, we can still admire their qualities. And before I break into song, I'm going to end my column. But remember this — everyone needs a hero.

Sanam Hakim is a Collegian columnist.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

STUDENTS NEEDED ON DIVERSITY COMMISSION

The Commission on Campus Diversity is basically a bunch of old fogeys that will make recommendations to alter life on campus. Why is this a problem? Because when old people are in charge of what young people have in their lives, you end up with things like pin the tail on the donkey at your sweet 16.

There are two members of this panel that I would not consider to be old fogeys, but instead respectable students: Uri Strauss, president of the Graduate Student Senate, and Eduardo Bustamante, president of the Student Government Associa-tion. These are two wonderful additions to the Commission, but these appointments represent only a small step in the right direction.

Being the only undergraduate out of all 23 commission members, Bustamante is to represent all 18,139 undergrads. That means that less than five percent of the commission is composed of the very body of people it will most influence.

Vast distances between a representative and the individuals in a represented population are expected when the population is in the millions, like in the U.S. Congress. However we are not dealing with millions of people. There is no reason to have such a general representation for all undergrads, especially on a diversity commission.

The commission has been charged to make recommendations aimed at meeting the expectations the entire student body. This wide array of expectations could be better expressed with more student representation.

The commission should have a representative from every major residential area on campus to ensure that the resident student voice is heard as clearly as possible. Without a strong resident voice in the decision-making processes, the commission will fail to fully assess diversity issues on campus and will, therefore, make poor recommendations. The consequences are wasted time, energy and money.

The fact of the matter is that the undergraduate students are significantly younger than the vast majority of this commission and live in a different world, with a different mindset. They've grown up in different times and live on a crazy campus. One man cannot represent them, and middle-aged people definitely cannot represent them, regardless of their titles.

Adam Sutton
UMass student

DEMOCRACY MATTERS MEETING TODAY

Do you constantly ask "why should I vote?" or "does my vote really matter?" Do you feel that our political system is corrupt due to private, corporate influences on politicians and their decisions? Are you tired of convincing people that their vote really matters and we as citizens still have power to do something about our system? Want to do something about it but have your undies in a bunch because you don't know how? Join Umass'

Democracy Matters! Come to our General interest Meeting today in the Commonwealth College Lounge in Goodell at 5:30 pm. Refreshments will be served.

Democracy Matters is a brand spanking new, non-partisan, political studentorganization on the UMass campus. It's so cool that the national organization was founded by an NBA player, Adonal Foyle of the Golden State's Warriors. And now it's here ... right on your own campus! DM aims to promote and educate residents of the valley area about clean elections and campaign finance reform through student-citizen community activism. Reform in the way political campaigns are funded is key to creating a stronger democracy, without the threat of corporate influence on decisions that matter to you and your community.

We are lucky because Massachusetts has a unique history of campaign finance reform, in which the local reform legislation was passed but too poorly funded to even have a chance to work. We as students and residents of Massachusetts have much power in re-energizing the campaign for finance reform.

Through Democracy Matters you will learn: what's wrong with our political system, how our society's elite use their power to influence politicians' decisions, what you can do to eliminate this threat, what happened in Mass. with the reform and crucial grassroots organizing and leadership skills that you will value for all your future endevours. (It also looks good on your resume or job application. But we don't condone joining for such purposes.)

So come to the General Interest Metting today at 5:30 in the Commonwealth College Lounge to learn what we can do to change the system and as well as good leadership and grassroots organizational skills.

Come fight the power to create a new power! It's time for a revolution baby!

Kate Baldacci
UMass student

REDEFINING DISABILITY

I am absoiutely dumbfounded by the callousness, arrogance and ignorance of Kateiyn Harding's assertion in last week's Collegian that the "definition of a person with disabilities not only includes persons with mental retardation, but also people who have suffered in accidents and maybe have had surgery that left their bodies looking less than 'perfect.'"

What gives you the authority to redefine "disability" and verbaiiy hinder an entire category of people? I don't understand how you are able to reconcile your "compassion" for the truly disabled while assigning erroneous, belittling and flippant labeis to those who are disfigured.

In identifying a disfigured person as disabied you are attempting to deprive them of their physical, moral and intellectual strength. Clearly you came to this conclusion without insight from anyone who looks "less than 'perfect.'"

Felicity Lingle
UMass student

Be heard.
Write for EdOp.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 1, 2004

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Revisiting the movie greats: '10 Commandments'

By Jeffrey Horowitz
Collegian Staff

Somebody once asked me the difference between an epic film and a standard film. I told them a standard film is something like "Pulp Fiction" or "Fargo": a standard movie with a standard experience, perhaps with something a bit more. An epic is something with ambition greater then the eye can see. A film with grand sets, overwhelming story lines, characters larger then life, and a movie that overwhelms with an experience rather then an escape. The same person remarked, in that case, that many films aspired to be epics (i.e. "Troy," "Gladiator," and even now "Alexander" promises our newest epic).

Having seen films like "Troy" and "Gladiator," the friend asked, how to distinguish a film that aspires to be an epic from a film that just is. I told him, watch "The Ten Commandments." If ever there was an epic that is the one. It's the greatest of all epics. Films like "Troy," "Gladiator," "Alexander," they aspire to be epics. Films like "Lawrence of Arabia," "Ben Hur," "Spartacus," and the best of them "The Ten Commandments," they just are.

"The Ten Commandments" touches on perhaps the greatest of stories, the story of Moses. It balances the life of its hero and the lives of everyone who touched it, while simultaneously covering Hebrew slavery from its brutal beginning to its flawed end. It takes a subject matter too broad to tell in a movie and squeezes it into a 3 hour and 40 minute film that passes like quicksand. In its seemingly extended length it's still forced to summarize the forty years of wandering in the desert into a five-minute narration, to give proper focus to more important aspects of the story.

The film was directed by Cecil B. Demille, the most talented director in Hollywood at the time, a master of filmmaking first in the silent era and by 1950 a master of the talkies as well. Already a legend, widely known at the time as one of the greatest filmmakers to date, he decided to make "The Ten Commandments" (released in 1956). It is his greatest film; directing at the pinnacle of its excellence. At the time, only he could complete a film this ambitious, with a budget this bold, with actors this famed and with a story so intimidating in content, length and profundity. He has made here a story that is too large for a movie and yet it is a movie, perfect in editing, in its world, in its philosophy, and in its character study.

It focuses on all the right struggles, gives a perfect screen time to all the right relationships, and portrays the heavenly events with all the right effects. While many movies are a model for how to reach for the stars, "The Ten Commandments" is a model on how to grab them and a pamphlet on how to use them.

Demille makes the film into a tale about a hero. The movie wouldn't have worked if Moses (Charlton Heston) were not so likeable. Charlton Heston plays him here with such confidence, and he is ideal as the likeable, noble, leader. His passion is emotionally captivating and it is easy to believe that slaves couldn't resist his leadership. Along with a perfectly noble hero, Demille gives us a sibling rivalry between Rameses (Yul Brynner) and Moses over the love of the Pharaoh (Vincent Price). He has the brothers fighting over the kingdom, but even more so over the girl, the gorgeous Nefretiri (Anne Baxter)

Whoever Pharaoh names king shall inherit the kingdom, the girl, and the love and approval of himself as a father. This fierce competition will set the bitter feelings for later on. Moses seems first in line to take all, as he captures Ethiopia, wins the affection of his "father," the Pharaoh, captures the heart of Nefretiri, and builds a city that Rameses failed to complete, in a scene exciting in tension and glorious in visual awe.

The film also shows us scenes heartrending in tragedy of the process by which slaves work, how they are driven like animals, starved, whipped, and overworked. It shows the slave life in brutal means with sad eyes, as they push their bricks, stomp their mud, carry their stone and pull their rope. Their bodies: tired; their eyes: sad; their skin: so covered with mud it seems to blend with the color.

As the story goes, a prophet of Pharaoh sensed a deliverer for the Hebrew slaves. To prevent the birth of a Hebrew savior he ordered all the male firstborns murdered. The mother of Moses, Yochabel (Martha Scott), sends him down the Nile in a basket of straw to save his life. He floats into the life of Bithiah (Nina Foch), the sister of Pharaoh, who falls in love with the baby, and brings it into her life to fill the emptiness left by a dead husband. She raises it as her own, its Hebrew heritage hidden forever. Until thirty years later when a Maid (Judith Anderson), that witnessed the incident, threatens to reveal to Rameses the truth.

Nefritiri, too in love with Moses to care of his heritage murders the Maid. Moses discovers this and interrogates her until he uncovers the reason for the murder. He learns that Nefritiri had done it to protect him from Rameses's future discovery of his hidden heritage. Now, however, he learns for the first time in his life, that he is a

See COMMANDMENTS on page 7

Design of a Decade: Pearl Jam returns with greatest hits on 'Rear View Mirror'

By Ian Reed
U-WIRE

PITTSBURGH — This month, Pearl Jam released a two-disc, 33-track, greatest-hits album, titled "Rearviewmirror." This release, coupled with the recent release of "Lost Dogs" (a rarities set), represents Pearl Jam's effort to clean out its closet of tracks before severing ties with its long-time label Epic. Because this greatest-hits collection samples from each Pearl Jam release, it provides an excellent opportunity to summarize the band's career until this point.

The early '90s presented a great collection of bands and music that has not since been matched. At the time, bands such as Soundgarden, The Smashing Pumpkins, Nirvana, Red Hot Chili Peppers, Nine Inch Nails and Green Day popularized rock music in a way that is sorely needed today. Some of the aforementioned bands (as well as Radiohead and OutKast) have been fortunate enough to celebrate their 10th anniversaries. Pearl Jam has become one of those bands, but in the process, it has gone from immense popularity to relative obscurity.

In many ways, Pearl Jam's popularity was something that the band never handled very well. This is most evident in the 1995 attempt to circumvent the giant Ticketmaster, which, in the end, alienated many fans by making the band even more difficult to see live. Coincidentally (or not), this also happened to be the point when Pearl Jam peaked musically. It was during this time that Pearl Jam released "Vitalogy" (1994), "Merkinball" (1995) and "No Code" (1996) — collections so outstanding that a double-CD release of these albums would constitute an admirable greatest-hits album.

This brings me to the most inherent and notable flaw of the present greatest-hits collection: It fails to showcase the very thing that has kept Pearl Jam together for so long. It fails to show the evolution of the band. Not one song in Pearl Jam's catalog can be taken from its album and placed on another album. As a result, the current release is merely a collection of songs — a collection of songs that do not tell the story that needs to be told.

There are many other crimes committed in addition to the one above. This collection fails to show that the music that Pearl Jam has created continually reflected the current struggles of the band. It fails to show the many ways in which Pearl Jam has used music as sublimation throughout the years. It fails to show how their music has changed as a result of their popularity. As a singular release, it fails to tell a story.

Arguably, the most important failure of the current release is its relative lack of songs penned by Eddie Vedder. In the beginning, Pearl Jam was Stone Gossard's band. From Vitalogy on, Pearl Jam has been Eddie Vedder's band. Undoubtedly, Vedder is the reason that the band is still making relevant music. Vedder is also the reason that Pearl Jam's more recent releases have been so frustratingly inconsistent. It is because Vedder is light years beyond his band mates in terms of song writing. An album of songs written by Vedder alone would constitute an amazing release.

In the end, the current release disappoints because of its effortless assembly. Pearl Jam's catalog is one to be handled with care — this release was not. Pearl Jam is a band with a collection of brilliant songs that have not been heard. I, for one, would have liked a release that challenged listeners to look deeper within the catalog of one of the greatest songwriter in music today.

COURTESY J&J SCHUTZ/SONY/UMG

Rock and roll legends Pearl Jam release their greatest hits album,"Rear View Mirror," proving that they still have what it takes.

Duke student challenges M.P.A.A

By Kelly Rohrs
U-WIRE

DURHAM, N.C. — When Duke University freshman Elliott Wolf opened his e-mail last week and found a forwarded note from the Motion Picture Association of America, he didn't think much of it. Sure, he had downloaded some television shows, but he didn't mind that the Office of Information Technology was telling him the industry wanted him to stop. He did.

But when he opened his e-mail this week to find another note from the MPAA, he wasn't sure what to think. The warning, which applied to TV shows from weeks earlier, was the same as the first, but this time Wolf was armed with a slew of research.

He was willing to quit sharing his files over the Internet because, as he said, "it's just not worth it." But the prospect of a legal fight with the MPAA intrigued him. "What the MPAA is yelling at me about, at Duke about, is really ambiguous," Wolf said.

Because the MPAA warning is about television shows, which are initially broadcast free of charge, Wolf thinks the industry is on questionable legal ground. He has contacted independent activist groups to help him figure out if the same court rulings that made VCRs legal in the 1980s, protects downloading.

Ren Bucholz, activism coordinator for the advocacy group Electronic Frontier Foundation, said the copyright law that governs file-sharing cases has not caught up with technology. Whether file sharing is legal at both individual and large-scale levels depends on interpretation of "fair use" exceptions in copyright laws.

"As far as personal file sharing and copying a television show, there isn't something in the law that gets you off the hook right away," Bucholz said. "The argument is that they may have been broadcast for free in the first place, but they may not remain free."

In the absence of a clear legal course, the industry often sends "cease and desist" requests to people they find trafficking files. OIT receives about 300 to 400 warnings from the recording and movie industries each year, said Chris Cramer, information technology security officer. It then forwards the messages to the people accused of violating copyright law. Whereas most allegations used to come from the Recording Industry Association of America, Cramer said a majority now concern movies and television.

In mid-November, the MPAA filed an undisclosed number of lawsuits against multiple individuals who were only identified by their IP addresses, which serve as computer identification codes. Following the same model the RIAA used, the studios said they will identify the individual defendants at a later date.

Cramer said none of the IP addresses named in lawsuits have belonged to Duke community members.

These lawsuits encountered resistance Nov. 23 when a federal judge in California ruled that individual lawsuits must be filed for each unnamed defendant.

Officials from the MPAA did not return repeated phone calls. Most of the lawsuits so far, from both the RIAA and the MPAA, have been filed against people who upload copyrighted information, rather than people who download it. OIT includes instructions on its website about how to prevent uploading while using file sharing sites.

"Practically speaking, it would be difficult to catch people who have disabled uploading, whether or not you are violating copyright law," Cramer said.

The University has never tracked downloads or person-to-person file transfers and does not disclose the names of alleged violators without a subpoena, Cramer said. "Since these are things that are alleged, there is no real reason to turn over the names of the alleged people," he said.

The policy is one that Wolf, like many other Duke students, is grateful for. In practice, it prevents the MPAA from linking Wolf to his address and becoming an easy target for a lawsuit.

So as Wolf attempts to argue for downloading, he is keeping specific details of the MPAA's accusations, such as what shows he downloaded, quiet. "I guess I'll go as far as I can without telling them my identity," he said. "Because if I become the one person who gets identified, then WHEW."

Gwen Stefani fails to deliver with new album release 'LAMB'

By Ruben Sanchez
U-WIRE

MEDFORD, Mass. — On her new album "Love, Angel, Music, Baby" (LAMB), Gwen Stefani rocks like it's 1989. Stefani is a child of the '80s, and through her solo debut the rock princess tries to revive the decade mocked for its materialism, bad clothes, and worse music. And for a large portion of LAMB, she succeeds.

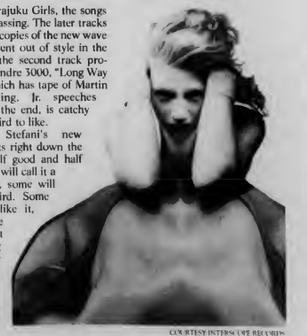
On hiatus from her band No Doubt, Gwen has focused on her solo career. She has been working on projects including her album, acting in "The Aviator" alongside Leonardo DiCaprio, and her own clothing line (also called LAMB). She's getting a lot of press these days, and the media coverage only helps her quest to become the interim queen of pop.

Gone are the highly personal and introspective lyrics that made No Doubt and its female lead so successful. In the place of substance, LAMB delivers '80s new wave and pop, with hints of swing and electronica. There is none of the familiar Ska sound No Doubt is famous for.

Fans of the rock band have let their displeasure be known. They've posted angry letters on message boards all over fan sites. Most of the complaints are that Gwen's solo album is just too weird, too over the top. And they are right. Put the album on and the first song you hear is the first single released to the public, "What You Waiting For." The "Alice in Wonderland" inspired video prepares the audience for the absurd themes on the rest of LAMB. This first track also introduces us to Gwen's personal muses for this project: the four Harajuku Girls she named Love, Angel, Music and Baby.

The story goes that in the process of creating her album and her clothing line, Gwen had a creative block. While visiting the Harajuku shopping district in Tokyo, Japan, Gwen was inspired by the glamour and style of the girls who go there to shop and show off. The Harajuku girls are referenced all over the album.

Dr. Dre produced the song "Rich Girl," a collaboration with female rapper Eve. Gwen helped Eve make a hit a few years ago on "Blow Your Mind," and Eve returns the favor. This track is no "Fiddler on the Roof" remake; it is inspired by Lady Saw's reggae hit "If I Were a Rich Girl." Dr. Dre takes the reggae beat and laces it with some heavy drums. "Rich Girl" is one of the two songs on this album that will grab some hip-hop listeners.



The other song is "Luxurious." Tony Kanal, bassist for No Doubt, gets in on the production and samples the same Isley Brothers beat that made the Notorious B.I.G. so famous with "Big Papa." Kanal stretches the beat out even more by slowing down the playback and having Gwen sing (almost rap) her lyrics quickly. She sings about money, cars and clothes on "Luxurious," likely to the chagrin of some dichard No Doubters. Gwen's solo album is for her fans alone, not No Doubt fans looking for more No Doubt music.

Really, LAMB isn't about the music at all. It's about Gwen Stefani and the cultivation of her new persona and career. The producers are the ones making the music on this one, not Gwen. She's put her career in their hands for the chance to propel her celebrity even further.

LAMB is an eccentric pop album meant to solidify the identity of an artist and package it neatly in a jewel case. Sometimes it works. Look at Madonna, Prince and most recently Andre 3000, who produces two tracks on LAMB. But it can also backfire.

When an album is promoted as an extension of the of the artist's personality, bad songs become embarrassments. LAMB has 12 tracks, and starting with number seven, an homage to the bizarre Harajuku Girls, the songs get embarrassing. The later tracks are carbon copies of the new wave pop that went out of style in the '80s, and the second track produced by Andre 3000, "Long Way to Go," which has tape of Martin Luther King, Jr. speeches infused at the end, is catchy but too weird to like.

Gwen Stefani's new album splits right down the middle: half good and half bad. Some will call it a fun album, some will call it weird. Some fans will like it, some won't. But one thing is clear: for Stefani, it's no longer about the music. It's about the material.

COURTESY INTERSCOPE RECORDS

Gwen Stefani's debut solo album recieves little praise

An epic vs. a movie: '10 Commandments' sets the stage

COMMANDMENTS from page 6

Hebrew. He can't take the hypocrisy of living in royalty and inheriting a kingdom based on slavery. So Moses joins the slaves in the harsh labor, stomping away in the mud, because as he learns to accept: they are his people.

Dathan (Edward G. Robinson) a slave overseer is one of the meanest of the characters. Joshua (John Derek), a slave is one of the most beloved of characters. Joshua is desperately in love with the Hebrew beauty Lilia (Debra Paget). Dathan however, eventually buys her. Joshua earlier had tried to save Lilia from being raped by an Egyptian master, but in doing so, struck an Egyptian and will now be put to death. After Dathan purchases Lilia he promises that if she does not physically fight his rape, he will see that Joshua, her love, is not executed. She submits to save Joshua, but in doing so their romance is murdered and so is her innocence.

When Dathan, overhears Moses telling Joshua of his Hebrew heritage, he tells Rameses that Moses is a slave and the prophesized deliverer. Rameses brings Moses to his beloved Pharaoh in chains and the truth is revealed. The Pharaoh disowns him for openly denouncing slavery and adapting an attitude of "treason." He allows Rameses to banish him into the desert, with nothing but a days worth of food and water, a walking rod and a Hebrew cloth to cover him.

Here the second part of Moses's life begins. He finds a Jewish family. Out of seven daughters, he marries the wise older one, prettier by any means then any of the other flirty siblings. He has long talks with her about religion, philosophy and inspired skepticism. They marry and have a son. He becomes a smart businessman, a successful and prosperous shepherd, and adjusts to his new life, happily married. Until one day, he sees a fire engulfed bush, that defies logic — one that is covered in flames, but does not burn. The voice of the Lord tells him to travel to Egypt, with rod in hand, carrying the voice of the Almighty one and free the Hebrews from the bondage of Egypt.

Years have passed, the Pharaoh has died and the new Pharaoh is none other than his old foe Rameses. He tries to appeal to Rameses sympathetic side but soon finds it doesn't exist. The new Pharaoh antagonizes the Lord and ten plaques ravage the land of Egypt. In these scenes special effects are done with surprisingly realistic simplicity even by today's standards.

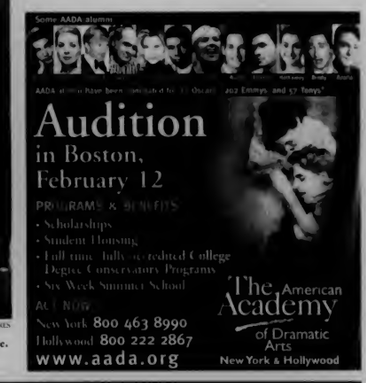
Moses repeatedly argues to the new ruthless Pharaoh, Rameses, to let his people go and with a stubborn grin and a disrespectful laugh he waves away the accusations of Moses. The scenes between Moses and Rameses provide some of the most bitter and intensely delivered dialogue of any fights I've ever seen between any two movie characters. Here we are watching sibling's war over an issue of freedom over slavery, life over death, God over man.

With passion and hostility and a well-developed background between two characters, by two actors that have disappeared into the concentration of their roles, Heston and Brynner provide us with some of the best scenes in movie history between an obsessed and furious Rameses and a fiery, but spiritually heartfelt Moses.

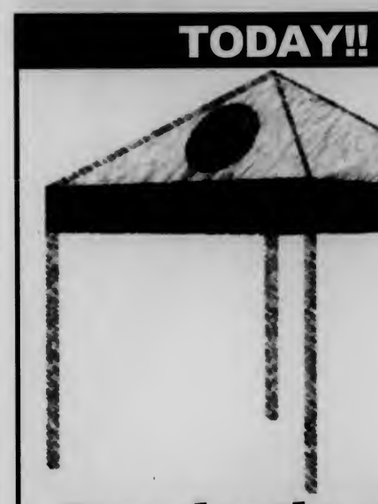
The film is emotionally overwhelming. It's not so much a film as it is a prayer on the history of a people. In thinking back on it, the thing that stands out the most are the gargantuan sets. Demille filmed on location, in Egypt, amidst the deserts, among the locations. The costume design is so authentic it's breathtaking.

The magnitude of the sets is daunting. The eyes of film have never seen sets this massive, actors this many, land this endless. The project is simply massive. The pyramids, the interiors, the desert lands, Mt. Sinai, and the pits of slavery are all spellbinding. The awe this film inspires is indescribable.

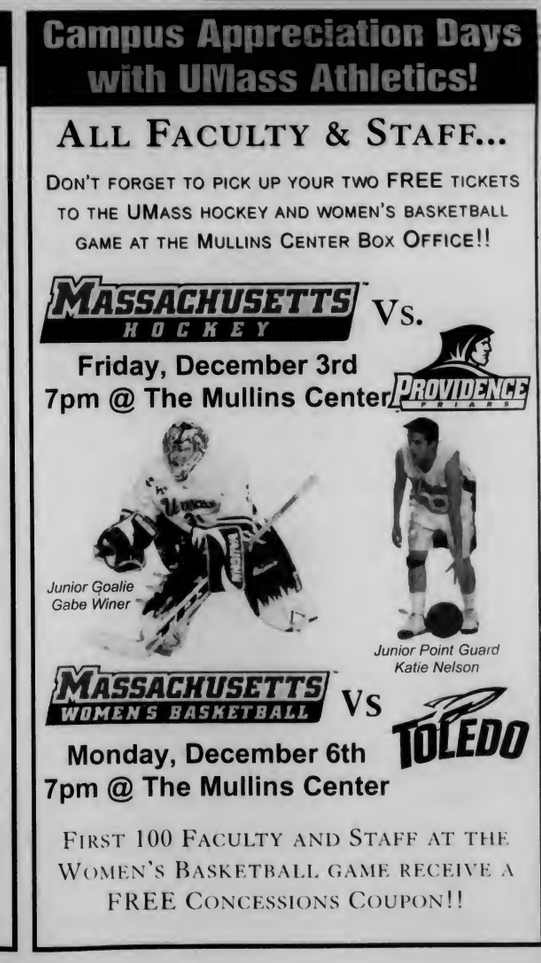
Demille also gives us a Moses that is doubtful. He questions the existence of a greater power in a world where his people are enslaved. He has philosophical discussions on the merits of whether the Almighty can exist and if so still be worthy. Would any spirit of good ignore cries of slavery, he asks? We see here a confused Moses who doesn't believe he will save anyone at first. He is skeptical of himself and his spirituality and only after he visit's the burning bush do we see a Moses that has transformed. Heston must change physically and emotionally in this role, in a way that convinces us of a confused slave changed to a holy profit and he does it in perfect form. It's his best performance.



The parting of the Red Sea filmed with two different shots of water superimposed around shots of dry land, has a perfect effect of water divided in walls with a look that is not natural because indeed it is not natural for seas to part. Some may mistake it as cheesy, it is transcendent to the reality of this movie and it works. Marked commonly as the greatest special effect in movie history, Demille delivered that scene about as well as a director can while claiming divine intervention within a movie that embraces reality.



This movie struck a chord. There's a reason it plays every Passover and there's a reason we watch it every year. It's an achievement of spectacular heights. It's not as if Demille made a movie that everyone has copied. Demille made something amazing that no one had ever done before, and no one has ever done again. He taught us how to film a miracle and no filmmaker dared to imitate. It's the greatest of biblical movies and the greatest of cinematic epics. Often I've mentioned its name and people's eyes grow wide and they think with little description of the experience. It's too intimidating to encapsulate with a comment so they nod and gaze and mutter. "The Ten Commandments. That's the best."



COURTESY PARAMOUNT PICTURES

The epic "10 Commandments" starring Charelton Heston and John Derek has proven to be a timeless classic and remains a fan favorite.

A list of the best plays in '04

MARZELLI from page 10

Massachusetts football program will look back on as the major turning point of the 2004 season. After starting out 2-0 in impressive fashion, it was the first clap of thunder in a storm that brought about four straight losses and knocked UMass from Division I-AA playoff contention.

With the Pioneer Valley having been pelted by rain overnight and well into game day, the Minutemen appeared waterlogged as well in putting together a lackluster first half performance against Richmond. Content to cut their losses and head into halftime even, the Minutemen fell asleep at the wheel during the half's final snap.

Using six defensive backs in a situation where only a heave towards the end zone could produce pay dirt, strong safety James Ihedigbo, among others, got crossed up in assignments. After rolling out to his left, something Brown had been stressing that UMass not allow the Spiders quarterback to do, Tutt lofted a long bomb towards the back half of the end zone for a wide open Wilson. Standing alone, with no maroon jerseys within seven feet of him, Wilson patiently watched the ball into his hands and caught it for the touchdown, stealing the lead and the momentum in a game UMass would never climb back into.

3.) First-year head coach Don Brown receives a Gatorade shower courtesy of his new team after the Minutemen down his former employer, Northeastern University, 26-22 in Brookline.

Dubbed as the "Bitter Bowl" by the Boston media, it was clear from the day he took over at UMass that Don Brown's return to Parsons Field would be about far more than football. Yet on this day, football was all the former Huskies boss needed to soothe nearly a calendar year's worth of hard feelings.

Behind inspiring, gritty performances from his charges, namely senior captain Rob Kane, who battled tooth and nail with All-American middle linebacker Liam Ekeziel from whistle to whistle, and tailback Steve Baylark, who physically wore the Huskies down in the second half, Brown was finally able to exact revenge on the team, the school and the athletic department that intentionally embarrassed and publicly defamed him.

Nonetheless, in a show of ultimate class that proves how much a football coach truly means to his past and present players, and vice-versa, it was Brown who made himself available to any and all of his former players who wished to visit with him after the game. Standing there, soaking wet from a victory shower, Brown took the final step towards closure in this most difficult of episodes, and fully stepped into the UMass chapter of his head coaching career as a victor.

2.) Ola Sanusi and L.A. Love block an extra-point attempt from Maine's Mike Mellow in overtime, preserving a 35-34 Homecoming Day win for UMass.

Things had already gone terribly wrong for the Minutemen by the time rival Maine arrived in Western Massachusetts for a rain-drenched Homecoming battle. Having lost four games in a row and five-of-six, UMass was coming off of a devastating final-minute loss to Rhode Island, and was just trying to salvage some semblance of respectability within its tumultuous season. Yet by the time this wild game was complete, the Minutemen had put themselves on the fast track to a complete turnaround.

Capping a nine-play, 80-yard drive with a nine-yard touchdown run just before the two minute mark of the fourth quarter, former Amherst Regional High School star tailback Marcus Williams sent the game to overtime, where he answered a Baylark touchdown on the first possession with a 25-yard scoring burst of his own on Maine's first play in the extra frame.

Facing the prospect of a second overtime against one of the A-10's most talented teams – the same team that stunned SEC foe Mississippi State earlier in the season – the Minutemen reached into their bag of tricks and pulled out the kind of moment you expect to see from this team at least once a year; the type of moment seasons are made, and remade, out of.

After the snap from center was on the money, defensive lineman Ola Sanusi broke through the middle of the line with a hand outstretched and behind him was Love, vaulting high over the mass of bodies with a hand reaching similarly to the sky.

When Maine kicker Mike Mellow eventually got his foot into the ball, the kick came off a little low, and Love and Sanusi successfully smothered the kick. From there, all hell broke loose as the UMass sideline erupted in victory and spilled onto the field in a sea of maroon. From that point forward, the Minutemen did not lose another game in 2004.

1.) On a warm, late summer evening in September, the Minutemen take the field under the lights at McGuirk Alumni Stadium for just the second time ever, and gain revenge on No. 4 Colgate 30-20 before a near-capacity crowd of 16,405 – the largest to watch a football game in Amherst in 30 years.

It was a game, or rather a series of moments, that reinforced the potential and possibilities of Massachusetts football, because for one fleeting football Saturday in the Valley, everything went perfectly.

From the hoards of tailgaters and football fans that filled the surrounding parking lot upwards of three hours prior to kickoff and spilled into the stadium for the first near-capacity crowd at McGuirk in three decades, to the Minutemen, clad in all-maroon for the first time since the 1999 playoffs and looking to build on the success of a championship season in 2003, there was an incredible aura of positive energy surrounding the artificially-lit stadium – the type of positive energy that creates a legitimate Division I football atmosphere.

In the end, the result of the much-anticipated rematch with hated Colgate was much like the night as a whole – perfect. With two Baylark touchdown runs, two Jason Peebler touchdown catches and the most amazing kickoff return you will ever see turned in by the aforementioned Mr. Spectacular R.J. Cobbs, the students jumped and chanted, the alums stood and cheered and those who knew what the win over the Red Raiders truly meant to this team sat, smiled and just soaked it all in.

It was the past, present and future of the UMass gridiron in full effect, and it was a tremendous success – a sign of the things to come.

Mike Marzelli is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at Marzelli@dailycollegian.com.

UMass will try to stop NU guards

MEN'S HOOPS from page 10

who tends to be recognized as a defensive player, has showed his accuracy from three-point land shooting 44 percent for the year.

Perhaps the most important player for UMass has been point guard/captain, Anthony Anderson. Getting back into the swing of things, Anderson is averaging 10.0 points per game, but leads the forward-clad team in rebounds with 7.5. Most of this statistic is derived from his 13-rebound performance against Yale.

"He plays great defense every game, he has a great floor game every game, and he rebounds like he did in the last game," Lappas said of his captain. "He does everything, whatever you need on a given day. He's just one of those guys that wants to win so bad that he'll do anything. He has the heart of a lion and when you have the heart of a lion you should be captain."

Northeastern has had some troubles this season, but has been getting a significant amount of contribution from its guards. Jose Juan Barea and Marcus Barnes are averaging over 50 points per game this year for the Huskies and pose a threat to any opposing defenses.

In the Huskies' lone win over Cornell on Nov. 20, Barea scored a season-high 35 points. He has been complemented by Barnes' accuracy from behind the arch; he has shot 54 percent on the year.

Lappas will be switching up the defensive scheme with his guards, hoping to keep the scoring tandem off-kilter.

"Anderson is going to have one, Mazwell is going to have one, but we're going to have Chadwick and Artie Bowers come switching on and off," Lappas said.

Any team that has a losing record with two primetime scorers must have a weakness. In the case of Northeastern, its early season troubles may stem from literally being a little slim in the post.

Sophomore Bennet Davis has been the biggest contributor from under the basket, scoring 6.7 points and grabbing 4.0 boards. Although he stands at 6-foot-9, he weighs in at a slim 220, 30 pounds less than Freeman.

Although there is a definite size differential, Lappas is wary to look beyond the Husky's post-game.

"This team here has some good big guys, they are a little thin, but they're very athletic," Lappas said.

Lappas hopes that tonight's game will spark interest in the student community. If the Maroon and White win three in a row, it will be only the second time since its 1995-'96, its Final Four season.

"I think it would help no doubt, last week was tough because of Thanksgiving and the weather was so bad, so you have two things against you," Lappas said. "Hopefully, we'll do well [tonight], win the game, gain some momentum, and hopefully people will come back. I think these kids deserve to be seen."

Speedy Baylark highlights 2004 season

HOWE from page 10

ers and dejection on the faces of its opposition after the game told the whole story.

Though there was no postseason for the Minutemen, the groundwork was set for next year. A young team that will only lose two senior starters (wide receiver Jason Peebler and offensive guard Rob Kane), they have clearly grasped Brown's ball-control and defensive systems.

And though there will be no national hardware for this team, the individual accolades are already adding up. Let's get to my awards:

Offensive Player of the Year:

Steve Baylark — The leading rusher in the Atlantic 10, Baylark was the driving force behind Brown's offensive scheme that relies very heavily on the running game. When he played well, the team usually won, and quarterback Tim Day's numbers skyrocketed when Baylark had success.

Baylark finished the season with 1,138 yards on the ground plus eight touchdowns, and his best game came during the upset at UNH when he rushed for 192 yards and three touchdowns. After two seasons of being UMass' starting tailback, he has rushed for 2,235 yards, which is good for fifth on the school's all-time list.

Also receiving consideration:

Jason Peebler — The senior wide receiver was the most potent scoring threat the offense had. He caught 48 balls for 976 yards and 10 scores while being held back due to a nagging leg injury during the early portion of the season. He was often double-teamed, and Brown said earlier this season that opposing defenses would change their schemes entirely on Peebler's side of the ball.

Peebler was great at taking a quick hitch-n-route and turning it into a long touchdown reception, and he had the greatest ability to change the momentum of a game on the team.

The senior receiver's career didn't take off until his All-American junior season, and he leaves UMass in the top-three in career receptions (123, third), career receiving yards (2,395, second) and career receiving touchdowns (27, second).

Defensive Player of the Year:

Shannon James — Also the Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Year, James picked off eight passes this season which put him in a tie for the nation's best, and his 16 career interceptions makes him the active leader in Division I-AA. He intercepted two passes in three games this season.

He single-handedly kept the Minutemen in the game during the 29-7 loss at Boston College when he intercepted Paul Peterson twice and had a third pick called back because of a penalty. James also finished the season with 75 tackles.

Also receiving consideration:

Serge Tikum — His team-leading 82 tackles came during his first full season at middle linebacker in a new defensive system under Brown. As one of UMass' captains, Tikum was the heart and soul of the defense.

The coaching staff admitted that Tikum's best game was against Northeastern, a week after he played his worst game against Maine. He had 14 tackles and a sack against the Huskies, which was ultimately a head-to-head match-up between himself and the opposing middle linebacker, Liam Ezekiel, who is the Division I-AA career record holder for tackles, but was held to only seven against the Minutemen.

Special Teams Player of the Year:

Christian Koegel — He averaged 41.3 yards per punt which was good for second in the Atlantic 10, and his 76 yard punt that went out of bounds at the three-yard line against Delaware with the score knotted at zero was one of the most jaw-dropping moments of the season.

Rookie of the Year:

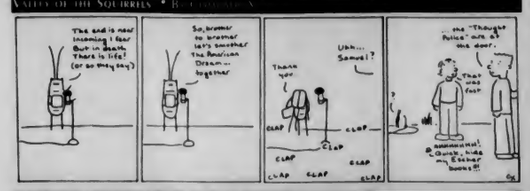
JJ. Moore — As a redshirt freshman, Moore was second on the Minutemen with four touchdown receptions and third in receptions with 32 and receiving yards with 389. As a very reliable third option in a young passing attack this season, Moore should contribute more steadily next fall.

2005 Breakout Performer:

Brandon London — His swagger never went unnoticed, even to the point when he collected several unsportsmanlike conduct penalties during game action. London's best game was against UNH when he caught seven passes for 136 yards and a touchdown. More amazing was how he caught those passes, though. He caught 34 passes for 439 yards and three touchdowns this season, and with Peebler graduating, London will be UMass' big threat next year.

Jeff Howe is a Collegian Columnist.

UMASS MAROON PLATOON
STUDENT SPIRIT GROUP
SIGN UP TODAY!!!
$15 Dollar Membership!!!
IF you sign -up between now and Dec 7th.
RESERVE YOUR MULLETS NOW!!!
ALL MAROON PLATOON MEMBERS WHO ATTEND PRE-GAME PARTY ARE GUARNANTEED MULLETS! (STARTS @ 5:30 12/11)
EMAIL ATHLETICMKTG@ADMIN.UMASS.EDU
Current members who recruit new members can earn 6 points per recruitment from now until Dec. 8th
STUDENT TICKETS ARE FREE!!!
STUDENT TICKETS ARE FREE!!!
1st 1,500 People get mullets!
Business in the front MULLET NATION Party in the back
Men's Basketball vs. Northeastern WEDNESDAY 7 pm
Hockey vs. Providence FRIDAY 12/3 7 pm
Women's Basketball in the Cage SATURDAY 12/4 2 pm
1st 200 students get free t-shirts!!!
Women's Basketball vs. Toledo MONDAY 12/6 7 pm (Toy Drive)
Live on ESPN2
MEN'S BASKETBALL vs. UConn THURSDAY 12/9 9 pm
MULLET NIGHT HOCKEY vs. Sacred Heart SATURDAY 12/11 7 p m



THE HARP
"Come party like you're Irish!"
NEW!! Wireless internet! Do your homework...surf the net...WIRELESS INTERNET!!!!
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
Amherst's last great neighborhood pub!
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments
413-548-6900 Check out our new covered deck! www.theharp.net
MON. - "Bad Karaoke" with Paulie V
TUES. - Our Famous Trivia Night
WED. - Reggae Night (NO COVER)
TH. - Special Brew (NO COVER)
FRI. - Traditional Irish Sesiun
SAT. - Live Music call for bands (NO COVER)
Molsen Pints $2.00 Pitcher $6.50
VOTED BEST NEIGHBORHOOD PUB EAST OF THE RIVER

SUMMER 2005
RESEARCH EXPERIENCES FOR UNDERGRADUATES (REU)
MIT HAYSTACK OBSERVATORY
Undergraduate science, mathematics, engineering, and computer science students are invited to apply for summer research positions at the MIT Haystack Observatory in Westford, MA. Research projects include radio astronomical studies, atmospheric physics investigations, and hardware and software development for data acquisition, processing, and recording systems. The program extends from June 6 to August 12, 2005 and carries a weekly stipend of $400.00. Women, minorities and students with disabilities are encouraged to apply. For further information and application materials, see http://www.haystack.edu/reu/.
Application deadline is February 1st, 2005

fancy NAILS
Walk-ins Welcome
FREE
Holiday Special
$2 OFF
w/ full set or fill with coupon only

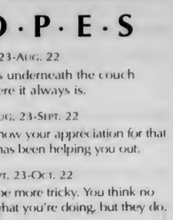
Quote of the Day

"Aunt Clara had for years not only perpetually labored under the delusion that I was 4 years old, but also a girl."

-Narrator, A Christmas Story



The Moan and Dove
If we don't have a beer that you like, its probably because you've burned your tastebuds off eating too many wings.
themoananddove.com
460 West St. • Rte. 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day

Make a Dream come true...
SUBMIT A COMIC

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Today you're going to get really embarrassed and your face will turn red.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
When someone asks you a question, you should just say yes.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Your legs are starting to turn scaly. Time for some heavy-duty moisturizer.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Your new friendship will take an interesting turn today.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
You need to take some time to ponder the meaning of life.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Soon you will hear some very good news. It's what you hoped for all along.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
The clicker is underneath the couch cushion, where it always is.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You should show your appreciation for that person who has been helping you out.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You need to be more tricky. You think no one knows what you're doing, but they do.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Everyone should get in the Christmas spirit. You're feeling it.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Today you get to forget all your troubles and focus on your own happiness.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Yes, turtles do pee. One of life's great mysteries has been solved.

$$$ Build your business with our business. Place your ad here, in The Collegian. $$$

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Linguistics Department seeks native speakers of Arabic (preferably Egyptian Arabic) and Singapore English for speech experiments. Experiments last about 1 hour w/participants paid $8/hr. Arabic speakers contact kawahata@linguist.umass.edu; Singapore English speakers contact mwolf@linguist.umass.edu

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Need an Apt. for 2nd Semester? Short Term Leases, Free Heat, Huge Bedrooms Call The Boulders 256-8534

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. 1 Bedroom units Available Jan 1, 2005 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com Stop by or call 549-0600

COMPUTERS

Pentium Laptop $99- Pentium III Desktop $99- 413-584-8857

EMPLOYMENT

Need money for the Holidays? Local moving company looking for mature responsible individuals to work between Thanksgiving and Christmas, and after. Part time hours available. Call 584-4746

EMPLOYMENT

Winter Break Employment at the Boston University Bookstore. Many temp jobs available! Kenmore Square location. Applications accepted Dec. 7 & 8 at the UMass Campus Center Concourse or email your resume to bnhmnres@bu.edu

"Bartending" $300/Day Potential. No Experience Nesc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

FOR SALE

MP3 $50 Avon Special MP3 & 100's of gifts under $10. Buy or Sell Kat ISR 413-585-1581.

ROOMMATE WANTED

325/month inclusive call 413-775-9997

SERVICES

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house Certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

EMPLOYMENT

Questions about your lease/security deposit deductions? Questions about subletting/assigning leases? Questions about the condition of your new house or apartment? Contact the Student Legal Services Office, 922 Campus Center, 545-1995

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

TRAVEL

StudentCity.com The Ultimate Spring Break Experience. 1-888-SpringBreak, or www.StudentCity.com to reserve today.

SERVICES

1SPRING BREAK Largest selection of Destinations, including Cruises! VIP Club Parties & FREE trips. Epicurean Tours 1-800-231-4-FUN www.BREAKNOW.com

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, Florida Campus Reps Wanted! Free Meals & Parties! 1-800-234-7007 endless-summertours.com

Spring Break Bahamas Celebrity Party Cruise! 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Nassau, Jamaica, From $459! Panama

TRAVEL

City & Daytona $159! www.SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Spring Break 2005- Travel with STS, America's #1 Student Tour Operator to Jamaica, Cancun, Acapulco, Bahamas and Florida. Now hiring on-campus reps. Call for group discounts. Information/Reservations 1-800-648-4849 or www.ststravel.com.

SPRING BREAK '05
SAVE $100 PER ROOM
Clip & Send or Use Code: PRMSG Online
1-800-426-7710

WANTED

Snowboard events intern $50/day stipend. For job description email jfriends@deerfield.edu

Egg Donors Needed. Help make a couple's dream of becoming parents come true by becoming an egg donor. Very generous compensation and expenses paid. Ages 21-32. Non-smokers only. For more information please visit our website at www.robertnicholsest.com or contact Christine or Liz at 781-769-6900.

HAPPY BDAY SAM NIELSEN! AHHWHOOP! Love Ive, Ali, Molly, Erika, Annie

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 1, 2004 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass searches for 3-0 start

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

After going 2-0 for the first time in three years, the Massachusetts men's basketball team is hoping to sweep its season-opening three-game home stand tonight against Northeastern.

The Huskies (1-2) will be the last game before the Minutemen head 2,979 miles west to play Gonzaga in the Battle for Seattle on Saturday.

Some would say, with nationally known Gonzaga and UConn coming over the next week and a half, UMass has to win tonight to carry over proper momentum. Head coach Steve Lappas is more concerned about the here and now and is focused on beating NU more than anything else.

"We haven't even mentioned Seattle, Gonzaga, or anybody else, all we've been talking about is Northeastern, that should be our only focus," Lappas said. "I hope that other stuff plays no part in this game."

The first two games of the season have shown a mixed bag of what the Minutemen are capable of. Against Birmingham Southern on Nov. 23, UMass dominated the first half, but let the Panthers get back in the game in the second. The Minutemen were able to snag a 64-60 victory, showing a resilience that has been missing over the past couple of season.

In its next game against Yale, the Maroon and White dominated on both ends and showcased a 70-56 victory.

The Minutemen, who are usually a one-dimensional team, have been getting help from up and down the roster. Four of the five starters are averaging in double figures, with Rashaun Freeman leading the way with 16.5 points per game and a respectable six boards.

Complementing Freeman has been the resurgence of Maurice Maxwell who is second on the team with 14.5 ppg. Maxwell,

See MEN'S HOOPS on page 8

COLLEGIAN ARCHIVES

Sophomore foward Maurice Maxwell goes up for a layup during the 2003-'04 campaign. Maxwell is averaging 14.5 points per game this year this Minutemen and has been a vital piece in UMass' defensive plan.

Five moments to remember

Mike Marzelli

Transition.

The 2004 Massachusetts football team adapted to it all season long. Transition from one era to another – from a coach who guided them to a National Championship and two league titles to one who hadn't coached in Amherst in over four years. Transition from a pass-happy offense to a run-oriented attack – namely a switch in quarterbacks following the graduation of Jeff Krohn, and transition on defense after losing seven starters and a vast amount of talent, size and experience.

Yet in the end, this team was able to overcome transition and adapt to change. The Minutemen figured themselves out after struggling mightily and united with their new coach, transforming a lost season into their third consecutive winning season. Now, with the experience this young but talented group gained during this period of transition, the focus will shift to 2005, when the transition will be complete, and the group that finally found its identity in 2004, will finally come full circle. With that I introduce to you the up five plays of the 2004 UMass football season.

5.) R.J. Cobbs intercepts an Anton Clarkson pass late in the fourth quarter and races 43 yards for a touchdown to seal a 40-30 UMass win over Hofstra on Senior Day.

Clinging to a three-point lead with just under three minutes remaining in the game, UMass was faced with the daunting task of stopping Hofstra – the Atlantic 10's best offensive team – from tying the score or taking the lead late in the final contest of 2004.

With the ball spotted at his own 40-yard line Clarkson, the Pride's first-year quarterback, came to the line of scrimmage on first down with an array of wide receivers to either side. After checking the play and scanning the defense, he took the snap and fired a quick pass out in the flats to his right, where he hoped to have receiver Charles Sullivan waiting for it.

Instead, Cobbs, a former Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Year who has shown a flare for both the electrifying and the dramatic, jumped the route, swooped in and stole the ball. Bobbling it as he began to race down the home sideline, he finally gained control and scampered into the end zone untouched, assuring the Maroon and White its third consecutive winning season.

Afterwards, Cobbs made sure the McGuirk faithful got a kick out of UMass' only defensive touchdown of the season, punting the game ball out of the stadium and equalling a collegiate record for most flags received on one play, with seven.

4.) Richmond quarterback Stacey Tutt completes a Hail Mary pass to wide receiver Harry Wilson on the final play of the first half, staking the Spiders to a 21-14 lead they would not relinquish in handing the Minutemen their first loss of 2004.

It was a play that many of those in and around the

See MARZELLI on page 8

Minutewomen face PC

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team is winless so far this year against Big East teams, but perhaps a trip tonight to Providence could change all that.

UMass (1-3) will be the favorite when the ball tips off at 7:30 at the Dunkin Donuts Center against the very young Providence Lady Friars (0-4); it's a position the Minutewomen aren't used to being in.

"PU might be the best adjective for PC at this point, because 2004-2005 has been looking ugly thus far for the Friars. Entering tonight's game, they are averaging only 43 points per game while allowing a startling 72.5, and have been outscored 290-172 through the first four games of the season.

In their most recent outing, the Airport University Inn Thanksgiving Classic in Albuquerque, N.M., the Friars came out extremely flat. In short, two squads not even currently ranked in the Top 25 or receiving votes for the poll beat them raw.

Against Gonzaga, PC was burned 85-38 in a match that was never even close. At the half, the Friars trailed 41-14. One day later against Missouri, the loss wasn't quite as bad – though they still lost by 33.

COLLEGIAN ARCHIVES

Sophomore foward Tamara Tatham is averaging just over seven points a game this year for UMass.

Even Holy Cross, who the Minutewomen were able to squeeze by thanks to a last-second lay-in by freshman Pam Rosanio, was able to hand the Lady Crusaders a beating. In fact, they forced a season-high 29 turnovers against the Friars, en route to a 68-40 thrashing. PC's closest game, a 56-46 loss to lowly Fordham, was still far out of reach.

The Friars currently lead the Big East in turnovers, with 99. And with such a young squad – only one junior, four sophomores and seven freshmen – logic suggests that a good portion of the turnovers can be attributed to not only carelessness with the ball, but rookie mistakes as well.

So perhaps it's a safe bet to preemptively mark this one in the win column, right?

Wrong.

"I think they're hungry for their first win," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "We can't come in and be complacent. We gotta try to get an uptempo game, force turnovers and then crash the boards."

To give the benefit of the doubt, the young PC squad has been shining one bright spot on the court in the form of sophomore Shauna Snyder.

Originally from Albuquerque – where she had her best performances of the year at the Thanksgiving Classic, averaging 14 points in the two-day tourney – the 5-foot-10 forward is the only Friar averaging in d- able figures in any category. She leads PC in scoring with 12.5 points per game, and is also the team's top rebounder with 8.3 per game.

But without a lot of help in the frontcourt, the Minutewomen may want to consider crashing the boards, especially with the size, and skill, leading them in the paint.

Senior Brooke Campbell has gone a bit under the radar for the Maroon and White this season. Though she is averaging 6.8 rebounds a game and shooting 42.9 percent from the floor, it has been the play of 6-foot-4 center Patrycja Gulak and Tamara Tatham that has been eyeing most of the attention in the paint. But it seems to work to her advantage.

"She's hands down the best we've got down low," Dacko said.

Rosanio, on the other hand, has been doing nothing but turning heads since she first stepped onto the court donning Maroon and White, and her contributions paid off when Sunday she was announced as the Atlantic 10's Rookie of the Week. Through the first four games of the year, the shooting guard out of Southampton, P.A. leads the Minutewomen in scoring with 10.8 points per game.

UMass and PC have not met in 11 years. In their last meeting, the Minutewomen cruised to an easy 64-52 win at home. Providence leads the all-time series 7-6.

Awarding the 2004 squad

Jeff Howe

The 2003 Massachusetts football team's season ended amidst a controversial ga-me in upstate New York.

The Minutemen were defeated 19-7 by the lesser Colgate team that just happened to beat the Division I-AA football playoff system on its way to a first-round game at home.

This was a game that was played during a massive snowstorm so bad that the visiting Minutemen almost couldn't make it to the game that ultimately sealed their season's fate.

Fast-forward a couple months. The snow was still falling in Amherst, and the controversy was ringing anew as the athletic department announced its hiring of coach Don Brown, who took over the job after Mark Whipple headed to the Pittsburgh Steelers to become the quarterback's coach and bring along rookie Ben Roethlisberger.

After lawsuits between University of Massachusetts and Northeastern University — due to Brown's alleged breach of contract — passed, Brown was forced to watch his new team's first three games from the press box, and UMass had to pay a $150,000 reparation to Northeastern.

With the season in full swing a few months later, the Minutemen properly disposed of Colgate under the temporary lights at McGuirk Alumni Stadium to improve their record to 2-0. The 30-20 victory in front of the largest crowd the UMass campus had seen in almost 30 years let off 10 long months of pent-up frustration.

But when the lights left McGuirk, the team's offense departed with them. The Minutemen fell hard, losing four in a row to Richmond, defending national champion Delaware, the oh-so-close to the BCS Boston College Eagles and current Division I-AA tournament team James Madison.

As fast as the lights turned off on the offense, though, they turned back on seemingly as quickly. UMass rebounded to win four of its final five games to send its seniors out with a 6-5 record and give its underclassmen some solid confidence when they return to action next fall.

The Minutemen were finding ways to win the close games they were losing during the four-game skid, and the final 36 days of the season were as fun to watch as the first two weeks.

In the season's most exciting game the next Saturday, linebacker L.A. Love stormed through Maine's offensive line to block an extra point attempt in overtime to

See HOWE on page 8

MATTHEW REBUCOLLEGIAN

Junior tailback Steve Baylark led the Atlantic 10 in rushing with 1,138 rushing yards. Baylark was named to the 1-AA All-Star team.

The Daily Collegian

THURSDAY DECEMBER 2, 2004 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXIV ISSUE 60

U2 on the rise with 'How to Dismantle an Atomic Bomb'
ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 5

THURSDAY • High: 46 • Low: 28
FRIDAY • High: 40 • Low: 24
SATURDAY • High: 43 • Low: 30
DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

Minutemen fall to Northeastern at home
SPORTS, PAGE 10

SGA says student queries to campus improvements may be answered soon

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Students may see improvements as early as next semester to requests and queries pertaining to the upkeep of the University of Massachusetts, according President of the Student Government Association Eduardo Bustamante and Attorney General Craig Goldshmidt.

Bi-weekly meetings called, 'Back to the People' have been going on in various dining commons on campus for this semester. Bustamante, Goldschmidt and other SGA members visit student while they dine and ask what concerns or problems that they might have with the current status of the University.

"We let them see the progress," Bustamante said. "We go around to tables and we get feedback, then we compile what they told us and go from there."

During his office report, Goldschmidt reiterated to the Senate, that these student concerns are important and it is the duty of the SGA to make sure that they are fulfilled.

"This is what we are here for and this is what we've got to do," Goldschmidt said.

He noted that many members of the SGA have been preoccupied with the current status of Speaker Seamus Brennan and certain members of the administration. Last March, key members of the SGA were photographed drinking alcoholic beverages in a University office while mocking a caricature of a Ku Klux Klan Grand Wizard and the Senate has been dealing with this issue because several of the aforementioned members have since resigned.

"We have to remember even though we have had trouble with our speaker and the administration, let's try and make [the students] happy," Goldschmidt said.

A series of emails that were anonymously released to the Senate last month between key members of the SGA and Vice Chacellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano led to a vote of 'no confidence' in Gargano during the last meeting.

Goldschmidt said that there is a long list of student gripes that needs to be taken care of as soon as possible.

"Students want to see road paving, more work study programs, more vending machines, better bus service, computer labs in Southwest so they don't have to walk across campus, and maybe a track because the track team doesn't have a track and that's a problem," he said to the crowd.

He also added that students don't always feel safe on campus and appropriate steps need to be taken to ensure student safety.

"There needs to be parking closer to the dorms, and more security. I know a student that has had his car broken into two times this semester."

Other complaints that member's said need changing are the meal plans on campus, bathroom renovations, better gym hours, reintroducing physical education classes and textbook prices.

Trustee Matthew Murphy addressed the Senate during his report with "some good news."

According to the Time of London, the University of Massachusetts is ranked the 45th best university in the world and 22nd in the country. The Times of London also mentioned that UMass is now ranked fourteenth in the country on intellectual property licensing, beating the number 16 school, Harvard.

During the meeting, three senate motions passed by majority.

The first motion written by Bustamante passed overwhelmingly to let students use kitchens on campus aside from the ones in the dorms. Recently, Auxiliary Services revoked the students' rights to use kitchens because of a small fire. According to Bustamante, after the investigation of the fire, it was found that it was not started by any fault of students, but by years of grease that had built up.

Secondly, the motion to tighten regulations on elevator inspection passed. Several senators noted that dozens of elevators on campus have expired inspection stickers and that is an issue that needs to be taken care of promptly because of the high traffic of elevator use on campus.

Finally, after some debate, the motion to verify the aforementioned emails by Brennan, Goldschmidt and a member of the administration passed. Senators also voted to amend the motion by setting a deadline for Wednesday.

MEGAN BANSTRA/COLLEGIAN

Student Government Association Senators Mark Morrison addresses the Senate body along side Senator Pavel Payano in last night's weekly meeting.

Racial panel asks UMass, 'Where do we go from here?'

By Sean Whalen
Collegian Staff

A panel discussion titled: "Where Do We Go From Here? Debates on Racial Inequality and Reparations," featuring Harvard Law School Professor Charles Ogletree took place last night. The event was part of a semester-long series emphasizing the impact of the U.S. Supreme Court's 1954 school desegregation decision, Brown v. Board of Education.

The Feinberg Family Distinguished Lectureship sponsored the panel discussion. Three other panelists were on hand to speak in succession after Ogletree. The second was Professor Laura Lovett, from the UMass History Department, followed by Alan Gordon, a law student from Yale. Ending the night was Neta Crawford, who presently holds numerous positions at Brown University.

Charles Ogletree opened by asking the audience, "Who here was born after 1970?" and two thirds of the audience raised their hands. He followed by addressing that the audience's age would pose a barrier to understanding "Colored only water fountains, and white only restaurants." He said that would sound completely "un-American" to most in attendance.

"You've predominately been alive with only one Pope, barely remember Regan being shot, and Jay Leno as the only host you've ever known on The Tonight Show," Ogletree said.

Ogletree proceeded to inform the audience that some of them may not be too old to remember 1975, when Ogletree arrived at Harvard, where he was "shocked and appalled to see, that the birthplace of the abolitionists-movement, and the place where President Kennedy had so recently rallied the nation, was facing racial riots with the bussing of whites and blacks to different schools."

With a timeline drawn, Ogletree began to speak of Greenwood, a segregated neighborhood of Tulsa, Ok. Greenwood was home for many in the African American community.

"[Greenwood was home to] black Wall Street, where black businesses, theatre, and black Americans thrived. It was home to many newspapers, and the dollar circulated an unprecedented 35 times before leaving the community," he said.

Greenwood's prosperity ground to a halt on May 31, 1921 when a false report about a black assaulting a white spiraled out of control.

"By the end of the day, a shoe shiner's stepping on a white woman's foot turned into a tale of rape," Ogletree said. "At the jailhouse, a white lynch mob demanded the accused, and a group of black World War One veterans came to his defense, and demanded a jury trial."

He said that many blacks retreated to Greenwood, while at the same time the sheriff deputized hundreds of whites, who stormed Greenwood.

"300 black bodies were never found, and the remaining of the population was placed in internment camps," Ogletree said.

The aftermath left the city in flames, the shoeshine cleared of all charges, and greenwood destroyed, he said.

Currently Ogletree is involved in a reparations suit against the state of Oklahoma. Another lawyer in the suit is John Franklin, the son of lawyer Buck Franklin, whose law office was burnt to the ground in the "race war."

In 2000, they were able to claim a short-lived victory. Oklahoma's courts agreed to pay reparations, but the governor halted the court decision. Ogletree paraphrased the decision as, "The governor claimed no one alive now was responsible, and no one alive was directly affected." They are presently in the appeals process.

Ogletree's recent book, "All Deliberate Speed," refers to the wording in the Brown v. Board decision, which allowed policy makers to implement change at their own pace. This type of interpretation of the law poses similar problems in the Greenwood suit, "where the youngest client is 89, and the oldest 105." They are in fact alive, and were affected.

Laura Lovett followed by citing present day reasons for reparations. She cited the practice of "Red lining" cities and towns. Lovett utilized visual aids to show this practice as nothing more than a way to draw racial lines through a city, where grades were assigned ranging from A to D. The banks and Federal Housing Authority would then decide who to loan to, and at what rate.

"The socio-economic standing of your neighbor became more important than whether your house would keep out the rain," Lovett said.

Society of Professors host discussion on tenure-tracking for UMass educators

By Alberta Colakovic
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts Society of Professors hosted a lecture to deal with the lack of tenure-track professors at the University of Massachusetts Tuesday. A number of students, teaching assistants and faculty members came to give their testimony on the effects of the shortage of professional faculty.

The first speaker in the meeting was Professor of Sociology and president of the Faculty Union, the Massachusetts Society of Professors (MSP) Dan Clawson. He gave a basic account on the number of tenure-track faculty in the 1980's compared with that of today. He said that in 1986 there were 1,229 tenure-track faculty members. The number currently is 880, while the size of the student body is about the same.

Clawson claims that in 1980, 80 percent of students had courses with a tenure track professor, but today only 60 percent have the opportunity.

He further attempted to define the meaning of tenure track, saying it means "faculty recruited through open national searches." Tenure track also means when a professor or faculty member holds onto one's position on a permanent basis without any contract renewals.

Students at the lecture described their dismay at the large lecture halls where students find it hard to ask questions and to pay attention when in proximity to chattering classmates. Many complained of the difficulty in finding faculty members who know them well enough to ask for recommendations.

"I don't honestly know that any one professor would be able to claim they know enough about me and my education to write a recommendation," said Sarah Towsley, a junior political science major.

Eric Wirth, a graduate student working toward his Masters in the Spanish and Portuguese program, said that almost all of his classes in the Spanish department were taught by teaching assistants. He comically remarked that the only class taught by a faculty member of the department was a Spanish cinema.

"Given that I was obtaining a degree and also was a paying student, it was very disconcerting to me," Wirth said.

Students claim that with the lack of professional tenure-track members and large lecture halls with no one-on-one interactions with professors, they may have little or no contact with the experts that teach their field of study. Many claim that they have no one to turn to when in need of recommendations, when in search for inspiration or in search of a faculty member to ignite interest.

Associate Professor Ray Pfeiffer of Department of Accounting and Information Systems believes that the decline in the number of tenure-track faculty will lead to a decline in the quality of the duties that faculty perform. He added that tenure-track offers faculty a stronger sense of attachment to the school in question, and more ample opportunities in researching the subject of their expertise.

In addition, Pfeiffer maintained that putting reliance on non-tenure track members could curb the aims of the University.

"The teaching mission may be relatively less affected, but the other two of the three missions of the University [scholarship and outreach] are diminished," he said.

MATTHEW REBUCOLLEGIAN

Sociology professor David Clawson discusses tenure-tracking for University professors and faculty among a panel of community leaders.

Priest gets 4 1/2 to 5 years for child rape

CAMBRIDGE (AP) — A Catholic priest was sentenced Wednesday to 4 1/2 to 5 years in prison after he admitted repeatedly raping an altar boy at a Waltham parish in the 1980s.

The Rev. Robert Gale, 63, pleaded guilty to four counts of raping a child on Tuesday, just as jury selection was set to begin for his trial.

The sexual assaults took place at St. Jude's parish in Waltham between 1980 and 1985, when the victim was between 10 and 15 years old. Prosecutors said the boy was sexually abused by Gale about twice a month.

The victim, now 34, told Gale he'd been tortured by his sexual abuse.

"The scars of the abuse will continue to haunt me," the man said. "My life has been permanently scarred."

The victim first told a friend about the abuse in 1995, and went to authorities in 2002. Gale was indicted in August 2002.

His father said all three of his sons were altar boys at St. Jude's. "We put them in your care; we believed in you. You let us down," he said, looking directly at Gale as his now-grown sons, seated in the front row, wiped away tears.

"You don't know what you've done to us as a family, and you'll never know."

Gale apologized and asked for forgiveness. "Saying sorry is very easy, but I am truly sorry," he said.

—Associated Press

Wilson is highest paid state worker

BOSTON (AP) — More than 2,000 state workers were paid at least $100,000 in the last fiscal year, according to a state report.

Almost half the 2,095 employees worked at state universities or colleges, and most of them are college professors. About a third worked in public safety, including state troopers whose pay was boosted by thousands of dollars in overtime. About 10 percent worked for health and human services.

The number of employees earning $100,000 or more makes up 2.5 percent of the state's 71,000 employees, according to the 16-page report, called the "Executive and Management Compensation in Massachusetts State Government." The report was submitted to Legislature on Nov. 15 by the Executive Office for Administration and Finance. It did not look at salaries of the Legislature or Judiciary. The Boston Globe reported.

In education, nearly 86 percent of those who were paid more than $100,000 worked for the University of Massachusetts. Of those 720 employees, 486 were professors whose earnings averaged $118,479.

The highest-paid state employee was University of Massachusetts President Jack Wilson, whose base salary was $349,999. The Chronicle of Higher Education ranked him 19th in compensation among the 131 presidents of U.S. public colleges.

In public safety, 525 State Police employees were paid $100,000 or more, including 160 state troopers who were paid an average of nearly $109,000. Twenty-nine employees in district attorneys' offices throughout the state and 27 in the Department of Correction made $100,000 or more.

In health and human services, more than 100 people were paid more than $100,000 in the Department of Public Health and the Department of Mental Health. At the MBTA, 130 employees were paid $100,000 or above.

—Associated Press

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Feurdan
Managing Editor Andrew Merritt
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Cameron Woods
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugulski
Features Production Samantha Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Meghan Healy
Comics Editor Alyson Zillmann
Features Editor Paige Cram
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Matthew Reid
Sports Editor Mike Marzelli
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Kiggans
Finance Manager Harak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Frecaut
Hann Resident Sarah Marquez
Assistant Chancellor Linda Wallach
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Jachren Sorenson
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Adviser Charlie Higgins
Asst Arts & Living Mike Bunack
Asst Arts & Living Monique Jemmott
Assistant Editors Yousef Munayyer
Assistant Editors Allison Edles
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Sports Robert McGovern
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts academic semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890 the paper began as Aggie Life. It became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1956. Published daily since 1967. The Collegian has been broadsheet since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call week-day mornings between 8:30 a.m. and 3:30 p.m.

Production Crew

Night Editor
Erika Lovley
Photo Technician
Megan Binnster
Copy Editor
Michael Busack
Production Supervisor
Shannon Farrington
Production Staff
Jodi Weisser, Tom Heslin

Write for News

Military sending 12,000 additional troops to Iraq

By Robert Burns
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The United States is expanding its military force in Iraq to the highest level of the war — even higher than during the initial invasion in March 2003 — in order to bolster security in advance of next month's national elections in January.

The 12,000-troop increase is to last only until March, but it says much about the strength and resiliency of an insurgency that U.S. military planners did not foresee when Baghdad was toppled in April 2003.

Brig. Gen. David Rodriguez, deputy operations director of the Joint Staff, told reporters Wednesday that the American force will expand from 138,000 troops today to about 150,000 by January.

The previous high for the U.S. force in Iraq was 148,000 on May 1, 2003, when President Bush declared that major combat operations were over and most soldiers thought the war had been won.

The initial invasion force included thousands of sailors on ships in the Persian Gulf and other waters, plus tens of thousands in Kuwait and other surrounding countries.

The expansion in Iraq will be achieved by sending about 1,500 troops from the 82nd Airborne Division in Fort Bragg, N.C., this month and by extending the combat tours of about 10,400 troops already in Iraq.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld approved the moves Wednesday, according to a Pentagon statement.

"They are the most experienced and best-qualified forces to sustain the momentum of post-Fallujah operations and to provide for additional security for the upcoming elections," the statement said.

The Pentagon originally expected to train and equip enough Iraqi government forces to fill the security gap in the weeks leading up to the elections, but that hope was not fulfilled.

The military is reluctant to extend soldiers' combat tours because of the potential negative effect it could have on their families, and thus on their willingness to remain in the service. In this case, Gen. George Casey, the most senior U.S. commander in Iraq, decided it was necessary to keep up pressure on the insurgents while also providing security for the elections.

KNIGHT RIDDER

Spl. Arthur Wright of New Jersey, with Alpha Company, 1st Infantry Division, sits outside of a Bradley fighting vehicle in Iraq.

One unit, the 2nd Brigade of the 1st Cavalry Division, is being extended for the second time. Its soldiers originally were told they would be going home in November at the end of a 10-month assignment, but in October they got the news that they would remain until mid-January. Now they are being extended until mid-March.

The 2nd Brigade of the 1st Cavalry and most of the other extended units will end up serving about 14 months in Iraq, exceeding by two months the 12-month standard set by the Army.

Rodriguez listed these unit extensions:

— About 4,400 troops of the 2nd Brigade of the 25th Infantry Division, which is operating in north-central Iraq, will stay until mid-March, instead of departing in early January. Those soldiers' home bases are mostly in Hawaii.

— About 3,500 soldiers of the 2nd Brigade of the 1st Cavalry, will be extended until March. These are the soldiers who originally were told they would be leaving Iraq in November.

— About 2,300 members of the 31st Marine Expeditionary Unit, based in Okinawa, Japan and in Hawaii, and California, will stay until mid-March instead of leaving in January.

— About 160 soldiers of the 66th Transportation Company, based in Germany, was due to depart Iraq in early January but instead will stay until early March.

The 82nd Airborne is generally relied upon by the Army to keep one of its three brigades on short-notice alert year-round to deploy abroad in the event of a crisis. Shortly before the October elections in Afghanistan, about 600 members of the 82nd Airborne were sent there to strengthen security.

Military officials have said repeatedly in recent weeks that they were considering whether more American troops would be required to provide sufficient security before Iraqis vote.

The moves announced Wednesday are in line with expectations — a combination of holding some troops in Iraq longer than scheduled and sending some fresh forces from the United States.

Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., a critic of the administration's handling of the war, said the Pentagon's announcement confirmed that the effort to stabilize Iraq would take years, with no certainty of success.

"This announcement makes it clear that commanders in Iraq need more troops and that this will be a long and very expensive process for the United States," Reed said.

Mass. natural gas line to see repairs

BOSTON (AP) — The Army Corps of Engineers has ordered repairs to New England's longest undersea gas line in eight locations where the pipeline was improperly buried, because of fears that ships' anchors could rupture the pipe.

When the Army Corps approved the pipeline several years ago, developer Algonquin Gas Transmission Co. promised to bury it deep enough under the ocean floor to be safe from anchors, and to fill the trench and restore the bottom for marine life.

But a recent inspection found the line improperly buried in 21 places, with open trenches and piles of dirt 200 to 1,000 feet long, called spoils. The Army Corps ordered repairs to eight of the sites, but will leve the other 13 alone to protect marine life.

"We felt this was a good compromise," said Ted Lento, the Army Corps' project manager for the 30-inch diameter "HubLine," which stretches across Massachusetts Bay from Beverly to Weymouth. The 29-mile-long pipeline went into operation a year ago.

The pipe, which connects to a longer pipeline delivering natural gas from Canada, was to be buried at least three feet beneath the sea floor. However, in areas heavily used by ships at anchor, the pipeline was to be buried much deeper.

Officials of Algonquin, a subsidiary of North Carolina-based Duke Energy, said the company completed a majority of the project as promised. However, the geology of the seabed prevented crews from burying the pipe as deep as planned in certain locations, while weather and other problems hampered efforts to fill the trench in other places.

"We want to do it right," John Sheridan, a spokesman for Algonquin, told The Boston Globe. "But this is the first pipeline built in Mass. Bay, and ... you learn something as you go along. Until you construct, you are not sure what the subsurface may look like."

The company attempted to fix some of the problems, including dropping rocks from the ocean surface to fill some trench sections, but company officials "just haven't been able to get it right," Lento said.

"It's probably less damaging" to let water currents naturally level the piles and fill in the trenches, Lento said, than to have the firm's heavy equipment do it.

-Associated Press

Univ. of Oklahoma banning alcohol after student death

By Julie E. Bisbee
Associated Press

NORMAN, Okla. — Drinking will be banned at University of Oklahoma fraternities and residence halls under new policies announced Wednesday, two months after a 19-year-old student died of alcohol poisoning.

University of Oklahoma President Dan Boren said the rules will go into effect Jan. 18 at the start of the new semester. Three violations will end in a student's suspension for one semester.

The university also will set up a hot line for students to report violations, and will expand alcohol education programs.

Drinking is already prohibited at sororities.

Boren will present the policies to the Board of Regents Monday for approval. Regents have been involved in creating the plan and support it.

"These policies send a strong signal that alcohol abuse will not be tolerated at the University of Oklahoma," Boren said.

Student Blake Hammontree died Sept. 30 after a Sigma Chi fraternity party. He had a blood-alcohol content more than five times the legal limit. The frat has since been shut down.

Police are still investigating the death and several fraternity members have been subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury. One student, a sophomore, has been charged with furnishing alcohol to another minor at the party.

"The investigation continues and other charges are anticipated," said Cleveland County District Attorney Tim Kuykendall.

Similar recent incidents have been reported at campuses, including Colorado State, where student Samantha Spady had consumed as many as 40 drinks when she was found dead at a fraternity house in September.

What are You Doing Over Winter Session?

Make use of it!

Come learn what you can do during break to make a significant difference in your job, internship or co-op search!

TODAY! Thursdsay, December 2
3:00 pm

Other exciting workshops happening today...
Interviewing Skills at 1:30 pm
and
Internship Info Session at 3 pm

all workshops take place at 511 Goodell

CareerServices

413-545-2224 • http://www.umass.edu/careers

• Nikoukari Charron Mahoney PC •
Attorneys at Law
• Family Law Matters
• Criminal - OUI
• Immigration
• Landlord/Tenant Matters
Mondana Nikoukari, Esq.
Samuel L. Charron, Esq.
Christopher K. Mahoney, Esq.
2 Mattoon Street • Springfield, MA 01105
737-8008
www.ncm-pc.com

CENTER SERIES WINTER 2004
Experience it all
from the edge of your seat!

November 21
Ying String Quartet
Beethoven Quartet Cycle
The Quartet will perform Beethoven's Opus 18, No. 1, Opus 18, No. 2 and Opus 130. Plan to join the quartet for a pre-concert talk at 6:45 p.m. Viennese coffee and desserts will be available for purchase.
Bowker Auditorium at 7:30pm

December 3 and 4
St. Petersburg Ice Ballet: The Nutcracker
Enjoy this traditional holiday classic in an entirely new way- on ice, on stage at the Fine Arts Center! On blades, The Nutcracker becomes effervescent, irrepressible. The cast's credentials, combined with a story that takes place in a winter wonderland, make St. Petersburg's production magical. What better way to see snowflakes dance than on ice?
Sponsored by Easthampton Savings Bank, FamilyFun Magazine, Coca Cola, The River 93.9, and The Daily Hampshire Gazette
Concert Hall at 7:30pm

The Fine Arts Center
University of Massachusetts Amherst
For Tickets: 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMAS
WWW.FINEARTSCENTER.COM

Peterson's father takes the stand

By Brian Skoloff
Associated Press

REDWOOD CITY, Calif. — Scott Peterson's father took the stand Wednesday in the penalty phase of his son's murder trial and described a friendly boy who sang at a senior citizens' home on Sundays, tutored young students, and distributed clothes and food in Tijuana.

"You don't know who Scott Peterson is, and it's going to be our job to show you," defense lawyer Pat Harris said on the second day of testimony in the penalty phase of Peterson's trial.

"What we're going to now show you is the 30 years that preceded this. And when we show you those 30 years, I believe that you will agree that this is a life worth saving."

The attempt to humanize Peterson came a day after Laci Peterson's mother cried on the stand and screamed at her former son-in-law as prosecutors urged jurors to sentence him to death. Jurors must decide between execution and life in prison without parole.

Lee Peterson said his daughter-in-law's death and the subsequent trial of his son have taken a heavy emotional toll.

"I'm frightened, deeply saddened," he said, looking tired on the witness stand. "Losing someone you love and now having our son in such jeopardy — it's just beyond belief."

As an infant, he said, Scott Peterson became ill with pneumonia and was placed in a plastic chamber — called a croup tent — that controls humidity.

"It was very risky. The doctor said this may not go so well, but he pulled out of it and he lived," Lee Peterson said.

He recalled a toddler who was always smiling, enjoyed playing with trucks and action figures, and liked to snuggle while his father read to him.

His son grew into a good student, and captained his high school golf team and dreamed of a pro golf career, Lee Peterson said. He sang to senior citizens, tutored and gave to the poor in Tijuana.

Lee Peterson described his son as motivated and full of energy: "You wouldn't catch him laying around in bed."

The day's testimony was in stark contrast to Tuesday, when Laci's mother, Sharon Rocha, alternated between tears and outbursts, at times directly addressing her former son-in-law, saying, "She wanted to be a mother. That was taken away from her."

Lee Peterson's testimony was somber, and he conceded that by nature he does not readily show emotion. He and his son exchanged brief glances.

Prosecutors claim Peterson strangled or smothered his pregnant wife in their Modesto home on or around Christmas Eve 2002, then dumped her weighted body into San Francisco Bay.

The remains of Laci, 27, and the fetus were discovered four months later along a shoreline a few miles from where Scott Peterson claims to have been fishing alone the day his wife vanished.

The 32-year-old former fertilizer salesman was convicted on one count of first-degree murder in the death of his wife and one count of second-degree murder for the killing of her fetus.

"We're not asking you to let this man go free," said Harris, the defense attorney. "Life without parole is not some sort of a holiday."

COURTESY MSNBC.COM

Scott Peterson converses with attorney Mark Geragos. Peterson's father took the stand yesterday, pleading for his son's life after he was convicted of murder.

Parliament votes 'no confidence'

By Anna Melnichuk
Associated Press

KIEV, Ukraine — Ukraine's opposition scored key victories Wednesday in its bid to scrap a disputed presidential election as parliament voted no confidence in the government and European-brokered talks provided momentum toward holding a new ballot.

Opposition leader Viktor Yushchenko urged throngs of supporters to stay on the streets until plans for what he demanded — a rerun of the Nov. 21 runoff with Kremlin-backed Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych — are worked out. He said such a vote could be held as early as Dec. 19.

But President Leonid Kuchma, who backed Yanukovych, instead proposed an entirely new election, which would allow his Russian-allied government to field a more attractive candidate as it scrambles to stay in power with his 10 years in office running out.

European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana, who mediated talks Wednesday between Yuschenko and Yanukovych, also suggested a new vote but didn't indicate whether it would be a repeat of the runoff or a new election. Kuchma, who earlier in the day called the idea of a new runoff "a farce," also left the issue unclear.

The two candidates signed a deal to set up a group of lawyers to work out proposals for the "completion of the election," a reference to drafting legislation for a settlement of the dispute.

The statement also urged protesters to lift their siege of official buildings that have paralyzed the government's work — but Yushchenko urged his backers to press ahead with their street protests.

"Our ranks mustn't shrink," Yushchenko told tens of thousands of his supporters who gathered on Kiev's central Independence Square for the 11th straight night since the election commission declared his rival the winner in a vote he says was stolen. "We mustn't leave until we have a revote date firmly set."

Hours after the deal was signed, throngs of Yushchenko's supporters continued to besiege the Cabinet and the presidential administration buildings, while thousands clad in his orange campaign colors crammed the central square under fireworks and listened to rock bands in a raucous celebration.

Yushchenko said he expected the Supreme Court to deliver a ruling Thursday on his campaign's appeal to invalidate the runoff result — based on claims of widespread violations across Yanukovych's eastern and southern strongholds.

Yanukovych has tried to counterattack by launching his own appeal contesting the vote results in pro-Yushchenko western provinces and the capital, but it wasn't immediately clear when the court would address it.

The opposition has asked the court to declare Yushchenko the winner based on his narrow edge in the election's first round, on Oct. 31. But his call for a revote suggested he does not believe the court would pronounce him the winner.

Yushchenko, Yanukovych and other participants in the talks in the ornate Mariinsky Palace presidential residence emphasized the need to prevent any actions that could split the country. Yanukovych's supporters in the east have called for regional autonomy, sparking fears of Ukraine's breakup.

Participants in the talks emphasized the need to avoid the use of force and said the next round of talks would be held after the Supreme Court's ruling.

COURTESY NYTIMES.COM

Members of Ukraine's opposition gather in the tens of thousands in Independence Square in Kiev, to show support for a rerun of the Nov. 21 presidential election.

Toyota recalling more than 92,000 Celicas

WASHINGTON (AP) — Toyota Motor Corp. is recalling 92,577 Celica cars because their daytime running lights are too bright and could be a hazard to oncoming drivers, federal regulators said Wednesday.

The recall affects Celicas from the 2000 and 2001 model years. Dealers will repair the vehicles for free beginning in March, the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration said.

NHTSA also said General Motors Corp. will recall 1,378 of its new Chevrolet Cobalt coupes because a headlight bulb shield can loosen or break. Without the shield, the lights cause too much glare. Dealers will install new shields free.

NHTSA has gotten thousands of complaints about headlight glare in the last few years.

In October, the agency said it had shut down 24 suppliers of klts that allow drivers to install their own high-intensity headlights.

—Associated Press

Violence breaks out as Powell arrives in Haiti

By Anne Gearan
Associated Press

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti — Heavy gunfire rang out near Haiti's presidential palace Wednesday as Secretary of State Colin Powell prepared to meet with the country's interim leaders. He denounced the violence as the work of thugs.

Powell said international peacekeeping troops need to come down hard on street toughs and those who carry out political violence in Haiti.

"They have to forcefully take on those armed individuals of the kind who were firing this morning," Powell said after meetings at the National Palace with President Boniface Alexandre, Prime Minister Gerard Latortue and other political leaders.

Haiti is still beset with violence and political infighting as the one-year anniversary of former President Jean-Bertrand Aristide's ouster approaches in February. The country's caretaker government has pledged open elections next fall, a goal Powell said Haiti can meet with outside help.

"The only outcome that will satisfy the U.S. is an election next year that is free and fair, ... that is not fraudulent and stolen," Powell said later in his one-day trip to shore up democratic efforts in the desperately poor country.

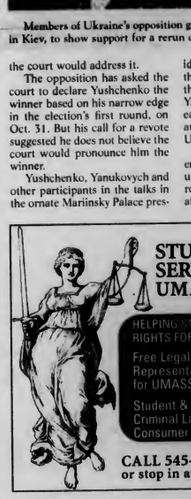
The United States, and Powell in particular, have been instrumental in Haiti's chaotic power shifts over the past decade. Powell was once an Aristide supporter but helped arrange Aristide's exile this year.

"I'm deeply saddened the opportunity that was given to Mr. Aristide a decade ago was wasted," Powell said Wednesday. "But the Haitian people have a new opportunity."

Aristide and others claim the Bush administration coerced him to leave. Aristide's followers say Powell signed onto a plan to remove Aristide because he was viewed as a troublemaker whose unpopularity could destabilize Haiti and cause a tide of refugees to head for U.S. shores.

The administration says Aristide departed voluntarily.

Details of the palace shooting were unclear. Gunshots, including several long bursts of automatic weapons fire, were heard in front of the palace shortly after Powell entered with a small U.S. delegation. A palace security official said a shot was fired from a passing car, and U.N. forces guarding the palace returned fire.



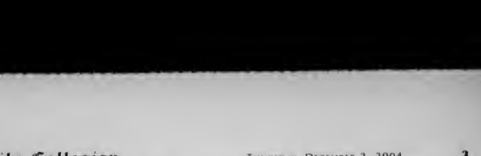
Several U.N. tanks appeared a short while later and patrolled the palace front.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Adam Ereli said that at the time of the gunshots, Powell was in a holding room at the palace. Powell and others in his delegation heard the gunshots, Ereli said. The incident prompted a change of meeting rooms but otherwise had no effect on Powell's schedule or plans.

Despite the presence of Brazilian-led U.N. peacekeeping troops, rebels and former soldiers have refused to abandon police stations across the country. They have also refused to disarm, saying they need to stabilize Haiti until the government reinstates the military and the police hire more recruits.

The U.S.-backed interim government has accused Aristide of orchestrating recent political violence from exile in South Africa. Aristide has denied supporting violence.

At least 89 people have been killed in politically linked violence since Sept. 30, when pro-Aristide groups stepped up protests demanding his return.



STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE
UMASS, AMHERST
HELPING STUDENTS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS
Free Legal Advice, Referral, Representation and Counseling for UMASS Students
Student & Workers Rights, Family & Criminal Law, Landlord/Tenant & Consumer Disputes
CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

DO YOU DARE?

ZUMI
downtown Amherst

HAMPSHIRE FITNESS club
90 Gatehouse Road, Off Rt. 9, Two miles East of Amherst Center
On the Bus Route • TEL: 256-6446
Shopping for a health club? • Do your homework first
JOIN NOW!
for our Winter Special
15 weeks - For Students: $179! ~Includes HFC Free T-Shirt for New Members!
Inclusive membership / No additional fees
Hampshire Fitness Club has it all for you
•FULL SIZED INDOOR POOL
•AQUA AEROBICS
•CYBEX NAUTILUS CIRCUIT
•BOXING STUDIO
•CYBEX FREE WEIGHTS
•FULL COURT BASKETBALL
•VOLLEYBALL
•INDOOR TENNIS
•YOGA/PILATES
•AEROBICS/STEP/BOSU
•JACUZZI/SAUNAS
•CARDIO-VASCULAR EQUIPMENT
Open: 6am to 10pm Mon-Fri
8am to 9pm Sat-Sun

FOUR Seasons
WINE • LIQUOR • CIGARS
333 Russell St., Rt. 9
Hadley, MA 01035
584-8174
Sale date 12/02 - 12/08
responsible for typographical errors

Beer

Miller Lite 30 pk Can $16.49
Coors Light 30 pk Bottle $17.99
Michelob 12 pk Bottle $10.99
Michelob 12 pk Bottle $10.99
Miller Lite 40 pk Can $10.99
Corona 12 pk Bottle $10.99
Keystone Light 30 pk Can $11.49
Busch & Bud Light 24 pk Bottle $10.99
Newcastle Brown Ale 12 pk Bottle $10.99
Pete's Wicked Ale 6 pk Bottle $7.99

Wine

Moet & Chandon White Star 750 ml.....$29.99
Black Box Chardonnay, Cabernet, Merlot 3 lt.....$16.99
Forest Glen Chardonnay, Cabernet, Merlot 1.5 lt.....$10.99
Ruffino Aziano Chianti 750 ml.....$10.99
Chandon Fresco Brut, Extra dry 750ml.....$8.99
Chandon Terazzas Chardonnay, Cabernet, Merlot 750ml....$7.99
R.H. Phillips Chardonnay, Shiraz 750ml.....$6.99

Liquor

Hennessy X.O. Cognac 750 ml.....$104.99
Hennessy V.S.O.P. Cognac 750 ml.....$36.99
Grand Marnier 750 ml.....$29.99
Hennessy V.S. Cognac 750 ml.....$25.99
Ciroc Snap Frost Vodka 750 ml.....$24.99
Jose Cuervo Traditional Tequila 750 ml....$22.99
Seagram's 7 Whiskey 1.75 lt.....$15.99
UV Vodka 1.75 lt.....$15.99
Rubinoff Vodka all flavors 1.75 lt.....$9.99

Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 11pm, Sunday 12pm - 11pm

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

"The author must keep his mouth shut when his work starts to speak" -Friedrich Nietzche

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 2, 2004

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Commitment and support needed in fight against AIDS

Wednesday, Dec. 1 was World AIDS Day, a day meant to remember those who have died as a result of the disease and to strengthen our resolve in finding a cure.

AIDS ravages people in all corners of the globe. As part of World AIDS Day, officials in China, the most populated country in the world, publicly announced their commitment to fighting the disease; The government in India, the world's second most populated nation, declared it would take great strides in promoting AIDS awareness in its rural areas.

For residents of Massachusetts, however, one must only look in his or her backyard to see the epidemic up close. According to a report in the Boston Globe, of the approximate 6.4 million people living in Massachusetts, an estimated 22,000 are living with HIV/AIDS. Of these 22,000, more than 50 percent are black or Hispanic/Latino and the rate of infection among teenagers and women is rising dramatically.

Despite all of this, Massachusetts residents living with the disease are facing an uphill battle. Statewide budget cuts are making it harder and harder for HIV/AIDS-infected people to receive the care they need. An HIV/AIDS line item in the Massachusetts state budget has been cut by 37 percent since the year 2000.

One area that has been hit the most by these cuts is AIDS-related education. A large number of the youth education and prevention programs throughout the state are being closed, and it is becoming harder and harder for young people to get counseling. In order for education on AIDS to work, it must start as soon as possible. Children growing up in these times are exposed to a world so ravaged by AIDS, that the sooner they learn about proper preventions methods, the better off they will be. It is also important to teach youths about what to do if they should become infected.

This leads to the second area that has been affected by the cuts; treatment. Early detection of the disease is extremely important when it comes to treatment. However, the budget cuts are closing down testing facilities where people can safely and accurately determine whether or now they are infected. People are also finding it difficult to get access to the proper medicine needed for treatment, because housing, nutrition and transportation programs are being cut as well.

Without proper and efficient treatment, the disease can multiply and/or mutate, making it harder to treat the disease further down the road.

The first case of AIDS was first documented over 20 years ago. At this time, patients were not expected to live more than a few years after contracting the disease. Since then, great strides have been made in terms of research, funding and awareness. Drugs have been developed that allow those infected to live fuller, happier and healthier lives. However, when setbacks occur, it is important that we remember the battle against AIDS is only beginning.

We must start by doing everything we can to get back the money that has been taken away from AIDS related programs and services. The fight against AIDS cannot be won without help, and government assistance is necessary to finally rid the world of this terrible disease.

Information from the Boston Globe was used in this editorial.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

The promise of stem cells

Matthew M. Burke

On Thanksgiving, a paralyzed South Korean woman walked for the first time in 20 years with the aid of a walking frame. Her progress, from being bed and wheel chair ridden, to taking her first steps, was the direct result of recent stem cell research.

When Thanksgiving rolls around every year, we often leave school and go home. We spend time with our families and our friends. We Americans picture Pilgrims, turkeys, and Native Americans all having a big meal, which later leads to most of us simultaneously unbuckling our pants, parking it on the sofa, and watching football. We don't think of the things that have made us smile, the things that we are truly blessed to have, like our health, or perhaps the health of our friends and families.

The AFP (Agene France-Presser) reported that Hwang Mi-Soon, 37, suffered spinal cord damage from an accident that occurred while she was still a teenager. Stem cells found in umbilical cord blood were used to repair her injured spine. She had not walked in twenty years. She wept and spoke of "miracles" as reporters snapped pictures.

In the same breath, a pro-stem cell research law was passed Sunday in Switzerland to compliment the good news from the Korean Peninsula. Two-thirds of the Swiss voted in favor of a bill that steps up regulations, but opens the door to new and promising research at the same time. This example of growing world liberalism contrasts sharply with the United States' unwillingness to pursue these programs. The rest of the world is not waiting around when it comes to stem cell research. Sadly, the United States is far behind.

The flip side to stem cell research, of course, is the ethical questions that the issue raises. President Bush and other stem cell opponents bring up strong and somewhat legitimate arguments. Like most people around the world, however, I think their conclusions are wrong. The stem cell opposition in Switzerland drew parallels between their new law and the medical experiments conducted on Jews in Auschwitz. I think that is going a little overboard.

Watching someone suffer is a horrible thing. My mother has been suffering, like many others, with a debilitating disease for many years now. Her affliction, which results in symptoms similar to Lou Geri disease, is incredibly rare and there is no cure. Two of my best friends from my old neighborhood are in the same boat as me, with each having a mother who is also very sick. It is not easy to experience. It is a pain that affects the heart and the soul, and it gets worse as the days pass.

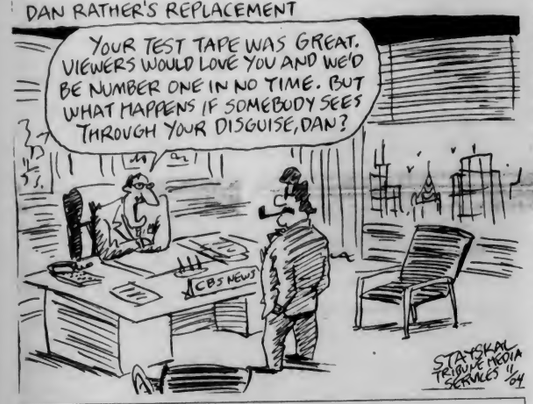
President Bush and my fellow Republicans, you can 'at least' explain to my mother and the mothers of my best friends why you are denying them hope.

It enrages many people to know that stem cell research is being ignored when it could quite possibly improve the quality of lives and alleviate suffering. Stem cell research should be a bipartisan issue, and everyone should get involved. I applaud Nancy Reagan and the widow of the courageous Christopher Reeve. But the Bush administration and conservatives have been dragging their heels, claiming that destroying an embryo in the process of extracting the stem cells is like killing a person — even though the leftover embryos from in vitro fertilization are destroyed on a daily basis anyway.

What would President Bush do if one of his daughters came down with a debilitating illness that could successfully be treated using stem cells? Or maybe even his mother, the former first lady? Or his wife? Would he leave it to faith to decide her destiny, or would watching their suffering first hand make him finally open his eyes and recognize both the promise and the value in stem cells? Knowing that they could cure his loved one and stop the pain might just do it for President Bush. I guess maybe it takes a tragedy to see that this cause has the potential to move mountains.

Bush ran his campaign on family values; maybe he should ask Hwang Mi-Soon or her family if they are a happier family unit. We are talking about cells that are destroyed anyway. They should be used to save lives.

There are many different kinds of stem cells. They all have promise, from those extracted from the placenta and the umbilical cord, to those taken from leftover embryos. Scientists suggest that those taken from embryos have the most potential because they have a higher likelihood of adaptability — they could be used on a variety of organs or body parts. Unfortunately, these cells will not be used in the United States because, as Bush says, they have "at least the potential for life."



Okay, President Bush and my fellow Republicans, you can "at least" explain to my mother and the mothers of my best friends why you are denying them hope. These cells are destroyed, but their potential for life keeps us from helping our own. It is an injustice.

A paralyzed woman walked for the first time in 20 years. I hope everyone understands the promise this brings. This has the potential to help so many people in the future, without getting any closer to having a clone in a tube that will someday break out and take over the world. We must both regulate and embrace developments like these.

The Bush administration is active in pursuing placenta and umbilical cord fluid stem cells because there are few ethical questions, but why stop there? A cure for a disease like Alzheimer's could be just around the corner.

President Bush, I voted for you. Now get it done.

Matthew M. Burke is a Collegian columnist.

Come on, lay off the judges

The Supreme Court of the United States on Monday declined to hear a challenge to the Massachusetts law that allows gay and lesbian couples to marry. The San Francisco Times quoted Peter Sprigg, a policy director at the Family Research Council, as saying "This will just reinforce the fact that our problems are not going to be solved by judges. Judges are the problem here, not the solution." Indeed, a trend that many public figures, most notably including President Bush, have followed is to decry "activist judges" that do not emulate the will of the people.

The problem is (and anyone in Dr. Jones' POLSCI 203 class two years ago can tell you this) is that the will of the masses is invariably transitory (no pun intended). Public opinion, the embodiment of the occasionally illogical and irrational passions of the people, has a dangerous precedent of being insensitive to the human rights of marginalized groups.

Yes, I did just compare the effort to allow homosexuals to marry with the plight of slavery. The gravity of the comparison is not lost on me.

This concept of allowing the electorate to decide the rights of another group of people has come up before. Stephen A. Douglass ran for president in 1854 on a platform of "Popular Sovereignty" – that the settlers of states newly inducted to the Union should be able to vote whether or not to legalize slavery within that state.

I think we all can agree that if slavery were left up to a mere state-to-state majority-rule vote, the legal recognition of African-Americans as free individuals would have happened much later in some parts of this country than the Emancipation Proclamation, January 1, 1863.

Yes, I did just compare the effort to allow homosexuals to marry with the plight of slavery. The gravity of the comparison is not lost on me.

If you look at this dilemma broadly, the real issue here is the critical importance of insulating the judiciary from the angry mob, and allowing them to get the tough decisions right without fear of backlash, especially when it comes to safeguarding the civil rights of a group of individuals. That's why justices of the Supreme Court are elected for lifetime terms — so that they can do their job without fear of being fired or elected out by making an unpopular decision, even if that decision rightfully strikes down laws that trump the Constitution.

The Massachusetts Supreme Court ruled that statutes banning gay marriage violated the state constitution, stating that opposition lawyers had "failed to identify any constitutionally adequate reason" to deny them the right.

Indeed, decisions by judicial bodies are known in legal parlance as opinions, and these opinions are made by fallible human beings (The phrase "Separate, But Equal" rings in my head). However, in a country such as ours where we believe in the rule of law and not the rule of the mob, the laws of the land must be followed not 99.999 percent, but 100 percent. That's something on which both conservatives and liberals can agree. This underscores the need to choose adjudicators who will impartially interpret and clarify the letter and spirit of our laws, especially the Constitution, and whose private religious or political prejudice will stay just that — private.

There is no legal basis to single out this not-so-small group of human beings (one in 10, right?) to treat them differently than other people.

When I say angry mob as above, I mean to convey that public opinion has been and always will be in flux. Perhaps someday, as is my sincere hope, gay people will be regarded in a much better light than they are now by the general electorate of this truly great nation, just as most people have moved on from the notion that African Americans are less than human.

Whether you're on the side that believes that the legalization of gay marriage will contribute to the turd-swirl that exists in our Godless, prudish, anti-family collective mentality that we call Pop Culture, or you believe that legalizing gay marriage will instead make a huge difference in the lives of homosexuals and will not affect the integrity of the nation, the law's the law.

Let us not attack the judges who are there to ensure that the Constitution is not violated, and laws are fully enforced. I laughed at Jon Stewart's mockery of an anti-gay marriage activist's frustration, "Damn those judges! Who are they to.....?"

Christopher Coletta is a UMass Student.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

GARGANO REPLY QUESTIONABLE

We write as the current and a former president of the Graduate Student Senate, to challenge Vice Chancellor Michael Gargano's abuse of FERPA privacy regulations in his zeal to hide public information.

The privacy law known as FERPA protects personal information —personal records, health information, home addresses, grades, and the like. It does not cover aggregate or statistical data, such as the information that SGA President Bustamante and GSS President Strauss have requested.

UMass knows that FERPA doesn't apply to these cases. During the years that we have been here, the administration has repeatedly tried to hide behind FERPA and has repeatedly been instructed by the State of Massachusetts to hand the information over.

In the case of SGA President Bustamante's information request, the State of Massachusetts informed UMass more than two months ago (on Sept. 27) that FERPA is not an issue — the letter is published in the November issue of the Voice. What distinguishes the current situation from previous ones is that the Vice Chancellor is refusing to comply with the State's instructions and is telling lies about the applicability of FERPA.

What is the administration's real reason for withholding public information? We can only assume that it's because of what the data will likely reveal when it finally becomes public: that UMass is becoming a more elitist, less accessible and less diverse place. It was these concerns that motivated the presidents of the SGA and GSS to file the request for information in the first place. At a meeting with the Vice Chancellor after the request was denied, he gave the two student presidents a reason other than FERPA for not providing the information: he said that we would use the data to publicize misleading information.

In other words, the reason for withholding public information is not principled concern about student privacy, but rather fear of the conclusions that we would draw from the data. The University's administration has chosen the path of corporatization in place of diversity and accessibility, and it's not willing to be accountable for its decisions, even if it means withholding public information and then lying about it.

Unfortunately for University administrators, its project of privatization does not shield it from the fact that this is a public university and they are public servants As such, their activities, decisions, policies and statements are a matter of public record and subject to scrutiny by the public. If the information they seek to withhold is damaging to their elitist ambitions, their refusal to follow the laws of the state can only compound their problems.

The information they seek to hide will be made public, sooner or later, but by that time, their credibility will have been seriously damaged, not by the information itself, but by their track record of arrogance, impudence and lies.

Uri Strauss, GSS President
Thomas Taaffe, Former GSS President

ADOPTION OPTIONS

I'm writing in response to Amelia Sabadini's column about adoptive families. Your article was well written and your message was very clear. My heart goes out to your mom and the experiences you both have shared together throughout your lives.

I encourage you to put together a resource book that could be used in trainings of pre-adoptive families through both state and private adoption agencies. If it's possible, you could also give a presentation at a Mapp Training through area DSS offices.

Once you had something in writing, then your knowledge and skills would be available to everyone. There are also a number of publications that would welcome your articles or anything you might write jointly with your mom.

Adoptive Families is a magazine at Jones Library. Other publications and adoptive groups can be found online. I support you in your concerns.

Marge Mills
Adoptive Mom

www.dailycollegian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 2, 2004

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Eve looks for a new gentleman

Original Sin
Eve

I have noticed an ongoing trend with most of the guys I date, and I cannot help but question why no one has kept my interest in over a year. I always end up feeling unfulfilled or void of something essential from each guy, and I think I have finally discovered what it might be.

In simplest terms, I desire a gentleman.

But it is not so simple. By a gentleman, I do not only mean a guy with manners, but someone with maturity, respect, and responsibility for the person he is with. Someone who works ambitiously for a woman he lusts after, and does not relent until he accomplishes this goal. It might sound passé, but I think it is what I secretly long for. It could be that I have made it too easy for some of them. I always seem to rush into a casual relationship before the guy has a chance to woo me with romantic gestures. I also tend to give a wrong impression of what I might really want from someone.

But does anyone know what they really want? I lowered my expectations the day I became single, and most recently decided to raise them due to my frustration with each outcome.

Yet somehow I can only really blame myself for these mishaps. I come across as entirely self-sufficient and capable as a single woman. I regularly refuse help from someone if it is based on a difference in gender, and I live by constantly proving I am as able as any man may be, but I know this will never be true, and I yearn for just one guy to take charge and be that strong, masculine role I seek.

It is exhausting to be the one who makes final decisions, to be the driver, to carry the heaviest bags, and even to pay for my own meals. Isn't it assumed that the guys are supposed to pick up the check on occasion? Since when did they feel it was justified not to spoil a girl they are interested in? I realize money can be a sore subject as a student, but even as little as a coffee would be acceptable.

I guess I crave the gesture more than anything, to feel special, and above all, taken care of. I am allowing myself to admit that I am tired, and it would be nice if just one guy would make life easier.

Sometimes I wonder if these expectations may be too high for some, And I fear there are logical reasons that may determine these communications. Most have been younger in age, and I believe that may be my biggest problem. I want someone with experience, someone with stability, someone I can legally have a drink with, and someone who I can take seriously. Is this why I refuse anything more than a casual fling? Is the answer as simple as age? It would be wrong to say that all young guys are incapable of handling a mature relationship. In certain situations, I have found that they try harder to fulfill my needs, but their reasoning may be stemmed from their subconscious need to compete with my previous experiences with older men. Whatever the case, they somehow fail to act as gentlemen.

As I said before, I do not expect more than what they are able to give. On the other hand, older men can also be frustrating if they feel the need to stay young and irresponsible. I diagnose their fear as the Peter Pan Syndrome.

They act as though they are still enrolled in college and neglect putting any energy into treating a woman with dignity. Shouldn't a man in his late twenties know by now? I have heard that what I seek does exist, but I have not had the opportunity to experience this possibility in years. I have forgotten what it feels like to be treated in ways any woman deserves, and I find it slightly unsettling that this has become a common complaint by most women I know.

I envy those that have a man with these rare characteristics, and I realize there are plenty wonderful gentlemen that I haven't had the chance to meet due to circumstance, but for this moment, I am satisfied with simply being aware of what I should expect from the next guy I meet.

That, I think, is all I need to acknowledge at the moment.

Eve is a Collegian columnist.

U2's album proves better than ever

By Ally Welch
Collegian Correspondent

U2
'How to Dismantle an Atomic Bomb'
Interscope

With over two decades of music, the legendary Irish lads of U2 are at their best once again. From young punks that amazed us with style to mainstream rockers today, U2 continues to put out cool and inspiring music, savoring their old techniques and adding a softer, newer sound. The newly released "How to Dismantle an Atomic Bomb" captures the distinct sound usually heard from the band, only this time it's the most mature and personal side of U2 we've been allowed to hear.

Already debuting at number one in the UK and in Ireland, the album combines old school sounds of the 1987 album "The Joshua Tree" and the smooth slower sounding music from U2's last release "All That You Can't Leave Behind" in 2000. Lead singer Bono's lyrics are powerful and emotion-filled words that take us into a profound state, and The Edge's guitar balances every bittersweet line with a distinct tempo that makes the music just plain good.

Although one of the band's best talents is their ability to reinvent themselves with each new album, perhaps the best quality of "How to Dismantle an Atomic Bomb" is that it isn't a reinvention. The album pulls together all the music that helps define U2 over the years. The first single, "Vertigo" is a track that rocks. As the most energetic track on the album U2 is able to start its music out with a bang, pulling the listener in to hear more.

The energy quickly fades, though, as the following slow songs take us from a high vertigo to a deep mindset with the melancholy track "Sometimes You Can't Make It On Your Own." The song is an emotional tearjerker that leaves you both moved and overwhelmed. The track is a reference to Bono's father who died of cancer in 2001. The song was the one U2 chose to sing at his funeral. The song switches from slow and acoustic to echoing and powerful.

Towards the end we hear Bono belt out the lines "Can you hear me when I sing? You're the reason I sing. You're the reason why the opera is in me." You can both hear and feel the emotion in Bono's voice as he sings as if speaking directly to his father. It's the most personal song yet to be heard from U2.

The album of course contains a song about the two most repeated themes in every U2 album released: war and peace. Back in the early 80s they were ranting about "Bloody Sunday." In the 90s they were promoting peace with "One." Now in 2004, U2 is asking where the love is with the albums fourth track, "Love and Peace or Else." The song is a grungy, in your face piece portraying the frustrations of a world lacking peace. Drummer Larry Mullins gives the background a loud beat while the Edge is sharp, playing a series of notes that create an angry tone that makes the song work.

The other themes contained in the album create a soundtrack to our lives. On the disc we're faced with death and healing, war and peace, and also love and fear. The upbeat song "All Because of You" includes the tender words "You can make me perfect again. All because of you, I am." The guitar in this song has the old school sound old U2 and the upbeat rhythm provides for a feel good love song.

The song that follows, titled "A Man and a Woman," captures the fear involved in love with Bono claiming, "I could never take a chance of losing love to find romance." It attempts to show the distance between a man and a woman through "love and sex and faith and fear."

These issues that everyone can relate to give "Atomic Bomb" a more personal touch, but this is just

See U2 on page 6

There's no joy spending 'Christmas With the Kranks'

By Tammi Munn
Collegian Staff

'Christmas with the Kranks'
Directed by Joe Roth
Starring Tim Allen, Jamie Lee Curtis Revolution
Rated PG
134 mins.
Grade B+

The long lines, cranky people, hours of shopping, wrapping gifts, writing out Christmas cards and the complicated all-day preparation for a holiday feast have replaced the simple Christmas carols, the religious meaning, maybe a meager gift exchange and family as Christmas ideals. Sometimes it is a nice thought to forego all of the madness associated with Christmas and in the film "Christmas with the Kranks" the protagonists have the opportunity to do just that.

Nora Krank (Jamie Lee Curtis) is distraught, with empty nest syndrome, as the Krank daughter, Blair, is headed to the Peace Corps shortly after Thanksgiving. It will be the first Krank Christmas without her and it to the family, it just won't be the same without her. Luther (Tim Allen) is grumpy about how much money was spent on Christmas last year and he comes up with a plan that replaces the typical Krank Christmas with a Caribbean cruise. Nora, despite being a huge fan of the Christmas season, wants to avoid feeling her daughter's absence, and reluctantly agrees to her husband's scheme.

The Kranks become the talk of the town after Luther sends out a memo to his coworkers explaining his Christmas boycott. After Nora refuses to buy Christmas cards, the clerk from the stationary store practically stalks Nora into a restaurant to also ask if she would want to order invitations to the annual Krank Christmas Eve party. When she refuses, she is forced to explain her plans to her friends as shock falls over the restaurant.

The neighbors, one of whom is played by Dan Akroyd, are having trouble understanding the crazy Kranks and their anti-Christmas ways.

They won't participate in anything that the neighborhood is involved in, including putting up a giant Frosty snowman on the roof, which is a tradition that everyone in the neighborhood practices. The neighborhood kids chant, "Free Frosty!" as they make prank phone calls to the Kranks. How truly strange it is indeed for a couple to decide to go on a cruise for Christmas because their daughter is away for the first time. How could they be so selfish? The mere fact that the neighbors care so much about the lives of the Kranks, so much as they would harass the poor couple is quite outlandish.

Tim Allen who should, after this film, hold the title of "Mr. Christmas," seemed like a very unlikely actor to play the role of the stuffy Luther Krank who suddenly breaks out of his own little world to boycott Christmas.

At first it doesn't look like Allen is going to pull off the role, but as the film continues, he does fit the role surprisingly well. It is just a little unnerving at times to think of "The Santa Clause" as Luther Krank who wants nothing to do with Christmas.

At the beginning of the film, Curtis and Allen lack the chemistry that a couple with a college-aged daughter should have. The characters have been together many years and they should know each other's quirks, but Curtis and Allen fail to let the jokes happen smoothly and it seems like their exchanges are forced.

The film is based on John Grisham's book, "Skipping Christmas." Grisham wrote a brilliant book filled with wittiness and humorous exchanges and scenarios between the Krank couple. Grisham even writes about the neighbors being obsessive over the Kranks, but it works in that medium. The book doesn't translate well into film. The jokes from his book are stale in the film, but it does have a few of its own visually hysterical moments. Most that are in both the book and the film seem overemphasized in the film to try to make a roaring comedy, but it is too campy and it fails miserably at its attempt to be a fun holiday.

Brian Jonestown Massacre looks back

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

The Brian Jonestown Massacre is, perhaps, the greatest hidden gem in modern American music. The band, led by mastermind Anton Newcombe, has released over 10 albums in about 10 years to much acclaim, but never hit the mainstream. There are countless reasons for this: maybe the BJTM is simply too good and people just want their watered down commercialized music, maybe the band was never promoted enough, maybe Newcombe and his band's infamous antics and erratic behavior (including fistfights on stage and an ever rotating lineup) have scared people away from them. Whatever may be the explanation, based on sheer talent, originality, and musical proficiency the BJTM should be the biggest band in the world.

Newcombe and his band mates mix influences of bands from The Rolling Stones, The Beatles, The Velvet Underground, My Bloody Valentine and far more (including a hefty dose of '60s psychedelica) to create a swirling, almost magical, sound that brings the listener back in time while pushing rock music forward, to its very limits. Newcombe can play practically any instrument laid in front of him and often uses that, and his innate musical talent and ability, to erase any boundaries put in front of him. Rock music? Newcombe's mastered it. Psychedelica? Newcombe's all over it. Folk? Newcombe tackles it with ease. Garage rock? Newcombe flipped the genre inside and out before the White Stripes recorded a note.

Newcombe is even heavily invested in involving world music influences, something you don't see too often in Western rock. Newcombe has a firm grasp on his musical flair and builds complexly, deeply arranged songs and other tracks that are based around one or two chords — they all come out just as brilliant. Not only are Newcombe's songs astounding but, he is also prolific. He released three albums in a year and made one album, "Thank God for Mental Illness" while the rest of his band was out getting drugs.

Earlier this year Newcombe and the BJTM were the focus of a long-in-the-works documentary called "Dig" which tracks the careers, friendship, and rivalry of the band and The Dandy Warhols. The Warhols, much more commercial and poppy then the BJTM, hit the big time, getting signed to Capitol Records and selling tons of records (especially overseas where the band are huge stars) while BJTM battled drug addiction, inter-band strife, and an industry that wants money, not art. However the recent release of the documentary, which won awards at Sundance and many other film festivals and has been getting high critical marks across the world, seems to be a blessing in disguise for BJTM. Though Newcombe has publicly stated that he feels the "Dig" is exploitative and inaccurate, there are many new people who are now discovering his music everyday through the film.

Now Newcombe's current label, Tee Pee Records, has taken it upon themselves to release a packed two-disc retrospective, featuring many songs that are prominently featured in "Dig," along with other fan and band favorites. "Tepid Peppermint Wonderland" features tracks from all of the BJTM's many releases, excluding "Strung Out On Heaven" their one foray into major-indie territory (it was released on TVT records), along with a few unreleased and live tracks.

The songs demonstrate the band's abilities to tackle a great number of different types of music, and showcases the band's distinctive sound. The opener, "All Around You," is a Sgt. Pepper'sesque intro taken from "Their Satanic Majesties' Second Request" and shows the band at perhaps their most bizarre. Tracks like "Open Heart Surgery" showcases the band's pop-pier side and "Sailor" shows their lush, '60s-inspired sensibility.

Brian Jonestown Massacre
"Tepid Peppermint Wonderland: A Retrospective"
Tee Pee Records

"#1 Hit Jam" shows that the band can be in top form even at their simplest, with a basic chord progression and only two words in the whole song ("Hey" and finally "You"). "Not If You Were The Last Dandy On Earth" is a playfully mocking song about the band's newly successful friends (it was written after hearing the band's first single, the super-poppy "Not If You Were The Last Junkie On Earth").

Newcombe is notoriously press-shy, especially after being burned so many times by so-called 'journalists' who portray the BJTM as rowdy, violent, and unable to pull themselves together. Sit Newcombe down and treat him with respect and he'll do the same to you, and reveal himself to be as interesting and intelligent as his music would suggest. Newcombe and the band are currently working on their next album, "We Are The Radio", and Newcombe took some time out to do an email interview, "I don't feel it is worth my time to be chained to a phone for interviews," Newcombe explains, with the Collegian.

Newcombe does have one reputation that he definitely lives up to. He is above all, an artist. Money seems to be his least concern, which makes it curious that his band would release a retrospective. However, Newcombe explains that it was his label's doing.

"Teepee wanted to use the interest in [Dig] to expose more people to our music," and then parenthetically suggested, "the cash in?" Newcombe also says he had nothing to do with organizing the 38 song track list or compiling the extensive liner notes.

"I'm glad that people like the music," Newcombe writes, expressing his feelings about the success of "Dig," though he still doesn't see the film as a positive product. "I don't want to edit anything [to make the movie more fair], I just think the filmmakers are scumbags. Why should I care? They are trying to sell a product, plain and simple, they don't care about facts or people's feelings."

Newcombe doesn't seem as upset with the former band members, and the Dandy Warhols, who have been promoting the film like mad since it came out. "I think people like being in the lime-light," he writes, "I think people like free airplane trips. I don't care about what they do. 15 minutes, right?"

Newcombe also appears to be just as indifferent about the current state of music. While most artists want to see the industry and the corporations tumble, Newcombe is genuinely invested in only his own work and absolutely doesn't care about the business. Newcombe is currently offering up the band's entire catalogue in free mp3s on the bands website.

"I think you need to look at the facts," Newcombe states, "people are sheep. They really like the music(?), fassion [sic], and styles created by these corporations. Why should that be changed? It has been proven by scientists that only one in ten-thousand people possess musical aptitude. That means is able to hear music as it really is. Let sleeping dogs lie." He goes on to state, "It's a pretty sad world at this point. I don't have much faith in the medium. There are so many distractions in this day and age."

While some critics and music fans hail bands like The Strokes and The White Stripes as a real return to rock's pure roots, Newcombe doesn't really see it that way.

"The proof is in the pudding. I see both of those groups as one trick ponies. I'm into wild horses, bucking broncos etc. I'm sure you get my drift."

And for those that still don't quite get Newcombe's drift, "Tepid Peppermint Wonderland" is sure to spell it out. When a band has as large a catalogue as the BJTM it can be very hard to distill it down to a few select songs but whoever was in charge of this retrospective seemed to nail it on the head. For anyone that is curious about the BJTM or anyone that wants to become really excited by real, pure music again "Tepid Peppermint Wonderland" is a must-have; a true chronicle of one of modern music's few true artists and, no exaggeration, geniuses.

King Tut's treasures take trip to Los Angeles County Art Museum

By Laura Wides
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — The treasures of King Tut will go on display in this country for the first time in a quarter century in an exhibit featuring the ancient ruler's gold crown, carved dagger and a massive gold and cloisonn necklace.

"Tutankhamun and the Golden Age of the Pharaoh" will include about 130 of the 5,000 Egyptian artifacts found in King Tut's tomb. The last time a similar exhibit toured the country, in 1976-1979, 55 items were displayed.

"Now Tutankhamun is back, giving a new generation the chance to learn firsthand about the life and magic of this ancient monarch," Zahi Hawass, secretary general of Egypt's Supreme Council of Antiquities, said.

King Tut ascended to the throne at about age 8 and died around 1323 B.C. at 17. Some archaeologists have speculated that he was murdered because a 1968 X-ray found bone fragments in his skull.

Hawass worked with National Geographic to obtain permission from the Egyptian parliament to display the artifacts. Money raised will help pay for the country's massive new archaeology museum, a children's museum and for preservation of the Pyramids, Sphinx and other national treasures.

The decision to allow the exhibit to travel marked the reversal of a policy set in the 1980s that confined most of the objects to Egypt, after several pieces were damaged during an international tour.

Hawass said he hoped the show would provide understanding of ancient Egypt while improving ties between that country and the United States.

The exhibit, which has already been staged in Germany and Switzerland, will make its U.S. debut at the Los Angeles County Museum of Art on June 16 and run through Nov. 15. It will feature displays of gold objects along with exhibits on death and the beyond and an interactive room on the discovery of King Tut's tomb.

The exhibition will travel to the Museum of Art in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., in December 2005, Chicago's Field Museum in May 2006 and a fourth museum yet to be identified. It will then head to London's Dome of the Millennium. Hawass said negotiations are underway with Japan to show the exhibit.

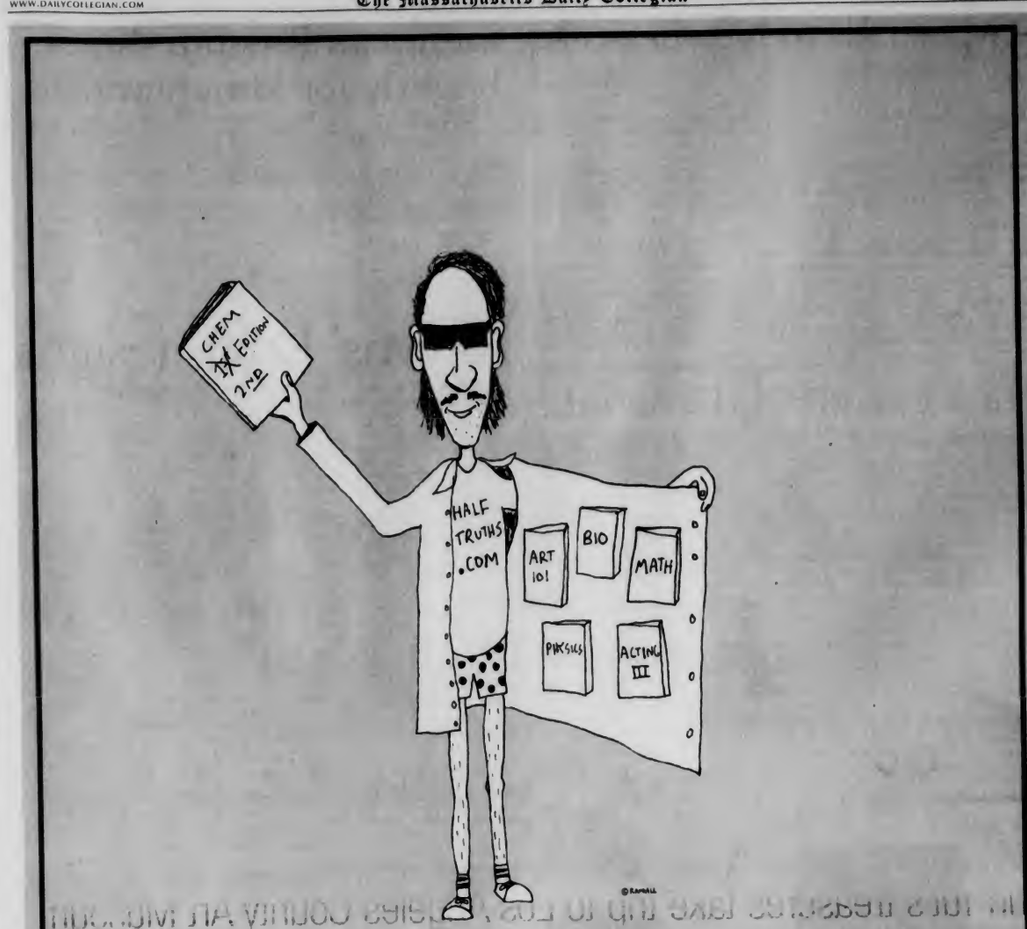
Panda East 熊国
Fine Chinese & Japanese Cuisine
Voted best Chinese food by UMass students!
Open Hours:
Mon - Thur: 11:30am - 10:00pm
Fri & Sat: 11:30am - 11:00pm
Sunday: 12pm-10pm
Delivery: 413.549.0077
Telephone: 413.256.8923
413.256.8924
We accept OCMP and all major credit cards.
We serve Chinese and Japanese food and also feature a sushi bar.

U2 releases best album to date

U2 from page 5

one of the many qualities of the album. The combination of old and new sounds creates a mix that's exciting to listen to. In "City of Blinding Lights," the quick, clean strumming of Edge's guitar is similar to the classic U2 hit "Where the Streets have no Name" which made The Joshua Tree so distinguished. The instrumental bridge in Vertigo has similar chords to the one in "Pride."

Like any album however, "Atomic Bomb" does have its flaws. With a softer and slower tone to the music it's easy to get bored with it unless you really listen to the lyrics. Those used to the faster, more brash side of U2 are likely to be disappointed. The music does grow on you quickly, because even with a softer sound the music is still U2, and it is still good. The lyrics are sung with heart and easy to relate to.



U2's personal style puts you right in the minds of the long time musicians who have experienced love, death, pain, and triumph. Their discrete sound remains, and now more than 20 years after their first album are U2 fans still able to enjoy it. Their "Atomic Bomb" leaves you speechless, thoughtful, emotional, and joyful, as many U2's albums do. Prepare to be swept up in their "vertigo."

THE HARP
The People's Pint Night
Thursday, December 2nd 9pm till closing
$3.00 PINTS! No Cover $3.00 PINTS!
Live Music
Poet's Seat Ale & Extra Ordinary Golden Ale
Give-aways & Prizes
Free Peoples Pint Glass Promo
Free T-shirt Drawing
The Harp is located at 163 sunderland Rd. in N. Amherst
For Directions call: (413) 548-6900

ugg...so many!
ZANNA
Clothing, Shoes and Accessories for Women.
downtown Amherst

If you write for Arts, you can work for this guy:
Call 545-1361 or email arts@daily collegian.com

GET A GREAT PRICE ON THE WRONG BOOK.
iT WON'T HELP YOU PASS YOUR CLASS, BUT THiNK OF THE MONEY YOU'LL SAVE!
At your campus bookstore we work directly with your professors to ensure we only order the exact books they plan on using. Buy your books somewhere else and you may or may not get what you're really after. And at efollett.com you can order your books online and pick them up in store, so there's no waiting or shipping to pay. So if you're looking for a deal, now you know where to look.
Your campus bookstore has the right book
UMASS AMHERST
University Store and Textbook Annex
Phone: (413)545-2619
efollett.com ONLINE. ON CAMPUS.

UMass falls to Northeastern

MEN'S HOOPS from page 10

it," Lappas said. "I think he's made more passes out of the post this year in three games then he made in the entire year last year."

UMass took its first lead of the game at 14:14 in the second half when Maxwell hit a three while getting fouled. He missed the free throw, but his shot put the Minutemen up 55-52, one of eight lead changes in the half.

The Huskies have been led by Barea and swing guard Marcus Barnes. Over the course of the season, this scoring duo has put up close to 50 points per contest. Last night was just another day in the office as they put up 47 between them, a statistic that didn't sway Anderson.

"Barnes takes 22 shots a game, Barea takes the rest of the shots, I mean we knew they were going to score," Anderson said. "We just wanted to make them shoot bad, like Barnes went 5-for-16, that's alright."

If there was any indication that Northeastern was ready to impose its game on UMass, it came with the first play of the game. Lasme won the tip off sending the ball to Bowers, who had the ball stolen from him by Barnes, who went to score the first points of the contest.

The Huskies never trailed in the first half, and shut down the Minutemen starting five. It wasn't until a youthful lineup, including Jeff 'Big Deli' Salovski and Lawrence Carrier, that UMass made an actual run.

Carrier went four-for-seven in the half, including two-for-three behind the arch, but as it went all night for the Minutemen, each run was countered by the sharp-shooting Huskies, who forced an incredible 12 first half turnovers.

The first half ended similar to how it began, with Northeastern leading the way.

With 12 seconds left, Artie Bowers scored a layup, putting the score at 43-37 in favor of the Huskies. On the ensuing play Barea took the ball up the court, squared up from roughly seven feet outside the arch and drained a three with time expiring. He crossed his arms over his chest making, sending the signal to the UMass student section.

Huskies control the action

NORTHEASTERN from page 10

for final waning seconds of the half, a 5-foot-10 point guard from Puerto Rico reminded them who was truly in charge.

"They went out and played their game," UMass coach Steve Lappas said. "They did what they wanted to do, and made us play their type of game. We needed to be able to inflict our will on them, and they wouldn't let us do that."

Barea, a junior point guard who started all 28 games that he has appeared in as a sophomore for NU, was very much a known commodity for UMass coming into last night's action, as was backcourt mate Marcus Barnes, a transfer from Miami. Averaging a combined 50 points between them in the Huskies first three games, the explosive pair accounted for 47 of the Huskies 84 points in the win, which didn't come as a surprise to head coach Steve Lappas after the fourth-year UMass bench boss had been singing the praises of the pair all week.

What did surprise Lappas, however, were the struggles his group experienced on offense — much of which was brought on by the relentless half-court man-to-man defense the Huskies employed. Knowing UMass was a slow-down team that relied on dumping the ball into the post to best utilize star forward Rashaun Freeman, the Huskies stepped up the pace from the game's first possession.

"They took us out of our game on offense," senior point guard Anthony Anderson said. "They forced us to play a quick game, and kept us from slowing things down and working for a good shot. They pressured the ball and took away the first pass that we use to get in the offense, forcing us to take quick shots and bad shots."

The Huskies pressured the ball, pressured away from the ball and forced quick shots. They stepped into the passing lines, battled hard for loose balls and caught UMass' big men not boxing out on numerous occasions. They wanted to run, and did everything they could to force UMass to run with them.

The end result? UMass finished the game with just one point over the final six-plus minutes, and guards Maurice Maxwell, Chris Chadwick and Art Bowers combined to shoot 6-29 from the floor, including 1-10 from beyond the arc. Additionally, the Huskies forced 19 turnovers and recorded 13 steals and generally created havoc and a sense of recklessness in a usually calm and collected Minuteman offense.

This is not the note this UMass team wanted to end on before beginning a week in which it will face No. 25 Gonzaga, defending National Champion Connecticut and Miami.

"I am very concerned [about the struggles on offense," Lappas said. "It's something we need to address, and something we need to fix. This will be a good learning experience for us, and hopefully we'll be able to build on this as we move along."

Freshman Rosanio shines brightly for Minutewomen

ROSANIO from page 10

where she is right now," sophomore forward Tamara Tatham said. "She's finishing, she's working hard in practice, she's working hard in the games. That's why whatever's coming to her is coming to her. I'm happy for her."

Those rights include racking up Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week honors this week, and being named Dinn Brothers/ UMass Athlete of the Week after averaging 14.5 points, three rebounds and two assists last week in their two-game stretch against Holy Cross and that other rival, twentieth-ranked Boston College.

Rosanio is currently the only Minutewoman averaging in double figures, with a team-high 10.8 per game.

"It feels like a good fit. I think we're all still getting used to playing with each other," she said. "It's only our fourth game, and I think we're jelling pretty good out there on the court. I think by the time we get to [the A-10] season, we'll be in good shape."

So what does she see her role as in UMass' matchup at Providence College?

"I don't know. I just hope we can get a win, and that our offense comes and our defense remains strong. I hope we can put the ball in the basket more than they do."

Browns' Davis resigns

BEREA, Ohio — Cleveland Browns coach Butch Davis resigned under pressure, leaving a last-place team with five games left in the season. The Browns (3-8) dropped their fifth straight game on Sunday, 58-48 at Cincinnati. The team went 24-36 and made the playoffs just once in Davis' four seasons as head coach.

Offensive coordinator Terry Robiskie will coach the Browns for the rest of the season.

TAMPA, Fla. (AP) — The Tampa Bay Buccaneers released struggling kicker Martin Gramatica and replaced him with Arena Football League kicker Jay Taylor.

The team's career scoring leader missed three field goals in Sunday's 21-14 loss at Carolina and was 11-for-19 overall this season. Gramatica missed seven of his last nine attempts and had not made a field goal over 22 yards since Oct. 10.

COLLEGE FOOTBALL

SOUTH BEND, Ind. (AP) — Coach Tyrone Willingham was fired by Notre Dame after three seasons. Willingham went 21-15, including 6-5 this season. The Fighting Irish lost 41-10 to No. 1 Southern California on Saturday.

Players are considering whether to play in the Insight Bowl on Dec. 28. Athletic director Kevin White said he didn't know who would coach the game. Notre Dame accepted the invitation to the game on Sunday.

BOSTON (AP) — Boston College will play North Carolina in the Continental Tire Bowl on Dec. 30 in Charlotte, N.C.

The Eagles would have gone to a Bowl Championship Series game with a win last Saturday against underdog Syracuse. A surprising 43-17 loss at home knocked the Eagles out of the BCS and the AP Top 25.

Also:

— Georgia accepted a bid to play Wisconsin in the Outback Bowl on New Year's Day in Tampa, Fla.

— Florida State formally accepted its bid to play in the Gator Bowl on Jan. 1 against West Virginia.

— Boise State will play Louisville in the Liberty Bowl on Dec. 31.

— New Mexico will face Navy in the Emerald Bowl on Dec. 30.

— Connecticut accepted a bid to play in the Motor City Bowl on Dec. 27. It's the Huskies' first post-season appearance as a Division I-A team.

— Marshall was invited to the Fort Worth Bowl against Cincinnati on Dec. 23.

— Bowling Green will play Memphis in the GMAC Bowl on Dec. 22.

— Georgia Tech accepted an offer to play in Champs Sports Bowl on Dec. 21.

— Wyoming is headed to the Las Vegas Bowl on Dec. 22.

BASKETBALL

ATLANTA (AP) — The NBA will set new security guidelines for its arenas, exerting more authority over a matter previously left to individual teams, commissioner David Stern said.

Stern said the Nov. 19 Pacers-Pistons brawl that spilled into the stands and led to three Indiana players being suspended for 25 or more games — including the season-long penalty for Ron Artest — exposed current policies as inadequate.

In his first public comments on the brawl since announcing the suspensions, Stern said the new guidelines will be issued in early January.

NEW YORK (AP) — Hornets center Jamaal Magloire was fined $7,500 by the NBA for throwing a basketball at Golden State's Mike Dunleavy in a game last week.

BASEBALL

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — Free agent Armando Benitez and the San Francisco Giants agreed to a $21.5 million, three-year contract. Benitez saved an NL-leading 47 games in 51 chances and lead major league relievers with a 1.29 ERA for the Florida Marlins this year.

WASHINGTON (AP) — The District of Columbia Council approved financing a ballpark for the Washington-bound Expos after voting to cap funding at $630 million. The council approved the plan 6-4 with three members, including Chair Linda W. Cropp, voting present. The measure must be approved a second time to become law.

The deal signed in September by the Expos and Washington Mayor Anthony A. Williams did not contain a cap. Major League Baseball had not yet received the text of Cropp's amendment and would wait until seeing the exact wording before responding.

SWIMMING

SALISBURY, Md. (AP) — Michael Phelps' drunken driving trial was set for Dec. 29. Phelps, 19, who won eight medals at the Athens Olympics, was stopped by a state trooper on Nov. 4 for running a stop sign in Salisbury. Phelps acknowledged shortly after his arrest that he made a mistake. Maryland's drinking age is 21.

SOCCER

ZURICH, Switzerland (AP) — The United States will open the final round of 2006 World Cup qualifying with games at Trinidad and Tobago in February and at Mexico in March.

The Americans, trying to reach their fifth consecutive World Cup, close out the 10-game final round of the North and Central American and Caribbean region in October at home against Panama.

The draw for the final was conducted by FIFA, soccer's governing body.

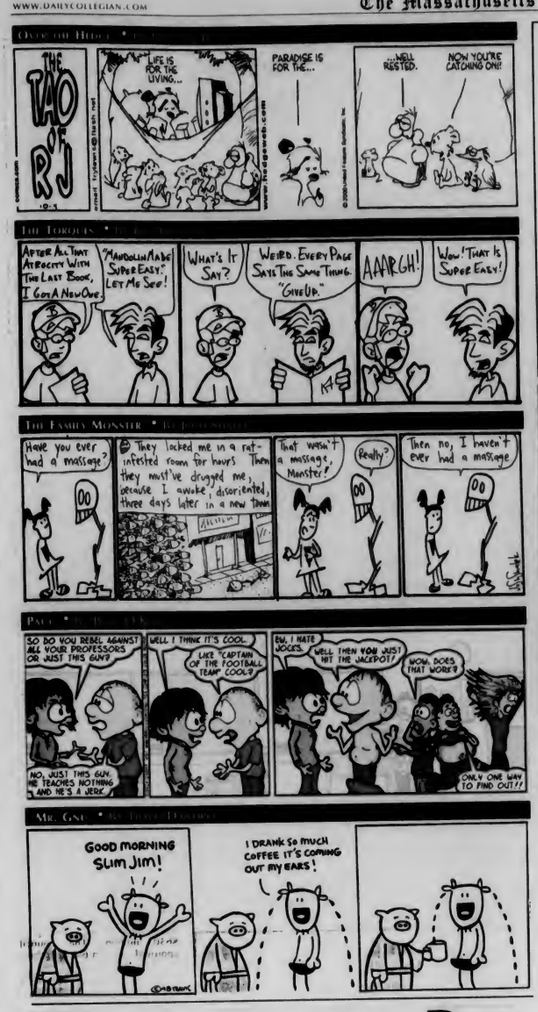
The top three teams in the six-nation group qualify for the 32-country field at the World Cup tournament in Germany. The fourth-place team will play the No. 5 nation in Asia in a home-and-home playoff for another berth.

CYCLING

GENEVA (AP) — Olympic gold medalist Tyler Hamilton was fired by his cycling team two months after testing positive for blood doping. The Swiss-based International Cycling Union, or UCI, said the Phonak team told the governing body that the American rider's contract was terminated last week.

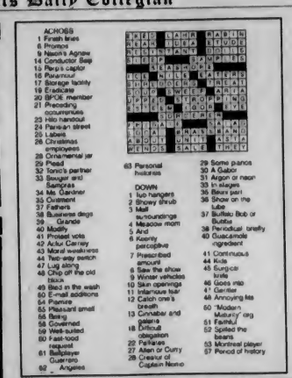
Hamilton confirmed the dismissal in a statement on his Web site.

Hamilton tested positive for an illegal blood transfusion at the Spanish Vuelta in September and plans to contest the results. He faces a possible two-year ban if found guilty.

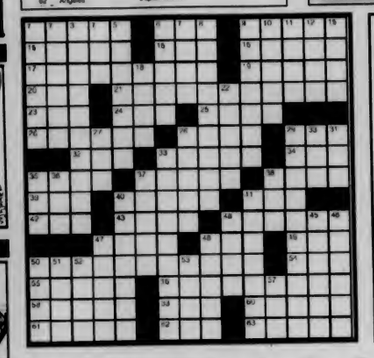


Amherst Computerworks, Inc.
PC & Laptop Sales/Service/Repair 5-College Certified Vendor
Laptop & LCD Projector Rentals
Repairing Macs and all brands of PC's
Selling new Custom desktop & laptop PC's
9 East Pleasant St. Amherst, MA 01002
Phone: (413) 548-8900
Fax: (413) 548-8030
Est. 1990 aci@acipc.com

News Sports Entertainment Jobs Autos Real Estate Contests Forums



THE CASINO VALUE PACKAGE CONTEST
Log on to MassLive.com/contests and enter to win a pair of round trip tickets to Foxwoods and 2 Casino Value Packages each worth $30.00 which includes $10 food coupon and full buffet or match play and $20.00 Keno.
mass live.com
MassLive.com is the online home of The Republican.
SPONSORED BY Peter Pan Bus Lines The People Professionals



Quote of the Day

"The Grinch hated Christmas — the whole Christmas season. Oh please don't ask why, no one quite knows the reason. It could be, perhaps, that his shoes were too tight. Or maybe his head wasn't screwed on quite right. But I think that the best reason of all may have been that his heart was two sizes too small."

-How the Grinch Stole Christmas

Amherst Brewing Company
The place where there's always fun and entertainment happening!
December 2nd Karaoke w/ Cloud Nine Productions
December 4th Population You Jazz-Rock Fusion
December 5th Amherst Jazz Orchestra 8:30-11PM
NFL Football on a 51" Wide Screen TV with free buffet & raffle at halftime www.amherstbrewing.com
Live Music, Food Specials & Happy Hour

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
Now accepting applications for:
Assistant Business Manager
For the Spring 2005 semester
Please call 545-3500 or stop by. Applications are due Dec. 7th @ 4P.M.

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You are just getting one thing right after another. Keep it up.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Double check your work before you pass it in. There is a bad mistake somewhere in it.

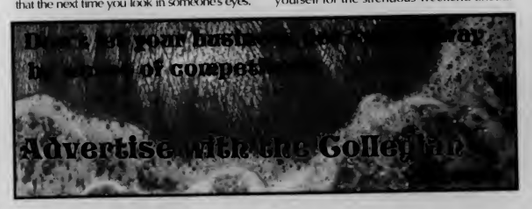
aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Today you're going to catch one of you all-time favorite movies on TV.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
It's time you took a trip to Yankee Candle for a smell-a-thon.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
You can't avoid calling your mom back forever. You might as well do it now.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Eyes are the window to the soul. Think about that the next time you look in someone's eyes.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You should do something creative in your room. It's lacking something.



virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Your secret is out. The best thing for you to do is confess.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Do a little yoga to unwind before you attempt any more work.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You truly have an oral fixation. Time to slow down with the gum.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You deserve a little respect. That's right. Just a little respect.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You had better be mentally preparing yourself for the strenuous weekend ahead.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Linguistics Department seeks native speakers of Arabic (preferably Egyptian Arabic) and Singapore English for speech experiments. Experiments last about 1 hour w/participants paid $8/hr. Arabic speakers contact kawahara@linguist.umass.edu; Singapore English speakers contact mwolf@linguist.umass.edu

APARTMENT FOR RENT

One bedroom apartment for rent. Puffton Village. Starting in January. 765/month. Heat and hot water included. Call 978-502-9036

APARTMENT FOR RENT

2 Bedroom 2 Bathroom Lease from Jan-Aug $1,100/Month, Utilities included Contact Jenna @ 917-753-3591

Need an Apt. for 2nd Semester? Short Term Leases, Free Heat, Huge Bedrooms Call The Boulders 256-8534

Brandywine Apts. 1 Bedroom units Available Jan 1, 2005 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com Stop by or call 549-0600

COMPUTERS

Pentium Laptop $99- Pentium III Desktop $99- 413-584-8857

EMPLOYMENT

Student to Assist Local Homeowner. Yardwork + moving furniture $10.00hr Call Fred 413-734-0526

Need money for the Holidays? Local moving company looking for mature responsible individuals to work between Thanksgiving and Christmas, and after. Part time hours available. Call 584-4746

"Bartending" $300/Day Potential. No Experience Nesc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

EMPLOYMENT

Winter Break Employment at the Boston University Bookstore. Many temp jobs available! Kenmore Square location. Applications accepted Dec. 7 & 8 at the UMass Campus Center Concourse or email your resume to bnhmnres@bu.edu

ENTERTAINMENT

DJ for hire Mission 101 Ent. Contact Fredy at 413-687-3849

FOR SALE

MP3 $50 Avon Special MP3 & 100's of gifts under $10. Buy or Sell Kat ISR 413-585-1581.

ROOMMATE WANTED

325/month inclusive call 413-775-9997

SERVICES

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house Certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

SERVICES

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

TRAVEL

1SPRING BREAK Largest selection of Destinations, including Cruises! VIP Club Parties & FREE trips. Epicurean Tours 1-800-231-4-FUN www.BREAKNOW.com

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, Florida. Campus Reps Wanted! Free Meals & Parties! 1-800-234-7007 endlesssummertours.com

TRAVEL

Spring Break Bahamas Celebrity Party Cruise! 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Nassau, Jamaica, From $459! Panama City & Daytona $159! www.SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Spring Break 2005- Travel with STS, America's #1 Student Tour Operator to Jamaica, Cancun, Acapulco, Bahamas and Florida. Now hiring on-campus reps. Call for group discounts. Information/Reservations 1-800-648-4849 or www.ststravel.com

TRAVEL

StudentCity.com The Ultimate Spring Break Experience. 1-888-SpringBreak, or www.StudentCity.com to reserve today.

SPRING BREAK '05
SAVE $100 PER ROOM
Clip & Send or Use Code: PRIMIX Online cannot be combined with any other offer
$100 off based on quad room. Only valid for trips with airfare. Expires 1/2005
1-800-426-7710

WANTED

Snowboard events intern $50/day stipend. For job description email jfriends@deerfield.edu

Place your own classified: Call our business office @ 545-3500.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 2, 2004

SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Same old, same old

Once again, UMass falls to lesser foe

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

Northeastern point guard Jose Juan Barea clenched his fist, holding the ball under his other arm. Barea had just been intentionally fouled with 57.7 seconds left, and he knew his team had pulled off an upset.

Northeastern	84
UMass	68

The Massachusetts men's basketball team didn't score a basket for the final six minutes of the game, missing every one of its final eight shots, en route to an 84-68 loss to the cross-state Huskies.

With 6:23 remaining in the game, Viggiano broke through Northeastern defenders and netted a lay-up, putting the Maroon and White up 67-64. NU forward Aaron Davis hit a wide-open three pointer on the ensuing possession and the Huskies never looked back.

UMass coach Steve Lappas saw the game as a series of offensive flaws, which let Northeastern take over the game.

"We lost a game because of the way we played on offense," Lappas said. "We certainly had some defensive lapses, but that game was lost because of the way we allowed the tempo to be played in the game, and that's what was disappointing."

After Davis' three, Barea, who scored a team-high 24 points, scored back-to-back baskets. Not to be denied, Davis received the ball again and nailed another three-pointer, this time assisted by Barea who had nine on the evening. The basket put the Huskies up 74-67.

UMass captain Anthony Anderson attributed the second half collapse to the tenacity of the restricting Northeastern defense. For most of the half, the Huskies successfully denied the ball to sophomore Rashaun Freeman, which opened up shots for the Minutemen guards.

Even with the open looks, UMass was already playing off balance.

"They wanted it more than us. They basically made us offense faster than we wanted to play offense. They just made us do what we didn't want to do," Anderson said. "Even in practice, when the other team is playing that defense, it was kind of hard to get the offense going."

Even though the Huskies put on emphasis on guarding the post, the Minutemen used Stephane Lasme and Freeman to come out fast into the second half.

Freeman, who scored a team-high 18 points, found Lasme on consecutive possessions, both resulting in two-handed dunks, leaving the score at 47-41 in favor of Northeastern. Freeman was double or triple teamed for most of the game and only used Lasme as an option twice. Otherwise, he was trapped, or forced into one of his three turnovers.

"Ray is still learning about how to deal with making quick decisions and getting double teamed, there's no doubt about

See MEN'S HOOPS on page 8

MATTHEW REISS/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore guard Art Bowers, shown driving to the hoop during a win over Birmingham Southern, struggled offensively once again for the Minutemen, scoring six points.

Northeastern did what it came to do

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

If the Massachusetts men's basketball team needed a reminder of what kind of trouble it was up against Northeastern last night, then Jose Juan Barea took it upon himself to make it abundantly clear just before the first half expired.

Holding a six-point lead after responding to an 11-0 UMass run with a 10-0 run of their own, the Huskies appeared content to head into halftime with a two-possession lead. Barea, Northeastern's explosive point guard who unofficially ranked first nationally in scoring average entering play, slowly sauntered over half court with the ball as the clock wound down under five seconds, not appearing to realize that he was quickly running out of time. Then, without the slightest hesitation, Barea set his feet at the far right end of the Mullins Center's half-court logo, cocked his shooting arm under the ball, and showed perfect form in firing a 30-plus foot trey that hit only twine.

It happened so fast that those in attendance who looked away for a split second may have missed the only shot buried from that distance all season, not to mention the fact that the Minutemen were now in a nine point hole.

Despite the fact that UMass fought back almost immediately in the second half and even enjoyed the lead for a portion of the frame, it was game, set and match at that very moment, because with that shot, Barea exemplified what Huskies came to Amherst to do in their game with the Minutemen: dictate the flow of play from whistle to whistle on both ends.

Northeastern did what it wanted, when it wanted and forced UMass into following suit. Yet just when the Minutemen thought it was safe to stop resisting; to let their guard down

See NORTHEASTERN on page 8

COLLEGIAN FILE PHOTO

One for the road

Senior guard Monique Govan and the Minutewomen downed Providence 53-39 in Providence, R.I. to move to 2-3 on the season. Junior point guard Katie Nelson lead all scorers with 13 points, while the Lady Friars' 39 points marks the lowest point total for a UMass opponent since December 13, 2000.

Without a true role, Rosanio starts fast for Minutewomen

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

When asked by a reporter after last Saturday's loss to Boston College on what she thinks her role on the team is, freshman Pam Rosanio bursts out with giggles.

Almost instinctually, "I don't know" is the first thing that rolls off her tongue. After some pause and elaboration on what she just said, she decides to ask the reporter to clarify. Her role? "I guess I'm a scorer, and..." More pause, followed by a burst of laughter.

"Don't know, sorry!"

This is ironic because the way she has fit into this team is no laughing matter. From the moment she stepped on the court donning the Maroon and White, the eighteen-year-old shooting guard out of Southampton, P.A. has been absolutely lights out for the Minutewomen.

One could start with her preseason debut, in which she was second in scoring on the night for the Minutewomen with 11 points — one point behind senior forward Brooke Campbell — in the 80-52 thrashing of the NWBL All-Stars. Or perhaps one ought to jump ahead to the regular season's opening weekend, when she once again dropped 11, including a four-for-eight night from the floor, three rebounds and a block to lead all scorers in her regular season debut.

Maybe even Nov. 23's contest with host Holy Cross, where her layup with 6.7 seconds was the game winner as the Minutewomen went to win 61-60 in nail-biting fashion, effectively hurling gasoline into the fire that is the growing rivalry between these two intra-state nemeses. Whatever the case may be, there's no doubting that there is something special about coaching this player.

"She's very coachable, somebody that wants to grow," coach Marnie Dacko said. "She's somebody who can take criticism and try to improve, somebody who really believes in a Team First motto, and that's great."

But it's proven to be more than great. It's a trait that everyone can soak up and use in their style of game.

"I wish that everybody would react like she does," Dacko said. "I think that can be contagious right now because Pam has had successes. She's got more of a confidence and I think others can look at that and start building up confidence themselves too."

A four-year letterwinner at Archbishop Wood High School in Warminster, Pa., Rosanio was a three-time member of the All-Philadelphia Catholic League team. When she closed out her senior year, when she averaged 20 points, six rebounds, three assists and two steals a game, she came away with a piece of Vikings history as the all-time leading scorer with 1,417 career points. And yes, that includes boys too.

Nonetheless, the Phila-delphian was one of more heavily-scouted players by Dacko and assistant Kia Damon, who began looking into Rosanio during her junior year. The five-foot-ten guard was one of the first recruits Dacko landed last year, and all those weekly phone calls have paid off. She's been reaping the benefits of landing Pam ever since.

"She deserves the right to be

See ROSANIO on page 8

Pedro mulls offer from New York Mets

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK — With an offer in hand from the New York Mets, Pedro Martinez will wait to see what the New York Yankees do before deciding where he'll play next year.

The free-agent ace isn't close to making a decision on where to sign, a person close to Martinez said Tuesday on condition of anonymity.

Martinez is likely to wait until the Yankees determine their level of interest, which could hinge on whether they acquire Randy Johnson from Arizona in a trade that could send Javier Vazquez to the Diamondbacks.

The Mets, trying to make a splash in the free-agent market, offered a $37.5 million, three-year contract last weekend, an agent with knowledge of the proposal said, also on condition of anonymity. The offer contains an option for a fourth season that could make the deal worth $50 million over four years, the agent said.

Boston has offered a two-year deal to retain Martinez and must decide by Dec. 7 whether to offer salary arbitration, which would extend the window for the World Series champion Red Sox to re-sign him until Jan. 8.

Martinez's agent, Fernando Cuza, would not comment on the Mets' proposal, which was first reported Tuesday in several New York and Boston newspapers. New Mets general manager Omar Minaya declined comment.

Yankees owner George Steinbrenner met with Martinez in Tampa, Fla., on Nov. 18, and Martinez also met in Florida with New York third baseman Alex Rodriguez.

But the Yankees' primary interest in recent days appears to be Johnson, the 41-year-old left-hander who would prefer to leave the rebuilding Diamondbacks and play for a contender. The Yankees and Diamondbacks have been discussing a trade involving the five-time Cy Young Award winner for several weeks, but talks haven't gained any momentum, several baseball officials said.

Steinbrenner met in Tampa with top aides Mark Newman and Billy Connors on Tuesday. Boston, coming off its first World Series title since 1918, has not publicly discussed its offer to retain Martinez, who teamed with Curt Schilling to give the Red Sox a powerful starting rotation.

KNIGHT RIDDER

Pedro Martinez received a guaranteed three-year deal from the Mets.

Bowker plays home to percussion performance
ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 5

DAILY WEATHER FORECAST
FRIDAY • High: 42 • Low: 20
SATURDAY • High: 42 • Low: 31
SUNDAY • High: 51 • Low: 30

UMass travels to Seatle to play Gonzaga
SPORTS, PAGE 10

The Daily Collegian

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 3, 2004 — NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 — VOLUME CXIV ISSUE 61

Faculty Senate releases Capital Plan

By Casey Novak
Collegian Staff

A detailed description of the Capital Plan, which would consist of new construction as well as repairs and renovations of exisisting campus buildings, was presented Thursday by James Cahill, director of Facilities and Campus Planning, at the 635th Regular Meeting of the University of Massachusetts Faculty Senate.

The five-year project totals $547 million in planned spending, and would support academic as well as student life at the University. Of that $547 million, about 19 percent or $107 million would come from UMass spending.

One aspect of the new construction includes a Central Heating Plan, according to Cahill.

"This would be a 10 megawatt plan to provide electricity and steam for the entire campus," he said. "It would provide five times more electricity than the current output."

The target completion date for the heating plan is 2007.

"We are working on the design and we still have a lot of dicussion left about the detailing of the building," said Cahill.

He also talked about a two-phase plan that would add a total of 1,500 beds to the campus.

"This is one of our most exciting projects," said Cahill.

He explained that the two-phase plan would add four-story buildings with apartment style suite arrangements near Sylvan.

Phase One includes adding 868 beds and is expected to be completed in 2006, while Phase Two would add 640 beds at a later date.

"We arrived at the conclusion that this is one of the best locations for Phase One, and we feel confident that it can be completed on schedule," Cahill said. "We also want to have some relationship between the first and second phase so they can become one large community."

There will also be four major developments on North Pleasant

COURTESY UMASS.EDU

Nutrition Professor Moktar Atallah is a Fac. Senate member.

MATT REISS/COLLEGIAN

University of Massachusetts Chancellor John V. Lombardi.

MATT REISS/COLLEGIAN

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano.

Street, including an Intergrated Science Building, the renovation of Skinner Hall for the School of Nursing, a new auditorium as well as a new art building.

"We want to look at this as a region we are developing, rather than individual buildings," Cahill said. "We believe that the proper response to the development would be to close Stockbridge Road in order to connect Thatcher and Infirmary Way with a thru street."

He added that they have not yet decided whether or not the thru way would be two ways or not.

"We've got oodles of consultants working on this so that we can ensure we are doing the right thing for the campus," Cahill said.

The Integrated Science Building would consist of 140,000 square feet for chemistry and biology science, including a 250-seat lecture hall, and labs for teaching a research.

"This is a major project," said Cahill. "We can maybe get a 300-seat lecture hall, but we will be working on that through the design phase. Right now, we invision four-stories close to North Pleasant Street."

The project is scheduled to be completed in 2008.

A new art building would be located across from the Fine Arts Center. It would be a 55,000 square feet of instructional, individual and group studios for two and three dimensional design. The target completion for this project is 2007.

"The cost of steel as gone up to a greater extent last year than it has in the last 30 years," Cahill said. "Basically, anything that sticks to a magnet is now more expensive. We are going to be faced with dealing with that as we have a fixed budget on these projects."

Nursing renovations will include the expansion of Skinner Hall, with a 7,000-square foot additon onto the east side of the building. According to Cahill,

See FACULTY SENATE on page 2

Final arguments in election scandal

By Mara D. Bellaby
Associated Press

KIEV, Ukraine — Tens of thousands of opposition supporters partied in Kiev's main square Thursday, erecting a Christmas tree and waving orange flags, in a show of confidence as the Supreme Court heard final arguments on whether to overturn disputed election results.

With Ukraine's political crisis nearing a decisive turning point, Russian President Vladimir Putin took the government's side in a deepening dispute over how to proceed once the judges issue a ruling.

Putin denounced the opposition's demand for a repeat of the contentious Nov. 21 run-off vote rather than holding entirely new elections for president, as the government wants. Putin said a new run-off "would yield nothing."

"A revote could be conducted a third, a fourth, 25th time, until one side gets the results it needs," a grim-faced Putin said, standing alongside his longtime ally, outgoing Ukrainian President Leonid Kuchma.

The two held a hastily arranged meeting at Moscow's airport just before Putin left for India. Kuchma flew to Russia for support as his goverment appeared to be losing momentum in the 11-day standoff with the opposition.

Opposition leader Viktor Yushchenko repeated his stance rejecting an entirely new election in an address to his supporters filling Kiev's Independence Square.

"We won't take part in any (negotiation) process if they talk about a new election," Yushchenko said, dressed in a fur trimmed black coat and orange sweater and tie. Behind him, his top aides were lined up, also decked out in scarves, sweaters and ribbons in orange, the opposition's campaign color.

The opposition wants a repeat of a run-off between Yushchenko and Kuchma's ally, Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych. Kuchma seeks an entirely new election, possibly so he can replace Yanukovych with a stronger, more charismatic candidate.

President Bush said Thursday that any new vote in Ukraine "ought to be free from any foreign influence."

The mood among the throngs of Yushchenko supporters rallying in their Independence Square tent city was celebratory, confident that the Supreme Court will annul the official results that declared Yanukovych the winner of the Nov. 21 run-off.

They waited all day for a ruling they expected Thursday, watching live broadcasts of the court sessions on televisions in the square, showing the 18 red-robed judges, behind stacks of documents hearing testimony in the cramped chamber.

The justices adjourned in the evening after beginning final arguments. They will hear more arguments Friday, then retreat for deliberations before ruling. It was unclear how long the process would take.

Protesters erected a Christmas tree spray-painted orange in the tent camp, while rock banks played on stage, their instruments fluttering with orange ribbons.

Other protesters kept up their blockade of the Cabinet building despite an agreement the day before to lift their sieges of government offices.

"We aren't letting anyone through. Why should we? We are so close to victory, why surrender now?" said Natalya Nechipurenko, 38, one of

See UKRAINE on page 3

Professor explains the history of pitch

By Arka Sen
Collegian Correspondent

Professor Sigrun Heinzelmann gave a lecture on music theory as a part of a series of themed lectures given over the past year on Thursday.

After playing a recording of "Do-re-mi" at the end of the lecture, Heinzelmann stated that everything had gone as planned and that she was very impressed with the turnouts. She mentioned that the turnout was better than the previous lectures given this year.

According to Gary Karpinski, the head of the Music Theory faculty at the University of Massachusetts, the Department of Music and Dance offers several different presentations for students each year.

"The Department of Music and Dance offers many different concerts and other presentations. Professor Heinzelmann's lecture is part of the Music Theory Lecture Series," he said.

He went on to say, "The Music Theory Lecture Series is coordinated by Professor Heinzelmann, in consultation with rest of the Music Theory faculty and that this series began last academic year, with one presentation by each member of the music theory faculty."

The music theory faculty met in early September to plan a series of dates where faculty members could present lectures. All faculty members decided to give a lecture and invite some guest music theorists as well.

Professor Heinzelmann's talk is the third in this year's Music Theory Lecture series.

To begin the talk, Heinzelmann asked what the conception of the "pitch" is and after giving several examples, said that the pitch was a result of historical developments. Heinzelmann stated that the ancient Greeks used the monochord and then played a few notes on a monochord for the audience.

The pitches are proportional to the length of the string being played. This is how the ancient Greeks made many different pitches. Heinzelmann went on to say that Pythagoreans used ratios to make different pitches, but their interests were mathematical and not musical.

Heinzelmann said that in singing, pitch is a position of the voice. He then talked about the tetra-chord and mentioned that it was used in Greek music.

On the tetra-chord, the outer tones were fixed and the inner tones were movable and one semi-tone was followed by two tones. Heinzelmann went on to talk more about the Greek system of music.

In the middle ages, Heinzelmann said, letters were associated with pitches. In the Carolingian era, the ancient Greek system of music was combined with church chanting.

They were joined together to make a set of pitches. In the year 1000, names of tones were associated with Roman letters. In the ninth century, lines of music were designed to aid the memory so the monks did not have to memorize their chants.

CURTIS KILLIAN/COLLEGIAN

Professor Sigrun Heinzelmann of the Music Theory department explains the history behind the pitch to students yesterday.

Heinzelmann then went to talk about different notation systems. The notational system was used to keep the monk's repertoire. In 1074, the Pope let the people notate the liturgy.

There was a piece of music in a handout given to the audience that was attending the lecture and after talking about the Middle Ages and notating music, the audience sang the tunes that were notated in the music, written on the handout. The handout was called Guido of Arezzo's Hymn for Solmization. The song translated into, "That your servants may be able freely to proclaim the wonders of your deeds, absolve the guilt of their unclean lips, O holy John."

Heinzelmann then talked about a hexa-chord pitch system and how it was combined with the Latin pitch system. One could switch between one hexa-chord and another, which eventually evolved into octaves.

There was a fixed system of pitches as time went on and the development came as a matter of tuning. In 1610 seven syllables were used to cover an entire octave: do-re-me-fa-so-la-ci. 'Ci' was later changed to ti.

The lecture ended with the playing of a recording of "Doc, a dear."

Lecture on hate

The Office of Michael Gargano, the Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs, held a Hate Crime vs. Hate Incidents discussion Wednesday night in the Campus Center Auditorium.

Janice Healy, the Western Massachusetts Regulation Chief for Attorney General Tom Reilly said a hate crime is when a person commits a criminal act with bias towards an individual(s) because of race, gender, religion, or sexual orientation.

She said that a hate incident is when the motive behind an act is evidently biased toward race, gender, religion, or sexual orientation, but is not a crime.

–Da...-O'Brien

MEGAN BRINKER/COLLEGIAN

Combating Hate

Several University officials meet to discuss hate actions and how to combat them.

Military protecting fragile democracy

By Stephen Graham
Associated Press

KABUL, Afghanistan — For a time, the U.S. military in Afghanistan was talking as if it would smoke Osama bin Laden out of a cave on the rocky Pakistan border within months, perhaps even ahead of President Bush's re-election.

Now, American commanders say protecting the country's fragile new democracy, reviving its economy and keeping Taliban militants on the run are the priorities, though tracking the cold trail of bin Laden and other al-Qaida leaders remains the focus of intelligence efforts.

Spies, informers, electronic listening devices and surveillance from the air all belong to the U.S. arsenal. American officials acknowledge that videotapes featuring a sprightly looking bin Laden and his deputy Ayman al-Zawahri, have yielded no clues to their whereabouts, even though one was delivered to a TV channel in Islamabad.

"They're pretty sterile in terms of intelligence value," Maj. Gen. Eric Olson, the operational commander of U.S. forces here, told The Associated Press.

Despite initial high expectations on the other side of the border, Pakistan's yearlong crackdown against foreign militants near the tribal town of Wana also has yielded no trace of bin Laden or al-Zawahri.

"We have no specific indication that they are in the Wana area or really any other location" in the region, Olson said. "But the hunt goes on."

American generals have had three years to rue how the suspected mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks slipped away from Afghan and U.S. troops near the Tora Bora caves of Afghanistan's eastern mountains as the regime of his Taliban protectors crumbled that December. French Defense Minister Michele Alliot-Marie, who has special forces patrolling farther south, claimed last month that bin Laden narrowly escaped an American operation as recently as mid-2003. There is no firm evidence anyone has picked up his trail since.

Interviewed at Bagram Air Base, nerve-center of the 18,000-strong force he helps command, Olson said this week that his immediate goals were preventing insurgents from mounting a "strategic surprise" with an attack on President-elect Hamid Karzai's Dec. 7 inauguration, and keeping them on the defensive ahead of April parliamentary elections.

American commanders have slowly diluted their focus on combat operations against Taliban militants to take in more of the kind of nation-building that the Bush administration was once wary of.

Lawless provinces in the south and east are now dotted with "provincial reconstruction teams" designed to help the Afghan government regain a grip on the countryside while squeezing better intelligence from ordinary Afghans in return for building wells and clinics.

Olson said running down bin Laden and his cohorts was still the focus of American intelligence efforts here. "That's the main effort, no doubt about it."

The general said al-Qaida cells could still be in Afghanistan and have encountered foreign fighters on several recent operations.

On Nov. 21, U.S.-led troops mounted raids on suspected al-

See AFGHANISTAN on page 3

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Andrew Merritt
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
News Supervisor Cameron Woods
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Meghan Healy
Campus Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Paige Cram
News Editor Erika Lorley
Photo Editor Matthew Reid
Sports Editor Mike Martelli
Operations Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marisa Pappas
Design Supervisor Josh Kiggans
Finance Manager Herab Shah
Account Executive Virginie Frecaut
Human Resources Sandra Marquez
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Jachinn Solomon
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachel Bruno
Graphic Artist Charlie Higgins
Arts Arts & Living Mike Bunsch
Arts Arts & Living Monique Jemmott
Assistant Editorial Yousef Munayyer
Assistant Editorial Allison Elkes
Assistant Sports Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Sports Robert McGovern
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian (USPS 325-920) is published Monday through Friday during the fall and spring semesters except during vacations and exam periods. The Collegian is distributed free on campus and by mail subscription for $150 per year. Periodicals postage paid at Amherst, MA 01004. The Collegian is a member of the Associated Collegiate Press. The Pioneer Valley Collegian 1996. Postmaster: Send address changes to the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, 113 Campus Center, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, MA 01003. Since 1890 the Collegian has been dedicated to the principles of independent student journalism.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today
NIGHT EDITOR
Andrew Merritt
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Curtis Killian
COPY EDITOR
Cameron J. Woods
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Cory Rosenberg
PRODUCTION STAFF
Nicholas Bolanger, Matthew Reid

Now looking for writers in the 5-college area

Campus Perspectives

What is on your holiday wish list?

By Curtis Killian

"I like surprises."

Allie Buxton
junior
Journalism/English major

"The Baha Men CD. Happiness."

Erin Moore
sophomore
Physics major

"A Bush free America."

Alicia Arkerson
senior
Communication major

"Viggo Mortensen"

Tiffany Bradbury
senior
History major

"Someone to pay my credit card bill would be nice."

Maura O'Reilly
senior
Communication major

Senate releases Capital Plan

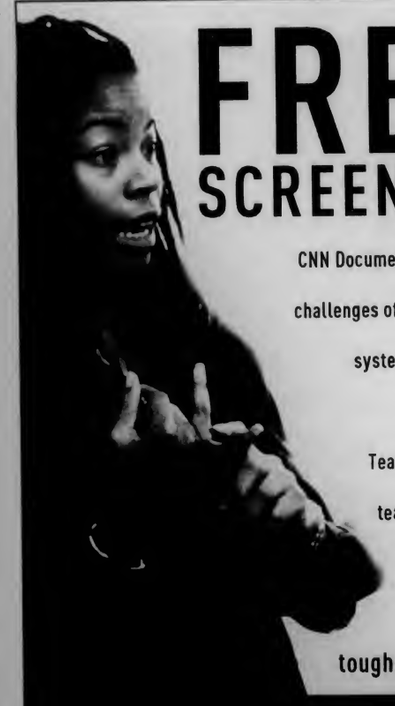
FACULTY SENATE from page 1

the project is on schedule to be completed by 2007.

Renvoations will also take place at Berkshire Dining Common in the Southwest Residential Area.

"This is a challenging project because we have to renovate and at the same time feed the students," said Cahill. "We hope to close the dining common for only one semester."

A state-of-the-art, general purpose auditorium with a 500-seat lecture hall is also planned to be completed for 2006. It would be located either south of Knowles and west of Goessmann or south of Hasbrouck, across from Skinner Hall.



"We are hoping for [the Skinner Hall location] because it would accommodate the auditorium nicely," Cahill said. "It would also be a very cost-effective site."

A new track and field is also scheduled to be added by 2005. Other renovations to the campus include: DeBois Library interior repairs, library deck replacement, campus center repairs, Totman elevator, hotel and tourism management renovations, and Southwest concourse replacement, among others.

When asked whether the University will have the money to do all of these things, Cahill responded somewhat confidentely.

"Yes we do. The question is, do we have enough money to do them the way we want to? But yes, all of these are funded projects."

FREE SCREENING

CNN Documentary explores challenges of our education system by following four new Teach For America teachers working in some of the nation's toughest schools.

SCREENING AND TEACH FOR AMERICA INFO SESSION
MONDAY, December 6, 2004, 5:00 PM
Campus Center, 8th Floor, Room 811 15

TEACHFORAMERICA
www.teachforamerica.org

BOSTON BARTENDERS SCHOOL of AMERICA

WANT A HOT JOB?
Learn to be a Professional Bartender!
Classes Starting Now!
Boston Bartenders School
218 Memorial Avenue • West Springfield
1-800-357-3210
www.bostonbartender.com

Worship at Dwight Chapel
We are an Interdenominational Evangelical Church serving the entire valley since 1886.
Sunday morning worship at 8:30 & 10:45
FREE SHUTTLE FROM UMASS (HAIGIS MALL @ 10AM)
If you are interested to know more about the church, visit us at www.dwightchapel.org
For more information call 413-256-8059
Dwight Chapel, 885 Federal Street, Belchertown, MA 01007

News Writers wanted. Call Erika if you are intrested 545-1762.

CINEMARK
CINEMARK AT HAMPSHIRE MALL 6
367 Russell St 413-587-4233
Schedule for 12/3/04 - 12/7/04
Digital Surround Sound in all Auditoriums
Purchase Tickets Online @ cinemark.com
After The Sunset (PG13) 11:50 2:20 4:45 7:20 9:45*
Alexander (R) 11:10 3:40 7:30*
The Polar Express (G) 11:15 11:45 1:55 2:25 4:40 5:05 7:05 7:30 9:35*
The Incredibles (PG) 11:05 11:30 1:45 2:15 4:30 5:00 7:15 7:45 10:10*
Alfie (R) 10:30 PM
Ray (PG13) 11:35 4:00 8:00
National Treasure (PG) 11:05 1:00 2:00 4:05 4:50 7:00 7:40 9:50 10:30
Saw (R) 6:55 PM
Spongebob Squarepants (PG) 11:15 1:50 4:10 7:10 9:30
Bridget Jones: Edge of Reason (R) 11:20 1:50 4:30 7:25 10:05
Christmas with the Kranks (PG) 11:55 2:35 5:00 7:35 10:00*
Friday Night Reviews Dec 3
National Lampoon's Christmas Vacation--Unrated
Tickets on sale now
* No Passes Accepted
$ Showtimes marked with $ are $1 cheaper cinemark.com

Military focusing on Afghan democracy

AFGHANISTAN from page 1

Qaida compounds in Nangarhar, not far from Tora Bora. The U.S. military said "several Arab fighters" were among suspects killed or detained.

Another raid targeting an unidentified "al-Qaida facilitator" a week later provoked riotous protests after the suspect's wife was taken into custody, a breach of tribal honor codes.

Olson said the chief suspect, who escaped, is only a "medium-value target" in Nangarhar, but that this kind of operation was now the military's best hope in the hunt for bigger fish.

Intelligence gleaned from such captives can help "piece together a story that leads you to more specific locations for the senior leaders," he said. "I honestly believe that that's the way that Osama bin Laden and al-Zawahri are eventually going to be located."

Despite the drain on resources posed by Iraq, the number of special forces in Afghanistan has held "steady," at an undisclosed level, Olson said.

He said he was redistributing those troops along the border in an effort to catch militants trying to slip back and forth from safe havens on the Pakistani side. To that end, cooperation with Pakistan is vital.

U.S. and Afghan officials have praised Islamabad for its bloody operations around Wana, the main town of the lawless Waziristan region, where fierce resistance earlier this year fueled speculation that a high-value target was cornered.

If he was, he escaped. Pakistani commanders now say they don't believe any of al-Qaida's top brass are in the region.

Maj. Gen. Niaz Khattak, commander of Pakistan's military operations against al-Qaida-linked fighters in South Waziristan, has predicted the fiercely autonomous area will be pacified by year's end. He says there is no sign of bin Laden and that most of the foreigners still in the region are low-level fighters.

COURTESY CNN.COM

Al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden, pictured above in a November videotape released to Al-Jazeera, is still missing.

Khattak said only a few foreign militants have been captured alive. He estimated that among the nearly 500 militants killed in the past nine months, about 100 were foreigners.

Final arguments made for new election dozens of protesters standing shoulder-to-shoulder to block entrances to the building. They banged cans against the ground to distract whatever workers had managed to slip past.

UKRAINE from page 1

In talks mediated by European officials, Yushchenko and Yanukovych agreed Wednesday to respect the court's ruling. The opposition charges that government fraud cheated Yushchenko of victory in the runoff, and his campaign has appealed results from eastern regions where the prime minister's support is strongest.

During Thursday's session, the court rejected Yanukovych's objections to parts of the opposition's appeal.

COURTESY CNN.COM

Two members of Ukraine's Supreme Court discuss arguments made in the case that will decide whether that nation will be holding new presidential elections after controversy since the Nov. 21 election.

Malls stepping up security around U.S.

By Matt Apuzzo
Associated Press

MANCHESTER, Conn. — In a shopping mall outside Hartford, past the Abercrombie & Fitch and the cell phone kiosks, tucked away by the Barnes & Noble, a conference room full of security guards is learning how to spot suicide bombers.

They are being taught blast patterns and behavior profiles, how a bomb is packaged and how a bomber is recruited.

Suburban shopping mall security guards are receiving the type of training that just a few years ago was reserved for the Israeli police and the U.S. military.

"If they're carrying a bag, look for that white-knuckle grip. ... They're carrying that package and they're holding onto it for dear life," Patrick Chagnon, a Connecticut State Police detective and national counterterrorism instructor, tells his class of 10 students as the Shoppes at Buckland Hills mall bustles with holiday shoppers carrying bags and boxes of all sizes.

Chagnon's students are also told to watch for people wearing oversized clothes, and are instructed to make eye contact with shoppers and look for either extremely focused people or those who won't return a look. Another tip-off: Terrorists often ritualistically shave their bodies before carrying out a suicide bombing, he says.

Around the country, enrollment in these suicide bombing classes has increased in the past year, and the students include not just elite SWAT team members, but also local patrol officers and private security forces.

"Everyone has an obligation to be a soldier in this war," Connecticut Homeland Security Director John Buturla says.

In Israel, mall security guards, bus drivers and hotel managers are added eyes and ears for the police. That is what state and federal officials are trying to build in the United States.

In New York City, apartment doormen and supers are being trained to be on the lookout for cars or trucks that are parked outside for a long time; for anyone who takes pictures of the building or lingers too long outside; and for new tenants who move in with little or no furniture.

The International Council of Shopping Centers held about 20 anti-terrorism classes this year and plans dozens more next year, says Malachy Kavanagh, who helps organize training for the organization. A class of mall security directors recently received training at the FBI Academy in Quantico, Va., he says.

"Our attitude is that everybody has a role: mall managers, engineers, maintenance people," Kavanagh says. "The more people you train, the more eyes you have, the more people you have aware, the better your opportunity to prevent things."

Such training frequently is met with skeptical questions: Is al-Qaida really going to attack a Connecticut shopping mall? Anti-terrorism instructors say a bombing is nearly twice as likely at a commercial establishment than at a government building or military installation.

COURTESY SIGNS.COM

Shoppers walk around the Auburn Mall in Auburn, Mass.

Car bomb explodes outside Baghdad

By Slobodan Lekic
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Mortar barrages hammered the heavily fortified Green Zone and elsewhere in central Baghdad on Thursday, killing at least one person and underscoring the vulnerability of even Iraq's best-protected areas ahead of national elections.

Also Thursday, a car bomb exploded next to a Bradley fighting vehicle near Beiji, about 155 miles north of Baghdad, wounding two U.S. soldiers and two Iraqi National Guardsmen, said Master Sgt. Cynthia Weasner of the 1st Infantry Division. No other details were available.

President Bush insisted that crucial elections set for Jan. 30 must not be delayed, rejecting calls from more than a dozen political parties there to postpone them until security at the polls can be ensured.

"It's time for Iraqi citizens to go to the polls," Bush told reporters in the Oval Office on Thursday.

The Pentagon has said U.S. troop strength in Iraq will be raised from 138,000 to about 150,000 by mid-January in order to provide security for the election.

The Iraqi Islamic party said it would push forward with demands to postpone the elections and would hold a conference on Sunday in a bid to muster more support for the call.

"We're trying to create a force to pressure the (electoral) commission and the government to postpone the elections," party official Ammar Wajeeh said. "We will do our best and we will continue this process until the very end."

"We are not convinced that elections could be held on this date so long as the security situation remains the way it is," Wajeeh said.

The calls for delay also have been strongly opposed by Shiite politicians and the influential Shiite religious authority. Shiites comprise about 60 percent of Iraq's nearly 26 million people and have been eagerly awaiting elections to transform their numbers into the political power they were deprived of under Saddam Hussein.

In Baghdad, at least five mortar rounds exploded Thursday, including two in Baghdad's Green Zone, the compound that holds Iraq's interim administration and foreign diplomatic missions.

One round struck near a mobile phone office in Baghdad's Arasat neighborhood, killing one person and wounding three, police Lt. Muhsin Khazim said. Witnesses also said people were wounded in the other blasts around Baghdad, but the number of casualties wasn't known.

Last week, a mortar attack killed four Nepalese employees of a British security firm and wounded at least 12 in the Green Zone.

In the northern city of Mosul, 10 insurgents were killed in a clash with Iraqi security forces, an Iraqi general said Thursday.

Maj. Gen. Rasheed Fleiyh said two rebels were captured during the firefight, which flared overnight when a police special forces unit was conducting a sweep through the city's troubled Islah neighborhood.

Mosul's 5,000-member police force disintegrated during an insurgent uprising last month, forcing the U.S. command and the interim government to divert troops from their offensive in Fallujah.

In Baladruz, a town, about 50 miles northeast of Baghdad, attackers gunned down a police colonel as he walked through a market, according to a policeman there, Ahmed Hassan. Insurgents repeatedly have targeted Iraqi police, who are cooperating with U.S. forces.

The U.S. Embassy also banned its employees from using the highway linking Baghdad to the international airport, regarded as one of the country's most dangerous roads.

"Until further notice, no mission personnel will be permitted to use the main road from the international (Green) zone to the Baghdad International Airport for security reasons," a warden's message said.

This is the "HOT" Yoga
BIKRAM YOGA Amherst
www.bikramyoga.com
665-yoga
The room is heated to open you...
The series is powerful to challenge you...
The yoga is BIKRAM to change you...
Designed for all levels, BIKRAM yoga will challenge you physically...focus you mentally... and allow you to relax on a very deep level.
TRY IT FOR 10 CONSECUTIVE DAYS FOR ONLY $20!!!
On Rt. 116 across from C.W. ...
Open 7 Days with generous ...

ugg...so many!

ZANNA
Clothing, Shoes and Accessories for Women.
downtown Amherst

SUCCESS begins here
Earn 1, 2, or 3 credits in less than a month
Classes begin January 4
English Comp I and II
Dance
Psychology
Public Speaking
Self Defense for Women
Spanish Skills
French Skills
CLICK or CALL
gcc.mass.edu
(413) 775-1801
GREENFIELD Community College

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 3, 2004

"The author must keep his mouth shut when his work starts to speak."
-Friedrich Nietzche

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Unity in a divided nation?

Thomas Naughton

Imagine yourself running for student council in your high school or for another analogous group of ineffectual morons who don't really accomplish anything: say, for example, the UMass SGA. However, this year is different, you're not just running for a simple senator seat in the "Ineffectual Moron" branch of your student government. This year, you're going for the gold. You want it all. You want to be the President.

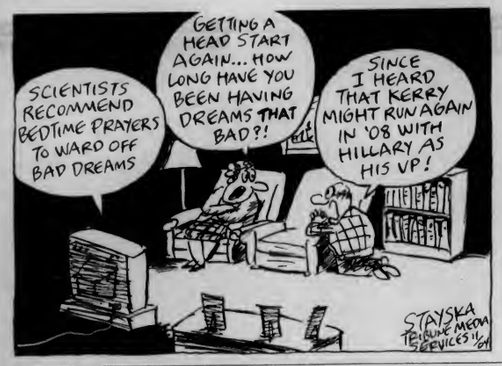
So you face your opponent in a blood bath of a campaign; you expose his drunk driving and heroin possession record. He exposes your kiddie porn collection. It's a death match like no other. Not only are you and your opponent sparring, but also your respective constituents have jumped into the ring. Your supporters protest in the hundreds of thousands when your opponent shows up in town. He gets his friends who fought in a war 30 years ago along side you to say really crappy things about you: it's a bloody, dirty war of words and ideas.

Now imagine that your opponent wins. His supporters rejoice in the streets, promising that their president's supreme reign has just begun. Your opponent also rejoices and agrees with his constituents that his "mandate" has just been newly christened. The other side laughs in your face and in the faces of all who support you. Then suddenly, a deafening silence sweeps over the celebrating supporters of your opponent as he comes forward and says "We should really unite. We should be on the same side. We should put this terrible campaign behind us and unite under the blanket of our great school and its leader, me."

We don't know who we are as a nation anymore. We are still fighting the battles about abortion, gay marriage, war, healthcare and civil rights.

Sound familiar? Well, the above scenario, although crafted under the metaphor of the SGA or your local high school student council actually describes the current climate of our nation. Remember the bloodbath that was the 2004 Presidential Campaign? Remember how close the election was? Remember how divided the nation is? You should remember and don't ever forget it. Don't let anyone, not George W. Bush, not Condoleezza Rice, not Bill O'Reilly or Joe Schmoe from one of the Red States alter your memory by spouting some crap about unity, healing, or "reaching across the aisle."

None of the supporters of George W. Bush really have the idea of true unity in mind. What they want is for anyone who is fighting against their ideological agenda to abandon the fight, to give up and surrender to the idea of some kind of "mandate" held by one man. I'm sorry, but the idea of a "mandate" doesn't really seem synonymous with democracy, or even a republic "by the people, for the people," but I guess if a mini-dictatorship makes people in Georgia feel safer at home, who am I to argue?



Who am I? I'm an American citizen who loves his country, who refuses to forget the disgusting ideological warfare that has occurred during this important campaign. I don't want the Republicans to forget what transpired in the past year either. Many dirty blows were dealt to Mr. Bush as well, and if I were aligned with the Republicans, I would not be pleased with his concessions to the democrats concerning "unity." Why? Because it's a band-aid over a deep gash, it does nothing. The cultural civil war has just begun. The bodies are still fresh on the ground on both sides. We cannot be united until some clear victories or defeats have occurred.

We don't know who we are as a nation anymore. We are still fighting the battles about abortion, gay marriage, war, healthcare and civil rights. Forgetting the past, letting go of this past and of our respective fights will never solve anything. I am for reproductive rights; it would be easier to know where I stand in this nation if some clear choices are made. My friend Sarah is against gay marriage; I think she would know better how she wants to move on as an American citizen if there was a clear decision made about how her nation will treat the issue.

I haven't given up anything. I am ready to be labeled as "crazy," "liberal," "anti-American," "a hater" or any label that talk radio and Fox News can come up with. We live in a scary time with a frightening and harsh division between people and their ideals, and I think that's a good thing. When I saw and heard the reporters describe the nation as "divided," I thought to myself "Good, now something can get done. Now that the delineations between people and what they stand for is clear, our leaders will be forced to make decisions for the entire nation, whether they like it or not."

I realize that the decisions made may be decisions that I don't like. In fact, I'm counting on it. In the meantime, I'll be watching the other side carefully, reading and educating myself, arming myself to try to defeat them and the outdated "values" they say they uphold. And while I'm doing that, I'll be processing my passport.

Thomas Naughton is a Collegian columnist.

The dilution of Holland

Ben Duffy

Holland is a land noted for its tulips, wooden shoes and drugs. Over the last half century, Holland has taken great pains to grant itself a new distinction as a nation of tolerance and a warm hearth for asylum-seekers from across the globe. Though pleasing to the ears of most liberals, I always had my doubts that such attitudes really served the Dutch people.

The Dutch are free to initiate whatever immigration policies they please, but I've always wondered if any nation could absorb almost limitless numbers of foreigners and still retain any shred of its national character and heritage. Opening its arms to the world seems like a recipe for ethnic suicide, the extinction of the people who gave us Van Gogh, Berlage and Rembrandt.

In short, I don't like it one bit. I believe that the Dutch have simply been avoiding a key decision, in hopes that remaining indecisive will allow them to have their cake and eat it too. Will Holland be a Dutch nation, or a tolerant, multicultural nation? Though the two seem to be in conflict, the Dutch have been living in denial that their homeland has been radically transforming before their very eyes.

When walking through the streets of Rotterdam last August, I found myself hard-pressed to find a Dutchman anywhere. According to the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, almost half of this massive port city is foreign born. Amsterdam is more ethnically Dutch, and it's important to look past the tourists to see the true character of the city. Even so, its population is only 65.9 percent Dutch and falling every day.

When walking through the streets of Rotterdam last August, I found myself hard-pressed to find a Dutchman anywhere. According to the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, almost half of this massive port city is foreign born.

The city council of Amsterdam recently drafted a new policy on diversity, acknowledging that, "particularly in the last decade, large numbers of migrants (from former colonies), guestworkers and newcomers with over 150 national backgrounds have substantially changed the constellation of the population." Therefore, announced the city council, Amsterdam was going to have to make some changes in order to accommodate the diverse population. Foreigners were spared the chore of adapting to Amsterdam. Instead Amsterdam adapted to the foreigners.

Like all Western European nations, the Netherlands has a low fertility rate. Just 1.66 children are born per woman, compared to the worldwide average of 2.62 children per woman. Coupled with loose immigration laws, this trend indicates that the Dutch will soon be a minority within the Netherlands. The three largest Dutch cities are projected to have non-Dutch majorities sometime between 2010 and 2015, and the country as a whole will pass that mark sometime in the latter half of this century, depending on whose projection one uses.

But I was wrong about one thing. It's not a choice between a Dutch nation and a tolerant, multicultural nation. If recent events are any indicator, the future of Holland holds neither. On Nov. 2, Dutch filmmaker Theo Van Gogh was murdered in Amsterdam. Mohammed Bouyeri, a 26 year-old with dual Dutch-Moroccan citizenship, allegedly shot Van Gogh while he was on his bicycle. Bouyeri then slit his throat and stabbed him, pinning a note to his chest that promised jihad against five particular Dutch politicians, Jews, Holland itself and the entire Western world. While apprehending the suspect, Dutch police and Special Forces laid siege to Bouyeri's hideout, where he and four policemen were injured by bullets and a hand grenade. The nation noted for its tolerance has seen a rash of mosque-burnings and retaliatory church burnings.

Van Gogh was certainly not an angelic figure. In fact, he wasn't the most tolerant of people himself. He was deeply critical of all three major Western religions, and wasn't afraid to make inflammatory remarks about their followers whenever he pleased. Van Gogh believed that insulting people and exposing harsh truths were his rights as a citizen. He collaborated with self-proclaimed "ex-Muslim" Ayaan Hirsi Ali to make his most recent film, "Submission," about the mistreatment of women in Muslim societies.

Still, offensive films are no excuse for murder. The Dutch people are now left asking themselves what went wrong with their utopia. I suspect that they naively assumed that toleration would be a two-way street, that those welcomed into Holland would be welcoming in return.

And what about the backlash against the Muslims themselves? Once again, I suspect naivete on the part of the Dutch. They foolishly believed that a peaceful, multicultural society would be easy to achieve. It appears now that this pluralistic utopia is reaching its limits, and multiculturalism always breeds some sort of resentment from both the host demographic and the minorities. While it would be an exaggeration to call the current state of Holland "balkanization," it certainly appears that it could move in that direction.

I wish the best for all of Holland's 16 million citizens. I certainly don't want to see any more bloodshed leveled at innocent immigrants or at blasphemous Dutch critics of Islam. Let not another mosque or church burn, another policeman be wounded or another immigrant be bullied. But let this be an opportunity to reflect on the slippery and sometimes contradictory natures of tolerance and diversity. A nation cannot allow unfettered immigration without affecting its culture and risking almost certain culture clashes.

Ben Duffy is a Collegian columnist.

Love or food poisoning

Blake Alcantara

Is it foolish to consider oneself in control of such an illusory word like love? Or is there comfort in the feeling of being conquered, like those who are victim to coyness and curiosity, who bow toward the other, more easily revealed and accessible personality? For in every relationship there is sans doute, the active and the passive, the supine palm that beckons for physical correspondence as two hands, complimenting each other, paddle through the campus center bazaar. The on-air embrace of sets of arms — forearms gripping coffees and Collegians, wrists supporting the fading yellow LiveSTRONG (a phrase that once had the momentum of the man who truly does), and hand tied to hand, in the belief that these minds attached to these bodies attached to these hands have the same definition of the word that will not be defined.

What are the university requirements that measure such a word? It is a lion in a lamb suit hiding amongst the ordinary. Junta suggests "Dinner and a Movie," while Frampton's Fender asked "Do You Feel Like I Do." Is it the insecurities about our standards in what we like, enjoy and appreciate that make us feel there should be a common interest to share in life's extracurricular? I do not want your apple in exchange for my apple. I am walking on Escher's staircase; I am gripping the rail. I am that faceless man hanging over that railing deciding what is up and what is down, debating if my next move will be classified jump or fall.

She is your anticipation of spring after the long Decembers and Januarys. You know this with a measured certainty because it is the story that you have developed for yourself time and time again.

I cannot say with any certainty that my instincts change. My heart is on my sleeve, but it's cold today; I'm wearing layers.

How will you be dressed when I meet you, I ask myself as anyone will when fashioning for an emotional inundation. What baggage do you carry? How long since your last? Your first? Are you? Have you? Would you like to? Everyone is in a constant state of transformation: cycling, in a constant state of transformation: cycling, transitioning, folding and unfolding. There is hope, tension and awkwardness, and then there is that unsettling anxiety that pits your stomach in just a way that you know only she can do, and you know it's either love or food poisoning.

Robert Frost once wrote, "A mother takes twenty years to make a man of her boy, and another woman makes a fool of him in twenty minutes."

Before you parenthesize or excuse my dear sally of anything else, there is a simple mantra: one and one. When experience, friends, stories, films and literature all tell you that there are going to be a myriad of variables down the road, there is that first meeting. When everything else in the world for that instant dips into a blurry "eventually" because this girl could be now. I want her to be now. There are inviting eyes; there are big lips and a freckled face carried above a soft neck cuddled in a cozy turtleneck sweater. There is long, thick hair straight and down grazing shoulders, finding bag straps and books, and you can clearly see that she is the warmth of winter. She is your anticipation of spring after the long Decembers and Januarys. You know this with a measured certainty because it is the story that you have developed for yourself time and time again.

And then there is the first hello, followed by the first smile, and "you make me laugh." It's all great, because I already think that you're just that ... and I don't know your last name, your birthday, your friends, your car or your classes, and vice versa. When none of that matters, is that love? Because what is that when we know so little, but feel so much? Irrational? Maybe. Stunning? Yes.

That first night when you separate and drive home belting out the song playing in your car, brush your teeth smiling and lie down above the covers. You face the ceiling when you normally sleep on your side, and you put your hands behind your head and say, "this has been a good day." You cannot sleep, only to wake and realize that you slept better than any other night before. Is that something?

Maybe there is a word for the gut-straddling attraction that all at once consumes the temptations, the wants, the needs, the desires, the fears and excitements that rush through your core and build behind your chest until you can't swallow. Maybe that one gulp is harder to get down than all the others else because you want to say everything all at once, but you don't know where to start. Or maybe you just had lunch at the DC.

Blake Alcantara is a UMass student.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

REALITY TV VS. SADISM

Kudos to Arka Sen for his column "How much I hate reality TV." He had the guts to remind us of something we seem to have forgotten in the bloodfest that is modern cinema: that there is nothing wholesome, respectful or – dare I use the M word? – moral about watching and enjoying our fellow human beings suffer in the name of entertainment.

In fact, it borders on a kind of perversion. Whether it's reality shows with contestants eating bugs and tunneling through sewers, or talk shows like Jerry Springer making a coast-to-coast spectacle of the slugging, desperate members of a love triangle, it's all so far beneath a thing called decency as to make one wonder if the people who derive pleasure from this are really all there.

If memory serves me right, it was Variety magazine that gave the movie "Night of the Living Dead" the thumbs-down when it premiered in 1968. It was considered distasteful, immodest even, to be voyeurs of cannibalistic acts. It just wasn't right to get a thrill out of watching people being attacked and eaten. As a recent review of the movie on Nixflix.com noted, most of the "hardcore action" took place slightly off screen; viewers weren't expected to be able to stomach in-your-face carnage. As the reviewer noted, "It seems that driving a tire iron through someone's forehead wasn't exactly an 'every day stunt' back in 1968, as it seems to be now."

Sen sums up the argument by calling today's reality entertainment what it is in reality: sadism. "The challenges become more cruel as time goes on and the more sadistic the challenges get, the more the viewer is entertained." Sadism: deriving pleasure from viewing the suffering of another being.

I'd like to suggest that we try another response when we see such suffering: compassion. It's long been recommended by the more enlightened beings on our planet (Gandhi, Mother Teresa, Martin Luther King, the Dalai Lama, Chief Seattle). The first step is to stop marinating our souls in that which celebrates the exact opposite.

Ali Crolius
Amherst resident

BOYCOTT WAL-MART

I'm writing to commend Andrew Freeman on his editorial piece from the Dec. 1 Collegian. In "Up Against the Wal-Mart," Freeman comments on the various exploitations and shady practices going on behind the scenes at the world's biggest retail chain. As a former Wal-Mart employee who experienced many of the issues Freeman wrote about, I'm pleased to see that people are willing to speak out on this issue.

While it's a little difficult to find sympathy for an executive who earns $280,000 a year as opposed to $420,000, there were many low-level workers at my hometown Wal-Mart who experienced the same sort of problem. I'm proud to refrain from shopping at Wal-Mart. Please join me.

Will Wagner
UMass student

BUILDING A TRULY BETTER UMASS

I have a question and an idea: As long as they're doing all that work over there by the library, why don't they do something with the Old Chapel? It's kind of just taking up space, isn't it?

They could renovate it, and the Interfaith Council could have devotionals there. Maybe a seance, to find the ghost of Whitey Bulgar? Just kidding. Or perhaps a Handel's "Messiah" sing-along. I would attend that.

Maybe just a place and pulpit to have big poetry readings. How about it?

Also, as long as they're doing all that work, why don't they put in some grass instead of concrete? Grass is prettier, by all practical accounts. Of course you have to mow grass, but concrete looks ugly. You could plant the kind of grass that you don't have to mow, the kind they have on golf course greens. How about it? Two good ideas for the price of one.

Joseph Hunt
UMass student

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 3, 2004

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

METROID PRIME 2: ECHOES in high demand this Christmas despite gaming competition

Press Start to Play

Reid Davenport

Garnering comparisons to cult video games such as 'Halo 2' and 'GoldenEye' the new Gamecube release, 'Metroid Prime 2: Echoes' has received much positive feedback from video game fans.

'Metroid Prime 2: Echoes'
Gamecube
Publisher: Nintendo
Developer: Retro Studios
Rated T

After a two-year leave of absence, Samus Aran has returned to do what she does best: stomping alien scum, in "Metroid Prime 2: Echoes" for Gamecube. The game series, which is quickly becoming as popular as Mario and Zelda games, has morphed from a highly challenging 8-bit side-scroller to one of the most mind-blowing first-person adventure games on the Gamecube.

The first thing gamers will be wondering is if it can compete with "Halo 2" for XBox or "Half-Life 2" for the PC. According to a few Internet polls , such as the one at G4techtv.com "Metroid Prime 2" is more in demand than "Halo 2," while "Half-Life 2" is jumping ahead of both. The reason is that "Metroid Prime 2" has a much more solid story going for it. The worlds have a lot to explore to get Samus through her travels, while "Halo 2" has excellent graphics but can be too easy to run through.

"Metroid Prime 2" brings back all of the details gamers loved from the first one. The game starts off with the same deal as the last game. You get jumped and lose almost all of your extra powers. You will quickly start to pick up the pace and find yourself forced to go one on one with a few hard-to-beat bosses to earn back those pieces of equipment.

"Metroid Prime 2" still has the loading-as-you-go maps, so you won't find yourself waiting and waiting for the next scene to load up. The areas are just as magnificent as they were in the first game and once again you will need to use your scanning visor to learn more about your surroundings, activate doors, and pick up useful information on your enemies. There are plenty of hidden passages to gain extra life and missile packs along with secret ways to get around a horde of enemies.

The game's storyline brings the space pirates back into play, but this time there is an even bigger threat than them. A dark force is traveling into the lighter universe on the planet Aether and it is up to you to stop it from invading the once peaceful planet. You will be helped by the light world inhabitants, called Luminoth, that remain in order to travel between the two worlds to save the planet and escape in one piece.

The weapons for Samus have been slightly tweaked, as you will now be able to use a light and dark beam. Both beams have their specific uses to activate and kill enemies. She will also be able to pick up the annihilator beam, which seeks out multiple enemies in the area, and even perform a screw attack that can help you reach great heights while attacking enemies.

Traveling into the dark world is a new experience, as you will, at first, need to stay in the cover of crystals due to the atmosphere being too poisonous for Samus to handle. The enemies are much harder than those you will find in the light world and they will come at you at every possible chance they have.

The added twist is that you are not only battling dark forces that infest the light world's inhabitants in attempts to destroy you, but you will also meet face to face with Dark Samus. The dark version of the space bounty hunter will constantly be taunting Samus until you finally do battle with it head on.

The added feature that makes the game even more appealing is the new multiplayer option. It is nowhere near the likes of "Halo 2" by any means, but it allows you to play with friends in a 2-4 player setup. If you were a fan of the "GoldenEye" multiplayer on N64, this is not quite as good but it will satisfy you enough. There are a few, different game modes to play: regular battle or death match mode, bounty mode in which you will need to pick up the most coins to win, or warrior mode, which is basically death match with all weapons and abilities available. This is a nice added feature to try every now and then with friends, but it isn't anything spectacular.

"Metroid Prime 2" has a lot more stability overall than its consol competitor "Halo 2."

"Metroid Prime 2" has a lot more solid story and the graphics are reasonably close to "Halo 2" considering the lack of power Gamecube has compared to XBox. With lush environments, hidden passages, space pirates, and the universes sexiest bounty hunter, "Metroid Prime 2" is the game to have for Gamecube owners this holiday season.

Beats in the Ballroom

Seen here is a live performance last night in the Student Union Ballroom, the band, The Alchemystics helped to round out the bill for "Ground Shaking," a hip-hop, spoken word, afro-beat, jazz, and reggae production put on by both university radio station, WMUA and the University Productions and Concerts.

An 'Academy' of rock teaching punk in Boston

By Craig Leger
Collegian Correspondent

The Academy Is... is quite possibly the ray of hope we have all been looking for amongst a barrage of bands being signed these days. The five-piece melodic rock band out of Chicago, Ill. has recently been touring the country non-stop and taking it by storm.

On the self-titled five-track E.P. that was released in March of 2004, each track allows for listener to become more attracted to the band's sound and instantly want to hear more. The best part is that if you are looking to hear the music of The Academy Is.... then you can check them out for free on the Internet at pureVOLUME.com.

The Academy Is... Tuesday Axis Boston $12

Coming off of an amazing tour with Matchbook Romance, Midtown, and Hidden in Plain View, The Academy Is.... is now on tour with Motion City Soundtrack, Tsunami Bomb, and Limbeck. Directly following the end of the tour, the band will be going out on a five-stop tour with Fall Out Boy, Midtown, and label-mates Gym Class Heroes (also a strong recommendation).

In a recent interview with the Daily Collegian, the drummer of The Academy Is.... Andy Mrotek stated that "Touring is all about making best friends, and every band has so much to offer each of us. You learn about yourself. You have to be open to learning from other people."

From the looks of it, this band must be learning a lot with all the tours they currently have set up.

Following a strong performance at the Worcester Palladium just under a month ago, the stir about the The Academy Is... was a positive one. The more people that hear them, the more fans they seem to acquire, and with the tours that they have lined up, gaining more fans does not appear to be a problem.

With a show containing national powerhouse Motion City Soundtrack, as well as the much talked about Tsunami Bomb, and up and coming Limbeck along with The Academy Is.... it is safe to say it will not be a boring night.

The constantly progressing The Academy Is.... say they strive not to let any crowd down. As lead singer William Beckett said, "Unless you're Bono, then you haven't done [anything]." With Motion City Soundtrack, The Academy Is..., Tsunami Bomb, and Limbeck all playing on one stage on Tuesday, Dec. 7 at the Axis in Boston, it will be the place to be.

Courtesy pureVOLUME.com

Following a brief tour with well-known acts such as Matchbook Romance and Midtown, The Academy Is ... will headline a show this Sunday at the Axis in Boston.

Crime prevention shows are still 'America's Most Wanted'

By David Bianculli
New York Daily News

It goes unnoticed, but "America's Most Wanted" is the most-watched program in its time slot on Saturday nights. It's also No. 8 on a much more impressive list: This Little TV Show That Could has lasted long enough to be ranked as one of the longest-running series in the entire history of prime time.

"America's Most Wanted" began on Fox's owned-and-operated stations in February 1988, and went national on Fox that April.

John Walsh, whose son Adam had been found dead in a nationally famous missing-child case, was and remains the host nearly 17 years later, with more than 800 fugitives captured.

Families of victims, especially, trust Walsh, because he's experienced in the ordeal they're undergoing.

"Unfortunately, I've walked in their shoes, so I know where they're coming from," Walsh said. "The media can be brutal.

"After Adam was murdered, a lot of the media that we begged to keep Adam's story going for the two weeks that he was missing lost interest after the first or second day. I had begged them to keep helping us look for this little boy, and, of course, when parts of him were found two weeks later, the most horrible murder, they were all camped out on our front lawn."

It was a horrible experience, he said.

"It's actually part of my deal with Fox, that I'll never do a story a victim doesn't want me to do," Walsh said. "We'll never show the face of a molested or abused child. That criteria has been my standard for 17 years. And if they don't want to say something, or are uncomfortable, this is not '60 Minutes,' this is my show. If they don't want to talk about it, it's okay."

The program, modeled after the BBC's "Crimewatch U.K.," went after FBI Top 10 wanted killer David James Roberts in its pilot, and caught him, identified by several people at a Manhattan homeless shelter.

"When it started," said "AMW" executive producer Lance Heflin, "everyone was just shrieking in horror. 'Oh my God, it's vigilante TV! Everyone will be turning in their brothers and their neighbors! Here comes George Orwell and company!'

"It was never that, and never turned out that."

The show helped catch John List, then the Texas 7, and, most famously, helped return Elizabeth Smart to her parents after nine months.

"America's Most Wanted" has lasted so long, Heflin said, because it's audience (7.7 million viewers last week) is so loyal: "People trust us, and they know what they're going to get with us."

And that has helped keep the show running. The top four longest-running shows still on the air are "60 Minutes," the Disney umbrella showcase, "Monday Night Football" and "20/20."

How many reality shows will run that long? Not many.

As for reality the genre, Walsh is dismissive.

"I think it's unreality TV, to tell you the truth," he said. "A woman in a bikini eating two yards of horse colon is not reality TV. 'Who Wants to Marry a Ho??' That's not reality TV."

A rarity in America, Irish group makes a splash in the U.S.

By Matt O'Rourke
Collegian Staff

It can be a letdown when one learns of a band from oversees that doesn't receive the same praise in the States as it does in its home country. Once in a while however, a band can break into a music scene abroad as an opening act for another artist, or through a mix tape from a friend. Irish rockers The Frames are one such example. After touring this past year with folk-rock artist Damien Rice, The Frames have managed to earn a small but strong following here in the United States.

With the release of their live album entitled "Setlist," The Frames have captured the live show experience with all the highs and lows of actually being present at the recording. Recorded over a few nights in Dublin in 2003, The Frames picked the best tracks and compiled them into an album of 13 energy-driven songs.

"Setlist" opens with a punch in "Revelate." What at first begins with a recording of a song from "Willy Wonka and the Chocolate Factory," soon jumps with intense guitar driven vigor into a moment that defines the rest of the album — pure rock. The crowd begins chanting along with Glen Hassard, the lead singer, as he sings, "My single slant, this broken chant." Heavy guitar melodies combined with rock violin create a sound that will blow away rock aficionados. Colm MacConlomaire's sweeping violin solo melds the folk aspect of The Frames with heavy rock feel in a moment that is sure to give listener chills.

The Frames 'Setlist' Plateau Records

The chilling effect of MacConlomaire's violin continues with "Star, Star," a soft ballad where Hassard sings about bringing out the best in oneself. Building in volume, the ballad increases in instrumentation and emotion.

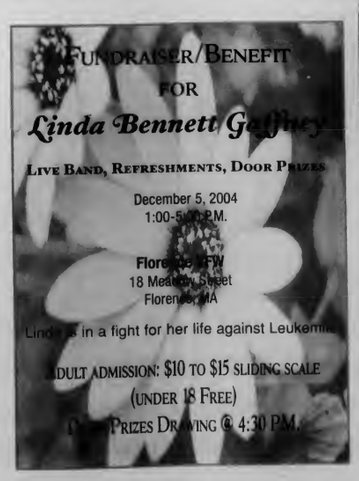
Hassard proves that emotional singing can be perhaps the most powerful type of vocalization in "God Bless Mom," which features perhaps the best live moments of the entire album, while also featuring the worst. Complex guitar strumming, fueled by a driving drum rhythm, complimented by single chords on another electric guitar, highlight the vocal overtones, providing a dark yet rich sound. At about two minutes into the song, MacConlomaire's violin and the rest of band break, but only for a second, coming together in perfect sync to make an incredible "grand entrance". Unfortunately, only seconds later, Hassard and his backup Doyle sing terribly out of tune.

The listener is rewarded however at about three and a half minutes in, when a Pixies-esque bassline and guitar rhythm akin to the Clash kicks in. The moment builds and builds, with a sudden eruption of sound, where one might find themselves with their fist pumping in the air, or jumping with excitement. It's truly a moment of rock excellence.

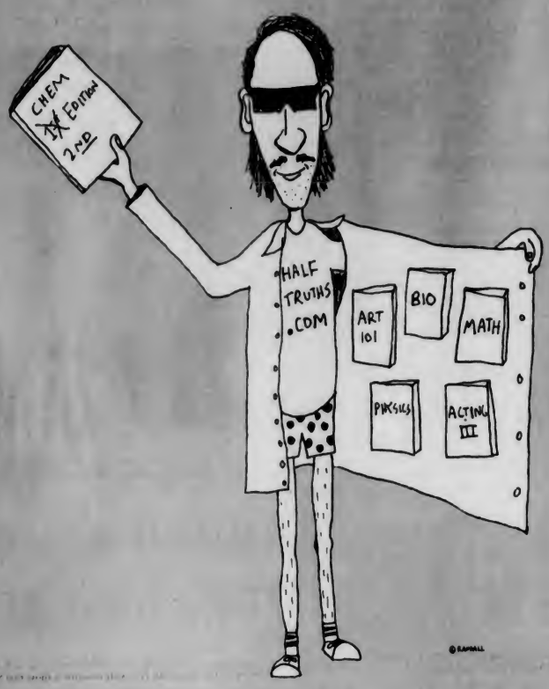
"Pavement Tune" and "The Stars Are Underground" thunder with heavy guitar resonance and drums clattering precise rhythms. The Frames master their timing, never missing a key moment, and one knows they're well rehearsed. Three part harmonies are present, but in an arrangement that consists of either the guitar, violin and vocalist, or a combination with the crowd singing. Make no mistake, The Frames use the crowd as an instrument and they do it well.

Considered by many to be their best song back in Ireland, The Frames use "Fitzcarraldo" as one of their closers. Hassard found inspiration for writing the song after seeing a movie of the same title where a man had to pull a ship over a mountain. Using that metaphor, The Frames combine great songwriting with a well-arranged piece. A Spanish guitar rhythm (played on an electric) combined with dark undertones, makes for a great piece. Every instrument is important here. Doyle's bass line, the simple carrying drum rhythm, and of course, Colm's rock violin. Hassard sings "Even the good stars fall from grace and falter" as the band rocks as a single unit, combining different elements of world music, and varied rock influences, before climaxing with Colm's last solo.

Listening to The Frames is an experience, which is difficult to describe. It's something you have to feel. For those who miss the emotion in rock, — and this isn't emo — and who want to experience a live show without being there, this album is for you. There is something for everyone in their music, and you don't know what you're missing till you've given them a try.



Information from the Web site theframes.ie was used in this report.



Courtesy Plateau Records

Despite past commercial success in Ireland, until now the Frames have yet to make much noise in the United States.

GET A GREAT PRICE ON THE WRONG BOOK.

IT WON'T HELP YOU PASS YOUR CLASS, BUT THINK OF THE MONEY YOU'LL SAVE!

At your campus bookstore we work directly with your professors to ensure we only order the exact books they plan on using. Buy your books somewhere else and you may or may not get what you're really after. And at efollett.com you can order your books online and pick them up in store, so there's no waiting or shipping to pay. So if you're looking for a deal, now you know where to look.

Your campus bookstore has the right book

UMass Amherst
University Store
and Textbook Annex
Phone: (413)545-2619

efollett.com
ONLINE. ON CAMPUS.

UMass hosts Syracuse in an old school battle at 'The Cage'

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Big East teams have proven to be formidable opponents for the Massachusetts women's basketball team in the 2004-2005 season.

After falling to No. 20 Boston College six days ago, the Minutewomen (2-3) scored a huge rebound against the Providence College Lady Friars (0-5) with a 53-39 win Wednesday night at Alumni Hall in Providence.

It is the fewest amount of points the Minutewomen have allowed in a game since December of 2000 when they trounced the New Hampshire Wildcats 56-39.

Katie Nelson led all scorers on the night for the first time this season, registering 13 points, four rebounds and a season-high five assists. Tamara Tatham recorded her first double-double of the year with 12 points and 11 rebounds, and Pam Rosanio netted 10 points — all 10 coming on a 14-0 run in the second half — on a 4-for-10 night from the floor.

Sophomore Shauna Snyder met Tatham's ante with a double-double of her own, grabbing 13 boards and dropping 12 points. She would be the only Friar, however, to create anything on offense, as no other players reached double figures in any category besides minutes.

Despite a lack of production by the home squad, PC held a six-point lead with just over 14 minutes to go in the game. That's when the Minutewomen found a second wind, embarking on a 9-0 run that started with a 3-pointer from Nelson. Nelson then stole the ball on PC's ensuing drive and kicked it out to Tamara Tatham, who laid it in for a one-point game.

Another Tatham, freshman Alisha, contributed arguably one of the most important plays of the game when she stole the ball from a Friar guard and made the unselfish pass to sister Tamara, who was fouled and went to the line for two.

Alisha took lead from the recent successes of fellow froshies Rosanio, Whitney McDonald and Kate Mills and has become a factor on defense.

"[Alisha] got some quality minutes and some quality rebounds as well," coach Marnie Dacko said. "She's a hawk on defense. She really stepped it up."

Tamara went 1-for-2 at the line to tie it up at 34 apiece, and the Minutewomen ceased to trail for the remaining 10 minutes. In fact, they turned on the jets and embarked on an offensive surge that has only surfaced a few times this season. Alisha stole the ball for the second time in two trips but missed a trey. Rebounding machine Brooke Campbell eventually came up with the ball and was fouled as she laid the ball in.

UMass went on a 14-0 run to close out the game. Rosanio, who had been on the bench for most of the half, hit double figures for the fourth time in five games, scoring all 10 of her points on this run.

And with Providence out of the way, the Maroon and White have now shifted their focus on the final of three Big East opponents this season: Syracuse.

And what better way to close out their Big East door than with a historic backdrop. Tomorrow's matchup with the Orange will not be played at the Mullins Center, but instead the women will be lacing up the sneakers on the other side of campus at the historic Curry Hicks Cage.

"Rage in the Cage III," as it is being promoted by the UMass athletic department, is a chance not only to see some great women's basketball, but an opportunity to take in the rich history that lurks inside the small arena.

When players set foot on that court at 1:30 p.m. tomorrow for warm-ups, they will be running through their Mikan drills and pre-game stretches on the same hardwood floor that once played host to the feet of some of UMass's most famous alumni.

When they go to the line for two, it will be on the same marked-off space where players like Julius Erving, Al Skinner, Lou Roe, Rick Pitino and countless others have taken their shots.

When they set up on the low post, it will be in spots once ruled by the likes of Sue Peters and Octavia Thomas.

There's a lot of history within the confines of the Cage. For the third straight year, the Minutewomen will try to create a little more.

The Orange are 4-0 this season, most recently escaping Hamden, Conn. with a 65-61 win against Quinnipiac. The Orange's efforts were aided in that contest by a 19-point effort from sophomore guard Lauren Kohn.

Like the Minutewomen, the Orange have a tendency to let the opposition back into the game. In four of Syracuse's games, the opponent hung in through at least the last 10 minutes of the game. But also like the Minutewomen, SU bears the potential to catch fire and put a game out of reach, like its 61-45 defeat of Manhattan on Thanksgiving Day.

In last year's meeting between the two on Nov. 25, the Minutewomen held a nine-point lead over SU going into the half. But with such a depleted roster and inexperienced bench, UMass ran out of gas and gave up the lead, eventually falling 62-54.

However, this is not last year's team. There is more depth and experience at each position, and even the inexperienced are showing they can hang with the starting rotation.

"Syracuse is someone we certainly want to challenge," Dacko said. "There's going to come a point in time for our team where we establish a lead and hang onto it. We've got the makings of a very good, strong basketball team."

And what better of a place to play than in their comfort zone? Certainly, playing a game in an area one practices in several times a week would make for a comfortable place to reach .500 for the first time this year.

"The kids are very comfortable at the Cage," Dacko said. "Our players like the Cage a lot."

Giambi: Busted!

GIAMBI from page 10

in his performance after starting to use the drugs, the newspaper reported.

Giambi came to spring training this year looking noticeably trimmer as baseball began a steroid-testing program that included punishments for the first time. Asked in February whether he had ever taken performance-enhancing drugs, Giambi said: "Are you talking about steroids? No."

Giambi won the AL MVP in 2000 for Oakland and signed a $120 million, seven-year free-agent contract with the Yankees after the 2001 season. He hit 155 homers from 1999-2002 and batted over .300 each season, but injuries slowed him down the last two years.

Bothered by a balky knee, Giambi hit just .250 in 2003. Giambi batted .208 and played in only 80 games last season, missing time because of a tumor, which the New York Daily News reported was in his pituitary gland. Medical experts told the Chronicle that Clomid, a female fertility drug Giambi said he thought Anderson had given him, can exacerbate a tumor of the pituitary gland.

Giambi's younger brother, Jeremy, who last played in the majors with Boston in 2003, also testified that he used performance-enhancing drugs given to him by Anderson, according to the Chronicle.

—Associated Press

PAUL J. BERESWILL/NEWSDAY

Jason Giambi walks back to the dugout after striking out in the 2003 ALCS. Giambi recently admitted to using performance enhancing drugs despite publicy denying previous accusations on the matter.

Minutemen look to change luck at home

HOCKEY from page 10

the road on smaller ice surfaces.

"The only issue right now is Providence College on Friday night and how we emotionally get prepared, how we physically get prepared, and how we get the energy level that's going to allow us to go out and play as well as we're capable of playing," Cahoon said.

Tomorrow night, the Minutemen will host the Terriers of Boston University (7-6-0, 6-1-0 Hockey East) for the first meeting between the two teams this season.

It will also be a meeting between two very old friends in Cahoon and Terriers' coach Jack Parker. Cahoon played left wing for Boston University during the team's two national championship teams in 1971-72, and he also served as an assistant coach under Parker three separate times, the last stint coming in 1990-91.

To further the connections between the two teams, Cahoon also recruited Paul Fenton to play for the Terriers in the late 1970s.

Boston University, which is currently in first place in the Hockey East, also dropped two games to the same two teams in Colorado last weekend, allowing Cahoon and Parker to catch up a bit.

"Jack and I are great friends," Cahoon said. "We spent the entire weekend together in Colorado and shared a lot of information. There's not much we don't know about each other's teams.

"It's always nice to play against him and beat him ... They're always special contests, but when the game is going on we're just trying to execute and win. I don't think a lot about Jack, and I doubt that he thinks a lot about me. We've had some interesting games over the years, and hopefully we'll have some more in the future."

Before the game tomorrow night, UMass plans to honor the 1972 ECAC Division II Championship team. It was the only time that UMass, which was known as the Redmen back then, has won a championship in its hockey history. In addition, should BU lose to rival Boston College tonight, Parker will be attempting a little history of his own tomorrow night, gunning for his 700th career victory.

Pierce apologizes to team

WALTHAM (AP) — Boston Celtics captain Paul Pierce apologized on Thursday for arguing with coach Doc Rivers after being benched for not hustling.

"Emotions got involved. I really didn't handle it the right way," Pierce said a day after the argument during Wednesday night's 101-100 win over Milwaukee. "So I'm just going to come out and apologize to my teammates, the coaching staff, the fans of Boston for what happened last night.

"It was uncalled for. I reacted at the moment. That's all it was. We handled it like men. I apologized to the team this morning, and we move on."

Pierce said that he and Rivers had not talked things out, but the conversation doesn't need to be a long one.

"He's the coach," Pierce said. "Whatever he says goes, and that's it."

Pierce was pulled from the game against the Bucks with just over 4 1/2 minutes to play and the Celtics holding a 92-91 lead. The star guard appeared agitated when Jiri Welsch came in for him. Pierce then got into a brief shouting match that Rivers ended by shouting, "You sit."

Rivers said he was upset because he didn't think Pierce was heading out quickly enough on the fastbreak. The coach, in his first year with the Celtics, said the argument "looked a lot worse than it was."

"I sat him because I didn't think we were doing the right things," Rivers said. "I'd rather for him to be upset. I don't want a guy on my team who shows no passion. ... It's never personal."

The two chatted in the huddle during a timeout, and Pierce returned to hit a 3-pointer on Boston's first possession to give the Celtics a 97-93 lead with 2:40 to go.

"Regardless of what happens, I can't let it affect this team in winning and losing," Pierce said, adding that he wants to set a better example for the young players on the team.

"I was upset because I couldn't remember the last time I got snatched out of a game for something that was minor. But as a coach he makes the decisions, and I've got to deal with it and move on."

Rivers said benching Pierce, the team's best player, was not intended as a message for its lesser stars.

—Associated Press

Psst, UMass Amherst Seniors!

You're not going to look like this forever.

Take your senior yearbook pictures today!

Senior Portrait Sitting Dates are:

November 29	November 30	December 1
December 2	December 3	December 6
December 7	December 8	December 9
December 10	January 24	January 25
January 26	January 27	January 28

Go to www.ouryear.com and use school code 147 to schedule your appointment today

GREAT Reasons to use UHS Eye Care Services

1. Savings on eyeglasses from the on-site Optical Services at UHS
2. A great place to get contact lenses
3. Convenient hours and location
4. FREE eyeglass adjustments and one year warranty on frames
5. Savings on routine eye exams for students at UMass

SPECIAL OFFER: 10 PERCENT STUDENT DISCOUNT ON ALL FRAMES AND EYEGLASS LENSES!*

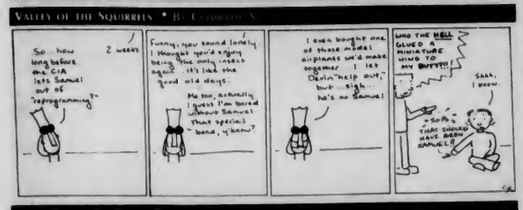
"I invite you to use the Eye Care Services"

Frederick H. Bloom, O.D. Director, UHS Eye Care Services

* Cannot be combined with other insurance discounts.

For appointments or questions, call 577-5383

UHS EYE CARE SERVICES

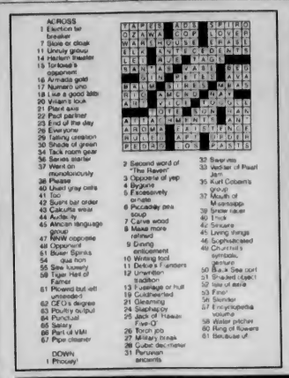


Over the Hedge • By [illegible]

The Torquets • By [illegible]

Valley of the Squirrels • By Cosmo D. X.

Mr. Gnu • By [illegible]



The Family Monster • By Jason Shiga

Quote of the Day

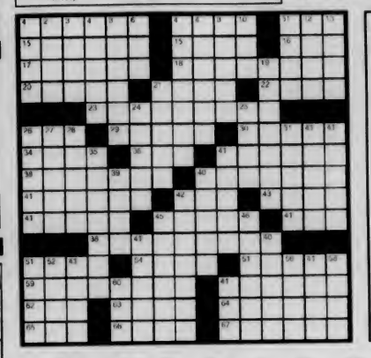
"With any luck, by next year - I'll be going out with one of these girls [picture of supermodels. But for now, let me say - Without hope or agenda - Just because it's Christmas - And at Christmas you tell the truth - To me, you are perfect - And my wasted heart will love you - Until you look like this [picture of a mummy] - Merry Christmas."

-Mark, Love Actually

ACROSS
1 Election tie breaker
7 Slide or dilute
11 Unruly group
14 Harbor theater
15 Tortoise's opponent
16 Armada gold
17 Numero uno
18 Like a good bibb
20 Vivian's love
21 Plant acid
22 Pool partner
23 End of the day
26 Everyone
29 Talking creature
30 Shade of green
34 Tack room gear
36 Series starter
37 Went on monotonously
38 Please
40 Overt gray cells
41 Sol
42 Sushi bar order
43 Calcutta wrap
44 Activity
45 African language group
47 Revile opposite
48 Opponent
51 Buser Spinks
54 ___ bar hon
55 Slew loosely
58 Tiger Hall of Famer
61 Plowed but still unloaded
62 QED's degree
63 Poultry output
64 Punctual
65 Salary
66 Part of VIM
67 Pipe cleaner

DOWN
1 Privately
2 Second word of "The Raven"
3 Opposite of yep
4 Bygone
5 Excessively ornate
6 Possibly sea soup
7 Canine wood
8 Make more refined
9 Giving entitlement
10 Writing tool
11 Detroit Tigers
12 Unwritten tradition
13 Passenger or hull
19 Godmother
21 Gleaming
24 Shepherdly
25 Jack of Hawaii Five-O
26 Tech grp.
27 Military brass
28 Cubic decimeter
31 Peruvian ancients
32 Bear into
33 Washer of Pearl Jam
35 Kurt Cobain's group
37 Mouth of Mississippi
39 Snake raiser
40 Thick
41 Screams
45 Living things
46 Sophisticated
49 Churchill's symbolic gesture
50 B.A.'s See cort
51 Shaded (dark)
52 Isle of Java
53 Fine
56 Slander
57 Encyclopedia volume
59 Roster pitcher
60 Ring of flowers
61 Because of

The Moan and Dove



_____ & Beer (fill in the blank)

_____ & Beer (fill in the blank)

Give me some more

_____ & Beer (fill in the blank)

themoananddove.com
460 West St. • Rte. 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

Now accepting applications for:

[illegible]

For the Spring 2005

Please call 545-3500 or stop by. Applications are due Dec. 7th @ 4P.M.

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Today is the end of an era. Be prepared for things to be a little different.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You really need to learn how to do things faster.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
The best coincidence ever will happen today. It's serendipitous in fact.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
You should jump and shout a lot because it's fun.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
You need to keep a very open mind about what you will be faced with today.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Today someone you would never expect is going to be nice to you.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Some careless joking is going to get you into big trouble.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Secrets, secrets are no fun. You should start talking.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Today at lunch you will see something that strikes you as very profound.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Don't bring up the past because you will only regret it.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Today you will get just the creative spark you were looking for.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You should seek some motivation from the master.

Blow away your competitors, advertise with The Collegian

Call 545-3500

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

APARTMENT FOR RENT

One bedroom apartment for rent. Puffton Village. Starting in January. 765/month. Heat and hot water included. Call 978-502-9036

2 Bedroom 2 Bathroom Lease from Jan-Aug $1,100/Month, Utilities included Contact Jenna @ 917-753-3591

Brandywine Apts. 1 Bedroom units Available Jan 1, 2005 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com Stop by or call 549-0600 Need an Apt. for

APARTMENT FOR RENT

2nd Semester? Short Term Leases, Free Heat, Huge Bedrooms Call The Boulders 256-8534

AUTO FOR SALE

1986 Mercury Wagon excellent condition all options 103K $1500 413-773-3346

2000 VW Beetle Turbo Leather all options 73K $6200 413-773-3346

CHILDCARE

Responsible, Experienced person to care for 17 month twin girls in exchange for room and board. Amherst.

CHILDCARE

Flexible hours. 413-256-4559

COMPUTERS

Pentium Laptop $99- Pentium III Desktop $99- 413-584-8857

EMPLOYMENT

Student to Assist Local Homeowner, Yardwork + moving furniture $10.00hr Call Fred 413-734-0526

"Bartending" $300/Day Potential. No Experience Nesc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

EMPLOYMENT

Winter Break Employment at the Boston University Bookstore. Many temp jobs available! Kenmore Square location. Applications accepted Dec. 7 & 8 at the UMass Campus Center Concourse or email your resume to bnhmnres@bu.edu

Need money for the Holidays? Local moving company looking for mature responsible individuals to work between Thanksgiving and Christmas, and after. Part time hours available. Call 584-4746

FOR SALE

MP3 $50 Avon Special MP3 & 100's of gifts under $10. Buy or Sell Kat ISR 413-585-1581.

ROOMMATE WANTED

325/month inclusive call 413-775-9997

SERVICES

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house Certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

SERVICES

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

TRAVEL

1SPRING BREAK Largest selection of Destinations, including Cruises! VIP Club Parties & FREE trips. Epicurean Tours 1-800-231-4-FUN www.BREAKNOW.com

TRAVEL

Spring Break Bahamas Celebrity Party Cruise! 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Nassau, Jamaica. From $459! Panama City & Daytona $159! www.SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Spring Break 2005- Travel with STS, America's #1 Student Tour Operator to Jamaica, Cancun, Acapulco, Bahamas and Florida. Now hiring on-campus reps. Call for group discounts. Information/ Reservations 1-800-648-4849 or www.ststravel.com.

TRAVEL

StudentCity.com The Ultimate Spring Break Experience. 1-888-SpringBreak, or www.StudentCity.com to reserve today.

SPRING BREAK '05
SAVE $100 PER ROOM
Clip & Send or Use Code: PRINT, Online
www.sunsplashtours.com
1.800.426.7710

WANTED

Snowboard events intern $50/day stipend. For job description email jfriends@deerfield.edu

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEEKEND

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 3, 2004 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

'Battle in Seattle'

Minutemen head out west to take on the Gonzaga Bulldogs

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

After suffering another painful, early-season loss to a mid-major opponent — something that has become a staple of head coach Steve Lappas' four-year tenure — the Massachusetts men's basketball team will make the cross-country flight to Seattle, Wash., where it will face No. 25 Gonzaga in "The Battle In Seattle" on Saturday. Tip-off is slated for 4 p.m. Eastern Time at Key Arena, with the game being broadcast locally on College Sports Television.

Reeling after finishing an 84-68 loss to Northeastern with just one point over the final six-plus minutes Wednesday night, UMass will look to ignite a sputtering offense that has featured poor shooting performances from sophomore guards Maurice Maxwell and Art Bowers among others, and a lack of consistency from buzzer to buzzer.

Such troubles come at an inopportune time for the Minutemen, as the match up with the Zags will begin their most difficult stretch of the season. Following their departure from Seattle, the Minutemen will host defending national champion Connecticut on Thursday at the Mullins Center, followed by a trip to south Florida to take on Atlantic Coast Conference newcomer Miami.

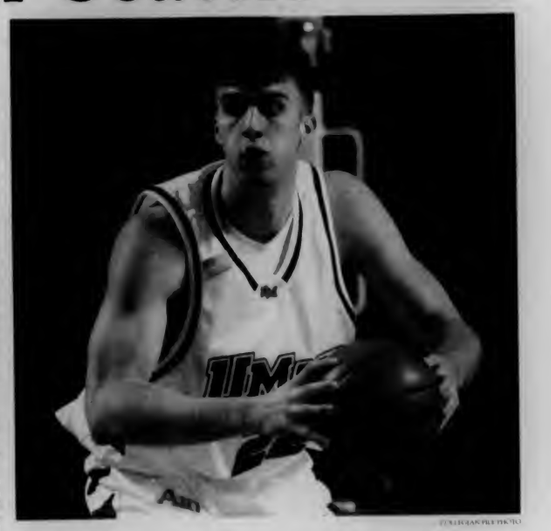
With that in mind, Lappas knows the need for a quick fix to his team's offensive woes must be addressed immediately.

"I'm not sure what's wrong with us offensively," Lappas said following the loss to the Huskies. "We've done a lot of good things at times, but we've kind of fell into a lull during some stretches where we're not moving around like we need to and not knocking down open shots."

One player who has produced the offensive success that was expected of him has been sophomore forward Rashaun Freeman. A leading candidate for Atlantic 10 Player of the Year, Freeman scored a team-high 18 points and grabbed 11 rebounds against NU, but will face arguably his toughest test of the season against Gonzaga (4-1) and All-American center Ronny Turiaf.

Averaging 25.6 points per game and 10 rebounds per contest, Turiaf ranks fourth in the nation in scoring and has established himself as one of the premier big men in the country. At 6-foot-10, he will provide a larger-than-life challenge for Freeman and the Minutemen, something Lappas is keenly aware of.

"The difference between Turiaf and Ray is that Turiaf is a bona-fide NBA center," Lappas said at Wednesday's Alumni Association sports luncheon. "He has the potential to be a lottery pick in the NBA Draft, and he is an imposing force down low.



"It's going to be a great challenge for Ray and our team and something we're going to have to address if we hope to win the game."

Also providing a major contribution offensively for Gonzaga is sophomore Adam Morrison, who averages 19.6 points per game and 6.6 rebounds per game from his forward position. More importantly, however, is that Morrison gives the Bulldogs a legitimate second option who can score consistently — something UMass has lacked at times in its first three games.

"They are a solid offensive team," Lappas said. "They can beat you with more than just Turiaf, and we need to be prepared to play solid defense and deny them open looks. If we can do that, then we can work to establish our tempo and control the pace of the game."

The game will mark the first meeting between UMass and Gonzaga and will also be the first time a UMass team has played a team from the state of Washington, as well as the first time it will play in the state. Over the last few years, Gonzaga has garnered much national attention as it rose from mid-major status to a perennial NCAA contender.

The Bulldogs were ranked for all of 2003-04, and finished the season third overall and as a No. 2 seed in the NCAA tournament. The game is the first of a three-year deal, which will bring the Zags to the Mullins Center next season, and send the Minutemen to the Gonzaga campus in Spokane, Wash. in 2006-07.

COLLEGIAN FILE PHOTO

Jeff Viggiano and the Minutemen will travel across the country to take on Gonzaga tomorrow at 4 p.m.

Busted: Jason Giambi admits to steroid use

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — New York Yankees slugger Jason Giambi injected himself with human growth hormone in 2003 and used steroids for at least three seasons, according to his grand jury testimony that was reviewed by the San Francisco Chronicle.

The testimony given in December 2003 to the federal grand jury investigating BALCO contradicts Giambi's public proclamations that he never used performance-enhancing drugs.

Baseball probably cannot punish Giambi. Penalties for steroid use began in 2004. Human growth hormone, or hGH, is not specifically banned by the major leagues.

Giambi described to grand jurors how he injected hGH in his stomach, testosterone into his buttocks, rubbed an undetectable steroid knows as "the cream" on his body and placed drops of another, called "the clear," under his tongue, the Chronicle reported Thursday.

Giambi testified that he obtained several different steroids from Barry Bonds' personal trainer, Greg Anderson, one of four men indicted by the grand jury probing the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative. He said he got the hGH from a gym in Las Vegas.

Anderson's attorney, Tony Serra, declined comment to the Chronicle, citing a court order.

Anderson, BALCO founder Victor Conte, BALCO vice president James Valente and track coach Remi Korchemny all have pleaded not guilty to the charges, which include steroid distribution.

The Chronicle report came out the day before Conte is scheduled to speak on the ABC program "20-20."

On Wednesday, a federal judge refused to immediately dismiss the charges in response to accusations that prosecutors illegally searched BALCO headquarters and Anderson's house and car. U.S. District Judge Susan Illston said she may conduct hearings into the matter in January.

Giambi was among dozens of elite athletes — including Bonds, Gary Sheffield and track stars Tim Montgomery and Marion Jones — who testified before the grand jury last year under a promise of limited immunity from prosecution.

Bonds, Jones and Montgomery deny using performance-enhancing drugs. Sheffield told Sports Illustrated and ESPN he used "the cream" and "the clear" from BALCO, but that he did not know they contained steroids.

Giambi told grand jurors that he didn't notice a "huge difference"

See GIAMBI on page 8

UMass returns home after tough road trip

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

The wheels are starting to fall off the bus.

Literally.

After the Massachusetts hockey team lost 5-2 to Vermont last Tuesday in the second contest of their winless four-game road trip, the team was traveling back to Amherst when two wheels on the team's bus actually fell off.

Luckily enough for the Minutemen, Paul Fenton, father of freshman P.J. Fenton and an eight-year NHL veteran, was following the team bus and helped them make their way back to campus by starting his own personal shuttle service.

The younger Fenton has done a great job of rejuvenating a team that lost most of its talent from last year's squad that reached the Hockey East finals. He leads the Minutemen (6-8-1, 3-3-1 Hockey East) with eight goals and is second to Matt Anderson with 13 points.

With the four-game road trip — which saw the Minutemen travel somewhere around 5,000 miles to places as far north as Maine and Vermont and as far west as Colorado to do battles with Colorado College and Denver — is finally over with, and UMass will play five of its next six games at the Mullins Center.

Coach Don Cahoon is treating this weekend's games against Providence College and Boston University as a fresh start for a tired team. He has held short practices, which haven't extended much longer than an hour, all week so this young squad could rest up for two tough Hockey East tests that could really set the tone for the remainder of the long season.

"We love playing the game," Cahoon said. "This is what we've chosen. This is how we define ourselves so you don't get caught up too much with what has happened in the past. You try to learn from it. You try to use it as a starting point in your teaching, but you can't get caught up with worrying about how we've lost four in a row."

Tonight, the Minutemen will try playing rude hosts to the Providence Friars (5-7-1, 2-5-1 Hockey East) at 7 p.m. Earlier this season, the two teams split a home-and-home series with each team solidly defending its home ice in a very chippy weekend for both teams with plenty of extra curricular activity happening in the corners and after the whistles.

The up-and-down weekend against the Friars has showcased what has been the underlying theme of inconsistency for the Minutemen this season. Before the last string of games, UMass would often follow up a poor showing with a convincing victory and vice-versa.

"We're not getting consistent performances from our players," Cahoon said. "I've got a run of [several] kids playing extremely well in a given situation and too many kids not playing up to their abilities on a regular basis, so consistency has probably been our biggest shortcoming."

Cahoon planned to dwell on the game tape that featured the 2-0 win at the Mullins Center on Oct. 30 — rather than the 6-2 loss in Providence the night before — for the short-term, but he also said he was looking at the tape from the road contest during the previous night to determine why his team hasn't played well on

See HOCKEY on page 8

KAREN WINOGRAD/COLLEGIAN

Freshman P.J. Fenton will look to help the Minutemen end their current four-game losing streak when they take the ice twice this weekend at the Mullins Center to play Providence College and Boston University.

UMASS

Weekend Schedule

Friday, Dec. 3

Sport	Opp./Event	Time
Men's Hockey	vs. Providence	7:00 p.m.

Saturday, Dec. 4

Sport	Opp./Event	Time
Women's Basketball	vs. Syracuse	2:00 p.m.
Men's Basketball	at Gonzaga	4:00 p.m.
Men's Hockey	vs. Boston University	7:00 p.m.

Sunday, Dec. 5

Sport	Opp./Event	Time
Women's Swimming	at Nutmeg Invitational	11:00 a.m.
Men's Swimming	at Nutmeg Invitational	11:00 a.m.

Josh Ritter comes to the Iron Horse

ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 5

MONDAY: High: 34, Low: 27 — TUESDAY: High: 44, Low: 38 — WEDNESDAY: High: 59, Low: 29

DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

UMass returns home for weekend split

SPORTS, PAGE 10

The Daily Collegian

MONDAY, DECEMBER 6, 2004 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXIV ISSUE 61

Boston Globe editor speaks to UMass journalism students

By Adam O'Neal
Collegian Correspondent

Last month, a top editor for The Boston Globe came to UMass to speak to journalism students on editing as a delicate balancing act that requires provocation, sensitivity and a sharp ability to report.

The role of a newspaper's opinion section is, "sometimes to be provocative and cause debate, but it has to be done sensitively," said Renée Loth, the editorial page editor at the Globe. "There's an important balance: giving free vent to a broad array of opinions, while balancing the responsibility of the paper to the community. You don't want to turn off your readers."

Loth is responsible for maintaining that balance in the editorial and op-ed pages—the last two pages of the Globe's front section. The two pages are so important, she said, that the Globe considers Martin Baron, the editor of the rest of the paper, and Loth, the highest-ranking woman at the paper, to be of equal rank, second only to the publisher.

To achieve that balance, Loth said that she strives to represent three voices in the two pages.

The first voice, the editorials without bylines, represent the, "voice of the institution of the Globe," she said. Editorial board members write these pieces, usually 450 words in length. Loth and her colleagues, who she jokingly called "graybeards" ("I'm the second youngest person on the editorial board, and I'm 51," she quipped.), hold the role of "ambassadors to the community," she said, and regularly meet with community groups and others to assume that role.

The second voice, the columns on the op-ed page, represent the "voices of full-time staff and members of the community," she explained, who are loosely edited to enable a balancing of other views, not usually those of the editorial staff.

The third voice, the letters to the editor, represents the voices of readers. "We really like to have a good cross-section of responses from our readers," she said.

"When all three voices are working properly," Loth said, "we [Globe board members] have op-ed columnists and the voices of the people representing a whole range of opinions. And so [these two pages] represent the public forum of the Globe."

It is Loth and her 20 staff members who are paid to get these voices working properly. In other words, they are paid to edit.

"We try to get local, national and international news in the editorials [every day]," she said. "A good editorial will recognize the other side's view right there in the piece. And it respects the other side," she said. Students interested in writing good editorials, she advised, should, "take their opponents' strongest argument(s) and explain why your position is better."

She said that the editing of the op-ed columns is "kept to matters of clarity and taste. We only edit columns for clarity, obscenity, libel, etc.—the big no-no's."

She emphasized the importance of becoming a sharp reporter of straight news, as a prerequisite to column writing.

"You can't be a good columnist unless you start with straight news," she said. "Opinion writing is news writing with an extra layer of work. It takes more skill."

Loth said she and her staff generally look for clarity, intelligence and authenticity in letters from readers. Authenticity proved to be problematic during the recent presidential campaign, when Loth discovered she had printed canned, pro-Bush letters that were sent to newspapers all over the country from the same website. The lesson for her, she said, was to follow a basic rule of reporting: verify the source and its quality.

Loth said she has not forgotten a lesson she learned when she began her journalism career in the 1970s while writing for a local paper.

"[Newspapers] matter more on local issues," she said. Issues are more important to readers when they are closer to them, she said.

"Local issues are harder to write about than national or international issues," Loth said. "The feelings are much closer to home, much more intense."

"I learned early on in my career the pressure of local reporting," she said. "You can't spell someone's name wrong because you might see him on the street the next day."

Loth spoke to UMass Amherst journalism classes on Nov. 9.

Annual Craft Fair attracts students

By Bill Donovan
Collegian Staff

Local artisans and craftsmen from New Jersey and Cape Cod gathered in the Concourse of the Student Center Dec. 1, 2 and 3 from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. at the Student Union Craft Centers annual fair.

Various tables were set up, showcasing the works of these professionals; such as miniature statues, decorations, photography, and jewelry. Past and current student members of the Craft Center sold their own as well.

"We have everything here from honey to herbal body perfume, jewelry, and embroidery," said Paula Hodecker, director of the Student Union Craft Center. "Working for this event, students learn of fundraising, promotion, marketing, and the business skills needed to set something like this up. This event livens the place up. There's a nice variety at reasonable prices affordable to students."

Student members at the event described the Fair as an excellent way to express themselves artistically. Some are restricted by the major they are in, and being involved with the group gives them an output for their creative needs. The students got to keep the profits they made off their products.

"We fill a void for the non-art major," Hodecker said.

"I wouldn't have a place to do the arts if I wasn't here. You can just go into the Center, get involved, and start something," said Molly Macfadden, student crafts fair coordinator. "This is a really important way to promote the arts on campus. It gives students like us certain things to aspire to."

Macfadden, a Spanish and Art double major, has been involved with the Student Union Craft Center since a freshman at UMass. Her first year as the student coordinator of the campus group, she was thrilled with the Craft Center turnout Thursday afternoon, Dec. 2.

"I'm really impressed with the fair," Macfadden said. "I'm thrilled with how it turned out."

Hodecker and Macfadden also explained the amount of planning which went into this three-day event. Press releases were sent out, and Macfadden even had a chance to promote the event on WMUA, the campus radio station.

Hodecker expressed the fact anyone can become involved with the Crafts Center.

"We want to be accessible for everyone, such as students

See CRAFTS on page 2

SCOTT B. RUDA/COLLEGIAN

Shoppers get a glance of a local artist's work during last week's annual craft fair in the Campus Center Concourse.

Stonewall Center showcases documentary

By Dan Terk
Collegian Staff

Last Thursday evening the Stonewall Center sponsored the showing of Tomboys, a documentary by Christian McEwen and Julie Akeret.

The movie explored both the customary idea of a tomboy, young girls that act more like boys, as well as a more untraditional manifestation of tomboys: "spirited woman." Tomboys also made the point that the term itself is archaic and inappropriate.

McEwen was on hand to present the film and also answers questions. She introduced the film by informing the audience that according to Grace Pally, a short story writer from New York, most students read six times more biographies about men then women. In children's books there are three times more heroes than heroines and twice at many animals are boys rather than girls.

The documentary "trapped tomboys through time" according McEwen. She also talked about her reasons for making the film: "to connect the rebel girl with the active women." The major concept was not to show what happens when girls act like boys, but to show what happens to the woman resister, the woman who is brave enough to break cultural norms. If anything, it was trying to bring to an end the idea that a tomboy is a girl acting like a boy, rather than a girl acting like herself – acting naturally.

The documentary followed four women: three are tomboys by definition, a high school student, an artist, and a firelighter. The fourth is an elderly activist. The artist featured made one of the most profound observations of all those interviewed. She recounted when her niece and nephew were jumping on a trampoline and the boy became very rambunctious. The boy's father said that it was okay, "just let him be a boy." She was frustrated not by his passiveness but that he had to "be a boy." Her outlook was that you should, "let them be whatever it is they need to be."

The high school student talked about how at times, espe-

See TOMBOY on page 2

Democracy Now discusses 'clean' elections

By Casey Novak
Collegian Staff

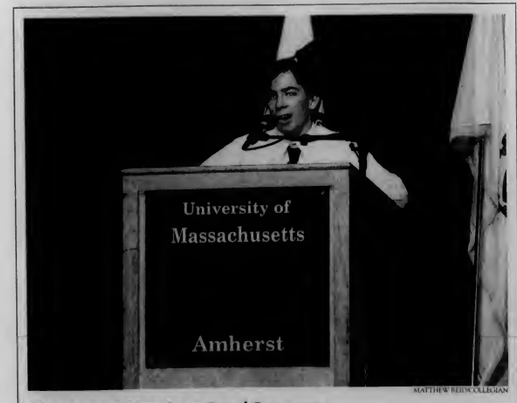
Democracy Matters, a new organization on campus, discussed last Wednesday the importance of clean elections and ways to go about educating the student body on why the issue "so closely pertains to them."

"Clean" or "fair" election legislation means that the state gives money to qualifying candidates during an election, which would ideally keep big corporations out of politics, which most of them are not, then a corporation can give any amount of money to a candidate," said DM member and junior English and Classics major Rachel Lewis. "We need to question why a corporation would do that unless there is some sort of payoff."

Baldacci asked the group to question what the corporation's incentive is to do that.

"If you start to ask those types of questions, you get to the reason why we are here," she said.

Democracy Matters is a national organization that was founded in 1996 by NBA player, Adonal Foyle of the Golden State Warriors. It has chapters on college campuses all over the country; however, it was just brought to the University of Massachusetts this semester and is not yet a registered student organization. While they are working towards that, their ultimate goal is to pass clean election legislation in Massachusetts.



"There is a possibility to get

See DEMOCRACY on page 2

"Clean elections basically allows average people to run," said Kate Baldacci, a junior psychology major and member of Democracy Matters. "So these are people that don't have the financial ability to run for office, advancing the idea that our country is built on that anyone can be president."

Currently, Arizona and Maine are the only states that have clean elections.

"If a corporation gives several million dollars to one candidate and they are not a politically inclined corporation,

MATTHEW REDUK/COLLEGIAN

Minuteman Marching Band Banquet

Senior English major band member Jameson Melbourne speaks to all graduating seniors of the marching band Saturday evening at their banquet in the Campus Center.

Drug war growing in Mexico

By Mark Stevenson
Associated Press

CANCUN, Mexico — Behind the glitzy playgrounds of Cancun is a growing drug war, fueled by widespread police corruption, the partial disruption of once-popular trafficking routes through Haiti and a sudden turf battle between two of the country's main drug gangs.

Three years after authorities thought they broke up the cocaine trade here, nine people have turned up dead, revealing a smuggling ring involving corruption at all levels of government and that took even federal investigators by surprise.

The discovery brings back memories of the dark days of the 1990s, when one gang, the Juarez cartel, moved huge amounts of cocaine along Mexico's Caribbean coast, allegedly with the protection of the state's former governor, Mario Villanueva, arrested in 2001 on drug charges.

But now, a shadowy chain of events involving several gangs has led to the killing of three federal agents and two police informants, the kidnapping and wounding of two federal investigators, and the discovery of four as yet unidentified bodies in the trunk of a burned car.

More than a dozen local and federal police agents have been arrested, including the wounded pair, adding to mounting evidence that police, business and local power figures are linked to the drug trade.

"It's like a little game to see who can get the drugs first" between the army, the navy, or traffickers in speed boats, said Donald Morgan, a fisherman and tour guide who moved to the coast from Washington state in 1976.

Describing shipments of drugs dumped from passing aircraft into the sea, he said: "It goes on all the time."

The drugs are destined for the United States, not the millions of Americans who visit Cancun annually. U.S. officials say there have been no reports so far of U.S. tourists caught up in the wholesale Gulf Coast drug trade and accompanying violence.

The trade here revolves around plastic-wrapped bales of Colombian cocaine tossed from small planes to waiting speedboats. Once ashore, the cocaine is put aboard trucks or airplanes for the trip north.

Mainly the victims and players have been Mexican police and police informants - though exactly why they were killed remains unclear.

Federal prosecutors say only that "the drug traffickers reacted violently, and began looking for something they thought the federal agents had."

Local officials who spoke on condition of anonymity said traffickers thought police had stolen a shipment of 11 pounds of heroin during a Nov. 9 raid on a house in Cancun.

A local columnist, Renan Castro, said the drug gangs wanted a computer disk police seized during the raid that allegedly contained the names of businessmen who launder money for the cartels. Prosecutors say they have no evidence such a list exists.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Peter Foustoko
MANAGING EDITOR Andrew Merritt
BUSINESS MANAGER Rich Pacheco
PRODUCTION MANAGER Cory Rosenberg
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Cameron Woods
ADVERTISING MANAGER Tiffany Sugalski
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Samantha Nielsen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Meghan Healy
COMICS EDITOR Alyson Zillmann
EDITORIAL EDITOR Paige Cram
NEWS EDITOR Erika Lovley
PHOTO EDITOR Matthew Reid
SPORTS EDITOR Mike Marrelli
CIRCULATION MANAGER Kristen Weiss
CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING Maety Pappas
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Josh Kuggins
FINANCE MANAGER Hiruk Shah
ACCOUNTING CLERK Virginie Frecaut
HOME DELIVERY Sandra Marquez
ASSISTANT OPERATORS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Josh Greenberg
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Jaclynn Sorenson
ASSISTANT FINANCE Thomas Hecht
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Rachael Bruno
GRAPHICS ADVISOR Charlie Higgins
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Mike Busch
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Monique Jemmott
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Yousef Munayyer
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Allison Edles
ASSISTANT NEWS Julie O'Donnell
ASSISTANT NEWS Dan O'Brien
ASSISTANT SPORTS Robert McGovern
ASSISTANT SPORTS Jeff Howe

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1958. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 5:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Mike Marzelli
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Megan Brinster
COPY EDITOR
Matt Elder
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Samantha M. Nielsen
PRODUCTION STAFF
Ali Zillmann and Amanda Allen

DO YOU WANT TO DRAW FOR COMICS
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Possible drug bust at Hampshire College

According to two sources, a drug bust at Hampshire College took place last month, and five people involved have left the school.

"The November 11th incident is related to an open investigation that was being conducted by Hampshire College Security," said Rennee Steese of the Northwest District Attorney's office.

Elaine Thomas of Hampshire College confirmed that marijuana and cocaine were involved in the bust, but amounts of each were not disclosed. She said that she did not think that large amounts of money were found, but she didn't know for certain.

Steese said that Hampshire College Security is continuing the investigation, and that the district attorney's office is not currently involved.

Thomas said that two students were dismissed and that three students withdrew from the college.

Many of the details about the investigation are confidential because they involve student information. However, some of the details were released.

"I don't think they are first year students," Thomas said because of where the students were living at the time of the incident. She said that the way the students are disciplined is also confidential.

Thomas said that she has been with the school six years, but this is the first sizeable drug bust that she has seen.

"I'm sure there are incidents," she said, but she didn't think it is very common. She said that she didn't have any numbers regarding any previous drug-related arrests on the campus.

Even though she couldn't give any specifics on the punishment of the students, Thomas had a strong stance on the issue.

"Illegal drug activity are against school policy," she said. "We will take action."

—Matthew Elder

Craft Fair showcases local artists and student photography majoring in Engineering, Computers, and Languages. They don't have access to the Arts," Hodecker said. We sell supplies at very low prices, affordable to Undergraduates. We also have evening workshops with one on one teaching. Sometimes we have a display case out in front of the center featuring the work of our customers as well as staff."

CRAFTS from page 1

UMass students had tables displaying their works at the Fair. Patrick Zephyr, a former Exercise Student was selling his photography at the event.

"This is how I've been making money for six years," Zephyr said.

"My first year here I was on the Concourse selling things. I love doing it. I like the energy of the college."

Keyse Angelo, a Women's Studies major who has just recently graduate from the university last May, also had a space on the Concourse. She now runs her own business, selling jewelry.

"I sold jewelry on the concourse for 3 years," she said. "The Craft Fair is how I started out taking this as a business seriously. The Craft Center is a great way to get people started."

A table filled with handmade dolls by former Craft Center employee Angela Zammarelli was showcased as well.

"I've been making dolls for a year and a half," explained Zammarelli. "First, I draw abstractly on a piece of cloth and then figure out where I want to go from there. I'm glad to be here, it's nice to have the opportunity to come back."

"There's a real, active group dynamic of Art as a business and teaching at the Craft's Center," commented Hodecker.

"Many times, it gives people the experience needed to make their own things. We are open to all students, undergraduate and graduate."

Membership is free to all interested in getting involved at the Craft Center. Students, faculty, staff, and administration are welcome. For members from the Five Colleges, it is $15 per semester and $25 a year.

The event was sponsored by the Student Government Association Arts Council and Graduate Student Senate. Donations were given by these organizations to pay the staff and support them. Tix Unlimited also leant a hand to the people of the Student Union Craft Center in putting the three-day event together. Through them, the space in the Concourse was booked for the Fair.

Democracy Now advocating for clean elections next year

DEMOCRACY from page 1

that done in two years," said Lewis. "So next year would be the year to lobby for it and get public awareness."

As it is now, candidates are able to receive unfixed sums of money from private founders, explained DM member Amara Levy-Moore. The junior, who is a political science and STPEC major, said that there are currently no provisions to even have clean election candidates in Massachusetts because there is no public funding available.

"If clean elections are passed it would only cost each citizen about $3-5 so you could pay a few dollars and then have your interests represented, instead of paying no money and having the interests of big oil companies represented," said Levy-Moore.

In 2002, a clean elections proposal was passed when it was on voting ballots in Massachusetts; however, it was not supported by legislation.

"A clean elections bill was passed by the people of Massachusetts in every single city in the state," said Baldacci.

See DEMOCRACY on page 3

Group dicusses the 'tomboy'

TOMBOY from page 1

cially when she was younger, it was difficult for her to be a tomboy. During youth soccer games she was periodically mistaken for a boy because of her athletic ability and short hair. She now participates in many other sports like BMX racing, karate, and riding ATVs.

The fire fighter, Jay Driscoll, was something of a pioneer. She was the first girl to be allowed to play little league, instead of softball in Northampton. To her it did not seem like such a big deal.

"Girls played softball. I didn't want to play softball. I wanted to play little league," she said. She also talked about what happened when she was younger.

"Girls did not do fun things, fun was out in the woods having fun," she said.

Driscoll became a fourth generation firefighter in her family after being the first firefighter trained by the Northampton Fire Department.

The most extraordinary woman was nicknamed Granny-D. She walked from California to Washington D.C. to support campaign finance reform. This is an amazing feet for anyone, but Granny-D was 88 years old and she walked over 3,000 miles, ten miles a day, six days a week.

Tomboys! has the ability to open the eyes. It is a pure look at tomboys at all stages of life and drives home the idea of letting girl's lives not be constrained by stereotypes. The pieces of a girl's life should be let to fall where they may.

MATTHEW REID/COLLEGIAN

Julie Akeret presented 'trapped tomboy through time' and answers questions to students who watched the documentary.

WANTED

SPIRIT BAND DIRECTOR & MUSICIANS to perform at
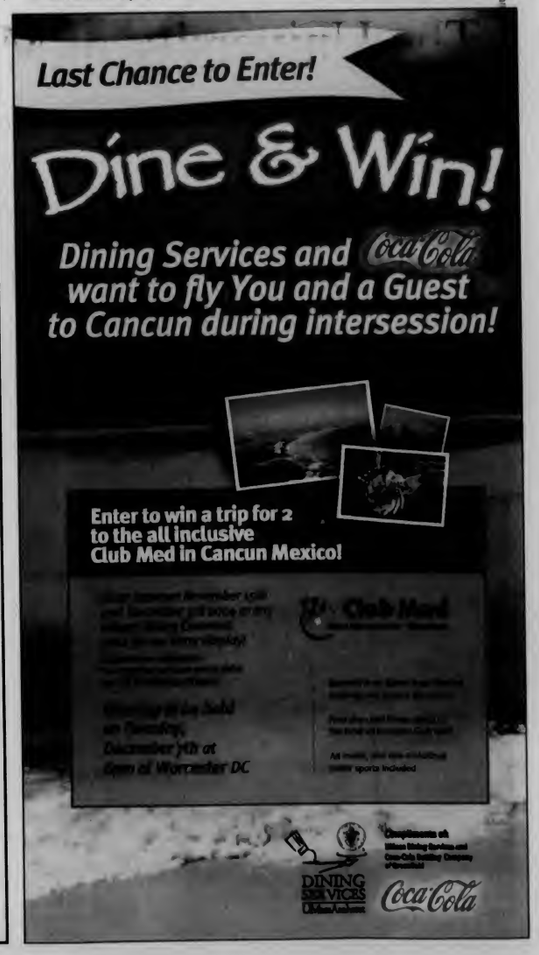
Women's Basketball & Ice Hockey Games



Required:
Ability to play an instrument, more importantly have fun!

Compensation:
You will have a blast!!!
You will also be a very important part of the UMass Athletics Family (you will also get a FREE Pep Band t-shirt and Pizza.)

Be part of a new tradition !!!

GO UMASS!!!

For more information:
Contact Tamra Geryk
545-9596
tgeryk@admin.umass.edu

Clean elections possible

DEMOCRACY from page 2

"So it got to legislation - the people that we elect to be our representatives - and they didn't want it. There is a disconnect there, it's the perfect case and point."

Lewis added that the bill was voted down by a silent vote, so the legislators that voted against it are not known.

"And they probably don't want us to know because it was such a popular bill, but Massachusetts didn't want to spend more money," she said. "Our only course of action is to get numbers of people involved, and that's why DM is so important on campus. These legislators will vote in their own personal interest unless the constituency really revolutionizes and throws all their votes against them in order to get people who are in favor of clean elections into office."

Democracy Matters works closely with Massachusetts Voters for Fair Elections, the organization that got the question of clean elections on the ballot in 2002. Since there was nothing on the 2004 ballot, Baldacci said she believes it is time to regroup and determine their goals for 2006.

"It's a definite goal of ours to lobby at UMass and get a petition signed and sent to Boston because first we need to organize the campus and then we can move to the community," she said.

Levy-Moore also stressed the importance of continually participating in the democratic process, rather than only being concerned when election time rolls around.

"The problem with American democracy is that people only feel obligated to participate once every four years," she said. "What we are trying to do is get clean elections passed so that we would be participating all the time. Our politicians would be held responsible because they will always be running for reelection and would want their constituents to be pleased with them. If their constituents want clean election candidates who run on clean money, then in turn the politician would be serving their constituents rather than corporations."

Democracy Matters, a non-partisan organization holds meetings every Sunday at 6:30 p.m. in the Blue Wall.

Dozens killed in Iraq this weekend

By NICK WADHAMS
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Gunmen opened fire on a bus carrying unarmed Iraqis to work at a U.S. weapons dump near Tikrit on Sunday, killing 17 and bringing the toll from three days of intensified insurgent attacks to at least 70 Iraqi dead and dozens wounded.

The attacks, focused in Baghdad and several cities to the north, appeared to be aimed at scaring off those who cooperate with the American military - whether police, national guardsmen, Kurdish militias, or ordinary people just looking for a paycheck.

The violence came just weeks after the United States launched major offensives aimed at suppressing guerrillas ahead of crucial elections set for Jan. 30. Later Sunday, several small Sunni Muslim groups joined more influential Sunni clerics in demanding that the vote be postponed by six months.

Sunday's bloodshed began when gunmen opened fire at the bus as it dropped off Iraqis employed by coalition forces at a weapons dump in Tikrit, 80 miles north of Baghdad, said Capt. Bill Coppernoll, spokesman for the Tikrit-based U.S. 1st Infantry Division. Coppernoll said 17 people died and 13 were wounded in the attack.

Survivors said about seven guerrillas were involved, emptying their clips into the bus before fleeing. The bodies of the victims were brought to a morgue too small to fit all of them; some were left splayed on a street outside.

About an hour later, a suicide car bomber drove into an Iraqi National Guard checkpoint in Beiji, about 75 miles to the north, detonating his explosives-packed vehicle, Coppernoll said. Then gunmen opened fire on the position. Three guardsmen, including a company commander, were killed and 18 wounded, Coppernoll said.

CLIFF TEST MONK/CS.84

Iraqis carry the coffin of a twenty year old citizen killed in combat yesterday.

Cosby visits second graders in Springfield

By TRUDY TYNAN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. — Bill Cosby was surrounded and upstaged in Springfield's Symphony Hall by two-dozen cute first and second graders in pigtails and their Sunday best. Deliberately.

"Ladies and gentlemen this is what we are talking about. These happen to be our redwoods," Cosby said bending down to the children he had called out of the audience. "We are in charge of bringing them up strong regardless of the winds and the flood. ... We're in charge.

"Are there any junkies in this crowd? Any drug dealers standing here," he said pointing to the children on stage while the cheering, clapping audience of 2,000 mostly black parents shouted "No!"

The comedian - who has become known for talking serious and tough about problems faced by blacks, pushing for young people to stay in school and calling for parents "to do more parenting" - was on almost an evangelical roll.

In the six months since making headlines during a commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the U.S. Supreme Court's landmark school desegregation decision by accusing some blacks of squandering the opportunities it provided, Cosby has taken his message to "Town Hall" meetings around the county. He's appeared in Newark, N.J., Milwaukee, Wis., Chicago, Baltimore and Norfolk, Va., and before Congress.

And he says he's just getting started.

"We've gone around and blamed people. That's not talking," he said. "Some people say I am being too harsh but we have to turn this around. It's epidemic. We've got to catch these children before they go into the slump. We've got to."

Over the months the delivery has been honed, become less scolding and more inspirational and inclusive with appeals to whites, Latinos and Asian-Americans.

"All of us are in this together," he said.

Still, he bluntly told the minority crowd in Springfield: "You are now getting up. The victim game is over."

"Your children are too important to wait. Stop looking for people to pour money into it," he said. "Do it yourselves."

For the man who knows a bit about mean city streets and dropping out school the message had a special resonance here.

"I was almost lost, but I was found. Saved, really," said Cosby, who moved his family in the late 1960s to rural Shelburne about an hour's drive north of Springfield when he determined to complete his own education at the University of Massachusetts.

It's where he quietly raised his own children and where his son, Ennis, who was shot and killed while changing a tire on a Los Angeles freeway in 1997, is buried.

"Education was not number one in my mind," said Cosby, who grew up in the projects of North Philadelphia. His own father abandoned the family. His mother worked as a cleaning lady. He dropped out of high school to join the Navy and to his mother's dismay dropped out of Temple University when his career as a standup comic took off.

"At the time, in the late 1960s, I had shows on the major networks and four LPs in the Top 10," he said. Still, Cosby admitted, he couldn't get finishing school "out of the back of my mind."

After a performance at the university, a professor approached him and told him that Dwight Allen, then dean of the School of Education, wanted to talk with him. The subject was how television could be used to aid teachers and family life.

Cosby recalls the discussion, with one of his wry faces, as his first exposure to "an oral dissertation - when Dr. Allen talks, you need a translator."

Where are YOU living next semester?

CHECK OUT
PUFFTON VILLAGE!

Excellent location...1/2 mile from UMass
Spacious Apartments--1 2 and 3 Bedroom Townhouses
All rents include heat, hot water and cooking gas
On site laundry, off street parking.
Basketball and Tennis courts.

NEW PUFFTON VILLAGE
1040 N. Pleasant St. #410
Amherst, MA 01002
413-549-0145
www.pufftonvillage.com

The University of Massachusetts Amherst
Commission on Campus Diversity
and
Chair Orlando Taylor

Extend an invitation to the UMass Amherst Community to attend a Public Forum on Campus Diversity and listen to presentations from the Campus Community

Thursday, December 9
7:00 to 10:00 p.m.
Curry Hicks Gymnasium

For more information, including how to register as a presenter, visit the Campus Diversity website

www.umass.edu/campusdiversity

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, DECEMBER 6, 2004

"The recipe for perpetual ignorance is: be satisfied with your opinions and content with your knowledge." -Elbert Hubbard

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Permission slips for gays are detrimental

The issue of gay rights has been raised again, this time at the high school level. For the past four days, protests have been commencing outside Copper Hills High School in West Jordan, Utah after the principal of the school passed a policy requiring all gay students to have a permission slip signed by their parents in order to attend school dances. As a result of the protests, the principal of the school will reevaluate the policy on Friday. Regardless of the principal's revisiting the policy, mandating that homosexual couples require special permission to attend a public school dance is demeaning on all levels and shouldn't have even been considered in the first place.

The principal, Tom Worlton, had instilled the policy last month "as a way to alert the parents to the dangers their children might face," according to www.cnn.com. These "dangers" that Worlton is referring to are, no doubt, hinting at the possible harassment gay students may run into from their peers. By using the term "dangers," Worlton is attempting to trigger the protective parent mindset which, in doing so, seems to place the onus on the parent to defer the child from going to a dance.

This high school is a public school that is paid for by the tax dollars of the students' parents, including those students who are gay. For a parent of a gay student to hear that their child may be in danger if they attend a public school dance, brings to mind the notion that their child is less protected than the others. Many public schools are required to adopt the doctrine of in loco parentis, meaning the school is to take the place of the parents. This encompasses duties of protection and seeing to the well being of the students in the parents' absence. By threatening the parents of gay students, that duty is being violated.

The school has a responsibility to the tax payers to provide a safe environment for students to learn and grow in. That environment should be made safe by the administration for the students regardless, and safety can not be assured just sitting idly by and warning those you're responsible for of dangers they may encounter on your watch.

By putting this policy into place, it seems as though the school and administration is attempting to sidestep any liabilities they may have over the harassment gay students may receive at their institution. By having signed permission slips by gay students' parents, the administration is saying that you signed this piece of paper, you know what you're getting yourselves into and it's out of our hands. No public institution that's responsible for the well-being and overall education of minors should have that attitude. Such action is not to be condoned and in a society such as this were equal rights are an expectation of all its citizens, the administration should be chastised for their lack of responsibility.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

Going abroad is vital

Chris Eckel

Amherst is a wonderful place, and the longer you live here, the more you come to appreciate it. With that on the table, some of the best advice I can give you is to get out of here. First, a disclaimer about my own study abroad experience. I was never fortunate enough to be able to go abroad for an entire semester or year. Between serving as a Resident Assistant and working in the SGA, I found it tough to get away during the school year. Last summer, I was finally able to get abroad as I enrolled in the UMass summer program at Oxford University. Now, that particular program was wonderful and comes highly recommended.

With what I know now, not having gone abroad during my time at UMass for a full semester or year is my second biggest regret. My biggest regret, of course, is that the Hampshire Mall is going to be so much better after I leave here - I should have taken a few years off before college so I could enjoy the convenience of Best Buy and Trader Joe's nearby. In persuading you all to do as I say, and not as I did, I don't want to sound like a travel agent. So rather than sell you on a specific destination, I only hope I can convince you of the value of the experience.

When I was younger, I read some study about how becoming stuck in a rut, even with your room decorations, was detrimental to your mental potential, so I constantly put up new posters and moved my furniture around. (Contrary to public opinion, I was not a nerd. I also read the Hardy Boys, Matt Christopher and R.L. Stine. It just so happens that my ever-thoughtful Mom clipped this out for me to read.) Ask my downstairs neighbors, and they'll tell you I still move my furniture around when I get writer's block.

Going abroad is kind of similar, except you rearrange your whole world, not just the stained chair from the Salvation Army. Your mind is opened to new kinds of thinking, and it just absorbs things like a sponge. I can better tell you what I learned last summer than I can tell you what I learned yesterday in class. If sitting in Herter 216 five times a week is getting a little stale for you, then take a walk over to the International Programs Office.

Going abroad is good practice for the real world . . . You make all your own decisions, whether it is what time to wake up, what city to visit on break, or whether or not to try the sketchy foreign delicacies.

Going abroad is good practice for the real world. Now, I run away from it all the time, but we all have to join the real world some time. For those of you who brought your laundry home to Mom or Dad on Thanksgiving break, listen up. Europe is the best of the real world without the drag of having a full-time job. You make all your own decisions, whether it is what time to wake up, what city to visit on break, or whether or not to try the sketchy foreign delicacies (frog legs, cow tongue, etc.) If you fail miserably, you know you need a little more seasoning before you walk down the graduation aisle. If you make all the right moves, then you get that shot of confidence that the world is yours for the taking.

It's a cliché, but you really do gain a clearer perspective of the United States when you're thousands of miles away, and it changes you for the better and not just our political woes, or anything else that you hear bashed in the foreign media. You gain insight into your own life, and what really is important to you, and what only seems that way.

It doesn't really hit you over there, because you're having too much fun. But when you get back, everything is suffused with this little gloss, this little sheen of simplicity. It really pushes you to reorder your relationships and priorities, and in doing so, you make living your own life much easier. It's like struggling to finish that 500-piece puzzle, then having your mother hand you the last 11 pieces that you left in the box by mistake; the picture becomes more complete. If you still need some convincing, just remember this: the dining commons try hard, but there's no way they can compete with panini, crepes or gyros actually made in the country in which they were first invented. Now get to filling out applications and packing your bags. Happy travels, UMass.

Chris Eckel is a Collegian columnist.

Mistletoe and the menorah

Matthew Reid

Christmas is a Christian holiday celebrating the birth of Jesus Christ. Hanukkah is the Jewish festival of lights. They are two separate events, each with a long tradition of worship and custom. But what do you do when you have a family made up of Christians and Jews?

You celebrate Chrismukkah, of course.

Michelle and Ron Gompertz of Livingston, Mont. have combined the two holidays with their own greeting cards, which they send out to friends and family members. The cards read, "Happy Chrismukkah." The Gompertz's are a Protestant/Jewish couple, who thought the cards would be a light-hearted, convenient way for couples with multiple religions to send out holiday greetings to their families.

On the couple's website, www.chrismukkah.com, they describe their creation as a "hybrid holiday... a gumbo of favorite traditions from both Hanukkah and Christmas that celebrates diversity.

The couple says the interfaith holiday is a fresh way to describe how millions of people already experience the holidays. The website also features a large picture of a bowl of matzoh ball soup with a snowman floating in it.

"Chrismukkah" does nothing more than homogenize and further commercialize the holiday spirit.

Competing greeting card companies have jumped on the bandwagon as well, including the Raleigh, N.C., company "MixedBlessing," and the more conventional card makers Hallmark and American Greetings.

The Gompertzs first thought of the idea while watching an episode of the popular Fox show "The O.C.," which has characters who occasionally face interfaith situations. The couple had already faced an interfaith wedding ceremony, and was now faced with the challenge of raising their newborn daughter.

It's not that I don't have sympathy for Michelle and Ron Gompertz. Raising a family must be difficult when you are faced with a "conflict" of religion. However, to trivialize both holidays by simply grouping them together does more harm than good. It further emphasizes that people are losing sight of what the holidays truly mean. While the Gompertzs may have the best intentions, the idea of "Chrismukkah" does nothing more than homogenize and further commercialize the holliday spirit.

I have heard of interfaith couples doing some sort of mixed rituals to represent the combination of Jewish and Christian beliefs. Although I still don't like the idea of an interfaith ceremony, at least it would encompass traditional elements from both holidays. The fact that we are using greeting cards, which have become symbolic of holiday commercialization in this country, as a way of representing each side speaks volumes for the regard some people hold for each.

The Gompertzs insist that they do not want, or ever wanted, the actual rituals of the holidays combined. In a statement they gave to ABC News, Ron Gompertz said: "Our intention wasn't to merge the religious aspects, but rather the secular aspects of the holidays."

The Chrismukkah website even has a disclaimer that reads, "We respect people's different faiths ... We passionately believe in religious freedom and tolerance, along with our right to worship as we please."

The ABC News report featured many angered Christians saying the mixture of the two holidays further commercializes and weakens the true meaning of Christmas, as well as many conservative Jews who said the "holiday" promotes interfaith marriages.

Chrismukkah is not only offensive and inappropriate, but it is ridiculous as well. Most of you probably recall the fictitious holiday Festivus, created by Frank Costanza on "Seinfeld." The holiday was a joke, of course, but it was symbolic of something deeper. Frank Costanza started Festivus so his family could experience a holiday free of commercialization. One of the crucial elements of Festivus is the "Festivus Pole," the holiday's equivalent to the Christmas tree. The pole is nothing more than an unadorned aluminum pillar, free of decoration and "distraction." It may sound ridiculous, but how ridiculous has the commercialization of Christmas become?

I don't want to demean Christian/Jewish couples by comparing their "holiday" to a sitcom, but that's how it seems to be. The Gompertzs wanted to focus on the secular aspects of Christmas and Hanukkah, but that takes every important, necessary element out of each. It is the latest example of how holidays have lost their meanings, and how we are so eager to lump religion with sentimentality. It may be convenient, and it may be cute, and that's the problem. Convenience and cuteness have become more important than worship and tradition. In a society where commercialization has become a way of life, the holiday season is when it is most important to remain steadfast to your beliefs and convictions.

Matthew Reid is a Collegian editor.

The worth of the U. S. dollar

Allison Edles

Three out of the four times I have tried to give blood, I have been rejected due to a low iron count. Yet I keep coming back and keep continuing to not learn my lesson that the outcome will not change if I don't increase my iron levels. Upon reflection of my situation and closer examination of my obsession with being knocked down for trying to do a mitzvah, it seems that this is the common mindset of people around me.

Go out of your way to do something good, but don't alter anything on your part if that something good doesn't work out. You did your part by trying. Consequently, there's a lot less stress on moral support in today's society and more attention must be given to monetary support.

Sit at the blood bank and get seen filling out your paperwork, but complain about your fear of needles to the Red Cross employees when no one's looking. Buy that Lance Armstrong bracelet to benefit his cancer fund, but don't make it a point to actually know what the foundation's called or what kind of cancer he even had. This stream of consumerism has placed a new emphasis on the American dollar. Consequently, its steps can be traced due to the predictability of the American buyer.

Upon all Americans' departure from this planet, following the idea of reincarnation, we will all return as our greatest love: the American dollar. We will start off slow, being exchanged for single teeth found under the pillows of small children who will. From there, begin to learn the joys that a single dollar can hold. That dollar will then be acquired and exchanged for five airhead candies at the local convenience store. During this time, the child will learn the most vital lesson of being an American consumer: the art of bargain shopping.

From there, that dollar will serve as change to the next American who just purchased a cup of coffee that was not able to come up with the 99 cents but, instead, had to pay with a 20 dollar bill. The next lesson on Americanism learned: you can have more than you need and still use all of it to pay for something that cost less in the first place. A sense of pride develops that many of you are more valuable than just the one alone.

Upon all Americans' departure from this planet, following the idea of reincarnation, we will all return as our greatest loves: the American dollar.

Continuing along the path to self-enlightenment, that American dollar next finds itself among many others in a guitar case sitting on a street in New York besides a financially struggling supposed musician. It has been tossed out as pocket change, a worthless token for a worthless individual who earns a living playing for the likes of passersby. The self respect and individual importance of that dollar has been decreased to that of its quarter and dime counterparts. To continue with the downward spiral, that said musician now holds that dollar, that American-made dollar, as an example to all the others and writes on it "please give" in ugly black letters. This is a cry to his fellow Americans, for them to help him join in the joyous consumer lifestyle.

That dollar's trip does not end with a homeless man, but rather continues through the natural chain of consumer events. The musician, upon being mugged, loses that dollar (including many others) and is once again at the bottom. That dollar that was stolen, however, gains one step in that capitalist society. It now has a new owner, one who will use it to buy black tar heroin off the streets of the city.

This cycle, however, isn't really a cycle. That dollar will never be under the pillow of a small innocent child again. Its only hope, at this point, is to be donated to the heavenly-equivalent Red Cross and, at least, be used precisely. That single American dollar, once there, will be contributed to the purchase of food, the maintenance of a blood bank and helping to aid the thousands of United States soldiers who are currently overseas. Once there, the American dollar will realize its full worth and come to acknowledge that, despite its journey, its final resting place will be in a land not its own. Such are the overreaching undertones propelled by consumers.

Next semester, I will undoubtedly try to give blood again. However, this time I choose not to anticipate and accept the fate of an iron-deficient rejection. I will spend my hard-earned dollar on raisins and nuts, in hopes to break the cycle. Maybe then my dollar's worth will finally be morally appreciated.

Allison Edles is a Collegian editor.

SUBMIT A LETTER OR OPINION

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, DECEMBER 6, 2004

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Fitting the average size woman into the fashion industry

Ever since I was 12 years old, I remember getting my monthly subscriptions to my favorite magazines, Teen, Seventeen, American Girl, etc. It was at this point that my serious love affair with fashion began; and now as an adult I still find myself anxiously awaiting the arrival of the latest issue of my now favorite magazines: Vogue, Essence, In Style, and W.

Style 101

Monique Jemmott

Although my preference in magazines have changed, one thing has remained the same: the fashion editors, designers, and stylists do not recognize me — me, your run of the mill reader who happens not to stand 6 feet tall and weigh 100 pounds.

I am pretty sure that I am not alone in this boat, especially when I take a look at my circle of friends. While we range in sizes and shapes, the number of tall thin friends that I do have are undoubtedly in the minority. It seems to be a fact of the matter that super thin does not dominate, but what is reflected in the magazines that I so faithfully subscribe too, would tell you otherwise.

The images are everywhere, and it takes a mighty strong character to not give into the pressure of the many images telling you that who you are is not "in" when the average woman is a size 10, and a size 8 is considered plus size for a runway model, it makes one wonder what exactly is the future of fashion?

We live in a world that is bombarded with images of what beauty is, and ways to attain it. If you flip through any contemporary fashion magazine, the first 20 pages of so are all advertisements from various designers baring images of this rare species known as supermodels.

Looking at these images you wonder what strings did they pull in heaven to blessed with genes like this, but in our admiration we fail to realize that some of these women go to dangerous and unhealthy extremes to maintain these physiques; not to mention that before those cameras are in front of them, they undergo hours of makeup and hair by professionals, and before you see those magazines, digital imaging erases all imperfections with the click of a button.

It's not just the matter of being big or small, but as a black woman I find that high fashion does not have us in mind at all. While stars such as Beyonce, and Queen Latifah have drawn positive attention to their curves, us commoners still find difficulty walking into a Nordstrom's and picking out clothing from our favorite designers. I cannot count the many times that I have walked into a high end fashion store, and tried on something in my size to no avail because the hips were too narrow, or there wasn't enough room in the seat for my curves. Urban apparel has also begun to abandon the ever -faithful support of women with curves. As brands like Baby Phat, Enyce, and Rocawear become larger, and more able to compete in the fashion world their clothing becomes more fitting to the bodies of their competitor's customers, and less to the average woman.

Monique Jemmott is a Collegian Editor

COURTESY LAUNCH.COM

Beyonce isn't afraid to step out and show her curvy side.

Folk singer Josh Ritter brings unique sound music to Iron Horse Music Hall

By Spencer Ziegler
Collegian Staff

Josh Ritter is bringing his unique brand of folk to the Iron Horse Music Hall this Thursday. However, if it wasn't for Boston, Ritter may have found himself in a science lab somewhere instead of touting his stuff to an attentive audience of folkaholics.

In a small town in Idaho 20 some odd years ago, Ritter was born to a pair of neuroscientists. Josh was on his way to following down their path until he heard "Girl from the North Country" by Bob Dylan and Johnny Cash. After hearing that song, Ritter went down to the local K-Mart and bought his first guitar. This momentous K-Mart blue light special kicked off the battle of the folk and the science communities over young Ritter's talents.

The sciences were winning the battle as Ritter was on his way towards finishing up his studies in neuroscience at Oberlin College when Josh had a change of heart, packed up his bags and moved to Boston to become a musician.

Ritter promised his parents that if in four years he was not where he wanted to be, then he would throw in the towel and with his head hung low with the shame of defeat, return to the life of test tubes and bunsen burners.

Luckily for Ritter and lovers of singer songwriters everywhere, Josh found success in the folk clubs of Beantown.

In 1999 Ritter recorded and released his first record. Ritter threw everything he had into this record, including some of the knowledge he picked up in college as evidenced by the following lines from the hidden track "Stuck to You:" It is not love that makes the flowers grow. But a complex electron transfer process known as photosynthesis when chlorophyll reacts with the light of day/ Since you're gone, the light has gone away." Just another example of the age-old axiom that you can take the Idaho born, Boston bred folk singer out of the science community but you can never take the science community out of the Idaho born, Boston bred folk singer.

In 2002 Ritter released his second album, the critically acclaimed "Golden Age of Radio." This is the album that launched Ritter's career thanks to a little help from HBO's "Six Feet Under," and Ireland. "Six Feet Under" used the song "Come and Find Me" in one of their episodes and Ireland made Ritter a local sensation due to the Irish Radio's top 40 hit "Me and Jiggs."

Ritter followed up "Golden Age of Radio" with "Hello Starling." This album exhibits a musician who has found his voice, and the result is one of the best singer songwriter albums—one of the best albums altogether even—of the last few years. The highlights are "Kathleen," "You don't make it easy babe" and the haunting "Wings."

Opening for Ritter is Willy Mason who is touring for his 2004 release "Where the Humans Eat."

The show begins at seven and tickets are $15 in advance and $18 at the door.

Networks hope to strike midseason gold

By Marisa Guthrie
Knight Ridder

Some familiar faces will return to the small screen in the next few months. Butt-kicking, wig-wearing double agent Sydney Bristow (Jennifer Garner) is back to battle criminals and her own demons in ABC's "Alias," Jan. 5 at 9 p.m. Kiefer Sutherland's Counter-Terrorist Unit agent Jack Bauer embarks on another very long day when Fox's "24" kicks off with a two-hour premiere Jan. 9 at 8 p.m.

And the kill-joy judges of "American Idol" are back for another season of dashed hopes and shmaltzy warbling with a two-hour premiere Jan. 18 at 8 p.m. on Fox.

But a roster of newcomers is also on the lineup, each looking for the kind of success won by "All in the Family," the king of midseason replacements. Archie Bunker and family arrived Jan. 12, 1971, and spent five years as the top-rated show.

Though the networks have yet to announce premiere dates for most midseason series, here's what to expect:

ABC

"Grey's Anatomy" is not an adaptation of the late Spalding Gray's sharp-witted monologue. The medical drama gets its title (never mind the slightly different spelling of the last name) from Henry Gray, the turn-of-the-last-century doctor who famously dissected and documented human anatomy. It stars Ellen Pompeo as Meredith Grey, a first-year surgical intern. In the pilot, she hooks up with a stranger (Patrick Dempsey) in a bar, only to discover, when she first reports to work the next morning, that he's a staff surgeon. Oops! Her fellow interns include Katherine Heigl, T.R. Knight and Sandra Oh.

"Blind Justice" is Ron Eldard's ("ER") return to series TV. In Stephen Bochco's latest police drama, Eldard plays Detective Jim Dunbar, who has worked his way back to active duty after being blinded during a botched robbery. Needless to say, he has a hard time finding a partner to work with him. But, there's good news: Dunbar's handicap has made him a better detective. The series is tentatively scheduled for the Tuesday 10 p.m. slot that will be vacated when Bochco's "NYPD Blue" wraps its long run.

"Eyes" stars Tim Daly as the head of a high-stakes risk-management firm that investigates corporate malfeasance and such dirty dealing as blackmail, embezzlement and even murder. His crack team of investigators includes Garcelle Beauvais-Nilon ("NYPD Blue"), A.J. Langer ("My So-Called Life"), Laura Leighton ("Melrose Place"), Eric Mabius ("The L Word") and Natalie Zea ("The Shield").

The spy thriller was created by John McNamara, the man behind the turbocharged "Fastlane," and promises plenty of high-wire stunts and whiz-bang special effects. Risk-management has never been so sexy.

CBS

"Numbers," a new crime drama with the big-screen cachet of executive producers Tony and Ridley Scott ("Gladiator," "Blade Runner"), stars David Krumholtz ("Grounded for Life") as a math genius who is enlisted by his FBI agent brother Rob Morrow ("Northern Exposure") to help the Bureau track tough cases. The cast also includes Peter McNicol ("Ally McBeal"), Judd Hirsch ("Taxi") and Sabrina Lloyd ("SportsNight").

"The Will" has money-grubbing friends and family of a wealthy man competing for a favorable place in his will. The reality show's Mr. Moneybags is not near death, a network rep says, so this is one competition with a serious case of delayed gratification. Staying in the reality vein, Joan Lunden will be hosting the network's search for the next Martha Stewart. The still-untitled series is scheduled to premiere next year. Remember, Stewart could be released in March.

FOX

-"The Sketch Show" Kelsey Grammer takes a turn at a different kind of comedy with this remake of a British series described as a hybrid of "Laugh-In" and "Monty Python."

-"Life on a Stick" finds two best friends (Zachary Knighton and Charlie Finn) taking jobs in a mall food court rather than go to college. One gets lucky and meets the girl of his dreams (Rachelle LeFevre). The other is resigned to operating the deep fryer. The comedy was created by Victor Fresco, the quirky brain behind the late, lamented "Andy Richter Controls the Universe."

-"Jonny Zero" chronicles the life of Jonny Calvo, ex-con and former strip-club bouncer, trying to go legit by becoming a freelance Jack Webb. Brooklyn-born actor Franky G ("The Italian Job") takes a stab at playing himself, sort of. In real life the one-time bodybuilder (and former Mr. Queens) worked at a strip club. He also studied criminal law in college. But he's never been in jail.

-"Hell's Kitchen" has real-life wanna-be chefs enduring the wrath of pompous Michelin-starred chef Gordon Ramsay. Contestants toil in Ramsay's L.A. restaurant Cordon Bleu, where each week, after a verbal lashing, the crusty cook sends someone packing.

NBC

-"Committed" stars Josh Cooke and Jennifer Finnigan play a couple of New Yorkers who meet and fall in love. But everyone in his family has gone insane, so he's perpetually negative and she's a quintessential Pollyanna.

-"Law & Order: Trial by Jury" stays close to the courtroom for drama in the style of an updated "Perry Mason." "Law & Order" stalwart Jerry Orbach headlines the latest franchise spinoff.

"Medium" stars Patricia Arquette as a psychic who can see dead people. She can also hear them, and she uses her mysterious gift to help them find their eternal resting place.

"Revelations" is an apocalyptic drama with Bill Pullman and Natascha McElhone as a scientist and a nun who join forces to prevent the four horsemen from riding roughshod over humanity.

"The Law Firm," a reality show from David E. Kelley ("Boston Legal," "Ally McBeal"), has real lawyers trying real cases for a chance at a $250,000 prize.

COURTESY ALIAS TV.COM

ABC's television show 'Alias' returns as one of the network's hits.

COURTESY FOX

American Idol will return to Fox for its fourth season, as it makes another star out of a dreamer, like last season's winner Fantasia.

Michael Jackson volunteers DNA

By Linda Deutsch
Associated Press

LOS OLIVOS, Calif. — Michael Jackson voluntarily gave a DNA sample to authorities, returning to his Neverland Ranch estate a day after he left during a search by sheriff's deputies, a source close to the case said Sunday.

When sheriff's deputies arrived with search warrants Friday, his lawyer instructed him to leave and take his children with him, the source told The Associated Press.

Jackson's attorney, Thomas Mesereau, flew by helicopter from Los Angeles to Jackson's ranch in Los Olivos, 100 miles northwest, when he heard the search warrant had been served, said the source, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

On Saturday, when the deputies returned, they asked for a DNA sample and Jackson returned by car to the estate and supplied the sample voluntarily, the source said.

Authorities had never before asked for a DNA sample, the source said. A cotton swab was used to collect the sample from Jackson's mouth.

It wasn't immediately clear how authorities planned to use the DNA in Jackson's child molestation case.

Also while at Jackson's ranch, sheriff's investigators measured rooms, trying to establish the sight lines from one room to another, the source said.

The 46-year-old entertainer has pleaded not guilty to charges of child molestation, conspiracy and administering an intoxicating agent, alcohol, to his alleged victim. He is scheduled to stand trial Jan. 31.

Loyola University law professor Laurie Levenson, a former federal prosecutor, said she was surprised District Attorney Tom Sneddon had not requested DNA earlier.

"We don't know whether this means they are scrambling or tying up loose ends, or its just Sneddon going over the top," she said.

From a public relations standpoint, however, the prosecution has scored a coup with the highly publicized searches, she said.

"They've certainly gotten a lot of attention and, even if there's a gag order, they got the message out: 'We've got DNA,'" Levenson said.

Authorities spent more than eight hours at the estate Friday, and less than two hours Saturday.

Santa Barbara County sheriff's officials have refused to discuss the visits except to issue a statement saying they are "part of an ongoing criminal investigation."

Jackson's estate was first searched in November 2003, shortly before he was charged.

Monday is the deadline for prosecutors and defense lawyers to complete the case's discovery process, in which both sides exchange evidence they have gathered during pretrial investigations.

By Bradley Farberman

MondayDecember 6

SHOW
X-rated hypnotist Frank Santos brings his raunchy live show to the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall tonight, at 7:30 p.m. Tickets are $5 for UMass students and $10 general admission.

TuesdayDecember 7

MUSIC
Jazz Ensemble I, directed by Jeffrey Holmes, presents "Jazz For The Holidays & Beyond" tonight, at 8 p.m. The program is set to include Duke Ellington's Nutcracker Suite and Twelve Days Of Christmas, Rob McConnell's Winter In Winnipeg, a new arrangement of Have Yourself A Merry Little Christmas, and original pieces by grad students Steve Kirby and Woo-Young Soon. Jon Bean (saxophone), Lena Bloch (saxophone), Joe Mayo (saxophone), Brian Raymond (piano), Jared Burrell (trumpet) and Scott Daugherty (trumpet) will contribute solos. Bowker Auditorium is the place to be; tickets are $5 (students, seniors and children) and $10 (public).

WednesdayDecember 8

SPEECH
Famed architect and Harvard professor Rem Koolhaas is set to speak at Amherst College's Stirn Auditorium today at 4:30 p.m. A reception follows at the Mead Art Museum; this event is free and open to the public.

ThursdayDecember 9

ART
Local artist Guillermo Cuellar's new portrait of Emily Dickinson goes on display today, at 5 p.m. at the Jones Library in Amherst, on 43 Amity St. The exhibits runs through February 10.

ThursdayDecember 9

MUSIC
Come watch as The Maori Dance Theater of New Zealand takes the audience on a colorful and exciting journey through the islands of Polynesia, including visits to Tahiti, Hawaii, Samoa, the Cook Islands and ending in Aotearoa, New Zealand with Kahurangi: People of the Pacific tonight at Bowker Auditorium at UMass. Show starts at 10 a.m. and tickets are $5 and $7. For more information call (413) 577-2486

FridayDecember 10

MUSIC
Funky Bostonians Addison Groove Project returns to Pearl Street tonight with instructions to rock Northampton. And, if their past performances at the club are any indication, tonight's event should be one to remember; AGP brought the house down last semester when their Pearl Street appearance fell on keyboardist Rob Marscher's birthday and they kicked out some fun new covers.

And what's on the menu tonight? That's hard to say, but it should include two saxophones, swirling organ runs, breakbeat drums, jazz guitar licks and catchy vocals. But you'll find that out for yourself; NBFB kicks things off at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are $11 in advance, and $14 at the door.

FridayDecember 10

MUSIC
The recital of Jewish music is one of the Isaac Babel Festival events, a three-day festival hosted on the Amherst College, Smith College, and UMass Amherst campuses in conjunction with the Smith College Theatre Department's December 8-12, 2004 staging of Isaac Babel's Marya, directed by Veniamin Smekhov. Show takes place at the UMass Amherst's Benzanon recital hall from 4:30-5:30pm. This event is free and open to the public.

weekly pinup

PARKER AND DRAKE DUO

The Fine Arts Center's fall "Solos & Duos" series concludes tonight with William Parker and Hamid Drake, at 8 p.m. Drake (drums) did time with jazz legends Don Cherry and Pharaoh Sanders; Parker (bass) fleshed out Cecil Taylor's low-end for more than ten years. These cats are serious; don't miss out. Tickets are $5 (students) and $10 (public).

Comedian Billy Crystal tells life story in Broadway production

By Michael Kuchwara
Associated Press

NEW YORK — "My first hero."

That's what Billy Crystal calls his father, Jack, during "700 Sundays," the comedian's fond journey back to his boyhood that opened Sunday at Broadway's Broadhurst Theatre.

And the show can probably remain there for as long as Crystal is willing to tell his frankly sentimental, yet very funny tale. The man may be talking about his own family, but Crystal's story is a universal one — of growing up, coming to terms with his parents (not to mention a carload of crazy relatives) and making his way in the world.

The man certainly has had a varied and successful showbiz career, from "Soap" to "Saturday Night Live" movies such as "Analyze This" and, of course, gigs as host of the Academy Awards.

But what he talks about here is more personal, so it's fitting that designer David F. Weiner's setting is the facade of the family home, a modest brick house in suburban Long Island. The time is post-World War II when Ed Sullivan was on television, automobiles sported big fins and Mickey Mantle was the star of the New York Yankees.

Crystal is the youngest son of Jack and Helen Crystal. Dad was a jazz musician and concert promoter who also ran the Commodore Music Shop, a legendary jazz record store in New York. Mom was a housewife. And there was a parade of colorful grandparents, uncles and aunts, "the Jewish Kennedy's," according to Crystal, who would "sell you the shirt off their backs."

The performer, dressed in a casually expensive burgundy sweater and dark slacks, prowls the stage as he lovingly tells their stories. What emerges are vivid portraits of people and a time. He talks of his Uncle Milt, who founded Commodore Records and who, among other things, recorded Billie Holiday singing "Strange Fruit," when other record labels turned down the song about the lynching of a black man.

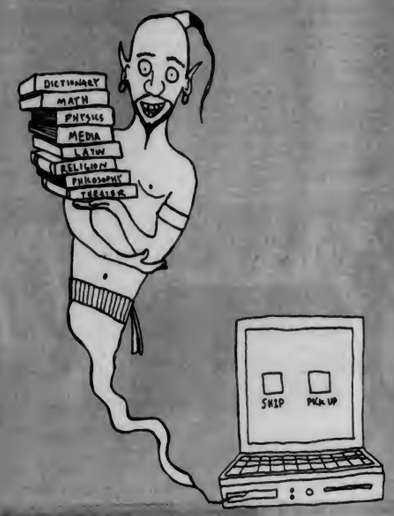
Home movies and old black-and-white photographs complement Crystal's monologue, and they show a peppy little boy, mugging for the camera and frantically tap-dancing, or adults doing the goofy things that always occur when the filming of home movies begins.

Yet the heart of Crystal's evening is Jack Crystal, a man who died too young (he had a heart attack in a bowling alley at the age of 54). His death jolts his 15-year-old son into a new appreciation of what the man accomplished and what his mother, Helen, then did to keep the family together.

The show's title, "700 Sundays," comes from a calculation by Crystal that father and son spent that many Sundays together before Jack Crystal died. Sunday was the one day of the week the two had to enjoy each other's company since Jack Crystal always held two or three jobs. Too short a time, of course, but they were enough to produce an affecting, hilarious evening of theater.

COURTESY BUNLINE.COM

Funny man Billy Crystal will share his life and laughs with audiences in Broadway performance.



Newbury Comics

20% off all New + Used DVDs

50 Main Street - Amherst, MA 413.256.8840

PICK UP YOUR ORDER IN STORE OR HAVE IT SHIPPED TO YOUR HOME.*

YOUR WISH IS OUR COMMAND.

MORE REASONS TO SHOP EFOLLETT.COM

- Shop the largest selection of used textbooks
- Search for books by course number
- One-stop for all your course books and materials
- No hassle returns and exchanges

The best place for books is closer than you think

UMass Amherst
University Store
and Textbook Annex
Phone: (413)545-2619

efollett.com
ONLINE. ON CAMPUS.

* No deliveries to on-campus housing.

Parker wins 701 at the expense of his former assistant coach

HOCKEY from page 10

"Certainly, going into the weekend I didn't want to be Jack's 700th (victim), but I can tell you it doesn't feel any better whatsoever being number 701," Cahoon said. "It's kind of a disheartening performance from our side. We weren't very sharp as far as making plays. It wasn't a real good offensive evening. That being said, it was more the self-destruction that put us away.

"We had a turnover in the middle of the rink for goal number one. [Winer] starts to make what looks like a terrific play on goal number two and then loses his balance and falls down. [Winer] can't get over goal number two and MacArthur, as good of a shot as it was, snipes a goal that there's no way he should be beating him from 45-50 feet out for goal number three. Goal number four is a turnover on a [penalty kill]. It just goes on and on."

Parker seemed as though he was more relieved after the game than he was happy with the victory that put him on the right side of 700.

"I was really concerned about this game," Parker said. "I really didn't get the chance to enjoy last night because I was so concerned that we wouldn't be ready for tonight because we had such a big win. I was really anxious to see how we would come out and play."

The weekend started out well for the Minutemen, who jumped out to a 2-0 lead of their own in the second period against Providence when Matt Burto received a pass from Matt Anderson just to the right of the Providence net. Burto said that he let Friars' goalie David Cacciola make the first move, and Burto capitalized on Cacciola's over-compensation to the left side of the net as he skated past the goalie and easily slid the puck home.

With the Friars rallying in the third period and cutting the lead down to 3-2, the Minutemen really escaped their home rink with a victory. With 45 seconds remaining in the game Torry Gajda made a perfect centering pass to David Carpentier directly in front of Winer.

Carpentier had Winer easily beat, but he couldn't get enough on the puck to flick it past the UMass net minder to tie the game.

Providence coach Paul Pooley noted that his team is still in its growing stages, but he knows that they needed to take advantage of that last opportunity.

"We have to make better decisions at times," Pooley said. "We have to score that goal. We've got to score the tying goal when we've got chances to score like that."

Cahoon just seemed happy to end his team's four-game losing streak and finally play a game at home for the first time since Nov. 14.

"I thought the kids responded pretty well to a difficult couple of weeks, and you never know who you are going to get when you come back to your own building after you've been away and kissed a couple times not so sweetly," Cahoon said. "Obviously, the friendly confines of Mullins treated us pretty well, getting out to a lead and having a good first period I thought was real important to us."

NOTES: Friday night's crowd of 4,321 fans was the largest one of the season at the Mullins Center until Saturday's crowd of 5,638 trumped that.

"The fans are great and more and more are coming to the games as the season goes on," captain Stephen Werner said. "We just feel a lot more comfortable playing at home right now."... Former Boston Bruins legend Ray Bourque was in attendance for the BU game to watch his son tally the ninth assist of his freshman season.

UM swim teams off to solid early seasons

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

So far this season, the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team has yet to lose a meet. In fact, in its four straight wins, they have accumulated 714 points against their opponents. They also had first and second finishes at two invitationals. Led by seniors Justin Zeimetz and Dylan Smith, UMass faced four teams and beat them decisively.

The men began the season by placing second at the UConn Invitational. At Stony Brook, it was a combination of teamwork and record-breaking victories that caused the 148-87 blowout in October. Evan Swisher, Jake Hogue, Smith and Zeimetz placed first in the 400-yard medley relay that was also a UMass pool record. In the 400-relay, it was Jeffery Chu, Kyle Thorton, Dan Piastruck and Ted Freeborn who stepped up to place first.

During the home opener against Southern Connecticut State, Smith dominated. Posting three individual victories, 1000-yard freestyle, the 200-yard butterfly and the 100-yard butterfly, Smith led UMass to a 189-106 win. Help came from all around as Swisher (100-yard back, 200-yard back), Hogue (200-yard breast, 100-yard breast) and Zeimetz (100-yard free, 50-yard free) all posted victories in two events.

Coming off two colossal wins, UMass didn't slow down. This time it was Amherst native Greg Chartier who had a big day, winning the 200-yard fly and 200-yard breaststroke to help UMass beat Boston University 196-99. Zeimetz also won two events and was involved in the 200-yard medley relay win involving Chartier, Hogue and Swisher. Smith, Ryan Mathews, Owen Scollan and Derek Castellana all won individual events.

Each meet has consisted of different Minutemen having big days in each of the previous meets, and against New Hampshire, senior diver Brandon Doane prevailed. Doane swept both the one-meter and three-meter and totaled 312.75 points in the process. The 190-71 execution was a result of a UMass team that is consistent all around. Mark Pechack (100-yard butterfly), A.J. Vozella (1,000-yard freestyle), Brian Porter (200-yard butterfly), Zeimetz (50-yard freestyle), Hogue (200-yard backstroke), Swisher (100-yard backstroke), Smith (200-yard backstroke) and Chartier (100-yard freestyle) all posted individual victories.

The men participated in the Nutmeg Invitational last weekend in New Haven, Conn. and continued with their success. The Minutemen placed first among eight teams with Zeimetz, Mathews, Leonard and Chartier filling up the top fours spots for UMass. The Maroon and White edged Yale by six points and Boston College came in third.

Winning has also been familiar to the women's swimming and diving team. At 3-1, they have their best record since its 2001 Atlantic Championship season. Led by coach Bob Newcomb, who is in his 21st season, the women's team hopes to reach those ranks again.

The women placed third at the UConn Invitational to start the season. Against Stony Brook, UMass won 136-103 thanks to their strong relays. Rebecca Porteus, Kristen Williams, Michelle Bahar and Jenny Serven all placed first in the 400-yard relay and helped UMass to a 1-0 start to the season.

A 171.50-122.50 win over Southern Connecticut State in November was due to the strong performances by Aimee Bourassa, Melissa Strango, Nicole LeBarge and Kelly Hoffrage. The four each won their two events: Bourassa winning the 1,000-yard free and the 500-yard free, Stango winning the 100-yard breaststroke and 200-yard breaststroke, LeBarge winning the 50-yard free and 100-yard free and Hoffrage taking the 200-yard back and 200-yard free. Susan Allen also added a victory in the 100-yard back.

Freshman Samantha Dempty proved she's ready to compete at the collegiate level, winning three individual events to lead UMass to a 196-99 win over Boston University. Colleen Wasson, Laura Whelton, Allen and Dempty competed together to win the 200-yard medley relay.

In their third meet, the women fell to New Hampshire 178-18. LeBarge won the 50-yard freestyle, which she is undefeated in so far this season. Dempty and Liz Lovejoy finished in the top two spots in the 200-yard butterfly, and sophomore Mary Jenkins came in second in both her dives.

At the Nutmeg Invitational, the women battled against 12 teams and came in second. They were led by LeBarge, Sweeney, Volpe and Hoffrage. The Minutewomen were beaten by Boston College by six points but came out in front of Central Connecticut, which came in third.

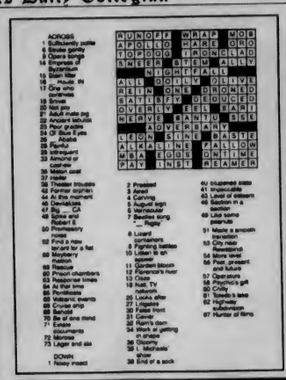
The men's team was ranked No. 11 in a recent national poll, and the women were ranked No. 12. This is one of the best starts for both programs in a few years. Both the men's and women's teams will next compete at the Sacred Heart Invitational in Jan Juan Puerto Rico.

Amherst Computerworks, Inc.
PC & Laptop Sales/Service/Repair 5-College Certified Vendor
Laptop & LCD Projector Rentals
Repairing Macs and all brands of PC's
Selling new Custom desktop & laptop PC's
9 East Pleasant St.
Amherst, MA 01002
Est. 1990
Phone: (413) 548-8900
Fax: (413) 548-8030
aci@acipc.com

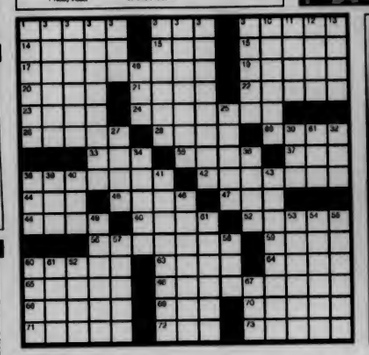
STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE
UMASS, AMHERST
CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

Don't get caught out in the cold!

Cancellation of your Spring 2005 housing assignment is FREE through 5:00 p.m. December 10, 2004.
It is strongly encouraged that you plan early to avoid a fee! Call 545-2100 or visit the Housing Assignment Office, 235 Whitmore Administration Building, by 5:00 p.m. Friday, December 10, 2004.
Cancellation Fees & Deadlines:
• $200.00 Cancellation Fee if you cancel your assignment after 5:00 p.m. December 10, 2004 until 5:00 p.m. December 31, 2004
• $300.00 Cancellation Fee if you cancel your assignment after 5:00 p.m. December 31, 2004 until 5:00 p.m. January 14, 2005
• $400.00 Cancellation Fee if you cancel your assignment after 5:00 p.m. January 14, 2005 through the Spring Semester.



SUCCESS begins here
Earn 1, 2, or 3 credits in less than a month
Classes begin January 4
English Comp I and II
Dance
Psychology
Public Speaking
Self Defense for Women
Spanish Skills
French Skills
CLICK or CALL
gcc.mass.edu
(413) 775 1801
GREENFIELD Community College



QUOTE OF THE DAY

"The way a crow/Shook down on me/The dust of snow/From a hemlock tree/Has given my heart/A change of mood/And saved some part/Of a day I had rued."

-Robert Frost, Dust of Snow

JUNGLE
Full Service Hair Salon
FREE Senior Bridge Giveaway
All Inclusive Vacation to Acapulco
Stop by Salon to Register
DRAWING FOR TRIP: JAN 5, 2005
411 North Pleasant St. in Amherst (Next to Antonio's)
413-549-1840

ELEGANT NAIL SPA
44 Main Street
Amherst, MA 01002
Next to Newbury Comics
Monday - Friday 10-7
Saturday 10-5
Walk-Ins Welcome Or By Appointment
413-253-2889

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You look like a Neanderthal on a bad day.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Don't let your bad mood transfer on anyone else.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Think twice before you put those dirty pants on.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Today you'll get the nicest compliment of your life.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
The longer it steeps the greener it gets. Keep that in mind for the future.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Remember the liquor before beer rule next time you party.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You should get that old roll of film developed. There are a few surprises on it.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Dogs are hairy and if you pet them, they make you smell.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Today, there isn't anything that can get you down.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Don't ponder too much about the weird thing that person said to you.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Life just gets more and more complicated with every day.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You need to shake off that mild case of hypothermia with oodles of herbal tea.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is now accepting applications for:
Editorial Boards
Please call 545-3500 or stop by. Applications are due Dec. 7th @ 4P.M.
for the Spring 2005 semester

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

APARTMENT FOR RENT

One bedroom apartment for rent. Puffton Village. Starting in January. 765/month. Heat and hot water included. Call 978-502-9036

2 Bedroom 2 Bathroom Lease from Jan-Aug $1,100/Month, Utilities included Contact Jenna @ 917-753-3591

Need an Apt. for 2nd Semester? Short Term Leases, Free Heat, Huge Bedrooms Call The Boulders 256-8534

Brandywine Apts. 1 Bedroom units Available Jan 1, 2005 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com Stop by or call 549-0600

APARTMENT FOR RENT

1 bedroom condo, kitchen, sitting room call Roohina at 549-6091

AUTO FOR SALE

1986 Mercury Wagon excellent condition all options 103K $1500 413-773-3346

2000 VW Beetle Turbo Leather all options 73K $6200 413-773-3346

CHILDCARE

Responsible, Experienced person to care for 17 month twin girls in exchange for room and board. Amherst. Flexible hours. 413-256-4559

COMPUTERS

Pentium Laptop $99- Pentium III Desktop $99- 413-584-8857

EMPLOYMENT

Student Brand Manager Motivated? Outgoing? Enthusiastic? Want to build your resume? CampusFundraiser is currently hiring a Student Brand Manager to promote our company on your campus. Start in January, Manage promotions on campus, work 10 hours a week, $100/week salary plus bonuses. Learn more at http://www.campusfundraiser.com/SBM.asp

Student to Assist Local Homeowner, Yardwork + moving furniture $10.00hr Call Fred 413-734-0526

"Bartending" $300/Day Potential. No Experience Nesc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

EMPLOYMENT

Returning to the Greater Boston area this Winter break? Want a fun, flexible job working with kids in their homes? Look no further....call Parents in a Pinch, Inc. TODAY if you have childcare experience/references, at least 1 full weekday free and want to earn $11/hr. Car helpful. 617-739-KIDS Fill out application at: www.parentsinapinch.com

Winter Break Employment at the Boston University Bookstore. Many temp jobs available! Kenmore Square location. Applications accepted Dec. 7 & 8 at the UMass Campus Center Concourse or email your resume to bnhmnres@bu.edu

ENTERTAINMENT

[redacted]

FOR SALE

MP3 $50 Avon Special MP3 & 100's of gifts under $10. Buy or Sell Kat ISR 413-585-1581.

ROOMMATE WANTED

325/month inclusive call 413-775-9997

SERVICES

Need Just Evacuation and Repatriation Coverage? Check out BETA! $250,000 Evacuation, $25,000 Repatriation COST is $18 for 6 MONTHS! Online enrollment, emailed verification of coverage www.betins.com

SERVICES

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house Certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

TRAVEL

Spring Break Bahamas Celebrity Party Cruise! 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Parties!

TRAVEL

Cancun, Acapulco, Nassau, Jamaica, From $459! Panama City & Daytona $159! www.SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

StudentCity.com The Ultimate Spring Break Experience. 1-888-SpringBreak, or www.StudentCity.com to reserve today.

Spring Break 2005- Travel with STS, America's #1 Student Tour Operator to Jamaica, Cancun, Acapulco, Bahamas and Florida. Now hiring on-campus reps. Call for group discounts. Information/Reservations 1-800-648-4849 or www.ststravel.com

TRAVEL

1SPRING BREAK Largest selection of Destinations, including Cruises! VIP Club Parties & FREE trips. Epicurean Tours 1-800-231-4-FUN www.BREAKNOW.com

SPRING BREAK '05
SAVE $100 PER ROOM
Clip & Send or Use Code: PRMVG Online
Cannot be combined with any other offer. $100 off based on quad room. Only valid for trips with airfare. Expires 4/1/2005
1-800-426-7...

WANTED

Snowboard events intern $50/day stipend. For job description email jfriends@deerfield.edu

Need a roommate for next semester? Place an ad with us: 545-3500.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, DECEMBER 6, 2004 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass survives against PC but gets trounced by Terriers

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

The makings of the weekend were historic, but after the Mullins Center ice was cleared for the final time on Saturday night, the only history that the Massachusetts hockey team (7-9-1, 4-4-1 Hockey East) would want to make was their collective memory of the 7-1 thrashing that the Boston University Terriers dished out to the ex-pense of the Minutemen.

Boston Univ.	7
UMass	1

After Friday night's tough 3-2 win against Providence (5-8-2, 2-6-2 HEA), UMass had a laundry list chalk-full of favorable reasons why they could knock of Boston University (9-6-0, 8-1-0 HEA) the following night.

UMass	3
Providence	2

The Terriers won a 3-2 thriller over their bitter rival Boston College Friday, which was coach Jack Parker's 700th career victory. The two teams admittedly put more into a BC-BU game than they do for their other contests, leaving UMass as a mere side dish to the Terriers' main course the night before.

There was even a little bit of gamesmanship that went on between Parker and his long-time friend, UMass coach Don Cahoon, who coached under Parker at BU three separate times after winning two national championships as a player at Boston University in the early 1970s.

Parker wanted Cahoon and the athletic department to reschedule the slated game to better accommodate his team's travel plans and create a nice cushion for a day off after the Boston College battle. Cahoon obviously denied his counterpart's request, and travel problems did hurt the Terriers as their team bus showed up late to Amherst, which delayed the start of the game by 15 minutes and allowed the crowd of 5,638 to rear up even more for the game.

MATTHEW REITH/COLLEGIAN

P.J. Fenton and the Minutemen were able to end their four-game losing streak on Friday night against Providence, but Boston University showed up to the Mullins Center to rout UMass on Saturday.

The Minutemen failed to take advantage of these one-sided circumstances, though, and the Terriers controlled the game from the start.

Just a tick over four minutes after the puck was dropped, BU's Dan Spang took a pass from Brad Zancanaro and one-timed it past goalie Gabe Winer.

After looking very complacent for the remainder of the first period and into the second, the Minutemen didn't create any opportunities for themselves to tie the score before a bad line change led to BU's second goal of the night.

Brian McConnell contained the puck near the right boards and passed it across the ice to a streaking Zancanaro who easily beat Winer after he was forced to leave the net to make up for the lack of defensemen in front of him due to the bad line change.

The Terriers put the game away just 33 seconds later when Peter MacArthur sniped a wrist-shot over Winer's shoulder to give BU a 3-0 advantage that sealed Parker's 701st career victory.

See HOCKEY on page 8

Freeman contained in loss to Gonzaga

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team proved that it was game for a challenge in giving heavily favored Gonzaga all it could handle Saturday afternoon, but in the end it was not enough.

Gonzaga	68
UMass	57

Having grabbed an early lead in the annual "Battle In Seattle" contest, the Minutemen watched the Bulldogs storm back to take a 17-point lead early in the second half before battling all the way back to tie the game at 40. From there it was all Zags, however, as 12 second half points from Adam Morrison and Ronny Turiaf's 19 points and 14 boards led coach Mark Few's team past UMass 68-57 before 10,126 at Key Arena in Seattle, Wash.

Sophomore guard Maurice Maxwell led the Minutemen with 19 points while senior captain Anthony Anderson added 14 points and four assists. Sophomore forward Rashaun Freeman, who attracted double teams all afternoon and struggled to find an offensive rhythm, scored nine points and grabbed six rebounds in 27 minutes before fouling out midway through the second half.

Sophomore guard Art Bowers continued to struggle mightily on the offensive end for UMass after scoring six points off 3-of-12 shooting, including 0-of-5 from 3-point range. Classmate Stephane Lasme played a strong defensive game for the Maroon and White, posting four blocks while defending Turiaf over 34 minutes.

UMass returns to action on Thursday night when it will host archrival and defending national champion Connecticut at the Mullins Center. Tip-off is slated for 9 p.m., and the game will be broadcast live on ESPN2.

Morrison led all scorers with 20 points, despite 1-of-5 shooting from beyond the arc. Turiaf, meanwhile, overcame a slow start to come on strong in the second half, getting the majority of his production from an 11-for-16 showing from the free throw line.

J.P. Batista was the only other player in double-figures as he had 10 points for the Bulldogs to go alone with nine points and four steals from point guard Derek Raivio.

The Minutemen appeared to be out of the game early in the second half after falling down by 17 but stormed back with a stunning 24-6 run that erased the advantage. A Maxwell 3-pointer with 12 minutes remaining brought UMass within a basket at 40-38, before Lasme tied the game with a pair of free throws just under a minute later.

After the team's traded hoops on the next few possessions, a Bowers basket gave the Minutemen a slim 44-43 lead before a Lawrence Carrier 3-pointer pushed UMass out in front by a score of 47-45 with 8:50 to play.

Gonzaga answered immediately with a 3-pointer of its own from Morrison, before the Bulldogs took off on a 13-2 burst that was part of a 23-4 run, giving them control of the game for good.

With both Freeman and Lasme fouling out of the game down the stretch, UMass was no longer able to contain Turiaf, who scored nine points during Gonzaga's second half run and keyed the Zags success on offense during the streak.

The Maroon and White got off to a promising start in the opening minutes of the game, staking itself to a 13-8 lead before turnovers and a lack of offense keyed a 15-0 Gonzaga run that gave control of the game to the Zags. The Minutemen turned the ball over 14 times in the first half, including 10 times in the first nine minutes.

Minutewomen escape 'The Cage' with win

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Last Friday in practice, Massachusetts women's basketball coach Marnie Dacko was working with sophomore forward Tamara Tatham on the mental aspect of foul shooting.

"I was with her just talking about visualization, all that mind stuff, trying to get her to focus on the ball and seeing it go through the basket," Dacko said.

So it comes as no surprise that with 11.7 seconds left and a tie score in Saturday's "Rage in the Cage" contest with the Syracuse Orange (5-1), it was Tatham at the charity stripe, visualizing the two most important shots in her young career.

UMass	52
Syracuse	51

"I was just focusing, zoning everything out, visualizing making the basket," Tatham said.

And with the crowd of 1,402 on its feet and screaming in the historic Curry Hicks Cage, the 6-foot-1 native of Canada came, saw, and conquered, nailing both her free throws to give the Minutewomen (3-3) a 52-51 win over the Orange.

"It was an ugly game," Dacko said. "We're usually a rebounding team, and we got beat on the boards today. It was an ugly game, but we'll take the win."

But things would have certainly been much uglier for UMass had forward Chineze Nwagbo made both of her free throws with 0.4 seconds left to go, which would have forced an overtime.

Once again, luck went the way of Maroon and White as a perennial star player fell short when it came down to the wire. Nwagbo led all scorers on the afternoon with 19 points and added 14 rebounds to give her a double-double. And so while the 6-foot-1 senior continued to wreak havoc on the Minutewomen's inside game all day long, she was unable to make her last shot count.

"Overall, I was pretty pleased with the way we're trying to play, and it's just [a matter of] finishing," Syracuse coach Keith Ciepicki said. "I'll tell you, Chinny's never played better. She plays hard. She's so consistent. I mean, it's too bad she's got to miss that free throw because she carried us for 39 minutes and 59 seconds... I think everybody understands everybody else has to play better."

Senior guard Rochelle Colton also scored in double figures for the Orange, throwing down 11 points despite a three-for-11 day on the floor. She also grabbed two boards and dished out three assists in 31 minutes of play.

The Campbell-Nwagbo matchup was an interesting showdown as the two continued to exchange baskets and boards down inside the key. When all was said and done, the two came away with double-doubles (Campbell scored a team-high 16 points and grabbing 10 boards).

UMass concluded its Big East tour for the 2004-05 season, finishing with a record of 2-1 against teams from that conference. The Maroon and White are also in the midst of their first two-game winning streak since November of 2003 when they pulled off three wins in a row against Brown, Vermont and Utah State, respectively.

The first half saw a neck-and-neck battle between the Minutewomen and Orange through the first 15 minutes. The excellent ball movement of UMass and the inside and outside shooting game of Syracuse continued to counteract one another until late in the first half. With 4:43 to go in the half and trailing 20-19, Edris Bailey tapped in a layup, sparking an 8-0 run to finish off the first half.

In what has almost become customary, the Maroon and White saw its seven-point halftime lead vanish, care of the hot outside hands of Coleman and Lauren Kohn. Every time the Minutewomen took back the lead, the Orange went deep from outside.

Trailing by three with under five minutes to go, Katie Nelson took a page from Kohn's book and nailed a deep trey to tie things up. Pam Rosanio then stole the ball on SU's next trip down, dished the ball off to Joyce Massey, who passed it right back to her for the go-ahead layup, and the Minutewomen would cease to relinquish their lead again.

Gulak grabbed the rebound off Nwagbo's errant second shot to prevent overtime, and the Minutewomen closed the door on a game that literally went down to the last stitch of allotted time.

If winning on a sloppy day is any indicator of the potential this team has, then there certainly has to be some momentum carrying into tonight, when they will play their last home game of the fall semester before embarking on a four-game road trip.

Tonight's game against the Toledo Rockets (1-4), scheduled for a 7:00 p.m. tipoff at the Mullins Center, ought to be an interesting one. Both the Rockets and the Minutewomen are shooting 38 percent from the field, 25 percent from beyond the arc and around 50 points per game (Toledo averages 49 while UMass averages 52).

Now here's where the paint comes into play. UMass has nearly a double-figure advantage in rebounds, as Toledo averages a mere 33 per game while the Minutewomen board 41.3. Syracuse has been the only team thus far in the young season to outplay the Maroon and White on the boards.

MATTHEW REITH/COLLEGIAN

Ednis Bailey started UMass' 8-0 run to close out the first half of her team's victory over Syracuse at "The Cage" on Saturday. The Minutewomen won during the last second to improve their record to 3-3.

This will be the second of six straight road games the Rockets will play. Last Thursday, the Rockets traveled to Youngstown State, where the Penguins came away with a 53-42 win. It was the fourth straight loss for Toledo since taking down Cincinnati on opening night, Nov. 19. Since ousting the Bearcats 62-57, the Rockets have been outscored 253-187—including a season-low 28-point effort in a 39-point loss to Marquette.

The Minutewomen would love to embark on their first three-game winning streak since November of a year ago, putting them one game over .500, but it will not come easy. After Saturday's wild barnburner with the previously undefeated Orange, the Minutewomen — despite playing poorly — have found out that anything can happen.

UMass is 0-1 so far in 04-05 when playing in the Mullins Center.

Lennon remembered with two disc release
ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 4

TUESDAY • High: 45° • Low: 41°
WEDNESDAY • High: 50° • Low: 28°
THURSDAY • High: 46° • Low: 37°
DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

Minutewomen crush Toledo 76-56 at home
SPORTS, PAGE 8

The Daily Collegian

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 7, 2004 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXIV ISSUE 62

Professor developing new designs on emergency vehicle traffic light changer

By Mike Parrish
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts Professor John Collura says he has been developing new and improved designs for a device called an Emergency Vehicle and Transit Priority System. This system is a device that allows emergency vehicles or even public transports, such as buses, to pass through a red light by emitting a signal to change it to green.

In his Dec. 3 speech at the Isenberg School of Management and in an interview with the Daily Collegian, Collura, a professor of civil and environmental engineering, said transit signal priority (TSP) is a device that could be invested in given cities and towns to help prevent accidents and save lives.

"I think it is more likely to be used in major cities, and it is a fairly inexpensive system in light of what occurs, such as saving lives and improving mobility," he said.

His speech, part of the ongoing "SOM INFORMS" speaker series, was titled "Preferential Signal Control Strategies for Transit Vehicles."

The lecture consisted of ways to improve response times of emergency vehicles or transit buses, such as the PVTA. Collura says that the Emergency Vehicle and Transit Priority System has actually been in use in some major cities for 10 to 15 years. The technology for this device has been around since the 1970s and 80s, when it was shown to reduce accidents and improve response times in emergency vehicles.

"In a way we are trying to enhance traffic signal systems for emergency vehicles and public transit," said Collura.

Collura said research for the device began almost two decades ago in Minnesota where 3M, the device manufacturer, is based. Once the value of the device was proven in Minnesota, other cities began investing in the product. Other benefits arise from using the device, as well. By preventing the vehicle from consistently idling, it cuts down on emissions because the vehicle can drive non-stop. This also makes emergency vehicles more efficient on fuel consumption.

"It improves air quality because fewer buses are idling and cuts down on emissions," said Collura.

This device is essentially an emitter, such as a strobe light, that is mounted on a vehicle. It sends out a conical signal to a receiver, about the size of a shoebox that is mounted on the arm of a traffic light. Some devices work in other ways, such as sending out a signal by sound, but the concept remains the same. The emitter that is mounted on the vehicle such as a bus is hardwired to the door of the bus, so when the door is open the signal is not being sent out, and when it closes the signal continues. This allows the vehicle to continue through the light, which will turn green after responding to the emitter. The price for one of these emitters is nearly $1,000. To set up 25 intersections in a 10-mile stretch and equip 20 vehicles would cost a city $200,000.

COURTESY BUSSMA EIA

Professor John Collura

"People have actually bought emitters on the Internet and some states are enacting fines and sentences for using the item," said Collura.

More than 10,000 of these devices have been set up and are in use throughout the U.S. They have produced energy-conserving results by improving transit, improving air quality, and optimizing traffic flow, which also reduces pollution by lowering vehicle emissions.

Last April, Collura chaired a panel discussion in Washington D.C. that involved the use of these systems. He said that at the same time the discussion started at 11 a.m., two fire engines in Chicago collided with each other, killing two people and injuring others. The reason they collided was because both fire engines received a green light and proceeded through the intersection. Had these fire engines been equipped with these systems, one of the engines would have received a red light, and the accident never would have happened. The system Collura has been designing does have its benefits, and more cities are likely to use the system where the funds are available.

On March 31, 2003, Collura and three other men from Virginia Tech Transportation Institute submitted their research for publication in the 2003 Transportation Research Record of Virginia. Their research was titled "Evaluation of Service Reliability Impacts of Traffic Signal Priority Strategies for Bus Transit." The other three men were research associate James Chang, assistant Professor Hesham Rakha — both of the department of civil and environmental engineering at Virginia Tech — and research scientist Francis Dion.

Four months ago, Collura came back to teach at UMass after having done his research at Virginia Tech for the past seven years. He is now the Associate Director of the UMass Transit Center.

When asked why he came back to the University, he said, "the challenge of coming back and the opportunity to work with excellent people."

Omega-3 fatty acids lacking in many diets, says panel

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

Omega-3 fatty acids, found primarily in fish, are important to a healthy diet, and many people aren't getting enough.

This was one of the main points of the panel discussion, "Omega-3 Fatty Acids: Remedies, Risks, and Recommendations," that met last Wednesday to teach nutrition and food science students, as well as other interested Amherst residents, about the vital fatty acid.

Professor Nancy Cohen gave the audience of approximately 100 people an introduction to Omega-3 fatty acids and the four panelists who were there to discuss them. Cohen is the head of the department of nutrition at UMass Amherst.

Linda Arterburn was the first lecturer. Arterburn is the senior director of clinical research at the Martek Biosciences Corporation in Columbia, Md. She talked about the benefits of Omega-3 fatty acids to disease prevention. Citing epidemiological observations, prospective cohort studies and controlled clinical trials, Arterburn showed that regular fish eaters had a lower rate of cardiovascular disease and a reduced risk of sudden death due to a heart attack or stroke. Omega-3 fatty acids also have "anti-inflammatory effects."

Arterburn said the group who can reap the greatest benefits of Omega-3 fatty acids is pregnant and lactating women. Infants draw the fatty acids from their mothers, and Omega-3 has been proven to increase eye and brain function and development.

Next to talk was Professor Eric Decker, who discussed seafood supplements and other Omega-3 fatty acid sources. Decker is the Fergus Clydesdale endowed chair of the department of food science at UMass. Since most people in the United States don't get their recommended amount of Omega-3 from fish, Decker encouraged the use of supplements such as cod liver oil and Omega-3 tablets.

Decker acknowledged that cod liver oil is "pretty gross" and that both it and supplements can cause reflux, so he also encouraged the use of Omega-3 fortified foods.

The next speaker was Elaine Krueger whose subject was seafood safety. She discussed in more depth the dangers of eating fish due to mercury, arsenic and other pollutants in our water. Krueger is the director of environmental toxicology program of the Massachusetts Department of Public Health. Krueger explained how fish are becoming more and more toxic due to water pollution, particularly in freshwater.

Even with legislation in the U.S. to cut back on water contamination, Krueger explained, our water supply is still being polluted by "local wastes, such as incinerators, global pollution from areas that may use 'old' pesticides that have been banned in the U.S." Even some natural sources, like volcanoes, have been contributing to the contamination of water.

Krueger's biggest area of concern was mercury, which has become increasingly common in fish and has led to advisories

See OMEGA on page 2

KNIGHT-RIDDER

Santa Smorgaspord

Over 4,200 people broke the world record on Saturday in Newton, Mid-Wales, by dressing up as Santa for a 4K run in the cold.

University Education department rears future teachers not to 'teach toward' MCAS

By Dave Fonseca
Collegian Staff

Although high-stakes standardized tests are pressuring elementary and secondary teachers to push students to reach achievement standards, the University of Massachusetts's School of Education is cultivating teachers to prepare students by not "teaching towards the test."

A main obstacle in preparing pre-service teachers for the MCAS (Massachusetts Comprehensive Assessment System) test is making sure their curricula don't become too focused on the test. According to Joseph Berger, assistant director of UMass's Department of Educational Research Policy and Administration, "One of our main goals is to prepare teachers to go out into the world and not resort to the stereotypical teaching to the test," Berger said. "We want to make sure teachers and students are engaging in a lot of active learning, not just drilling and killing."

Cynthia Rosenberger, coordinator of the school's CTEP (Collaborative Teacher Education Program) — which licenses new elementary and early childhood education teachers — said they must have the skills not only to prepare students for the MCAS, but also to help them understand the concepts behind the material.

"We consider it extremely important that our teachers have the background knowledge and pedagogical skills to prepare students to perform well on the MCAS tests," Rosenberger said. "At the same time, the CTEP faculty hopes to prepare teachers who know how to help students construct an understanding of the fundamental concepts and big ideas in the various fields of knowledge."

Rosenberger said that CTEP seeks to avoid teachers' teaching to the test "by sharing research that demonstrates the importance of teaching for understanding, helping them learn meaningful ways to construct a curriculum that focuses on essential understandings or large concepts in each field of knowledge, and focusing on the importance of helping children become autonomous and lifelong learners."

Nevertheless, with greater pressures placed on schools as a result of the No Child Left Behind education reform act, some in the educational system say the push to focus on the MCAS is inescapable.

According to Wendy Buckley, a reading teacher at the Erwin K. Walker School in Carver, Mass., the pressure to do well on standardized tests has created an atmosphere in which not focusing on the test is almost unavoidable.

"The atmosphere within the school building has changed," Buckley said, "because there is this underlying feeling that we are in a time of making sure that we make the grade."

Buckley, a teacher in the Carver system for 29 years, says she doesn't feel like her teaching style will change much despite to the pressures of MCAS testing "I truly felt like what I was doing was working before," Buckley said. However, she fears that many teachers are letting preparing students for MCAS overshadow other important aspects of teaching.

"We used to be very much interested in observing children," she said. "Watching the process of how they arrived at answers. There's no time for that now. You really just need to focus on the final product, something that is measurable."

With the enactment of No Child Left Behind in 2002, the importance of standardized tests such as the MCAS gained new weight. Provisions in the act require states to come up with ways to measure the achievement levels of their schools. In Massachusetts, it is the MCAS test that is used to measure school achievement.

See MCAS on page 2

Ukraine officials reach compromise on election reforms

By Natasha Lisova
Associated Press

KIEV, Ukraine — Ukraine's opposition and pro-government lawmakers tentatively agreed on a compromise Monday to ensure a fair vote during the rerun later this month of the fraud-ridden presidential runoff and gradually shift some powers from the presidency to parliament.

Ukraine's outgoing president, Leonid Kuchma, and Russian President Vladimir Putin said they would abide by the results of the new election, removing major question marks surrounding the Dec. 26 rematch. The vote was ordered by the Supreme Court, which last week struck down the election commission decision that Kremlin-backed Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych won the Nov. 21 runoff.

"Of course we will ... accept the will of any nation in the former Soviet space and will work with any elected leader," Putin said during a state visit to Turkey.

Yanukovych emerged from seclusion and declared he was confident of victory. Kuchma had supported Yanukovych in the runoff against Western-leaning opposition leader Viktor Yushchenko, but has distanced himself from the prime minister over the past two weeks as protesters swarmed the capital.

Stepan Havrysh, a senior pro-government lawmaker, said all factions in the parliament's coordination committee agreed to back the compromise to amend election laws and the constitution when it comes to a vote Tuesday.

As part of the deal, Kuchma may also fire Yanukovych from his prime minister's post. Havrysh said. Kuchma was quoted by The New York Times as saying that if he were Yanukovych, he would not run in the Dec. 26 vote.

As European leaders mediated talks in Kiev, Putin warned against foreign interference in the new ballot and suggested the opposition was seeking power at any price. He left open how Russia — which considers this nation of 48 million people part of its sphere of influence — would deal with a Yushchenko government.

On the streets of the Ukrainian capital, opposition demonstrators countered Putin's warning with an appeal of their own, unveiling a 200-foot-long petition — inscribed on a roll of cloth in the opposition's trademark color of orange — urging the Russian leader to stay out of Ukrainian affairs.

COURTESY CNN.COM

A Yushchenko supporter celebrates downtown Kiev yesterday.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, DECEMBER 6, 2004 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass survives against PC but gets trounced by Terriers

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

The makings of the weekend were historic, but after the Mullins Center ice was cleared for the final time on Saturday night, the only history that the Massachusetts hockey team (7-9-1, 4-4-1 Hockey East) would want to make was their collective memory of the 7-1 thrashing that the Boston University Terriers dished out to the ex-pense of the Minutemen.

Boston Univ.	7
UMass	1

After Friday night's tough 3-2 win against Providence (5-8-2, 2-6-2 HEA), UMass had a laundry list chalk-full of favorable reasons why they could knock of Boston University (9-6-0, 8-1-0 HEA) the following night.

UMass	3
Providence	2

The Terriers won a 3-2 thriller over their bitter rival Boston College Friday, which was coach Jack Parker's 700th career victory. The two teams admittedly put more into a BC-BU game than they do for their other contests, leaving UMass as a mere side dish to the Terriers' main course the night before.

There was even a little bit of gamesmanship that went on between Parker and his long-time friend, UMass coach Don Cahoon, who coached under Parker at BU three separate times after winning two national championships as a player at Boston University in the early 1970s.

Parker wanted Cahoon and the athletic department to reschedule the slated game to better accommodate his team's travel plans and create a nice cushion for a day off after the Boston College battle. Cahoon obviously denied his counterpart's request, and travel problems did hurt the Terriers as their team bus showed up late to Amherst, which delayed the start of the game by 15 minutes and allowed the crowd of 5,638 to rear up even more for the game.

MATTHEW REDDY/COLLEGIAN

P.J. Fenton and the Minutemen were able to end their four-game losing streak on Friday night against Providence, but Boston University showed up to the Mullins Center to rout UMass on Saturday.

The Minutemen failed to take advantage of these one-sided circumstances, though, and the Terriers controlled the game from the start.

Just a tick over four minutes after the puck was dropped, BU's Dan Spang took a pass from Brad Zancanaro and one-timed it past goalie Gabe Winer.

After looking very complacent for the remainder of the first period and into the second, the Minutemen didn't create any opportunities for themselves to tie the score before a bad line change led to BU's second goal of the night.

Brian McConnell contained the puck near the right boards and passed it across the ice to a streaking Zancanaro who easily beat Winer after he was forced to leave the net to make up for the lack of defensemen in front of him due to the bad line change.

The Terriers put the game away just 33 seconds later when Peter MacArthur sniped a wrist-shot over Winer's shoulder to give BU a 3-0 advantage that sealed Parker's 701st career victory.

See HOCKEY on page 8

Freeman contained in loss to Gonzaga

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team proved that it was game for a challenge in giving heavily favored Gonzaga all it could handle Saturday afternoon, but in the end it was not enough.

Gonzaga	68
UMass	57

Having grabbed an early lead in the annual "Battle In Seattle" contest, the Minutemen watched the Bulldogs storm back to take a 17-point lead early in the second half before battling all the way back to tie the game at 40. From there it was all Zags, however, as 12 second half points from Adam Morrison and Ronny Turiaf's 19 points and 14 boards led coach Mark Few's team past UMass 68-57 before 10,126 at Key Arena in Seattle, Wash.

Sophomore guard Maurice Maxwell led the Minutemen with 19 points while senior captain Anthony Anderson added 14 points and four assists. Sophomore forward Rashaun Freeman, who attracted double teams all afternoon and struggled to find an offensive rhythm, scored nine points and grabbed six rebounds in 27 minutes before fouling out midway through the second half.

Sophomore guard Art Bowers continued to struggle mightily on the offensive end for UMass after scoring six points on 3-of-12 shooting, including 0-of-5 from 3-point range. Classmate Stephane Lasme played a strong defensive game for the Maroon and White, posting four blocks while defending Turial over 34 minutes.

UMass returns to action on Thursday night when it will host archrival and defending national champion Connecticut at the Mullins Center. Tip-off is slated for 9 p.m., and the game will be broadcast live on ESPN2.

Morrison led all scorers with 20 points, despite 1-of-5 shooting from beyond the arc. Turiaf, meanwhile, overcame a slow start to come on strong in the second half, getting the majority of his production from an 11-for-16 showing from the free throw line.

J.P. Batista was the only other player in double-figures as he had 10 points for the Bulldogs to go alone with nine points and four steals from point guard Derek Raivio.

The Minutemen appeared to be out of the game early in the second half after falling down by 17 but stormed back with a stunning 24-6 run that erased the advantage. A Maxwell 3-pointer with 12 minutes remaining brought UMass within a basket at 40-38, before Lasme tied the game with a pair of free throws just under a minute later.

After the team's traded hoops on the next few possessions, a Bowers basket gave the Minutemen a slim 44-43 lead before a Lawrence Carrier 3-pointer pushed UMass out in front by a score of 47-45 with 8:50 to play.

Gonzaga answered immediately with a 3-pointer of its own from Morrison, before the Bulldogs took off on a 13-2 burst that was part of a 23-4 run, giving them control of the game for good.

With both Freeman and Lasme fouling out of the game down the stretch, UMass was no longer able to contain Turiaf, who scored nine points during Gonzaga's second half run and keyed the Zags success on offense during the streak.

The Maroon and White got off to a promising start in the opening minutes of the game, staking itself to a 13-8 lead before turnovers and a lack of offense keyed a 15-0 Gonzaga run that gave control of the game to the Zags. The Minutemen turned the ball over 14 times in the first half, including 10 times in the first nine minutes.

Minutewomen escape 'The Cage' with win

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Last Friday in practice, Massachusetts women's basketball coach Marnie Dacko was working with sophomore forward Tamara Tatham on the mental aspect of foul shooting.

"I was with her just talking about visualization, all that mind stuff, trying to get her to focus on the ball and seeing it go through the basket," Dacko said.

So it comes as no surprise that with 11.7 seconds left and a tie score in Saturday's "Rage in the Cage" contest with the Syracuse Orange (5-1), it was Tatham at the charity stripe, visualizing the two most important shots in her young career.

UMass	52
Syracuse	51

"I was just focusing, zoning everything out, visualizing making the basket," Tatham said.

And with the crowd of 1,402 on its feet and screaming in the historic Curry Hicks Cage, the 6-foot-1 native of Canada came, saw, and conquered, nailing both her free throws to give the Minutewomen (3-3) a 52-51 win over the Orange.

"It was an ugly game," Dacko said. "We're usually a rebounding team, and we got beat on the boards today. It was an ugly game, but we'll take the win."

But things would have certainly been much uglier for UMass had forward Chineze Nwagbo made both of her free throws with 0.4 seconds left to go, which would have forced an overtime.

Once again, luck went the way of Maroon and White as a perennial star player fell short when it came down to the wire. Nwagbo led all scorers on the afternoon with 19 points and added 14 rebounds to give her a double-double. And so while the 6-foot-1 senior continued to wreak havoc on the Minutewomen's inside game all day long, she was unable to make her last shot count.

"Overall, I was pretty pleased with the way we're trying to play, and it's just [a matter of] finishing," Syracuse coach Keith Ciepicki said. "I'll tell you, Chinny's never played better. She plays hard. She's so consistent. I mean, it's too bad she's got to miss that free throw because she carried us for 39 minutes and 59 seconds... I think everybody understands everybody else has to play better."

Senior guard Rochelle Colem[illegible] also scored in double figures for the Orange, throwing down 11 points despite a three-for-11 day on the floor. She also grabbed two boards and dished out three assists in 31 minutes of play.

The Campbell-Nwagbo matchup was an interesting showdown as the two continued to exchange baskets and boards down inside the key. When all was said and done, the two came away with double-doubles (Campbell scored a team-high 16 points and grabbing 10 boards).

UMass concluded its Big East tour for the 2004-05 season, finishing with a record of 2-1 against teams from that conference. The Maroon and White are also in the midst of their first two-game winning streak since November of 2003 when they pulled off three wins in a row against Brown, Vermont and Utah State, respectively.

The first half saw a neck-and-neck battle between the Minutewomen and Orange through the first 15 minutes. The excellent ball movement of UMass and the inside and outside shooting game of Syracuse continued to counteract one another until late in the first half. With 4:43 to go in the half and trailing 20-19, Edris Bailey tapped in a layup, sparking an 8-0 run to finish off the first half.

In what has almost become customary, the Maroon and White saw its seven-point halftime lead vanish, care of the hot outside hands of Coleman and Lauren Kohn. Every time the Minutewomen took back the lead, the Orange went deep from outside.

Trailing by three with under five minutes to go, Katie Nelson took a page from Kohn's book and nailed a deep trey to tie things up. Pam Rosanio then stole the ball on SU's next trip down, dished the ball off to Joyce Massey, who passed it right back to her for the go-ahead layup, and the Minutewomen would cease to relinquish their lead again.

Gulak grabbed the rebound off Nwagbo's errant second shot to prevent overtime, and the Minutewomen closed the door on a game that literally went down to the last stitch of allotted time.

If winning on a sloppy day is any indicator of the potential this team has, then there certainly has to be some momentum carrying into tonight, when they will play their last home game of the fall semester before embarking on a four-game road trip.

Tonight's game against the Toledo Rockets (1-4), scheduled for a 7:00 p.m. tipoff at the Mullins Center, ought to be an interesting one. Both the Rockets and the Minutewomen are shooting 38 percent from the field, 25 percent from beyond the arc and around 50 points per game (Toledo averages 49 while UMass averages 52).

Now here's where the paint comes into play. UMass has nearly a double-figure advantage in rebounds, as Toledo averages a mere 33 per game while the Minutewomen board 41.3. Syracuse has been the only team thus far in the young season to outplay the Maroon and White on the boards.

MATTHEW REDDY/COLLEGIAN

Ednis Bailey started UMass' 8-0 run to close out the first half of her team's victory over Syracuse at "The Cage" on Saturday. The Minutewomen won during the last second to improve their record to 3-3.

This will be the second of six straight road games the Rockets will play. Last Thursday, the Rockets traveled to Youngstown State, where the Penguins came away with a 53-42 win. It was the fourth straight loss for Toledo since taking down Cincinnati on opening night, Nov. 19. Since ousting the Bearcats 62-57, the Rockets have been outscored 253-187—including a season-low 28-point effort in a 39-point loss to Marquette.

The Minutewomen would love to embark on their first three-game winning streak since November of a year ago, putting them one game over .500, but it will not come easy. After Saturday's wild barnburner with the previously undefeated Orange, the Minutewomen — despite playing poorly — have found out that anything can happen.

UMass is 0-1 so far in 04-05 when playing in the Mullins Center.

The Daily Collegian

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 7, 2004 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXIV ISSUE 62

Lennon remembered with two disc release
ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 4

TUESDAY • High: 45° • Low: 41°
WEDNESDAY • High: 50° • Low: 28°
THURSDAY • High: 46° • Low: 17°
DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

Minutewomen crush Toledo 76-56 at home
SPORTS, PAGE 8

Professor developing new designs on emergency vehicle traffic light changer

By Mike Parrish
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts Professor John Collura says he has been developing new and improved designs for a device called an Emergency Vehicle and Transit Priority System. This system is a device that allows emergency vehicles or even public transports, such as buses, to pass through a red light by emitting a signal to change it to green.

In his Dec. 3 speech at the Isenberg School of Management and in an interview with the Daily Collegian, Collura, a professor of civil and environmental engineering, said transit signal priority (TSP) is a device that could be invested in given cities and towns to help prevent accidents and save lives.

"I think it is more likely to be used in major cities, and it is a fairly inexpensive system in light of what occurs, such as saving lives and improving mobility," he said.

His speech, part of the ongoing "SOM INFORMS" speaker series, was titled "Preferential Signal Control Strategies for Transit Vehicles."

The lecture consisted of ways to improve response times of emergency vehicles or transit buses, such as the PVTA. Collura says that the Emergency Vehicle and Transit Priority System has actually been in use in some major cities for 10 to 15 years. The technology for this device has been around since the 1970s and 80s, when it was shown to reduce accidents and improve response times in emergency vehicles.

"In a way we are trying to enhance traffic signal systems for emergency vehicles and public transit," said Collura.

Collura said research for the device began almost two decades ago in Minnesota where 3M, the device manufacturer, is based. Once the value of the device was proven in Minnesota, other cities began investing in the product. Other benefits arise from using the device, as well. By preventing the vehicle from consistently idling, it cuts down on emissions because the vehicle can drive non-stop. This also makes emergency vehicles more efficient on fuel consumption.

"It improves air quality because fewer buses are idling and cuts down on emissions," said Collura.

This device is essentially an emitter, such as a strobe light, that is mounted on a vehicle. It sends out a conical signal to a receiver, about the size of a shoebox that is mounted on the arm of a traffic light. Some devices work in other ways, such as sending out a signal by sound, but the concept remains the same. The emitter that is mounted on the vehicle such as a bus is hardwired to the door of the bus, so when the door is open the signal is not being sent out, and when it closes the signal continues. This allows the vehicle to continue through the light, which will turn green after responding to the emitter. The price for one of these emitters is nearly $1,000. To set up 25 intersections in a 10-mile stretch and equip 20 vehicles would cost a city $200,000.

CHRISTINE WUSMAN III

Professor John Collura

"People have actually bought emitters on the Internet and some states are enacting fines and sentences for using the item," said Collura.

More than 10,000 of these devices have been set up and are in use throughout the U.S. They have produced energy-conserving results by improving transit, improving air quality, and optimizing traffic flow, which also reduces pollution by lowering vehicle emissions.

Last April, Collura chaired a panel discussion in Washington D.C. that involved the use of these systems. He said that at the same time the discussion started at 11 a.m., two fire engines in Chicago collided with each other, killing two people and injuring others. The reason they collided was because both fire engines received a green light and proceeded through the intersection. Had these fire engines been equipped with these systems, one of the engines would have received a red light, and the accident never would have happened. The system Collura has been designing does have its benefits, and more cities are likely to use the system where the funds are available.

On March 31, 2003, Collura and three other men from Virginia Tech Transportation Institute submitted their research for publication in the 2003 Transportation Research Record of Virginia. Their research was titled "Evaluation of Service Reliability Impacts of Traffic Signal Priority Strategies for Bus Transit." The other three men were research associate James Chang, assistant Professor Hesham Rakha — both of the department of civil and environmental engineering at Virginia Tech — and research scientist Francis Dion.

Four months ago, Collura came back to teach at UMass after having done his research at Virginia Tech for the past seven years. He is now the Associate Director of the UMass Transit Center.

When asked why he came back to the University, he said, "the challenge of coming back and the opportunity to work with excellent people."

Omega-3 fatty acids lacking in many diets, says panel

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

Omega-3 fatty acids, found primarily in fish, are important to a healthy diet, and many people aren't getting enough.

This was one of the main points of the panel discussion, "Omega-3 Fatty Acids: Remedies, Risks, and Recommendations," that met last Wednesday to teach nutrition and food science students, as well as other Interested Amherst residents, about the vital fatty acid.

Professor Nancy Cohen gave the audience of approximately 100 people an introduction to Omega-3 fatty acids and the four panelists who were there to discuss them. Cohen is the head of the department of nutrition at UMass Amherst.

Linda Arterburn was the first lecturer. Arterburn was the senior director of clinical research at the Martek Biosciences Corporation in Columbia, Md. She talked about the benefits of Omega-3 fatty acids to disease prevention. Citing epidemiological observations, prospective cohort studies and controlled clinical trials, Arterburn showed that regular fish eaters had a lower rate of cardiovascular disease and a reduced risk of sudden death due to a heart attack or stroke. Omega-3 fatty acids also have "anti-inflammatory effects."

Arterburn said the group who can reap the greatest benefits of Omega-3 fatty acids is pregnant and lactating women. Infants draw the fatty acids from their mothers, and Omega-3 has been proven to increase eye and brain function and development.

Next to talk was Professor Eric Decker, who discussed seafood supplements and other Omega-3 fatty acid sources. Decker is the Fergus Clydesdale endowed chair of the department of food science at UMass. Since most people in the United States don't get their recommended amount of Omega-3 from fish, Decker encouraged the use of supplements such as cod liver oil and Omega-3 tablets.

Decker acknowledged that cod liver oil is "pretty gross" and that both it and supplements can cause reflux, so he also encouraged the use of Omega-3 fortified foods.

The next speaker was Elaine Krueger whose subject was seafood safety. She discussed in more depth the dangers of eating fish due to mercury, arsenic and other pollutants in our water. Krueger is the director of environmental toxicology program of the Massachusetts Department of Public Health. Krueger explained how fish are becoming more and more toxic due to water pollution, particularly in freshwater.

Even with legislation in the U.S. to cut back on water contamination, Krueger explained, our water supply is still being polluted by "local wastes, such as incinerators, global pollution from areas that may use 'old' pesticides that have been banned in the U.S." Even some natural sources, like volcanoes, have been contributing to the contamination of water.

Krueger's biggest area of concern was mercury, which has become increasingly common in fish and has led to advisories

See OMEGA on page 2

KNIGHT/STAFF

Santa Smorgaspord

Over 4,200 people broke the world record on Saturday in Newton, Mid-Wales, by dressing up as Santa for a 4K run in the cold.

University Education department rears future teachers not to 'teach toward' MCAS

By Dave Fonseca
Collegian Staff

Although high-stakes standardized tests are pressuring elementary and secondary teachers to push students to reach achievement standards, the University of Massachusetts's School of Education is cultivating teachers to prepare students by not "teaching towards the test."

A main obstacle in preparing pre-service teachers for the MCAS (Massachusetts Comprehensive Assessment System) test is making sure their curricula don't become too focused on the test. According to Joseph Berger, assistant director of UMass's Department of Educational Research Policy and Administration, "One of our main goals is to prepare teachers to go out into the world and not resort to the stereotypical teaching to the test," Berger said. "We want to make sure teachers and students are engaging in a lot of active learning, not just drilling and killing."

Cynthia Rosenberger, coordinator of the school's CTEP (Collaborative Teacher Education Program) — which licenses new elementary and early childhood education teachers — said they must have the skills not only to prepare students for the MCAS, but also to help them understand the concepts behind the material.

"We consider it extremely important that our teachers have the background knowledge and pedagogical skills to prepare students to perform well on the MCAS tests," Rosenberger said. "At the same time, the CTEP faculty hopes to prepare teachers who know how to help students construct an understanding of the fundamental concepts and big ideas in the various fields of knowledge."

Rosenberger said that CTEP seeks to avoid teachers' teaching to the test "by sharing research that demonstrates the importance of teaching for understanding, helping them learn meaningful ways to construct a curriculum that focuses on essential understandings or large concepts in each field of knowledge, and focusing on the importance of helping children become autonomous and lifelong learners."

Nevertheless, with greater pressures placed on schools as a result of the No Child Left Behind education reform act, some in the educational system say the push to focus on the MCAS is inescapable.

According to Wendy Buckley, a reading teacher at the Erwin K. Walker School in Carver, Mass., the pressure to do well on standardized tests has created an atmosphere in which not focusing on the test is almost unavoidable.

"The atmosphere within the school building has changed," Buckley said, "because there is this underlying feeling that we are in a time of making sure that we make the grade."

Buckley, a teacher in the Carver system for 29 years, says she doesn't feel like her teaching style will change much despite to the pressures of MCAS testing. "I truly felt like what I was doing was working before," Buckley said. However, she fears that many teachers are letting preparing students for MCAS overshadow other important aspects of teaching.

"We used to be very much interested in observing children," she said. "Watching the process of how they arrived at answers. There's no time for that now. You really just need to focus on the final product, something that is measurable."

With the enactment of No Child Left Behind in 2002, the importance of standardized tests such as the MCAS gained new weight. Provisions in the act require states to come up with ways to measure the achievement levels of their schools. In Massachusetts, it is the MCAS test that is used to measure school achievement.

See MCAS on page 2

Ukraine officials reach compromise on election reforms

By Natasha Lisova
Associated Press

KIEV, Ukraine — Ukraine's opposition and pro-government lawmakers tentatively agreed on a compromise Monday to ensure a fair vote during the rerun later this month of the fraud-ridden presidential runoff and gradually shift some powers from the presidency to parliament.

Ukraine's outgoing president, Leonid Kuchma, and Russian President Vladimir Putin said they would abide by the results of the new election, removing major question marks surrounding the Dec. 26 rematch. The vote was ordered by the Supreme Court, which last week struck down the election commission decision that Kremlin-backed Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych won the Nov. 21 runoff.

"Of course we will ... accept the will of any nation in the former Soviet space and will work with any elected leader," Putin said during a state visit to Turkey.

Yanukovych emerged from seclusion and declared he was confident of victory. Kuchma had supported Yanukovych in the runoff against Western-leaning opposition leader Viktor Yushchenko, but has distanced himself from the prime minister over the past two weeks as protesters swarmed the capital.

Stepan Havrysh, a senior pro-government lawmaker, said all factions in the parliament's coordination committee agreed to back the compromise to amend election laws and the constitution when it comes to a vote Tuesday.

As part of the deal, Kuchma may also fire Yanukovych from his prime minister's post. Havrysh said. Kuchma was quoted by The New York Times as saying that if he were Yanukovych, he would not run in the Dec. 26 vote.

As European leaders mediated talks in Kiev, Putin warned against foreign interference in the new ballot and suggested the opposition was seeking power at any price. He left open how Russia — which considers this nation of 48 million people part of its sphere of influence — would deal with a Yushchenko government.

On the streets of the Ukrainian capital, opposition demonstrators countered Putin's warning with an appeal of their own, unveiling a 200-foot-long petition — inscribed on a roll of cloth in the opposition's trademark color of orange — urging the Russian leader to stay out of Ukrainian affairs.

TSVETKOV/SNS.COM

A Yushchenko supporter celebrates downtown Kiev yesterday.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Andrew Merritt
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Cameron Woods
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha Nieben
Arts & Living Editor Meghan Healy
Copy Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Paige Cram
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Matthew Reid
Sports Editor Mike Marzelli
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Kagann
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Frecaut
Human Resource Sandra Marquez
Assistant Operating Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Jaclynn Sorenson
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Advisor Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living Mike Busack
Asst. Arts & Living Monique Jemmott
Assistant Editorial Yousef Munayyer
Assistant Editorial Allison Edles
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Sports Robert McGovern
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890 the paper began as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1918 and the Tri Weekly Collegian in 1936. Published daily since 1967. The Collegian has been printed sheet since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call 545-3500 days between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Cameron J. Woods
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Jamie Lau
COPY EDITOR
Sarah Marples
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Cory Rosenberg
PRODUCTION STAFF
Nate Freedman, Elliott Chong

LIVESTRONG-type bracelets gaining popularity

Brent Murach, left, and Brett Hartman of Pennsylvania hold up a Lance Armstrong Livestrong bracelet.

CHICAGO — Jennifer Longley wears her yellow bracelet in honor of her many relatives who have had cancer, including a grandfather who lost his tongue and voice box and an aunt who died of ovarian cancer.

"I also wear it for me, because I know that this is something that I will continue to deal with in my future," says Longley, a 24-year-old who works for the Cornell University Press in Ithaca, N.Y.

Jason "Jazz" Skipworth, a 26-year-old scientist at the Fox Chase Cancer Center in Philadelphia, says his bracelet gives him "the extra motivation to work that much harder."

And Eric Nobis, an amateur bike rider in Seattle, is convinced that his bracelet "makes [him] cycle faster."

It's just a simple band of yellow rubber that bears the word "LIVESTRONG" and sells for $1 as a fund-raiser for the Lance Armstrong Foundation, an organization the celebrated cyclist began for fellow cancer survivors. But the yellow bracelet has become a must-have item and has prompted charitable organizations nationwide to create their own versions, made with various colors, materials and messages.

Some liken the fad to the POW-MIA bracelets people wore for imprisoned and missing soldiers during the Vietnam War or say the bracelets are the latest twist on the red and pink ribbons that have become synonymous with AIDS and breast cancer, respectively.

Today, red bracelets are being sold to raise money for everything from diabetes research to children with HIV. Vistacare, a health care company in Scottsdale, Ariz., is giving out hurgundy bracelets with the word "Remember" to get people talking about the difficult topic of hospice care.

And next Monday, the Ohio Tobacco Use Prevention and Control Foundation will start handing out orange bracelets as a conversation starter about the dangers of secondhand smoke.

Genny Neely, a 27-year-old New Yorker, is interested in getting several of the bracelets. She first saw the LIVESTRONG bands while visiting Chicago last summer and said, "I have to have one of those."

-Associated Press

Professor advises to avoid fish with high mercury levels

OMEGA from page 1

being posted for at-risk groups, such as pregnant women, to stay away from fish. Mercury negatively affects a person's kidneys and reproductive system; it has also been suspected of causing cancer. The worst effect of mercury is the neuro-developmental damage it can cause as it builds up in the brain over several years. This can lead to seizures and cerebral palsy.

Finally, Professor Elena Carbone came to the podium to talk about what amount consumers really need of Omega-3 fatty acids based on the risks and benefits of them. Carbone is an assistant professor of nutrition at UMass. Carbone encouraged people to stay away from certain sources of fish, such as shark, swordfish, king mackerel and tilefish, which all contain high amounts of mercury. She also said to "stay away from fish from freshwater sources." For people with lowered immunity, Carbone said to "avoid Boston Harbor lobsters, flounder, soft shell clams and other bivalves." Canned tuna is another thing to limit in a diet.

Most of all, Carbone encouraged people to stay updated on health advisories, but not to be so afraid of eating fish that you miss out on all the benefits of Omega-3 fatty acids, which, in and of themselves, present none of the dangers that eating fish might.

This conference was funded in part by a grant from the Nutritional Impacts of Functional Food Program.

Total security not certain in Iraq

WASHINGTON — President Bush acknowledged Monday that American military forces "can never guarantee 100 percent security" for Iraq's elections Jan. 30, but said the voting must proceed on schedule to let people choose democracy over terrorism.

Bush met with Ghazi al-Yawer, the interim Iraqi president, and Jordan's King Abdullah II, in the White House on a day when attackers forced their way into the heavily guarded U.S. consulate in Jiddah, Saudi Arabia. Eight people, none American, were killed.

"The attacks in Saudi Arabia remind us that the terrorists are still on the move," Bush said at an Oval Office photo opportunity with al-Yawer. "They're interested in affecting the will of free countries. They want us to leave Saudi Arabia. They want us to leave Iraq. ... And that's why these elections in Iraq are very important."

Iraq has been riddled with violence that has claimed the lives of more than 1,200 U.S. troops.

To bolster security for next month's voting, the United States announced last week it was increasing its military force in Iraq to about 150,00, the highest level of the war, including the initial invasion in March 2003.

Bush said the 12,000-troop increase will help make polling places safer, although "you can never guarantee 100 percent security. But the Iraqi people have a chance to say to the world, 'We choose democracy over terrorism.'"

Al-Yawer — an influential leader in Sunni Muslim regions of Iraq where the fiercest battles against insurgents have been waged — wants Iraq's Jan. 30 election held on time, but other Sunni leaders want it postponed, saying ongoing violence in these areas would keep people from voting.

Interim Iraqi President Ghazi al-Yawar speaks to reporters after meeting with President Bush yesterday.

-Associated Press

MCAS importance stressed to teaching students

MCAS from page 1

Schools that score poorly or show no improvement on the MCAS are subject to panel reviews to determine whether the school is under-performing. According to the MCAS homepage, schools that under-perform are subject to state intervention. Such schools may be placed under federal watch or become subject to reduced funding. No Child Left Behind also enables parents to transfer their child to another school if the one they are currently enrolled in underachieves.

In the School of Education, there's concern not only with the way the teachers prepare students for the MCAS, but also with whether or not the tests are good indicators of student progress.

"These tests are far more concerned with educational efficiency than they are with educational equity," Berger said. "We need to make sure we have enough information about what it's useful for and what it's not useful for before we start implementing policies around it."

Wendy Buckley echoed Berger's sentiment. "You can measure a test, but you can't measure the idea that while a student was working on this she saw that she made a mistake and she fixed it, which says a lot more to me than that student getting the answer right."

Rosenberger said the test is a valid measure of a student's knowledge, but not the only one. "What we know about the theory of multiple intelligences shows us that students need many ways to show what they know," Rosenberger said. "The MCAS is just one way to show what a student knows."

NEWS IS LOOKING FOR WRITERS FROM THE FIVE COLLEGES.
If you are from Hampshire, Mt. Holyoke, Amherst, or Smith and interested in writing, please call Erika

We are now accepting applications for

MDC Design Manager

Position involves:

Graphic Arts Production
Sales and Management

Please submit your resume, in person, to the Collegian in the Campus Center basement.

Hadley Sunoco
"Specializing In All Your Automotive Needs."
457 Russell St.
Hadley MA. 01035
(413) 253-4623
HadleySunoco@yahoo.com

Front Brake Special
$69.95
Includes Brake Pads, Labor and inspection of front rotors and calipers
Most Cars, Light trucks & SUVS
GET A FREE TIRE ROTATION WITH ANY BRAKE JOB!!!!!!
Regular Price: 84.95
Offer valid with Collegian AD only
Not to be combined with any other Brake discounts or offers
Offer Expires 01/1/05

SPECIAL
10% Student Discount On Labor With a Valid College ID
WE WILL BEAT ANY COMPETITOR'S WRITTEN ESTIMATE!!!!!

Come try us out today
FREE ESTIMATES!

Some of the many other services we specialize in are: Brakes, tires, CV-shafts, alternators, starters, belts, tune-ups, timing belts and exhaust repair.

Please join the Jewish community at UMass Amherst for an evening of cultural celebration
UMass Hillel and the Jewish Student Union are pleased to present:
A Hanukkah Bash
Featuring the Middle-Eastern flavored folk rock confabulation:
Pharaoh's Daughter

With HHB (the Hillel House Band) opening
Latkes, Dreidles and Dancing Can't wait to see you there!

Wednesday, December 8th, 8:00 pm.
Marketplace Cafe, Campus Center Concourse
(across from the UStore) University of Massachusetts, Amherst

This event is free and all are welcome
For more information contact the UMass Hillel House at 413-549-1710 or info@umasshillel.org

Additional generous support provided by Debra Abrahams Weiner (UMass '81), Umass Office of Student Affairs, UMass Office of Jewish Affairs and Harold Grinspoon Foundation.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

Tuesday, December 7, 2004

"The recipe for perpetual ignorance is to be satisfied with your opinions and content with your knowledge." Elbert Hubbard

Editorial@dailycollegian.com

Near miss at Mullins

Zach Oelschlegel

Last Wednesday, I came back to my dorm room pretty ticked off. I was having a blast at the UMass basketball game against Northeastern up until the last eight minutes of play, when the Huskies went on a big run to beat UMass by double digits. We've had better games in terms of finishing them out.

What really ticked me off, though, was the fact that our student section was this close to making Sports Center. It wasn't for being the loudest fans at the Mullins Center since the "Refuse to Lose" era. It wasn't for inspiring the team to a nice win, although we sure tried.

It was because some knucklehead decided it would be a good idea to throw a peppermint at one of the male cheerleaders from Northeastern as the game was twenty seconds from ending — some knucklehead who has seen the hoopla surrounding Ron Artest and the Detroit Pistons fans yet still, in a big effort to impress the schmuck sitting next to him, took the risk.

The cheerleader, being a real tough guy, didn't help the situation. He turned around towards the student section, in absolute hysterics, bellowing, "Who did it? Man up! Come on, man up!" He managed to get one leg over the railing to pounce on who he deemed the perpetrator before two of his other cheerleading cohorts grabbed his arms to pull him back, with him still screaming, "Man up!"

While what came about was relatively minor, it all comes down to one huge "what if?" For instance, what if that cheerleader managed to get the other leg over the railing and was able to level the guy who hit him with the peppermint?

To flip out over a one-ounce peppermint hitting you in the head is ridiculous, and he made his best attempt to prove to the crowd and to the women he was so recently bulding pyramids with that he was, in fact, masculine.

Every student in that section would have been throwing punches right back at him, like those Detroit fans who kept hitting Ron Artest after he threw to the ground the man who hit him with beer. Some more of those beefy cheerleaders would have followed him into the stands to defend him, and they would've been fighting the students as well, since there was bad blood between the cheerleaders and the Maroon Platoon faithful before anything was thrown onto the court.

It would have been ugly. We all would have been famous. And, as it has been done so traditionally at our school for so long, our reputation would have gone down yet another few notches.

We really were two male cheerleaders from disaster.

Clearly, the cheerleader overreacted. To flip out over a one-ounce peppermint hitting you in the head is ridiculous, and he made his best attempt to prove to the crowd and to the women he was so recently building pyramids with that he was, in fact, masculine. Then again, you don't play with fire, especially when it weighs 250, can bench 300, and has the intellectual capacity of a baked potato.

I sat down with my sociology professor Todd Crosset to get some more input on why these things happen. He pointed out to me how the spectacle isn't so much the actual game anymore, but the fan. Since sports has become completely about the money, fans are paying more than ever for their sports with tickets, T.V. and taxes. Fans go to games expecting to enjoy themselves in other ways than just watching, because they feel they have the license to by paying huge fees for every aspect of the event.

We see this in heckling, in booing, and in being critical of whoever Is playing. And because of that, the fan is drawing attention to himself, making games almost a contest to see who can say the most obnoxious comment to the other team — or seeing who can outsmart whom.

Unfortunately, it's become a blank check. The line is no longer booing or chuckling at a player's inability to make a free throw. Now, with that same license received for paying to watch the game, the slippery slope continues to the point where some fans think they can throw something. In addition, as was seen with Ron Artest, the line between the grandstand and playing field isn't as sacred.

So what do we do? Mullins Center security, as long as it is primarily students, will continue to be a joke. The UMPD embarrassed itself Wednesday night when it turned on the very fans that were policing the unruly ones. Overall, the whole situation could have been avoided had the Mullins Center placed the Northeastern cheerleaders somewhere other than two feet from the student section.

That one knucklehead who threw the mint spoke for everyone. The headline would have read "UMass Students Fight Cheerleaders" instead of "One Idiot Throws Altoid." We need to understand how one person can represent an entire university under a larger spotlight. It's up to the students to take responsibility for each other and police themselves, and it's time for the Mullins Center to foresee problems before they begin.

Of course, realizing that your student fees don't afford you the right to idiocy is probably the appropriate way to start.

Zach Oelschlegel is a Collegian columnist.

The Anaconda Plan

Yousef Munayyer

In 1862, a military strategy was adopted by the Northern army in the American Civil War. The plan, originally drafted by General Winfield Scott, would lead to the blockade against Gulf of Mexico ports, dividing the South by controlling the Mississippi as well as marching to Georgia from the Tennessee River Valley. Ultimately, this led to the fall of Richmond, the capital of the Southern Confederacy. The strategy was simple: surround, divide, and suffocate. With this plan, and overbearing force, the Southern armies could bear no more, setting the stage for an upset that would feature a militarily superb general surrendering to his lesser counterpart Ulysses S. Grant.

Today, Israeli armies and the government are implementing a similar plan halfway across the globe. It seems that they took the page right out of General Scott's playbook. However, the target in this situation is not the rebelling army of the South; rather it's a civilian Palestinian population.

Slowly it creeps, uprooting trees, dividing families, separating villages. Children at the top of hills look every day to see it coming closer. Surely they are thinking of how it will soon be at their doorstep. Surely they are wondering what will happen when the apartheid wall reaches their home.

Its nature can only be described as serpentine. Curving, twisting, moving in between villages and suffocating its prey, the apartheid wall is a repulsive creature that is tearing apart any hope in the region.

Some immediately object to the use of the word "wall." They would rather call it a fence, or perhaps a barrier. However, if you cannot cross it, if passing it means your death, why argue over the semantics or, even worse, the aesthetics?

Israel's anaconda plan aims to suffocate a Palestinian population. It is a direct response to the paranoia in Israel towards the possibility of a Palestinian state and the current population crisis.

In Tel Aviv, they are hoping they can turn every Palestinian town into another Gaza: isolated, surrounded and packed unbearably. With 1.3 million Palestinians in Gaza and high birth rates (3.8 percent), there is a population crisis developing in the already densely populated spot. Gaza is a 40-kilometer strip. Still they have been contained.

This is the prototype. In the eyes of the snake masters in Tel Aviv, Nablus must become Gaza. Jenin must become Gaza. Qalqilya is almost there, and Tulkarem will soon follow. Surround, divide, and suffocate.

They claim that this monster is necessary. They claim that this is for security. I can tell you from personal experience, this vicious construction does not keep people out of Israel all the time. The exact circumstances I'm referring to cannot be mentioned because they are not technically legal for Israeli citizens like me to undertake.

One Bantustan after the other is being created. From refugee camp to concentration camp, this is Israel's idea of advancing Palestinian society.

The wall is economically clamping down on Palestinian society. It is confining people to their villages as they cannot travel or bring goods from one place to another. One Bantustan after the other is being created. From refugee camp to concentration camp, this is Israel's idea of advancing Palestinian society.

Travel is restricted to the use of mules, which have come back into the main street market. That spiffy hybrid that gets 80 miles to the gallon will not cut it for Palestinians; they need something to get around the mountain on. This is what they have been reduced to; this is the road map to peace.

The Hague has found the path of this wall Illegal: it of course deviates from the 1967 green line consistently. Still, The Hague is an international organization, and like most international organizations, it is not respected by Israel or the United States. Sometimes I wonder if Israelis have a backup plan for policy strategy once they lose the support of the United States. At some point, maybe not soon, Americans must realize that they are supporting the concentration of human beings into Bantustans and the longest-standing occupation that is internationally recognized as illegal. Concentration . . . occupation ... why does this sound familiar to the genocides of World War II? You would think at least Israel would be beyond repeating that. You would think.

This apartheid wall is not only hurting Palestinians, but the creators of the wall, as well. To use this Civil War strategy against civilians shows you how uncivilized Israel can be. Further, it hurts Israel because it solves nothing and only makes the situation worse. Instead of acknowledging the problem of demography and population, Israel chooses to build a wall so they do not have to deal with it. If you are a settler in the West Bank or Gaza, which means you are an illegal settler, you could still travel freely all day long without having to see a Palestinian. Israelis use the wall to cover up any eyesores, or in other words, the indigenous Palestinians.

Sure, it can claim to be a democracy and all that other public-relations nonsense, but inside, Israel is bleeding because of what it has become. The only way out for Israel is to acknowledge the elephant in the room and deal with the problem it has forced upon itself.

Yousef Munayyer is a Collegian editor.

Model in Ukraine elections

Mike Sances

What's been going on In Ukraine recently? More to the point, why do we care? To be sure, fraudulent elections in politically obscure countries are hardly a novelty, but granting sustained front-page coverage to one amongst others is practically unheard of. While the geostrategic implications for the United States and Russia cannot be ignored, it seems equally impossible to ignore the parallels — and they are legion — to the American elections that took place here earlier last month.

Yet miraculously, the press has accomplished just that. Without a trace of irony, stories abound detailing the excruciatingly tight race, the exit polls that somehow turned out bizarrely inaccurate, the accusations of voter intimidation and stuffed ballots, and the ultimate role of the Supreme Court in resolving the dispute. On Friday, after the decision to hold new elections by Dec. 26 had been made, Newsweek reporter Frank Brown told Ray Suarez on PBS News Hour that one of the most convincing points Yushchenko supporters raised was the anomaly of one million extra votes registering for the Kremlin-backed Viktor Yanukovych in the final hour before polls closed.

However, Allan Waldman, an independent journalist whose extensive analysis of stories on domestic voter fraud appeared in last week's Valley Advocate, reports that similar anomalous surges for Bush occurred in several U.S. states on Nov. 2.

The spectacular display of direct democracy in Kiev surely puts us all to shame. At the same time, its spirit, optimism, and ultimate success ought to instruct and inspire us.

Indeed, the only real difference between these two situations seems to be the reactions to them: reneging on John Edwards's election night vow to "count every vote" in Ohio, Kerry chose to skip the extra ten days and conceded on Nov. 3. Kerry voters, while bitterly disappointed, ultimately followed suit.

In stark contrast, after Yanukovych was declared the winner in Ukraine, tens of thousands of Yushchenko supporters poured into the streets of Kiev to protest, camping out in the cold and snow for nearly two weeks. The mood of the demonstrations reportedly differed sharply with the post-election doom and gloom among the American left. One protester, a young journalist named Svitalan Usenko, expressed on News Hour her wonder at the "huge changes in society. People are saying our nation's been born. I cried on the first day when I saw these people on the square. We'll never forget the strength of these feelings. I'm proud to be alive at this time in this country. It's something to be happy about. After we've witnessed all this, what stories we'll have to tell our children." Solidarity and praise to Miss Usenko!

Although it remains a mystery just what either Yanukovych or Yushchenko actually stands for (beyond allegiance to Moscow or Washington, either man could be a neo-Nazi — their views simply aren't being reported), the spectacular display of direct democracy in Kiev surely puts us all to shame. At the same time, its spirit, optimism, and ultimate success ought to instruct and inspire us.

And I think, to a point, that we are shamed by what's happened in Ukraine and that the obsessive media coverage in the U.S. is our way of projecting disappointment toward our own elections, of living vicariously through these true democrats (small "d"). The guilt toward reelecting President Bush, coupled with the innumerable yet invariably ignored (outside of wonderful journals like the Advocate) reports of voter fraud at home, make for a Ukraine-sized elephant in the room. Perhaps this is why it's out of the question for American journalists to mention "Ukraine" and "John Kerry" in the same article.

Two primary causes of our national woes remain static. First is a dysfunctional press that is more comfortable inquiring into voter fraud in domestically irrelevant Eastern European states than in its own. Second is mediocre Democrats who would rather gossip about who they might field in 2008 than work to change things today. Indeed, one might be left with the impression that after Nov. 2, all the problems that faced this country during the campaign simply disappeared. Certainly they have disappeared from the national discussion. Perhaps they will resurface before the midterm races in 2006 — but again, there's no reason we should wait so long.

Ukrainians like Svitalan Usenko certainly didn't. And so, with her and others like her in mind, I hereby invite the reader to join me among countless others at the counter-inaugural planned for Jan. 20 in Washington, D.C.

To reiterate what was written earlier, and what has been written elsewhere in recent weeks: the campaign may be over, but the fight has just begun.

Mike Sances is a Collegian columnist.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

LOAN CONSOLIDATION IS VITAL

The stumping economy of the past few years has proven a boon for at least one segment of the American population. College students who pay for their education through federal loan programs are currently able to take advantage of record low interest rates. Graduates are also able to consolidate their loans to lock in these low rates throughout repayment, which can save bundles over the life of their loan. While current students and graduates benefit disproportionately, they do so at the expense of both future students and taxpayers, which is why Congress may soon change the rules.

Under current law, the Department of Education allows graduates to consolidate, or refinance, their federal education loans. This means that if you have multiple loans, you can trade them in for a single loan covering the entire balance of what you owe, so you can make a single monthly payment on your balance until It is paid off.

When you consolidate, current loan rates are locked in, so students who consolidate now are at a huge advantage because they lock in record low rates for the entire life of their loan. Rates are currently as low as 2.77 percent, according to the Department of Education. To put this into perspective, current record low mortgage rates hover around 4 percent, and you'd need perfect credit history to get a credit card that gives you a rate of 5-7 percent. These rates have nowhere to go but up, so this is a crucial time for student borrowers to consolidate.

Consolidation lowers interest for loans initially borrowed at higher rates, lowers monthly payments and can spread repayment over a longer time period with less total interest burden. Consolidation is also guaranteed; you can't be turned down for a consolidation loan. This is all great news for students, who have been rushing to take advantage of this opportunity. According to the U.S. Government Accountability Office, total consolidation loan volume rose from $5.8 billion to $41 billion between 1998 and 2003.

This raises financing problems for taxpayers, because the law also requires that the feds guarantee a rate of return to private lenders who make educational loans under federal regulations. When interest rates drop, the government has to pay more to private lenders to fulfill its end of the bargain.

Students should keep their eyes on the news for word of Congress's intent to change the law, which could make consolidation loans sport variable rates that follow the ebb and flow of the economy. Such legislation was discussed this year and may become a reality in next year's session. If Congress is able to avert their attention from intelligence reform, Iraq, and social security, they may find time to fix the costly little consolidation problem sometime in 2004.

What does this mean for the average Minuteperson as they near graduation? Don't miss the bus. check out loanconsolidation.ed.gov for information during the semester before graduation, and use their loan calculator to figure out the best approach. If you sit idly by until you start making payments, you may find yourself staring at variable rates that could rise every July. Loans should also be consolidated immediately to beat Congress's rule change so that students can get in before the government slams the door.

Justin Cormier
UMass alum

SUBMIT A LETTER OR OPINION

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 7, 2004 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

New pages in the Lennon Songbook

"If you tried to give Rock and roll another name you might call it 'Chuck Berry'."
-John Lennon

"My role in society, or any artist's or poet's role, is to try and express what we all feel. Not to tell people how to feel. Not as a preacher, not as a leader, but as a reflection of us all'."
-John Lennon

COURTESY PAPARAZZI

Rerelease has 'Rock 'n' Roll' but little soul

By Michael Busack
Collegian Staff

The Beatles, like many great bands, had to learn form the masters. When they were young, they lit up clubs of future Beatle-maniacs with tunes that were not created by John Lennon and Paul McCartney, but rather by the likes of Little Richard, Carl Perkins, and Chuck Berry.

John Lennon 'Rock 'n' Roll' Capitol

When the Beatles began performing, it was about exactly that: performing. But, as most performers realize, you won't get far as a cover band.

Later on during the success of the Beatles, the band still cut a few cover songs; but even though Lennon and McCartney continued to be inspired by many of their idols, they were not able to have good ol' fun with some of the originals.

In the re-release of Lennon's "Rock 'n' Roll," it appears that something is lacking in his tributes. It is as if he falls short of the confidence that he should have. After all, the man was John Lennon. His versions of, "Money" and "Twist and Shout" will always be remembered by many as the "real" versions of the songs.

When Lennon and the Beatles played the tunes of their heroes, listeners never got the impression that they frightened the band. They played the songs and had fun.

On "Rock 'n' Roll" Lennon seems to just simply play the songs. Don't be mistaken, the music is played accurately, but while none of the songs are painful, Lennon's original music had a passion that this disc does not.

The album was originally released in 1975 and was recorded in part as a response to a possible lawsuit by the notorious Morris Levy. On Nov. 2, Yoko Ono re-released the disc in an attempt to allow fans another opportunity to remember Lennon.

While the overall tone falls short with "Rock 'n' Roll," there are a few gems hidden in the album. The Gene Vincent cover of "Be-Bop-A-Lula" is a graceful version of the song that seems a bit like what Vincent may have done with the original if given the chance.

"Stand by Me" is considered by many fans to be a classic Lennon tune. The cover undeniably strays from the sound of the original Ben E. King song and is a signature for Lennon. Lennon's version invokes the desperation of King's lyrics and hrings them to fruition in his voice.

The disc includes very restrained performances by Lennon. As it was produced by Phil Spector, there are significant Spector touches on the clarity of the disc. On many occasions, you can hear the distinct attention to detail that Spector made work in releases like "Let it Be."

While this album is maybe only mediocre in Lennon's discography, the amazing thing about Lennon as an artist is that this does not matter at all. Lennon was an artist with few regrets and many accomplishments. This allows him a rare privilege that many artists are not afforded: he can fudge one every now and again. So what if it was a little half-assed for John Lennon?

Most listeners would take a mediocre Lennon over an exceptional Ringo any day.

'Acoustic:' An intimate view of a more raw John Lennon

By Michael Busack
Collegian Staff

While the title of the new posthumous John Lennon release, "Acoustic" seems to refer to the guitar Lennon played during these session, "Acoustic" seems an odd title considering that many tunes oddly show signs of the origins of punk music.

John Lennon 'Acoustic' Capitol

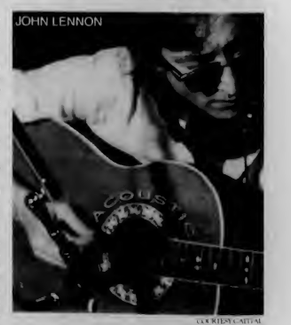
The album released from the Lennon songbook is a combination of demos and live cuts from the 1998 Anthology box set and seven previously unreleased Lennon tales.

The most visibly definitive effects of this disc are the raw Lennon moments that are most remembered from the John Lennon/Plastic Ono Band era. Lennon bellows out tunes like "Working Class Hero" and "My Mummy's Dead," Lennon evokes the future of music despite having little clue about the lack of his own future.

In 1970, the world was stunned to see the Beatles draw to a bittersweet end. The songwriting duo of Lennon and McCartney were then and continue to be hailed as one of the greatest songwriting duos in history.

This year, as many remember the anniversary of Lennon's death on Dec. 8, yet another piece of the John Lennon pie has been released to help define the man as more than just the many accomplishments of the Beatles.

An acoustic version of Lennon's ode to spirituality, "God," is one of the seven unreleased demos that appear in the "Acoustic" collection. This bare rendition of classic Lennon prose is one of the disc's most simple, yet honest ballads. The demo version of the song has a budding feeling to it; it is quite possibly the most perplexed you have heard Lennon. It shows the open spirit of Lennon that led him to be not only a musician, but also a great political force among radical peace activists. Lennon was a model example of what has come to be known as guerilla protest — staging bed-ins for peace and advocating billboards stating, "War is over, if you want it."



The other previously unreleased songs are a bit of a departure for the casual Lennon fan. The songs on the "Acoustic," disc are raw, to say the least, though quite rewarding. "Well, Well, Well" and "Cold Turkey" evoke a little bit of the Lennon spirit that was angry, bitter with life. It seems as if it were not only the love, but often times the heartache that inspired Lennon to write many of his most candid songs.

"Real Love" is a John Lennon composition that many can actually say was ruined by Beatles influence. Luckily, on "Acoustic," the listener is able to hear the song in a form that does not modulate the unmistakable voice of John Lennon. This song is in no way similar to the Beatles' release of a studio-modified version that coincided with the "Beatles Anthology" discs. The natural form of it is almost as powerful an elegy for love as the simple poetry that was John Lennon's "love."

Other tracks on "Acoustic" include live performances of such Lennon political trademarks as "The Luck of the Irish," "John Sinclair," and "Imagine." Stick-in-the-mud fans will recognize these recordings as taken directly from the "Anthology" box set.

The problem with the release of unreleased Lennon tracks is in the slow and deliberate removing of the legend's ambiguity. Once most kids know the real story behind Santa Claus, they are often a little disappointed. The point may be that John Lennon was mortal. Though exceptional, John Lennon was a human being.

Once Yoko Ono clears all of the dust from the Lennon vault, will the hype remain? It is clear that as a musician, Lennon has made a lifelong legacy, but many critics believe that the many recent Beatles/Lennon releases in the past decades are taking it a step too far to bleed the collective songbook of the mythic musician.

COURTESY CAPITAL

While the album consists entirely of acoustic tunes, listeners have noted a more gruff Lennon sound.

Percussion show a success

By Dave Fonseca
Collegian Staff

The UMass Amherst Percussion Ensemble treated a modest, but enthusiastic, crowd to an evening of extraordinary and uncommon compositions on Sunday, Dec. 5 at the Bowker Auditorium.

Persephassa: Sounds of War — Bowker Auditorium — UMass — Dec. 5

The night began with the percussion ensemble's performance of Tokuhide Niimi's "Heterorhythmix." A piece typical of Japanese music, "Heterorhythmix" flowed naturally from start to finish with familiar patterns arising almost imperceptibly throughout. For those not familiar with this particular style of composition, "Heterorhythmix" may have taken some time to get into; however, its subtle yet engaging manner served as a fitting introduction to a show that would be introducing the audience to a host of musical experiences for which they may not have been prepared.

Next on the program was the percussion ensemble's rendition of Lynn Glassock's "No Exit." Perhaps the least cerebral and most easily accessible piece performed that night, the xylophone-driven "No Exit" bounced along at a lively and delightfully unpredictable pace. The selection of "No Exit" for Sunday evening's presentation came via grad student Jeff Hope, who also conducted the piece, in what is becoming a UMass percussion ensemble tradition: departing students choose and conduct a piece for one of their final performances.

Lou Harrison's "Canticle No. 3" — featuring instruments such as an ocarina, guitar, and elephant and buffalo bells — followed and was perhaps the most eclectic piece on a night ripe with unusual compositions. Before the piece began, conductor Eduardo Leandro took some time to address the audience and explain the background of the piece and its composer. Leandro also pointed out that the ocarina part of the piece was open to improvisation, and that its melody would be determined by the player and not the composer.

After a brief intermission, Leandro introduced Iannis Xenakis' "Persephassa," a composition he described as "one of the most difficult and encompassing pieces in the percussion literature." Xenakis' composition, which requires a multitude of percussion instruments, deals with the composer's personal experience with German bombings of the city of Persepolis during World War II. The piece, which draws extensively from Xenakis' background in engineering and mathematics, is what Leandro called a "combination of mathematical complexity and raw, primal power."

With the six percussionists and their islands of instruments situated in a ring around the audience, Leandro explained some of the fundamental components of the piece, such as the cyclic manner in which the sounds travel around the auditorium. Clearly, it would take a musical acumen far greater than this reviewer possesses to tell whether or not the UMass percussion ensemble had fudged any of the dizzying intricacies of Persephassa, but from my perspective, their portrayal of the composer's experience with the horror of war was as accurate a translation as one could hope for.

In a fitting conclusion to what turned out to be a spectacular evening for the UMass percussion ensemble, the final 20 seconds of Persephassa featured all six percussionists battering their kit with maximum force, driving home Xenakis' vision with utter clarity and bringing the night to a close in rousing fashion.

COURTESY DEPARTMENT OF MUSIC & DANCE

Professor Eduardo Leandro conducted the UMass percussion ensemble in "Persephassa: Sounds of War" Saturday night.

Local musician on the rise

By Jennie Lea
Collegian Correspondent

Raspy and raucous, rueful and raw, she is shake, rattle, and roll. She is Northampton native, Chris Pureka: born performer and legendary folk-musician-in-the-making, as proven once again during her bravura performance at the Iron Horse Music Hall last Friday night. But don't let the implications of the local venue fool you. The packed house proved that Pureka has garnered more than just local celebrity. She has, in fact, achieved much more.

Chris Pureka — Iron Horse — Northampton — Dec. 3

With the May release of her sophomore album, "Driving North," Pureka officially established herself within the realm of contemporary folk music. Critically recognized for her lyrical genius and distinguished by her mesmeric tone, Pureka knows her way around a guitar. With a voice like an audible whisper, her secrets cut through the crowd like a knife with little to no resistance. She is haunting. She is enchanting. She knows how you feel.

Pureka's keen ability to tap into these emotions establishes an instantaneous connection, placing the crowd in the palm of her calloused hand. You want to know where she's been and what she's done. Then you realize you already do, because you've also been there: everyone has.

Friday's performance was no exception. Pureka proved that folk is alive and thriving in Western Massachusetts, playing amongst an array of talent comprising Sebastian Renfield on bass and banjo, Jesse Freidin on percussion, and the vocal accompaniment of Merrill Garbus.

After kicking off the night with "Unwelcome," the performance proceeded to twist and turn across the musical highway that is "Driving North." Taking the crowd on a tour of relationships past — laden with the lament and remorse of breakups and breakdowns — Pureka flat out admits, "This is me at my most cynical." Cynical she is, but cynical we love. This is the fuel that keeps the emotional fires burning in mind well after the conclusion of a song. Echoing lyrics like, "This is the story of loaded glances and leaning in too far. This is the story of vague advances and confessions in smoky bars," from Burning Bridges (a definite crowd favorite) had the audience ravenous for more of the bitter honesty Pureka so heartily supplied throughout her performance.

In addition to her own material, Pureka's choice of cover songs was noteworthy in itself. Borrowing from the likes of Gillian Welch, Bruce Springsteen, and Old Crow Medicine Show, Pureka refines with finesse while preserving the novelty of the original tracks.

Clearly comfortable in front of the insatiably receptive crowd, the only interruption in song occurred during water breaks in which she would offer bits of friendly banter, sip from the bottle, and crack a silver-tongued smile that exclaimed, "This is what I live for."

Hopefully she will continue on with that feeling. If you missed her this time, have no fear. You can likely find her at any number of venues across greater New England sometime in the near future. Catch her while you can, though. This one's going places.

COURTESY CHRIS PUREKA

Popular locally, Pureka is gaining steam in New England.

Pixies make special stop at UMass in major headline tour

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

Something very special was in the air at the Mullins Center last Tuesday night, and everyone in the near-capacity crowd felt it when the Pixies returned home to UMass. It has been 12 years since the Pixies broke up and about seven months since the Boston-bred band hit the road again before finally making it back home, and the second the lights dimmed and the band took the stage, the crowd let them know they were welcome with open arms.

Not only was this the first show in Massachusetts, as well as the entire New England region, but it was especially meaningful because lead singer Charles Thompson (known as Black Francis in the original Pixies days and Frank Black in his current solo career) and lead guitarist Joey Santiago met and formed the band here at UMass (for those of you that are curious, they revealed that they lived in Sylvan). After the roommates decided to drop out, they found bassist Kim Deal and drummer David Lovering in Boston, and the band was formed.

The band started the set just the way many of the band's first fans were introduced to the Pixies: with "Bone Machine," the song that opens the band's first full-length album, 1987's "Surfer Rosa." The minute Lovering started the familiar opening drum pattern the crowd went wild, and from then on the show become a constantly escalating display of adulation and excitement.

It seemed that every movement, every note, every beat, every noise the band made provoked the crowd even more than the previous one. When Deal began the simple, memorable bass line of "Bone Machine," there were cheers. There were also cheers when Santiago started playing his lead line and perhaps best of all when Thompson let out the first of what would be many of his trademark yelps/screams. The Pixies were indeed in top form, and everyone at the Mullins knew it.

After "Bone Machine" the band jumped straight into "Head On," a cover originally done by the Jesus and Mary Chain — a band that, like The Pixies, was never very popular in their heyday, but has been the source of influence for hundreds of bands that followed. Without even saying a word to the crowd, the band transitioned from "Head On" to "UMass," their ode to the school. Though the track is from their last album, 1992's "Trompe Le Monde," which did not sell as well as the previous efforts, it is a fan favorite worldwide. It can be assumed, though, that the biggest reaction the song ever got was at the Mullins when the entire arena went absolutely insane, singing every word louder than they did for the other songs and jumping around more then they did for the rest of the night.

> "While a lot of talk has been given to the fact that this reunion tour ... has been about the money, the band didn't show it..."

While "UMass" was definitely a highlight, and a historic performance, the band maintained the same energy for the whole evening, and the crowd was just as happy to hear every single song they played. From hits (mostly just songs that have grown to be fan favorites in the years since the band broke up, as the band only had about two or three songs that were ever played on the radio) such as "Monkey Gone To Heaven," "Debaser," and "Where Is My Mind?" to less well-known songs such as "Something Against You," "Planet Of Sound," and "In Heaven" — a cover of a song from the film "Eraserhead" — the Pixies sounded great and the crowd reciprocated everything the band gave them.

While a lot of talk has been given to the fact that this reunion tour, which has seen the Pixies headline larger venues than they ever had before — and sell most of them out — has been about the money, the band didn't show it at all. While the between-set talk was kept to a minimum, that seemed to be more about keeping the momentum of the show rather than the band's actual enthusiasm. In fact, judging from the onstage behavior, the band was just as excited about being there as anyone in the crowd was. For a band that broke up amidst serious fighting and hostility, they were all smiles and seemed to really enjoy playing with each other.

When it came time for the encore break, the band never actually left the stage, rather they all came to the front of the stage and waved goodbye to the audience for a few minutes while the roadies came out and retuned the instruments. This sense of playfulness continued into the encore song, "Gigantic," a track sung by Deal, whose youthful, girly voice sounded as perfect as ever. The song ended with an extended "outro" during which all the members of the band broke the tradition of saying "goodnight" to the crowd by saying "goodnight" to each other; and somehow — and perhaps this is only for a band that has grown to be as loved as the Pixies have — when Thompson and Deal said goodnight to each other (their fighting was reported as the worst during the final months of the Pixies' first run), that got the crowd going just as much as any song did.

Even after 12 years apart, the band sounded as if they had never separated. Not only did everyone leave the Mullins happy and buzzing about the thrilling show they had just seen, but everyone was also hoping that the band would stay together for more than just a tour. Hopefully the Pixies agree.

The Mercantile
Books Cards
Toys Great Clothing Gloves Gifts
Stocking Stuffers Scarves
Action Figures Rings
Clothing Sale Tapestries Bracelets Chains Earrings
Dec. Hours Mon-Sat. 10 am-9 pm-Sun 12-6
Amherst-11 E. Pleasant-Carriage Shops
Northampton-108 Main St.

Where are YOU living next semester?
CHECK OUT PUFFTON VILLAGE!
Excellent location...1/2 mile from UMass
Spacious Apartments--1,2 and 3 Bedroom Townhouses
All rents include heat, hot water and cooking gas
On site laundry, off street parking.
Basketball and Tennis courts.
PUFFTON VILLAGE
1040 N. Pleasant St. #410
Amherst, MA 01002
413-549-0145
www.pufftonvillage.com

SUCCESS begins here
Earn 1, 2, or 3 credits in less than a month
Classes begin January 4
English Comp I and II
Dance
Psychology
Public Speaking
Self Defense for Women
Spanish Skills
French Skills
CLICK or CALL
gcc.mass.edu
(413) 775-1801
GREENFIELD Community College

A PLEDGE FOR AND BY MEN ABOUT VIOLENCE

Because:

Men commit the vast majority of violence in our society. This includes racial, homophobic, religious, and ethnic, as well as violence perpetrated against women. Thus, violence is a men's issue.

Men are friends, family, and/or lovers with victims/survivors of violence. Their response can help or hinder a survivor's recovery process.

Men are the primary targets of violence in our society, though women are the primary targets of sexualized violence.

We all have women in our lives we love – partners, daughters, mothers, sisters, friends, grandmothers, and granddaughters.

Thus:

Violence is a MEN'S issue. As men we must work to stop violence. We need to learn and teach positive ways of being that are healthy for our selves, our partners, our families, our communities, and our world.

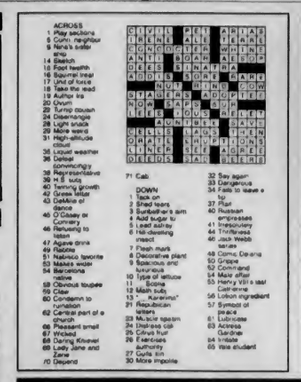
We, the below signed men of the UMass-Amherst community acknowledge that:

Domestic and relationship violence is a problem that all men must work to end;
All people deserve to live and learn in a safe and loving environment based on equality;
Our lack of action and silence perpetuates the violence in my community;

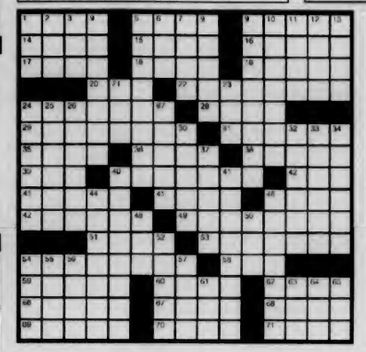
And we pledge to:

Be violence free
Never commit, condone or remain silent about violence
Challenge other men to recognize that they can be powerful without making others powerless
Encourage all men to work together with women, using their collective voices and resources to end violence - not only at UMass but in all of our communities.

Colin Adair
Jason Alexander
Gregg Allen
Brendan Asquith
Alex Austin
Samuel Ayala
Nick Bagley
Michael Barrett
Uzair Beg
Jason Behrens
Nicholas Belanger
Curtis Bellemer
Joe Bennett
Alex Bernsten
Charles Berry-Skillen
Ernie Billittier
Tyler Bolte
Noah Bond
Stefan Boroda
Mike Bosco
Evan Boshi
Nick Botchar
Philip Brady
James P. Brennan III
Steve Brewer
John Timothy Brodeur
Dennis Bromery
Gordon Brown
David Brown
Tristan Brown
Will Bunker
Andrew Bunyard
Matt Burto
Eduardo Bustamante
Blake Buxton
Bruce Byers
Alan Calhoun
Dennis Canty
Jim Carroll
Craig Carter
Chase Catalano
Chris Caton
Patrick Cavanaugh
Stefan Chase
Dan Cheney
Nate Chesley
Alan Chow
Mike Christman
Jared Collier
Nick Collins
John Cornaccunia
Andrew Couto
Wilder Cusick
Coureton Dalton
Shahzad Dar
Jim Darling
Jon Davenport
Joe Dean
Mark Dean
Joseph Deering
Colin Delargy
Daniel Delloiacono
Nicholas Demas
Alexander DeSerpa
Eric Dewer
Frank DeZenzo
Johnny Donaldson
Michael Doolan
Josh Doolittle
Damon Dopfel
Adam Dovale
Stepen Driscoll
Zach Ducharme
Ben Duffy
Greg Dumond
Paul Ellis
Andrew Elm
Josh Essig
Christopher Fagbayi
Matthew Falcone
Oluyemi Famuyide
Matthew Faulkner
Michael Federico
P.J. Fenton
Gus Fernandes
Sid Ferreira
Brian Fitzgerald
David Foley
Jim Forest
Matthew Fox
Shawn Gaines
Paul Galotti
Michael Gargano
Seth Garrison
Matthew Giancola
Eric Giebner
Dave Gilbert
Jamie Gilbert
Rich Giudice
Manuel González
Fernando Gouviea
Nick Graziose
Ali Hamendani
Paul Hansmire
Adam Hartwell
Jeremy Hartwell
Ahmed Hassan
Kevin Hendricks
Royce Henry
Mike Hershey
David Ho
Matt Hoffman
Todd Holmes
Will Horan
Robert Horowitz
David Hoyos
Grant Ingle
Nikita Iranov
Bailey Jackson
Ed Jaffe
Patrick Silk Johnson
Kevin Judd
Jubin Karimi
Matthew Kennis
Bill King
David King
Timothy Kitchell
Kevin Klement
Eric Kosta
Mike Kostka
Andrew Koziol
Maksim Kuksin
Jonathan Labaki
Daniel Lachar
Kendrick Lau
David Lawrence
Anthony Leonardi
Jonah Lerner
Ty Lerner
George Lindblad
Zack Linder
Joseph Liskowsky
Greg Little
Alex Lonczak
Brian Long
Dan Ludwig
Andrew Lutaaya
Desmond Lymon
Pat Lynch
Ben Mabee
Eric Magazu
Safdar Mahmud
Matt Makara
Dan Maltzman
Keith Manchester
Adam Marblestone
Justin Marques
Shawn Marroni
Manuel Matos
Eric Matsumato
Ryan Maxwell
Brian McCarthy
Robert McCaw
Brendan McElhiney
Ben McHugh
Christopher Meade
Juan Gabriel Medrano
Andy Meehan
Evan Melford
Sam Messer
Greg Meyer
Brad Milley
Mike Monopoli
Jonathan Moore
William Morgan
Mark Morrison
Paul Moroz
Anthony Mugford
Andrew Mulligan
Yousef Munayyer
Tom Murdy
Brian Murphy
Matt Murphy
Sean Musselman
A.J. Muszynski
Joules Nahas
Matthew Nalewanski
Jeff Napolitano
Michael Naso
Darren Nichols
Doug Nickerson
Bilal Nizami
Joe Norrall
Matt Norton
Joe Nunes
Anthony Nunes
Levi O'Brien
W. Brian O'Connor
Zach Oelschlegal
Henry O'Neal
Keith Otis
Soji Otuyelu
Matt Ouellett
Thomas Ouellette
Ralph Pace
Anirban Paul
Pavel Payano
Jeff Pedecine
Nick Pell
Ilan Persing
Phu Pham
Randall Phillis
Brendon Pires
David Pomeroy
Dan Pomeroy
James Poro
Leor Radbil
Kevin Randall
Doug Rappaport
Brendon Reed
Matt Reynolds
Vino Richemond
Ricardo Rivera
Colin Robbins
David Robbins
Sean Robinson
Donald Robinson
Chris Robuned
Daniel Rogier
Michael Romeni
Eli Rosinha
John Sanchez
Kosal Sarou
Sean Scanlon
Tom Schiff
Thomas Schneeweis
Derrick Schull
Mark Schwartz
Richard Senatore
Barak Sered
Andrew Shattuck
Jason Sherman
Paul Sherry
Peter Shields
Trevor Shreeve
Sam Soltani
Jonathan Stahl
Jason Stiaghter
Dan Sweent
Jonathan Swenson
Peter Tames
John Toffey
Randy Townsend
Brian Tse
Nat Trask
Arthur Tuttle
Rashad Uqdah
Ean Van Vliet
Michael Wade
Andrew Walsh
Kyle Walsh
Thomas Wang
Chris Watkins
Jason Welch
Alex West
Ryan Whidby
David Whitehead
Josh Wilder
Teeomm Williams
Andrew Williston
Gabe Winer
Jesse Winn
Ryan Winters
Anthony Witman
Greg Woods
Pat Woodward
Bob Wuzzard
Iliya Yerukhimovich
Nick Zguro
Doug Zohn
Thomas Zoltowski



This message is brought to you by the SGA and the Voices Against Violence Program of the Health Education Division of University Health Services. For more information about Voices Against Violence call 577-5133.



Quote of the Day

"Some of us will never ever find true love. Take, for instance ... me. And I'm pretty sure that guy right there. And that lady with the sideburns. And basically everybody at table nine."

-Robbie, The Wedding Singer

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
Now accepting applications for:
Assistant Business Manager
For the Spring 2005
Please call 545-3500 or stop by. Applications are due Dec. 7th @ 4P.M.

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Your room is a stinkhole. It's about time you through away all those pizza boxes.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Your day is going to go by really fast. That could be good or bad.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Your socks don't even come close to matching today.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Today you should pay homage to a band you haven't listened to in a while.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Fly away on you little zephyr. Zephyr is such a pretty word.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Relationships are such a piece of work. You never know what's going on.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Feng Shui your life. It's the way to go in this modern day and age.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Just about everyone you know is sick. You can't escape it for long.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Never mock a yoga class that is in session. Chances are you will get a beating.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Sometimes all of your creative energies are way under-appreciated.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Forever is a long time. A very long time. A scary long time.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Queen was such a killer band. More people should listen to them.

Do you know The Score?
Check out The Massachusetts Daily Collegian's annual sports magazine The Score. Available at selected newsstands and at the Mullins Center.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Announcements

Your exams are very important. Your ultimate destiny is the most important. "Final Frontier" coming to your campus soon. www.finalfrontier.tv Check out www.allaboutgod.com

Apartment for Rent

1 bedroom condo, kitchen, sitting room call Roohna at 549-6091

One bedroom apartment for rent. Puffton Village. Starting in January. 765/month. Heat and hot water included. Call 978-502-9036

2 Bedroom 2 Bathroom Lease from Jan-Aug $1,100/Month, Utilities included Contact Jenna @ 917-753-3591

Apartment for Rent

Need an Apt. for 2nd Semester? Short Term Leases, Free Heat, Huge Bedrooms Call The Boulders 256-8534

Brandywine Apts. 1 Bedroom units Available Jan 1, 2005 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com Stop by or call 549-0600

Auto for Sale

1986 Mercury Wagon excellent condition all options 103K $1500 413-773-3346

2000 VW Beetle Turbo Leather all options 73K $6200 413-773-3346

Childcare

Responsible, Experienced person to care for 17 month twin girls in exchange for room and board. Amherst. Flexible hours. 413-256-4559

Computers

Pentium Laptop $99- Pentium III Desktop $99- 413-584-8857

Employment

Student Brand Manager Motivated? Outgoing? Enthusiastic? Want to build your resume? CampusFundraiser is currently hiring a Student Brand Manager to promote our company on your campus. Start in January. Manage promotions on campus, work 10 hours a week, $100/week salary plus bonuses. Learn more at http://www.campusfundraiser.com/SBM.asp

Employment

Returning to the Greater Boston area this Winter break? Want a fun, flexible job working with kids in their homes? Look no further....call Parents in a Pinch, Inc. TODAY if you have childcare experience/references, at least 1 full weekday free and want to earn $11/hr. Car helpful. 617-739-KIDS Fill out application at: www.parentsinapinch.com

Winter Break Employment at the Boston University Bookstore. Many temp jobs available! Kenmore Square location. Applications accepted Dec. 7 & 8 at the UMass Campus Center Concourse or email your resume to bnhmnres@bu.edu

Employment

Student to Assist Local Homeowner, Yardwork + moving furniture $10.00/hr Call Fred 413-734-0526

"Bartending" $300/Day Potential. No Experience Nesc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Entertainment

DJ for Hire Mission 101 Ent. Contact Fredy at 413-687-3849

For Sale

MP3 $50 Avon Special MP3 & 100's of girls under $10 Buy or Sell Kit ISR 413-585-1581.

Roommate Wanted

$25/month inclusive call 413-775-9997

Services

Need Just Evacuation and Repatriation Coverage? Check out BETA! $250,000 Evacuation, $25,000 Repatriation COST is $18 for 6 MONTHS! Online enrollment, emailed verification of coverage www.betins.com

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house Certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free resting and assistance 549-1906

Travel

1SPRING BREAK Largest selection of Destinations, including Cruises! VIP Club Parties & FREE trips. Epicurean Tours 1-800-231-4-FUN www.BREAKNOW.com

Spring Break 2005- Travel with STS, America's #1 Student Tour Operator to Jamaica, Cancun, Acapulco, Bahamas and Florida. Now hiring on-campus reps. Call for group discounts. Information/Reservations 1-800-648-4849 or www.ststravel.com

Spring Break Bahamas Celebrity Party Cruise! 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Nassau, Jamaica, From $459! Panama City & Daytona $159! www.SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Travel

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, Florida. Campus Reps Wanted! Free Meals & Parties! 1-800-234-7007 endlesssummertours.com

StudentCity.com The Ultimate Spring Break Experience. 1-888-SpringBreak, or www.StudentCity.com to reserve today.

SPRING BREAK '05
SAVE $100 PER ROOM
Clip & Send or Use Code: PRMYG Online
1 800 426 7710

Wanted

Snowboard events intern $50/day stipend. For job description email jfriends@leerfield.edu

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 7, 2004 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass redirects Rockets

BY BRENDAN HALL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It would appear as if the Massachusetts women's basketball team is finally turning the corner on this turnover thing. For once it was the least of their worries as they cruised to an easy 76-56 defeat of the Toledo Rockets (1-5) last night at the Mullins Center.

The Minutewomen (4-3) are on a three-game winning streak for the first time since November of 2003, when they beat Brown, Vermont and Utah State in succession. They will leave their home town with a winning record as they now embark on a road trip that will last roughly one month.

UMass	76
Toledo	56

This game is also the highest point total UMass has reached in a regular season game since January 11, 2004, when the Maroon and White downed Dayton in double figures, 78-68.

The Minutewomen and the Rockets both tallied 21 turnovers, but Toledo's carelessness with the ball proved more costly as UMass scored 22 points off turnovers and 16 fast break points. It came at the expense of rebounding, however, as the Maroon and White just barely edged out the Rockets in rebounds, 40-39.

Rocket Olivia Terry led all scorers on the night with 14 points to go along with a three-rebound, two-steal effort. Danielle Bishop (12 points, five rebounds, three assists, three steals) and Karin Hoogendam (10 points, nine rebounds, one block) also reached double figures for Toledo.

Brooke Campbell recorded her second double-double in as many games, totaling more rebounds (13) than points (11) while dishing out three assists.

Katie Nelson dished out a career-high seven assists, mainly setting up UMass's three other double-figure scorers. Tamara Tatham and Pam Rosanio tied for the team high (13), while Patrycja Gulak tallied 12.

Toledo took an early lead by making its first two shots of the game successful three-pointers by Hoogendam and Bishop, but it was entirely the Maroon and White's ballgame following the second trey at the 18-minute mark of the first half.

UMass answered Toledo's early spark with a punishing 18-2 run, highlighted by six straight fast break points. Gulak gave the Minutewomen a 10-8 lead at the 16-minute mark with a short jumper, and they would cease to lose the lead for the remaining 36.

The run was highlighted by a spectacular play from the duo of Rosanio and Campbell. Rosanio stole the ball near the top of the key and found Campbell streaking along the left side of the court, who tossed the ball up one-handed as she was knocked to the ground on a foul. Almost effortlessly, the ball ricocheted off the front of the iron and sank through the net to give her a chance at a three-point play.

Toledo continued to push from beyond the arc in light of their successes with it to begin the game, but it was to no avail.

The Rockets were a miserable 7-for-27 from beyond the arc.

The Minutewomen reached halftime leading 43-27, and held onto the lead remarkably with its backups in for a good portion of the second half. Toledo never trailed by fewer than 18 points in the second half.

Nelson reached her career high in assists with 12 minutes to go in the second half, a dish to Rosanio that made it a 58-37 contest.

Toledo shot just 29.9 percent from the floor, while UMass shot 54 percent.

COURTESY UMASS SPORTS PUBLICATIONS

Point guard Katie Nelson had five points and seven assists for the Minutewomen last night against the Rockets of Toledo. UMass defeated Toledo 76-56 to win its third straight game

GW leads the way

BY MIKE MARZELLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Mullins Center is preparing to have its 1,000,000th fan walk through its turnstiles in the near future, and the University of Massachusetts is helping to make it all worthwhile for one lucky individual.

The lucky fan will win a prize pack featuring two season tickets for 2005-06 and two round-trip airline tickets courtesy US Airways to the 2005 Atlantic 10 Men's Basketball Championship in Cincinnati, including hotel accommodations.

Coming into the '04-05 season, 979,807 fans have watched the Minutemen at home since the Mullins Center opened its doors in 1993. Following the season's second home contest on Dec. 1, the number stands at 989,283 – just 10,717 short of the million mark. The Minutemen host defending National Champion Connecticut on Dec. 9, followed by a Dec. 19 home date with Davidson. Capacity at the Mullins Center is 9,493.

Atlantic 10 Conference

Notebook

BELIEVE THE HYPE

It was no secret that George Washington would be the team to beat in the Atlantic 10 entering 2004-05, and the Colonials have recently gone along way in asserting that prediction as fact, beating national powers No. 11 Michigan State and No. 12 Maryland in succession to win the BB&T Classic and move into the national top 25 for the first time since 1998.

Returning all five starters and 13 players from an '03-04 squad that finished second in the A-10 West Division standings and made an appearance in the National Invitation Tournament (NIT), GW garnered 48 of 54 first place votes in the conference's preseason coach's poll and currently sits at No. 21 in the nation in The Associated Press poll.

Leading the way is 6-foot-9 junior forward Pops Mensah-Bonsu, who scored at least 20 points in each of the Colonials' three wins over the past week.

ANOTHER MILESTONE

On Dec. 20, Temple head coach John Chaney will coach his 1,000th college basketball game as the Owls host Princeton at the Liacouras Center in a game broadcast live on ESPN2. Behind the bench for his 33rd season of coaching and 23rd at Temple, the Hall of Famer ranks 16th all-time among Division I coaches in wins and fifth among active coaches with 710 career wins.

YOUNG GUNS

After struggling mightily through much of the last 10 years, the Fordham men's basketball program finally got an infusion of talented young players this season, and four freshman newcomers in particular have paid immediate dividends for coach Derek Whittenburg.

Kevin Anderson, Bryant Dunston, Sebastian Greene, and Marcus Stout have combined for half of the points scored by the Rams in 2004-05 (129 of 258), and combined for 33 points in Fordham's comeback win over Iona.

Auburn squeezed from Orange Bowl

BY WENDELL BARNHOUSE
KNIGHT RIDDER NEWSPAPERS

AUBURN, Ala. — Toilet paper and precipitation don't mix. Sort of like Auburn's undefeated football team and the national championship game.

As is tradition, Tigers fans celebrated Saturday night's victory over Tennessee in the Southeastern Conference championship game by draping the oak tree at Toomer's Corner with tissue.

"It was pretty amazing," Auburn sophomore Casey Maddox said Sunday from behind the counter at Toomer's Drug Store. "But everybody knows we're getting [slighted] by the BCS. It's a shame. We're 12-0 for the first time, we've won our first SEC title in 15 years."

The thought trailed off, but what was unsaid was understood. The last time the South felt this way, Lee was handing over his sword at Appomattox.

Auburn's season of dreams ended with Sunday's expected and unwanted wakeup call. The Bowl Championship Series standings decreed that this year's national title game will match No. 1 Southern California against No. 2 Oklahoma.

Third-ranked Auburn? The Tigers will play Virginia Tech on Jan. 3 in the Sugar Bowl. Enjoy yourselves on Bourbon Street. We'll just call you Au-burned.

"It will probably never happen again," Auburn coach Tommy Tuberville said of an undefeated SEC champion being deemed unworthy of playing for the national title. "It will be my luck."

Buzzard's luck.

And unlike last season, when USC was able to split the national championship glory with LSU, Auburn's best hope is a 13-0 season and a No. 2 ranking.

Tuberville bravely tried to talk up the possibility of sharing a title.

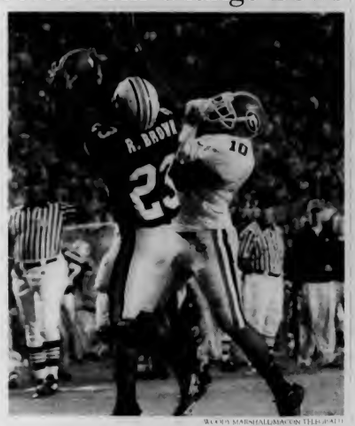
"There's gotta be some hope there," Tuberville said of the Tigers' moving from No. 3 to No. 1 in the final Associated Press poll. "We'll run through that scenario [with the team]."

No matter the Orange Bowl outcome, the winner will be No. 1.

"Everywhere I go, they want to see USC-Auburn," Auburn cornerback junior Rosegreen said. "They want to see that showdown. We should get what people want. Most everybody in the South wants to see Auburn-USC.

"I believe and the whole team believes in the man up above. God's been blessing us this whole season."

God, apparently, is a BCS fan. Auburn actually lost ground in the final BCS standings. The Tigers were ranked No. 17 in the preseason AP poll. USC and Oklahoma finished where they started – ranked No. 1 and No. 2. "It kinda hurts," Auburn quarterback Jason Campbell said nearly three hours after the official word had come down. "I think the national championship [USC-Oklahoma] was preordained by the preseason rankings. We're champions of the SEC, and we feel like we're champions in our hearts."



During Sunday afternoon's Wofford-Auburn men's basketball game, football season-ticket holder Ned Sheffield was told Auburn was locked in as the No. 3 team.

"I figured that," he said. "I don't like the BCS. The computers have too much influence. They need to work out some way to have a playoff system so they don't deny opportunities to a team like Auburn.

"If you had told me a year ago Auburn would be undefeated and SEC champions but not playing for a national championship, I would have sent you to the loony bin."

Not that Auburn fans are crazy mad. There were no cars set on fire, no storming of the administration building, no hanging of effigies of BCS coordinator Kevin Welberg.

"I think we all saw this coming," said Marc Corbi, a sophomore from Atlanta. "Right now, this system is as good as it gets to decide a national championship. It's just not easy when you're left out."

BRODY MARSHALL/AUBURN UNIVERSITY

Auburn's Ronnie Brown scores touch down reception on University of Georgia's Thomas Davis Auburn, Alabama, on Saturday, Nov. 13.

Patriots keep cruising

BY JIMMY GOLEN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

FOXBORO — Randall Gay had picked up a fumble and headed for the end zone when he felt someone pulling on his jersey. It was Patriots teammate Willie McGinest, trying to get up front to block.

That's the way things are going for New England these days; the only thing that can slow them down is themselves.

"Willie and Blue [Gay] kind of improvised that a little bit — not exactly the way we practiced," coach Bill Belichick said Monday, a day after Gay's return helped the Patriots to a 42-15 win over the Cleveland Browns.

"That one, that wasn't textbook, but it worked," Belichick said. "Willie held him up so he could get in front of him, and Willie made the block, and Blue cut it back and got in the end zone."

The victory improved the Patriots to 11-1, with a two-game lead in the AFC East over the New York Jets. New England is tied with Pittsburgh for the best record in the conference.

The Steelers' remaining opponents have a 27-21 record, while New England's have a combined mark of 18-30. If both teams go 15-1, the Steelers would have the home-field advantage through the AFC title game by virtue of a 34-20 victory over the Patriots on Oct. 31 — New England's only loss in 27 games.

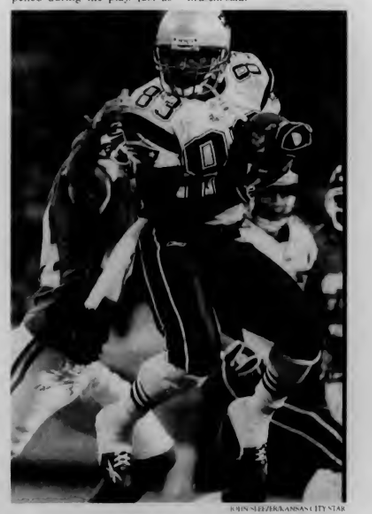
"I can see why they've won [26] out of [27]," Browns interim coach Terry Robiskie said Sunday. "You can't go out there and let them run back the opening kickoff and you sure can't fumble the ball away."

Gay, a rookie from Louisiana State nicknamed "Blue" in college, has filled in at cornerback while the Patriots' secondary has sustained one injury after another. Cornerbacks Ty Law, Tyrone Poole and Asante Samuel all missed Sunday's game with injuries.

Gay showed his worth on the third play of the third quarter, when he scooped up a fumble by Browns running back William Green at the Cleveland 41-yard line. Before he could get up to speed, McGinest pulled on his shirt to slow him down.

The Patriots' linebacker did get in front of Gay and set a block, but Gay soon turned sharply to the left and ran the width of the field before diving past Browns quarterback Luke McCown into the end zone.

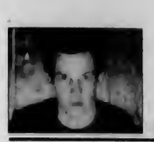
"I felt somebody holding my jersey. I thought it was the other team. But then when I looked back, I saw it was Willie," Gay told reporters after the game. "He was like, 'Get behind me, fella.'



"He told me he was leading me in. Hey, I got to the end zone, so I don't care what happened during the play. Just as long as I got there."

Gay's first career touchdown made it 28-7, but the game was over long before that.

On the opening kickoff, Bethel Johnson ran 93 yards to give the Patriots a 7-0 lead just 14 seconds into the game.



With the four touchdowns they scored on offense, the Patriots scored in all three phases of the game for the first time since Jan. 6, 2002, against Carolina. New England went on to win its first Super Bowl that year.

"That does not happen a lot, [where] offense, defense and special teams all put points on the board," Patriots linebacker Tedy Bruschi said.

JOHN SLEEZER/KANSAS CITY STAR

Patriots' Deion Branch catches a first down pass in front of Chiefs' cornerback Eric Warfield in their game at Arrowhead Stadium on Nov. 22.

Simple Plan's new album mediocre punk rock

ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 6

WEDNESDAY	THURSDAY	FRIDAY
• High: 49° • Low: 28°	• High: 45° • Low: 35°	• High: 49 • Low: 39

DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

Bonds, steriods ruining the sanctity of the game

SPORTS, PAGE 12

The Daily Collegian

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 8, 2004 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXIV ISSUE 63

Students disciplined post Red Sox season

Following through on a series of warnings about unruly behavior, the University of Massachusetts administration has handed out preliminary sanctions to students who allegedly participated in disturbances following Red Sox victories this October.

One student was expelled, 11 were suspended and 73 received deferred suspensions, which places students under judicial review for a determined period. The UMass News Office would not release names of the students, citing federal law.

The University claims students received three warnings via email regarding post-Red Sox celebrations. Shortly after the disturbances occurred, the University moved quickly to impose immediate interim suspensions. Each case was individually reviewed under the Code of Student Conduct, resulting in the current sanctions.

"We warned all students, in three different messages this fall, about the consequences of harmful and destructive behavior, and I sent a personal letter to all parents explaining our no-tolerance policy for such acts," said Michael Gargano, Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life. "When this behavior does occur, students will face consequences from the University as well as in the courts."

When the courts make a final judgment on the students who were arrested in the disturbances, students must meet with Dean of Students Jo-Anne Vanin to determine a final and permanent sanction to be placed on their permanent record.

The Code of Student conduct defines expulsion as "permanent separation of the student from the University system."

Suspension is "separation of the student from the University system for a specified time, but not less than the remainder of the semester."

Deferred suspension occurs when, "significant mitigating factors are present," providing the student with one final opportunity before he or she is suspended. If another violation occurs within the sanction period, he or she is immediately suspended.

-Dan O'Brien

Homicide in North Amherst

Shots heard early Tuesday; investigation is underway

BY MATT ELDER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

AMHERST – A homicide investigation is underway by the Northampton District Attorney's office after police were called to an Amherst residence early Tuesday morning.

"I was upstairs and I heard, I think, three shots," said Jill Zagami, a University of Massachusetts senior nursing major. Zagami, who lives across the street from the residence where the incident took place, said approximately two minutes after she heard the gunshots she heard a car speed off.

Unconfirmed sources say that the victim is a student, according to WGGB-TV 40 in Springfield. The Daily Hampshire Gazette confirmed this morning that the victim was a 22-year-old male from Berkshire County.

Although there is no confirmation that shots were fired, Zagami said that the police line of questioning involved comparing the noise she heard to various fireworks.

Renee Steese, the first assistant of the district attorney in the Northwest District, said that at 12:36 a.m. phone call came in and police were sent to 105 Meadow St.

"A homicide had occurred there," Steese said. Steese added that the name of the person could not be released at press time because the next of kin had not yet been notified.

"The State Police Detectives are investigating with the Amherst Police Department," Steese said.

According to the Associated Press, Steese told The Republican in Springfield that the authorities have learned the victim had a conversation with someone shortly before the call.

The residence is part of a three-family house that is opposite from the Townehouse Complex. As of press time, no arrests have been made.

Zagami said that she and her three roommates were questioned for the investigation, but that the police focused their attention to her because she heard the shots. Zagami's three female roommates did not hear anything.

She compared the noises to someone banging on her door very loudly.

Zagami said that she was also questioned again at around 3:30 a.m., but this time the questions were more specific, but many were similar to the ones she was asked hours before.

"It was out of control," she said. Zagami said that when she looked outside she saw two EMTs and an ambulance. She said that it didn't appear as if anyone was in any major hurry.

Pat Kelly, a junior political science and English double major, was in Zagami's residence when the incident occurred. Kelly said that he was questioned at around 12:30 a.m., and then again around 7 a.m.

Meadow St. was blocked off all day, however people who lived on the street were granted access. Dozens of police cars were outside the house, and a State Police Crime Scene Services van was parked in the street throughout the day and into the night.

Some buses, whose routes ran along Meadow St. were diverted. There were detour signs on 116 throughout the day. Despite the detours, many cars drove through the Townehouse Apartment complex to see what was going on.

"Obviously it was something major," said Jared Tivnan, an Amherst Police Department officer.

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano, who is currently in Tampa, FL, said that he got a phone call from Bob O'Connor of the UMass News Office to inform him of what happened.

"We couldn't confirm what year the student was, and we couldn't confirm if they were a student," Gargano said.

More information will be made public this morning at a news briefing at the Amherst Police Department.

MATTHEW RIBEIRO/COLLEGIAN

An ambulance and police officers remain outside the residence of the apartment on Meadow Street where a 22-year-old male's body was found early Tuesday morning. Police have not released the victim's identity.

Veterans recall Pearl Harbor anniversary

BY JAYMES SONG
ASSOCIATED PRESS

PEARL HARBOR, Hawaii — Tears ran down the wrinkled cheeks of 81-year-old Wayne Pease on Tuesday as he recalled the destruction he witnessed on Dec. 7, 1941.

"I had a bird's-eye view to watch five battleships go down," said Pease, who was an 18-year-old seaman aboard the USS Sicard destroyer when the Japanese launched a surprise attack on Pearl Harbor.

Pease, of Fort Myers, Fla., was among the dwindling number of survivors who returned to the site of their most haunting memories to honor fallen comrades on the 63rd anniversary of the assault. "On December the 6th, I was a boy," Pease said. "On December the 7th, I became a man, suddenly. I grew up in one day. I grew up in two hours you might say."

Ceremonies were held on shore and on the gleaming white monument straddling the submerged USS Arizona.

The anniversary took on added meaning with U.S. troops still fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan. Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, saluted the nation's resilience, then and now.

"It was a day when weaker souls would have surrendered," Inouye said of the attack that thrust the United States into World War II. "It was a day that gave real meaning to our name, the United States of America."

He added: "Today, the obstructions and challenges are many, the ugly voices

See PEARL HARBOR on page 3

ANDREW B. WHITE/COLLEGIAN

'Tis the season!
Kate Bradbury and Chelsea Elliott place gifts under the 'giving tree.'

University Child Care assists parents

BY HANNAH DRAKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

To a young pregnant woman the idea of obtaining a college degree may be daunting. After all, college isn't cheap and it isn't easy, especially if you're the parent of an energetic preschooler. As a result, there are options in place to assist eager parents in their pursuit of a higher education.

One such option for assistance at the University of Massachusetts is University Child Care, located on Clubhouse Drive on the Southwest side of campus.

UCC provides a place for children of UMass affiliates aged 15 months through five years of age. UCC considers children of full-time undergraduates, graduates, and employees for priority enrollment, followed by alumni, children of Five-College affiliates, and children of the community-at-large.

The classrooms are open Monday through Friday, 8:15 a.m. to 5:30 p.m., with different pick-up and drop-off options. Tuition assistance is available, and is based on household size, income, and services needed.

Nine eligible undergraduate families are offered a $2.00 per hour tuition rate, and many undergraduate/graduate families receiving assistance pay no fee or only $1.00 per hour spent at UCC.

Butler, a single mother and English major at UMass, decided to finish school following the birth of her son, Max, and hopes to go to graduate school upon completion of her degree. She is currently a waitress on the weekends, but her goal is to teach. Her four-year-old son Max has been going to UCC since he was three.

"I don't know what I would do without them [UCC]. I do know I definitely wouldn't be here. They're great; I love them," she said.

"And they're not just babysitters, they're loving and they're so well educated, which is really important. They know what they're doing."

Marvanne Gallagher, Director of UCC, says the most exciting part is that the system works. Apart from Butler, she sees undergraduate parents succeed with the help of UCC's child-care year after year.

"It's so exciting when you see a single mom in their first year of school, figuring out what their major's going to be; by the second-third year, they're doing it; third-fourth year they can see the light at the end of the tunnel," Gallagher said.

"So now here's a person who might be a first-time college graduate in their family, who has their higher education, whose child has had a great early childhood experience and is going to be very ready for kindergarten. It works, and it makes sense."

Gallagher went on to add, "That family's not going back in the welfare system. That family's not going to go back and need public assistance. That mom has a job, she can pay the rent, the utilities, and the food for her child," she added.

The services at UCC aren't just for undergraduate parents. While approximately one-third of children at UCC are children of undergrads, one-third more are children of graduates, and the remaining third are children of faculty and staff.

"Some of [the faculty] came to UMass because our childcare center has a national reputation," Penny Gagnon, UCC Office Manager said.

"We have a very well qualified staff. To become an early childhood teacher, you don't have to have a degree. At UMass we require degrees of everyone," she added.

Gallagher said that all UCC teachers have degrees in Early Childhood Education. All have at least their Associate's Degree, most have their Bachelor's and some have their Master's.

UCC also contributes to the community by hiring 35-45 work-study students per semester as assistant teachers.

The curriculum at UCC differs from most pre-schools because of the individual focus and that its children come from diverse backgrounds. There are 28 Caucasian, 17 Asian, 7 Latino/Hispanic, 5 Black/African American, 5 European, and 8 multiracial children at UCC.

Their primary languages include English, Chinese, Spanish, Korean, Akan, Hebrew, Japanese, Russian, Bulgarian, Arabic, Tagalo, Vietnamese, Turkish, African, and Bhutanese. As a result, the curriculum strives for tolerance.

"Anti-bias Curriculum supports children as they explore, celebrate, and understand differences. Our approach acknowledges that children and adults can be empowered to stand up for their rights and to recognize and question social injustice," the UCC application packet explains.

Despite its benefits, the status of UCC's future at UMass has been shaky in recent years. UCC suffered a $300,000 budget cut in 2002 when UMass received financial cuts from the state.

However, in October of 2002, the Department of Higher Education granted UCC a four-year federal grant. The grant, known as CCAMPIS (Child Care Access Means Parents In School) enabled UCC to sustain itself for longer than expected.

Professional reports indicated that it was not likely for UCC to maintain the quality of the program with the cuts without additional subsidies or fee increases, which would stop most student-parents from being able to afford UCC childcare.

Last May, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano committed to support UCC through the 2004-2005 academic year.

Gallagher and Gargano are currently working towards a plan to align costs and allow UCC to continue its childcare services.

Gallagher is confident about UCC's future, and expects to have final plans for the upcoming year by the end of the semester.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Andrew Merritt
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
News Supervisor Cameron Woods
Advertising Manager Jiltian Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Meghan Heath
Campus Editor Alyson Zilmann
Editorial Editor Paige Cram
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Matthew Reed
Sports Editor Mike Marinelli
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Higgins
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Advertising Design Virginia Frevaut
Human Resources Sandra Marquez
Assistant Production Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Jacklin Sorenson
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Advisor Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living Mike Bonack
Asst. Arts & Living Monique Jennotti
Assistant Editorial Yousef Munayyer
Assistant Editorial Allison Edles
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Sports Robert McGovern
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published during the University of Massachusetts academic semester, Tuesday to Friday. The Collegian is independently owned, operated and advertising revenue supported. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, when the College Signal in 1901, The Weekly Collegian in 1914 and as The Weekly Collegian in 1958. Published since April 1967, The Collegian has been semi-daily since January 1994. For questions, subscriptions and information, call 545-3500 daily between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
S.J. Port
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Andrew Roberts
COPY EDITOR
Peter Foundas
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Molly Eggleston
PRODUCTION STAFF
Melody Natal, Lauren Egavian

www.dailycollegian.com
www.dailycollegian.com
www.dailycollegian.com
www.dailycollegian.com
www.dailycollegian.com

policelog

Several students arrested for alcohol possession

WednesdayDecember 1

5:47 a.m. An intoxicated student was reported to be kicking a door in Mary Lyon Hall. An officer brought the student to their room.

ThursdayDecember 2

9:42 a.m. The Marlborough Police Department requested assistance with threats made against a family and a UMass student. The suspect was issued a trespass notice through the mail.

12:36 p.m. A twenty to thirty foot pine tree was cut down on Clark Hill Road. There are no suspects at this time.

FridayDecember 3

12:09 a.m. A fire alarm was set off in Dwight Hall after an unknown subject set a poster on fire.

1:26 a.m. A party stated that three subjects refused to quiet down and sprayed the hallway with the fire extinguisher in John Adams Hall.

10:13 a.m. A caller reported damage to the patio furniture, which had been smashed and thrown onto the lawn of Dakin House. The approximate cost of the chairs was $200.00.

12:08 p.m. A bike was stolen from the bike rack at the Franklin Dining Commons. The bike was valued at $300.00.

7:46 p.m. Benjamin Pogany, 19, of Newton, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol, possession of a class D substance, and possession of a false identification on Fearing Street.

10:07 p.m. Joseph Gerossie, 20, of North Billerica, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol in the parking lot across the street from Southwest.

10:24 p.m. A party stated that the dressing rooms in the Fine Arts Center were broken into and multiple wallets were stolen.

SaturdayDecember 4

1:02 a.m. A fire alarm sounded in Herter Hall. The fire was extinguished, but a large amount of smoke was reported to still be in the building.

3:33 p.m. A computer was reported to have been stolen from Coolidge Hall. The estimated value of the computer was $800.00.

7:16 p.m. An EMT stated that a subject was hit by a hockey puck in the Mullins Center. The subject refused a transport to the hospital.

8:27 p.m. Following a date of birth request, Benjamin Orrell, 20, of Stow, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol in the parking lot across the street from Southwest.

8:32 p.m. John Rahkonen, 18, of Monson, was arrested for unlawfully transporting alcohol.

8:46 p.m. Carl Ciarcia, 19, of Berlin, CT, and Brian Guite, 18, of Kensington, CT were arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol in the parking lot next to Southwest.

10:13 p.m. Patrick Torney, 20, of Braintree, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol and indecent exposure in Kennedy Hall. Another subject fled on foot

10:27 p.m. John Gould, 20, of Braintree, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol and indecent exposure in the parking lot behind Sylvan.

SundayDecember 5

1:33 a.m. A backpack with marijuana, a bottle of Bacardi rum, and a knife was found in Van Meter Hall. An officer brought the backpack to the police station.

3:06 a.m. After a disturbance in Melville Hall, Kathleen Kelly, 20, of Needham, was arrested for disorderly conduct, resisting a police officer making a lawful arrest, attempting to commit a crime, and assault and battery on a police officer.

4:44 a.m. After a vending machine was discovered smashed with the contents stolen in Mackimmie Hall, Nathan Silva, 20, of Dartmouth, was summoned for destruction of property and larceny under $250.

11:47 a.m. A party stated a group of people were arguing and possibly fighting outside of Baker Hall. An officer reported that the disturbance was actually a guitarist, playing and singing.

11:12 p.m. After serving a warrant an officer arrested Adam Vohra, 18, of New Fairfield, CT in Hamlin Hall.

MondayDecember 6

2:29 p.m. Two bikes were reported stolen outside of Washington Hall

5:21 p.m. Subject were observed throwing snowballs at vehicles on Clark Hill Road. An officer could not locate the subjects.

-Compiled by Brendan Heck.

MIT agrees to increase annual payment to Cambridge

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP) — The Massachusetts Institute of Technology will boost its annual payments to the city of Cambridge and won't pull large amounts of property from the tax rolls without paying a penalty, according to a new deal between the school and city.

As a nonprofit, MIT is exempt from property taxes, but the school has long made payments to Cambridge to compensate for its use of city services. The deal announced Monday is the first time the payments have been part of formal agreement.

Under the new arrangement, MIT will pay the city $1.5 million this fiscal year, up from $1.2 million last year, The Boston Globe reported. The university will then increase its payments by 2.5 percent each year for 10 years. The agreement will be renewed every decade for 40 years, unless MIT opts out.

The new deal also ensures Cambridge won't suddenly lose a significant portion of the taxes MIT does pay. Despite its tax-exempt status, MIT is Cambridge's largest taxpayer because it owns 84 acres of commercial real estate as part of its investment portfolio. Last year, MIT paid $23.5 million in taxes on that property.

As MIT's commercial holdings have grown, city officials have worried the school would convert portions of it to nonprofit use and threaten the stability of the city budget.

Under the agreement, MIT won't remove more than a half percent of the city's tax base from the tax rolls in any given year and will not remove more than 2.5 percent of the tax base off the rolls over the life of the agreement. If MIT exceeds those numbers, it will pay Cambridge an amount equal to the taxes on the newly exempt property.

"It's helpful to know that we can continue to invest in our infrastructure without the peril of losing tax money in an extreme fashion," said Cambridge city manager Robert Healy.

—Associated Press

UMass Amherst Student Activities Center
UP TO THE MINUTE

December 8
Music Injection Wednesday
Bring your lunch and get a healthy dose of live music between classes!
Student Union, Cape Cod Lounge, 11am-1pm

International Movie Series: The Cuckoo
The story of a Finnish conscript who turned pacifist in WWII, a Russian imprisoned for writing bad poetry, and a Lapp woman with a reindeer farm.
SOM 108, 8pm. FREE

The NEXUS Magazine Release Party
A source for social change. Featuring COLD DUCK COMPLEX,
student art work, and free food from People's Market.
Fine Arts Center Lobby, 7pm. FREE

DECEMBER 8,9,10
Yearbook Senior Picture Sittings: The Best of U
Be part of UMass history and have your photo recorded forever in university archives. Log on to www.ouryear.com (UMass Amherst code:147) or call 1-800-OUR-YEAR. Sittings open for next semester.

December 9
Mix It Up Dance Series: Latin Dance Lessons
Back by popular demand, the award-winning UMass Ballroom Dance Club presents a short performance followed by dance lessons for all!
Campus Center Auditorium, 7pm-11pm. FREE.

December 9,10,11
A Midsummer Night's Dream
Premier Shakespearian comedy performed in all of its magnificence by the UMass Theater Guild.
Student Union Ballroom, 8pm
Two performances on 12/11 at 2pm and 8pm.
Students $5, General Public $8.

December 12
Contradance
Dance to the live music of fiddles, accordions, and banjos! No experience necessary and no partners needed.
Student Union Ballroom, 7:30pm FREE

December 16
Tension Breakers
Save the drama for yo' mama but let us help relieve your stress! Drop by and enjoy free food, give-aways, and messages.
Campus Center Concourse, 11am-3pm. FREE

Iraq blaming neighbors for heavy combat

By Mariam Fam
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A top Iraqi official accused the country's neighbors Tuesday of doing too little to stop foreigners from joining the brutal insurgency, while the U.S. combat death toll neared 1,000 with the killing of an American soldier in Baghdad.

Russian President Vladimir Putin said he "cannot imagine" how Iraq's elections can go forward next month amid the violence.

In a speech to the Iraqi National Council, the deputy prime minister, Barham Saleh, said he was losing patience with Iraq's neighbors. He didn't single out any governments, but noted that Iraqi police had arrested a Syrian driving a car bomb packed with artillery shells and other explosives.

"There is evidence indicating that some groups in some neighboring countries are playing a direct role in the killing of the Iraqi people and such a thing is not acceptable to us," Saleh said. "We have reached a stage in which if we do not see a real response from those countries, then we are obliged to take a decisive stance."

Iraqi leaders have repeatedly called on their neighbors — particularly Syria and Iran, to guard their borders more closely against infiltration. Those countries have expressed concern that instability in Iraq poses a threat to the entire region.

U.S. soldiers, meanwhile, arrested several people described as suspected senior "transnational terrorists" in a raid Monday night on a sports complex in Baghdad, the military said Tuesday. It did not identify the suspects or say where they were from.

"This operation put a serious dent in the transnational terrorism in Baghdad," Col. Robert Abrams, commander of the 1st Cavalry Division's 1st Brigade Combat Team, was quoted as saying in a military statement.

U.S. soldiers' presence remains heavy during elevated insurgent combat. Iraqis claim foreigners are not being stopped.

The American soldier slain Tuesday was gunned down by small-arms fire while on patrol in Baghdad. As of 10 a.m. Tuesday, the Pentagon Web site listed the number of combat deaths as 999; it was not clear if the soldier was included.

The military also announced a Marine died in a vehicle accident in western Baghdad. The two deaths brought the number of U.S. military who have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003 to 1,278, according to an Associated Press tally.

Also, three Iraqi National Guardsmen were killed in a roadside bomb attack Monday as they patrolled near Iskala, an Iraqi National Guard official said. And a roadside bomb exploded near a police patrol in Basra at 8:30 p.m., killing one policeman and wounding five.

N.Y. scaling back mandatory sentence

By Joel Stashenko
Associated Press

ALBANY, N.Y. — State lawmakers voted Tuesday to scale back some mandatory prison terms under New York's infamously harsh drug laws, which critics said caused low-level offenders and addicts to spend too much time in state prison.

Among the reforms would be to change the current maximum sentence of 15 to 25 years to life to a sentence of eight years to 20 years, making offenders eligible for release in less than seven years.

The proposal would also eliminate the maximum term of life for the most serious offenses. A common sentence of three years to life for many offenders would become a determinate sentence of three years, making offenders eligible for release in just over 2 1/2 years.

Opponents of the drug laws had decried the maximum life sentences of the statute as draconian, though only about 400 of the state prisons' 62,000 inmates are serving the maximum for offenses related only to drug possession.

Those inmates would be allowed to seek reductions in their prison time in line with the new sentencing guidelines.

The agreement would also make nonviolent drug offenders eligible sooner for treatment programs and double the amounts, by weight, of heroin and other controlled substances that defendants have to be caught with to qualify for the harshest of charges.

The Assembly approved the measure 96-41; the Senate passed it in a 53-6 vote. The bill will next go to Gov. George Pataki; he did not say Tuesday if he would sign it.

Former Gov. Nelson Rockefeller pushed the statutes through the New York Legislature in 1973 and 1974, at a time when he felt the state's inner cities were being lost to heroin addiction and judges were balking at imposing still sentences on drug offenders.

Two longtime goals of drug law reformers — giving near-total sentencing discretion to judges and allowing some offenders to avoid prison entirely in favor of treatment — are not included in the agreement.

Michael Blain, director of public policy for the Drug Policy Alliance, called the measure "a step in the right direction." Robert Gangi, head of the state Correctional Association, said the legislation makes "very modest" changes in the drug-sentencing provisions.

"The laws are still mandatory," Gangi said. "The sentences called for are still unduh long, even with the reductions."

Anniversary brings tears to veterans of hatred and the unconscionable actions of terrorism around us intending to make us afraid."

PEARL HARBOR from page 1

Inouye, a recipient of the Medal of Honor, spoke to more than 1,000 people at the USS Arizona Memorial visitor center.

Just 17 and living in Honolulu at the time, he later lost his right arm serving in Europe as a member of the Army's distinguished 442nd Regimental Combat Team, made up almost entirely of Japanese-Americans.

COURTESY CNN/AP

A veteran recalls his involvement in Pearl Harbor sixty three years ago. More than one thousand people attended the memorial service in AZ.

A moment of silence at 7:55 a.m. marked the time bombs began to fall over the harbor. Hawaii Air National Guard jets roared overhead in a missing-man formation.

The somber ceremony, under overcast skies with an ocean breeze, concluded with a 21-gun salute and a Navy bugler playing "Taps."

About two dozen Pearl Harbor survivors attended the ceremony, a number that declines every year. They were given a standing ovation and later signed autographs and posed for pictures.

"It's really neat to see them out here and see people that were in the war and experienced the whole thing," said Dave Casados, of Red Bluff, Calif. "It's a privilege to see them."

Other ceremonies were held around the country. In Little Rock, Ark., retired U.S. Air Corps Col. David Moffat recalled standing guard at an airfield when the attack began. "There was a state of confusion. Our weapons were locked up," he said. "One officer ran to his plane in pajamas."

Zenji Abe, 88, a Japanese dive-bomber pilot who participated in the attack, also paid tribute in Hawaii to the American lives that were lost. He met Pearl Harbor survivor Richard Fiske during the 50th anniversary ceremonies in 1991 and the two became friends.

The two men made a pact. Abe would send Fiske money each year to lay two roses at the memorial each month, one for him and one for Fiske. Fiske promised to continue the tribute for as long as he lived. He died April 2.

Wearing white gloves and a dark suit, Abe laid down the roses and bowed to the marble wall listing the names of those killed aboard the Arizona and prayed.

Amherst Computerworks, Inc.
PC & Laptop Sales/Service/Repair 3-College Certified Vendor
Laptop & LCD Projector Rentals
Repairing Macs and all brands of PC's
Selling new Custom desktop & laptop PC's
9 East Pleasant St.
Amherst, MA 01002
Phone: (413) 548-8900
Fax: (413) 548-8030
Est. 1990
acri@acripc.com

Psst, UMass Amherst Seniors!
You're not going to look like this forever.

Take your senior yearbook pictures today!
Senior Portrait Sitting Dates are:

November 29	November 30	December 1
December 2	December 3	December 6
December 7	December 8	December 9
December 10	January 24	January 25
January 26	January 27	January 28

Go to www.ouryear.com and use school code 147 to schedule your appointment today

Let it Snow Holiday Dinner
Thursday Dec. 9th
from 4-7:30pm in all DC's

Menu Featuring:
entrees
Chicken Breast Ballontine
Prime Rib
Ratatouille desserts
Chocolate Torte
Pound Cake with Chocolate Fondue
Snowflake Rolls
beverages
Hot Cocoa with Real Whipped Cream
Wassil

DINING SERVICES
UMassAmherst
YCMP

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 8, 2004

"The recipe for perpetual ignorance is: be satisfied with your opinions and content with your knowledge." Elbert Hubbard

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Disciplinary action not enough to fix riot problem

Yesterday represented a small dose of closure for a long, embarrassing ordeal at the University of Massachusetts, as disciplinary action was finalized for the students identified as being involved in raucous post-Red Sox game disturbances this fall.

While it is probably still too soon to understand the full impact of these events, there are certain cultural and social lessons that ought to be learned from what happens in the name of celebration. The punishments that were handed down will certainly affect the lives of the students who receive them, but for the rest of us, the true message is something else.

This is the unfortunate and harsh reality of our school right now. Upon what should have been a cause for joyous celebration, the hometown team winning at the most crucial of times, we instead saw outbreaks of violence and vandalism; antisocial acts that destroyed property at best and endangered lives at worst.

The debate about the severity of those actions and the justification of the punishment that results will certainly continue long after the school year, if only in an academic sense. What we must recognize now, though, is that what some people call disturbances, and what some call riots, are the manifestations of some abstract part of our society that is begging to be corrected.

That "part" is not just a human element, either. We can castigate and alienate as many students as we wish for their unruliness, but that is attacking the effect. The causes of that lack of control and respect for the school and their peers will not go away when we punish those students.

The fix must begin with everyone in the UMass community, not simply the individuals we deem as being separate from the group, the rabble-rousers. We must all take a good, hard look at ourselves as students of this school and residents of the community, because we are both of those things at all times.

The underlying problem seems to be a lack of pride in the special gifts that UMass has to offer. To draw up a laundry list of reasons for pride in this university should not be necessary — they appear on the front page of this publication and on the UMass Web site everyday. Suffice to say, this is a top-class institution, and a place where we all experience a tremendous amount of growth. It should not also be a place where we feel endangered or embarrassed as a result of sporting achievements.

To be fair, this is not the only school that has dealt with such problems recently. Northeastern and Emerson have both been affected by postgame violence in the worst ways imaginable. The brother of a Northeastern student was killed and another student was injured when a schoolmate hit them with his SUV after the Patriots' Super Bowl win, and an Emerson student died after being hit with a police pepperball after the Red Sox' World Series victory.

We are not that liar from such incidents here at UMass, and it must become a part of our cultural dialogue. The dangers of excessive and violent celebration were already evident. Now, we see the consequences of even mostly harmless acts, and as those students who feel the brunt of disciplinary action decide what comes next, we can all take proactive measures to ensure that we will not have to open the newspaper and see our peers, or ourselves, punished in public again.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

Mandatory attendance unfair

Mike Anmuth

When I was a freshman I was bright-eyed and bushy-tailed and ready to attend the full roster of large lecture classes that I had picked in orientation. Despite being one of about 300 people, I would still show up; take notes, talk to my neighbor during times when I thought the professor had said something interesting and sit in my chair with my flip-out desk ready to learn ... until about the third week of the semester. That's when college students get the urge to sleep in later, or sleep most of the day, catch up on doing other things or do practically anything other than go to a large lecture class.

But there was something stopping me in the way, something large and looming that was right there on the syllabus: the mandatory attendance policy. Now, I understand that when you're a professor and you've put in years of hard, diligent work in getting your doctorate, researching, coming up with material and teaching it, you want an audience. This is understandable. However, is an audience full of students who are not paying attention, doing other work or sleeping really a desirable audience? I know that when I'm tired, in big classes or small, I don't want to sit there and learn, and neither do most college students.

The problem with mandatory attendance policies is not the encouragement to attend the class because, in reality, every professor encourages you to attend the class and you inarguably learn the most when you do. The problem is the other side of the equation, which punishes those who cannot attend classes for a variety of reasons. Is it fair to say that missing one class is detrimental to one's learning? How about three? How about half the semester?

If there is one thing that I have learned in my education class this semester, it is that students learn in different ways. Perhaps you learn by visual notes on the board; your neighbor may only have to hear the lecture, and the girl who sits down the row may need to copy the notes down to learn. With each student having different needs, is it balanced to assume that every student needs to be present in every class session as opposed to just reading the assigned texts? Perhaps some students will grasp the concept just by reading the texts whereas some students may need the lecture, the texts and flashcards in order to fully understand the material. Mandatory attendance policies force students to attend classes that they might not get anything out of attending, and may disadvantage other students who do wish to attend classes without other students, who may be bored or sleeping.

Mandatory attendance policies should be eliminated from college courses because students pave their own way, so to speak, in terms of independence and choices

One cannot think about mandatory attendance without thinking of the cost involved. Each student pays tuition, some of us more than others. Each of us contributes to the upkeep of this University and effectively pays for the classes in which he or she is enrolled. To look at it from a consumer point of view: if I buy a television and never turn it on, I still have paid for the television and the store has gotten its money. Likewise, if I pay for a class, but never attend it, the advantage is still on the side of the school because the tuition dollars are already present. I am not saying that students should never attend classes, nor am I saying that students will succeed by not attending classes; I am simply stating that mandatory attendance does not change the role of the student in the university system when it comes to paying the bill before each semester.

As with any opinion, I'm sure there are proponents for mandatory attendance policies. It does fill seats in classes; it keeps students off of the street, or perhaps out of bed, and it makes years of professor research and implementation more worthwhile. Plus, students do generally get a better education when they show up for class.

Mandatory attendance policies should be eliminated from college courses because students pave their own way, so to speak, in terms of independence and choices. If you choose to continually not show up to a job in the real world, you will be fired. If you do not show up to class, you will not learn as much. In terms of responsibility, attendance policies are just a slap in the face to students, and when someone is attending class and sleeping, it is a slap in the face to the instructor.

Mike Anmuth is a Collegian columnist.

New traditions; old lessons

S.J. Port

It was Christmas Eve 2003 when Mom decided 32 years of marriage was enough. She flung down the wrapping paper and walked briskly from the wrapanything-not-moving center, formerly the dining room. In her office she began to look at real estate in the town in which she worked, 45 minutes south of our home. My father dismissed her feelings, left the shopping bags at his feet and claimed his usual spot on the living room couch for his usual afternoon nap. I left standing in the dining room, like two heroic trees after a hurricane's destruction, my brother and I were in shambles. Was this the end? How could this be the end? Was she serious? Did he care?

The holidays have always been riddled with tension in my home.

Raised in a communist household by Jewish immigrant parents who rejected religion after witnessing the atrocities faith brought to their Russian villages during the pogroms, my father challenges the commercial holidays.

Taught the Gospels on a dairy farm in the Bible Belt, my mother's childhood passed with each advent calendar, as she decorated sugar cookies to bring to the Apostolic Christian church in town with the women of her prosperous family.

When they married in 1971, family and friends alike asked my parents "how" they would raise their children. Their immediate answer was always: "to be good people." If people asked what faith they would raise their children both would answer: "to have faith in independent thought and education."

Neither considered what would happen when the values of their childhood traditions collided. Neither realized how powerful those habits of thought and association would be or how heavily the burdens of conflict would weigh on their children. Their inability to mesh, to realize the other's needs and wants during the holiday crush has drawn us into a feud that quite literally threatens our existence as a family.

My brother, Andy, and I were the lucky kids on the block who celebrated both Hanukah and Christmas. The traditions had to change as we changed as a family. With both children away from home for four years now, Hanukah has been largely forgotten, and Christmas is intensified by the stress of exams, rush to get home and the few days off to "be together."

In truth, the together part has become the most challenging part. And in turn finding small gifts that we were certain the other would appreciate became an equal test. Big gifts became the thing, lots of them, so much so that when you needed something it became an expectation that it would be provided. Gifts were no longer sentimental or affectionate niceties, they became expensive burdens that represented the consumerism of the society we lived in the other 364 days of the year.

With the ever-increasing cost and tension of the holidays, my father grew more and more frustrated. His few days off from the office were not spent lounging and enjoying company, they were spent chasing items on a list at the nearest packed mall. For my mother, the holidays came to represent one of the few times both her children were home and hers to coddle; she attempted to make everything perfect, and as homesick college students, we pouted each time she suggested a smaller tree or fewer traditions. At the same time, we were too tired or too busy with friends to help clean, decorate, cook, sing, wrap or spend time together.

Neither considered what would happen when the values of their childhood traditions collided. Neither realized how ... heavily the burdens of conflict would weigh on their children.

As a small immediate family of four a thousand miles from our enormous extended family, we didn't see a mass of people each time we entered the door and left Mom with the responsibility of making the holidays fulfill our expectations. Our father decided the best way to deal with the holidays was to shut down and fight every request made of him; these were not his holidays or his expectations.

On Dec. 24, 2003 the pressure almost blew the roof off our humble home.

As children we were the minority: our parents were happily married. And even when they weren't at their happiest, they put their commitment to the partnership they had built first. We never questioned the legitimacy of their union. It is one of, if not the most important, constant in my life.

For the three days following Christmas, Andy and I tried to make things normal. We did the work Mom usually did alone.

On Christmas we opened our gifts; we pretended; we tried. We spoke very little. Then, Andy and I went away to ski homes and Cape Cod cottages for New Years ragers. When we returned the dust had settled. Shocked, Andy and I, accepted the return to normalcy quizzically.

Months later we brought the question of, "What are we doing this Christmas?" to the table over dinner. Conversation stopped. Nobody was sure what to do. Later at Thanksgiving, we still were unsure, but with the tension mounting tears came again as we desperately scrambled for an answer. Dad held onto his contention that the holidays had become something that didn't mean anything to him, but only caused him pain. Our mother argued that the traditions meant a great deal to her and to her children. Andy and I wondered if we should even come home. He wondered why he should have faith in our ability as a family to gather the moxie and consideration to attempt another holiday, and make it a successful holiday. For once, I kept my mouth shut, but wondered the same thing.

But then, as I drove away back to the messy Massachusetts Turnpike it hit me that faith, in the words of the Hebrews 1:11, "is evidence of things unseen."

Each year it is not a battle between Judaism and Christianity, or between atheism and belief, nor is it even really the divide between communism and capitalism. It is a fight to survive as a family despite the expectations of all of these components and the possibility that we cannot possibly fulfill them all. In fact, this holiday, my faith lies squarely on the idea that we will not fulfill all the expectations, except the most important: time together without the pressures of religion, commercialism, capitalism or tradition because that to me is all that matters now.

S.J. Port is a Collegian columnist.

The wide world of LiveJournal

Lisa McLaughlin

I'm an egomaniac. I like to read fellow aspiring writers. People from different walks of life fascinate me. I crave the newest gossip from my friends and want to divulge gossip where I don't have to repeat myself fifteen times. I can't miss my daily dose of drama, comedy and freedom of speech. These are just some of the reasons why I am hopelessly addicted to LiveJournal.

For those of you who aren't familiar, www.livejournal.com is a personal publishing Web site for online journals, i.e. "blogs." The blog is a fairly recent phenomenon. The term was coined in 1999 by Peter Merholz as a shortened version of the phrase "Web log." It is defined as "a Web site that contains an online personal journal with reflections, comments and often hyperlinks." According to Merriam-Webster Inc., "blog" was the number one searched word on their Web site in 2004.

While there are many blog sites on the Web, such as Blogger, Journal Space and Type Pad, LiveJournal is one of the most popular with more than five million users internationally. To create a LiveJournal, one simply has to create an original username. LiveJournals are free unless you want special features, such as the ability to post pictures, create polls, customize your journal style and make audio posts, among other things. It's easier if you're technically savvy and know some basic html.

Your journal can serve many purposes. It can be used as a therapeutic outlet for the daily stresses of life. It can serve as an easy way to update all of your friends on the events of your life or as a glorified tool to gossip. It can be a place to showcase your creative writing and receive constructive criticism. It can be a way to meet people online and make new friends. Personally, I use it for all of these reasons.

My daily routine is logging onto LiveJournal so I can glimpse through the windows of people's lives all around the world.

On LiveJournal, you have the right to remain completely anonymous, or at least semi-anonymous. As long as you have enough common sense to not give out your personal information to complete strangers, no one can invade your privacy. You can keep your journal private or make it so only certain people are allowed to read it. If you do want to meet people, again you have to be careful and take the same precautions you would in an online chat room. Remember that the person behind the username can be a much different person from what they proclaim to be.

A good way to meet people on LiveJournal is to join one of its many communities. There is a community for everything, and I mean everything! You can join a community of fellow Johnny Depp fans, pro-choice activists, math geeks, journalists, truffle lovers, etc., where you can discuss the topic at hand with others who share your interest.

If you can't find a community that suits you, you can even create one yourself. Be aware though: LiveJournal is an exercise in freedom of speech, and there are communities out there that you might find offensive. There are certainly communities in existance that are racist, sexist, pro-anorexia, pro-marijuana legalization and (wink) pro-Bush. So just remember to keep an open mind if you come across something that doesn't suit your fancy. Remember that everybody has a right to his or her own opinion.

One drawback to LiveJournal is that it is very easy to get lost within the blogosphere. One link leads to another, and you end up spending more time surfing the web than you expected. It can end up feeling like a waste of time because you're taken away from academic or professional productivity, but it can also serve as a good learning experience.

For example, somebody posts an article from cnn.com regarding a current event. Different people can post comments voicing their opinions and how the situation affects them. Thus, the reader can look at the post objectively and learn different sides of the issue, and then decide what they think of it themselves. It's a great tool in learning tolerance because you feel compelled to listen to and interact with people you disagree with, and vice versa. Emotions don't end up factoring as much into the argument, because they're hidden behind the computer screen. Personally, I often find it easier to make arguments that are not face-to-face, because it gives me more time to think of an intelligent thing to say.

Where most people have a daily routine of going to the gym, watching the morning news or meditating, my daily routine is logging onto LiveJournal so I can glimpse through the windows of people's lives all around the world. These people, my Live Journal "friends," range widely in age, ethnicity, nationality, profession, and personal identity. While we may differ in many ways, we all have one thing in common tying us together: we write to express ourselves as individuals living in a complicated and multifaceted society.

Lisa McLaughlin is a Collegian columnist.

Breaking the yoke of gender roles

Amelia Sabadini

In his book "The Prophet" under the entry, "On Laws," Kahlil Gibran asks, "What of the ox who loves his yoke and deems the elk and deer of the forest stray and vagrant things?" These are the words that haunt me whenever I hear someone extolling the supposed virtues of gender roles.

By gender roles I mean the expectation that behavior and performance in certain situations are not determined by the specifics of that situation, nor by the abilities and talents unique to the individual involved or even a combination of these two factors, but by biological sex alone. I mean those notions such as: all women are just naturally superior to men when it comes to caring for children, as my friend keeps insisting to me. I mean, the idea that men are all innately predisposed to excel at math, driving and killing spiders.

I'm sighing these examples because in all honesty I don't know if the official nomenclature for these preconceptions is gender roles or sex roles. I know it varies depending on whom you ask and where you look. I also know that ultimately what I'm talking about is the prevalence of stereotypes about women and men.

What troubles me the most about gender-based stereotypes is that they exacerbate the 'us and them' mentality that's already given to plaguing interactions between men and women.

The very word stereotype has all sorts of negative connotations and most people will shy away from it with good reason. You hear the word stereotype and you probably think of oppression, injustice, limits imposed on people's personal freedoms and individual potentials. Limits that are based on and maintained by unfounded generalizations about certain groups of people. Most people will agree that stereotypes are detrimental things, and should be abandoned.

I guess that means there has to be something else that people can call the stereotypes they're not ready or willing to part with. So enter gender roles? About a year ago, in a coffee shop, it was gender roles as I recall that the unpleasantly loud boy sitting behind me kept referring to. He was insisting that he was being fair, and it was simply a fact of nature that women are not as assertive as men. While he wouldn't discriminate against a woman, he just felt that a woman wouldn't do as well in a leadership position because of her natural, pre-determined lack of assertive behavior.

Well, I took the opportunity to demonstrate just how assertive a woman can be that day as I asked him where he had gotten such an idea. It was strange because he didn't have much for an answer. Maybe he just didn't feel like he could assert himself, and adhere to his gender role, if I wasn't going to play along and behave in accordance with my own. It's bad enough that this guy's gender roles were going to probably lead him to discriminate (despite his contrived insistence that he wouldn't), but he probably didn't even see how they were limiting him either.

I've had other people try and justify gender roles to me with talk of how it all comes down to an appreciation of the differences between the sexes. Yet I do not see how our biological differences confer the need for so many social restrictions. The assumptions made by gender roles and stereotypes extend well beyond the realm of quantifiable physical differences between the sexes and ultimately seek to suppress the differences antong individuals of all genders.

Perhaps what troubles me the most about gender-based stereotypes is that they exacerbate the "us and them" mentality that's already given to plaguing interactions between men and women. Any time you have this sort of in-group/out-group dichotomy, you also have an increased potential for acts of aggression occurring between the groups. Members of either group are apt to see members of the other group as less real or human than themselves. This perspective opens the door for anything from apathy to outright violence. Given that according to the U.S. Department of Justice in 2002 there were 247,730 rapes, attempted rapes and acts of sexual assault reported (the actual number would be higher as rape and sexual assault are two of the most under reported crimes committed), it doesn't seem like the dehumanizing divide between the sexes needs to get any wider.

Even if you could keep all the larger scale repercussions of these gender roles in check, what about the intra-personal damage that they do? How can it be conducive to personal growth to have a built in excuse as to why you don't, or can't do certain things (i.e. change a flat, change a diaper, file your taxes, ask for directions, stand up for yourself, articulate your feelings)? How does it feel if you really suck at something you believe your sexual identity is defined by? What if you're good at something your gender role says is off limits for you? What if you would've been really happy doing something that you never even tried thanks to your role restriction?

Why would anyone want to endure or even just risk the emotional and intellectual disfigurement that goes with accepting a gender role, living out a stereotype? "What of the ox that loves his yoke?" My best guess is that he's enamored his confinement with the belief that it ensures his safety and fulfillment. I can't say how it goes for an ox but any human ought to know better.

Amelia Sabadini is a Collegian columnist.

The academy of the left

John Ciampa

In case you haven't heard, some conservatives are up in arms about the leftist thought that is permeating through academia. Right-wing heavy-hitters such as George Will and Jeff Jacoby have each recently shared their insights on studies that confirm that an overwhelming majority of college professors are liberal, reinforcing the long-standing notion that academic institutions have traditionally been a harbor for left-wing political ideology. The news is hardly revelatory, but the reaction of the pundits is.

To his credit, Will tackles this issue in a recent Washington Post editorial with his customary tact, quoting Emory University English professor Mark Bauerlein. Bauerlein gives several interesting suggestions for the phenomenon of liberal academic dominance, including an echoing of what social scientists call the "false consensus effect," whereby people assume that the collective opinion of their own group matches that of the larger population.

He also has plenty to say about the prevailing environment that surrounds contemporary academic discourse. Especially intriguing is his mentioning of an "irrational social dynamic," that trumps the ability for equitable debate to occur. Instead, he argues, we are left with an environment where the most radical views that exist within a group eventually become the social norm. Bauerlein refers to this phenomenon as the "trappings of deliberation."

Boston Globe columnist Jeff Jacoby ups the emotional ante of Will's column by taking a considerably more caustic stance, claiming that contemporary campus leftism is more than just extensive, it is also "radical, aggressive, and deeply intolerant." Strong words when you consider the emphasis that many campuses now place on student diversity. Jacoby's interpretation of the released data prompts him to declare that students should have "the right to learn without being molested," and universities are sitting idle while professors are exacting a form of "intellectual harassment," on their students.

Now I cannot speak for college students everywhere, and I'm sure that many of my peers have their own fair share of insights on the matter, but I can't help but think that Jacoby reached a bit too far into his journalistic tool box to cull language that is flowery and emotional at the expense of being truly reflective of the post-secondary classroom experience that we students share.

Perhaps it was the statistics that lired him up. They are, in fact, quite telling: in a 2002 report by the American Enterprise magazine, an examination of the voter registration records of academics showed that faculty members registered the Democratic Party outnumbered their Republican brethren by ratios exceeding a 10-1 margin.

Yet one cannot help but wonder what results this study would have yielded from a broader sample. Of the half-dozen schools mentioned, several of them not only operate under umbrellas of perceived liberalistic thought, but they are also nestled within liberal geographic regions. A poll taken at Oberlin, or for that matter, within the Five College Consortium, would have yielded similarly predictable results.

Far more interesting would have been a sampling that looked at schools with liberal leanings that contrasted with their broader geographic locales. It remains intriguing how liberalism in prestigious institutions such as Texas, North Carolina and Wisconsin dictate the flavor of their surrounding city limits even though the states that they reside in range from conservative to inoderate.

The real question, then, seems to be: what accounts for the affinity that liberals appear to have for academia and the accompanying flavorings and sensibilities that surround it.

Perhaps age plays a factor. There is a healthy sense of authoritative questioning that presides over many campuses, a phenomenon that in some fashion traces that natural arc of human development. Traditionally, people have been more apt stray to the left in their younger years, only to become more centrist with age. Indeed, as people age and acquire more, a cautious possessiveness almost invariably grows with it. It was, after all, with great insight that Winston Churchill professed the following: "If you're not a liberal in your 20's, than you have no heart, if you're still a liberal in your thirties, you have no brain." Could it be that the academy is merely reflecting the age that it serves, and if so, are conservatives doomed to being shut out of the proceedings?

Before conservatives begin to hang their heads, they should recognize that location and ideological association does seem to be a factor. If the American Enterprise magazine compiled their results from Kenyon College in Ohio or Washington and Lee Univesity in Virginia – schools that more than hold their own with their intellectual eastern counterparts – they would certainly garner less lopsided results than from those found at Cornell and Stanford. There are conservative groups residing out in the left-of-center world of academia, albeit in more isolated pockets.

In my experience at this University, the liberal bias that most of my instructors have displayed has been noticeable, though that hasn't necessarily limited their effectiveness to teach. Few, if any, have flagrantly distorted their interpretation of the material at hand. Moreover, in terms of stirring up rigorous debate, despite what Mr. Jacoby purports, I have yet to encounter an instructor who presides over a classroom state of "intellectual harassment" with gleeful affirmation.

On the contrary, most have made the effort to encourage debate – right or left of center – that is both vociferous and engaging. Without question, a dominating sense of liberalism pervades UMass, be it in small groups, social events, speaking engagements or the editorial pages of the Collegian itself. If anything, I often find my classes to be a respite from this – a forum where viewpoints are freely discussed in an encouraging environment.

This is not to say that certain ideological leanings do not exist in other forms. In many cases, assigned texts often present a particular point of view that coalesces with that of the instructor. Warning about predisposed biases are also common: we've all born witness to proverbial warnings from instructors who make it a point to state that their political opinions have little to do with the point they are about to make. This creates an environment that arguably makes it challenging to introduce conservative views, but by no means impossible.

I once had a conversation with a faculty member who is conservative in his leanings. He said that if anything, the leftism of fellow colleagues has helped to make him a better academic, requiring him to choose his words more carefully, tactfully and with a measured sense of discipline. I admired this stance, even though his political position stood opposed to mine. It remains an inspiring way to address this issue. Intelligent debate will always remain more profound and significant than the ideological spectrum that surrounds it.

John Ciampa is a UMass student.

A not-so-Hollywood ending

Thomas Naughton

"Well, its ok I guess. Tim and Thomas are two names that are not meant to be romantically involved," I thought to myself as irrational tears made their way down my cheeks, while I quickly walked down Lansdowne Street, away from Tim's workplace. I smacked my hand against each side of my face, violently wiping off the tears while averting my eyes from the looks of drunken girls in halftops that were screaming some crap about the Red Sox.

I was especially happy that the Sox won that night in October because at least I could pass off my weak sob-fest as hyper-elation over the quickly reversing curse that the Boston baseball team had incurred years ago. "Tim and Tom," I said under my breath, "sounds like a stupid cartoon where animals drop anvils on one another or stick dynamite in each other's mouths while looking bug-eyed."

I actually don't really have a head anymore. My cartoon counterpart won, so there is a cold black anvil standing upon my neck where my head should be, and let me tell you, I am so much hotter now. It doesn't really matter how attractive I am these days because I'm throwing in the towel. The anvil on my head is a symbol that I can't do the American Dream Moderne because I'm just one of those people who doesn't have the ability.

The American Dream Moderne is a three-pronged hope for all Americans born out of the cinematic rainy-day kisses of romantic comedies: successful career, supportive friends, sustaining love. To have all three is to obtain the Holy Grail, and this anvil on my neck or the dynamite that I'm quickly attempting to digest (both provided by a bug-eyed guy who's name sounds much like mine when tripping off the tongue) is making things really hard for me to pull off my most convincing Indiana Jones impression. I'm the one of the odd men out.

Tim showed me something by his quick departure from my life: a pattern. There's nothing so damning in evidential terms as a pattern and my pattern is quick departures, either perpetrated by me or by the guy I am seeing. The pattern sent the message that I am capable of "the career" or at least a pursuit of success, and my friends are incredibly loving and supportive, but as for love or whatever love has become, I'm pretty bankrupt. I go on dates with some very interesting young men, and all I can think about is what my next project will be, what my next column will be on, what kind of sound my band will evolve into, what my friends are doing — anything but the situation at hand.

We are each an elaborate and beautiful lattice of scar tissue from failed friendships, relationships, projects and even failed identities.

The situation at hand is the attempt by another person to make a connection with me, and I always find a way out or he does. I think I'm secretly terrified, and this fear is so secret that I can't even identify or recall it. And that might happen at dinner on the first date.

Or after the dinner or movie, my date and I will go to his place to "talk and stuff," which usually means we're going to make-out. He'll kiss me and I'll kiss back because that's what the people in the movies do, and then my eyes will open wide and I'll look at the lids of the boy I'm kissing or at our kissing reflection on some shiny surface in my eyeline and think calmly, "I feel nothing for you, I could walk away right now." He fumbles and rubs against me, and we make the noises we're supposed to. He'll ask me if I "wanna," and I'll look at him and say "No, it'll mean more to us if we take it slow," which really means that he terrifies me, and I terrify me and the way I feel when I know that the sight and touch of my own body changes some one else's very body chemistry terrifies me. And that's just one date.

It's even more frightening on a long-term basis. I have had a few long term relationships, good relationships that verged on some kind of love, but in the back of my mind there always remained that image of me in the mirror hanging by the lips of some boy knowing that I could walk away, preventing me from ever truly being invested. We all do it to some extent. We are each an elaborate and beautiful lattice of scar tissue from failed friendships, relationships, projects and even failed identities. It becomes a kind of armor that we constantly thrust against other people (and their respective armor) to keep ourselves from ever again being as vulnerable as that first time you were bludgeoned so badly by love.

I got into my car on Lansdowne Street and drove through the city, driving past ex-boyfriend's houses, first date-restaurants and other landmarks of failed relationships. I felt stupid and childish for being upset, but once again I was just doing what I thought people in the movies did. I called a friend and laughed about something stupid to keep myself from wallowing in self-pity. After all, I had two-thirds of the dream that the movies prescribed for me, and that ain't bad. Besides, I don't really think any screenwriter ever met someone like me.

Thomas Naughton is a Collegian columnist.

No such thing as a coincidence

Colin Jones

Have you ever gotten in your car, turned your radio on and found that the song playing is just the one that you needed to hear, right at that moment? Or how about turning the television on randomly and finding that whatever happens to be on the air at that specific instant is in some way personally relevant to you? Maybe you've thought about an old friend of yours, one you hadn't seen in a long time, and you happen to run into that person suddenly or get a call from them.

All of us have experienced these things at one point or another. There are two ways to look at them: the first way is to fall in line with our contemporary cultural tendency to see them as being a coincidence, a happy turn of chance, a random occurrence that brings fleeting happiness or satisfaction, but nothing more. The second way is to see them as signs that there are forces out there, unheard and unseen, that look out for us all and try to tell us things, if we're willing to listen.

Don't worry. I'm not going to get all preachy on you. I'm not talking about religion in any kind of a traditional sense; I'm talking about spirituality. At this time and place in the world today, it seems that many people oscillate between two views on the subject. Some deny the existence of anything that can't be quantified scientifically, limiting themselves to only what they can see, hear, taste and touch. They feel that they are capable of understanding these things and that is what makes them "real."

We must acknowledge that it is up to all of us as individuals to find our own path, and we cannot force others to follow us.

In my opinion, this view isn't about knowledge as in science or experience: it is about fear of an unknown. It is one thing to not believe in forces we can't see, somehow exerting their influence over our lives. It is another thing to deny the possibility of such things altogether. It is arrogant to say that any one of us can fully understand and comprehend the nature of our existence. There are certainly distinctions that can be made and conjectures that can be developed based on those distinctions, but none of us know all of the answers to life's questions.

If we can acknowledge this as being a fact, then we can remain open to any possibility. Such openness can have a way of increasing our appreciation for things we do know and see, while at the same time allowing us to wonder with youthful curiosity about what we don't know. In a real sense, we can remain young at heart.

Others are limited to viewing things through the filter of their religious or spiritual views. While they believe that there are forces at work that we may not see, they feel that they know what these forces are. As such, they feel that not only is their view on any number of subjects right, but that other views are wrong. A key example of this mentality can be seen in the way that our current government administration conducts it's international relations, particularly with regard to the situation in Iraq.

Although there are a number of reasons for us to be fighting this war, both philanthropic and selfish, the fact that part of our motivation has a basc in religion is indicative of the destructive nature of such a way of thinking. It creates an illusion of things being us against them, and such a mentality can allow even the best of us to justify doing things that we know are wrong. As Chris Rock says in "Dogma," "I think it's better to have an idea. When there's a belief, people will die for it and people will kill for it."

We are now seeing history repeat itself firsthand. The Crusades weren't about religion; they were about land. Vietnam wasn't about protection; it was about containment. And this war is about a lot of things, but terrorism is towards the bottom of the list. Just as none of us can ever know the answers to all of life's questions, no one knows what "God" or "fate" or "whatever" would want. It seems unlikely that such forces would take sides.

So what can we do, personally, in our day-to-day lives that can help us come closer to spirituality? First of all, we must acknowledge that it is up to all of us as individuals to find our own path, and we cannot force others to follow us. Once we can accept this and move on, we can start to look for signs in our lives: if we're open to them. This takes practice, like most skills in life, and faith, like the best things in life. There are thousands of great books written on the subject, on how to determine the best ways to use spiritual insights to our advantage and gain knowledge and understanding.

However, even though it may be very difficult to do, we need to recognize that when we notice signs, they may not tell us what we want, but they will tell us what we need. So the next time you experience something that seems to be too much of a coincidence, think about what it means to you and how you can use that meaning to better your life.

Colin Jones is a Collegian columnist.

SUBMIT A LETTER OR OPINION

editorial@dailycollegian.com

413-545-3699

Letters to the Editor
113 Campus Center
Amherst, MA 01003

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 8, 2004

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The complexity of the Simple Plan world

By Emily Myer
U-WIRE

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. — Pop music has hit an all-time low.

With marginally talented pop princesses ruling the charts, Simple Plan fits right in. Considering the band writes its own lyrics, it may be a bit of an improvement. Yet its new album, "Still Not Getting Any ..." is remarkably similar to its last album, "No Pads, No Helmets ... Just Balls."

The band's latest attempt is full of songs about how bad life can be when you're famous or without an internationally known band, proven. Good enough, whining against record execs and bitching to a girl friend or friend are the recurring themes.

The album is essentially three minutes of Pete Singer, Jeff Stinco, David Desrosiers, Chuck Comeau and Jeremy Dion's best attempts at sounding angry and pissed off. Each track is the musical equivalent of a temper tantrum, complete with stomping feet and slamming doors.

[illegible] tomorrow

they'd rather "jump" tonight.

Most of the lyrics are stereotypical of the pop-punk genre, which includes artists such as Avril Lavigne, Good Charlotte and Ashlee Simpson. Lyrics repeatedly scream "Shut up," and members say they will never be stopped, that the world just needs to leave them alone and get out of their way.

The boys attempt to be [illegible] ridiculous, but most of the tracks [illegible] whiney. Every track is a [illegible] singer's life. Individual songs are [illegible] but when integrated into an album [illegible] message becomes an ode to lead singer Pierre Bouvier.

"Still Not Getting Any ..." does [illegible] fairly advanced guitar solos in [illegible] untitled track at the end really [illegible] solo is redundant if the [illegible]

The [illegible]

Nas continues quest for lyrical dominance on 'Street Disciple'

By Aaron Salas
U-WIRE

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. — The rapper Nas has grown up.

On his eighth solo release, gone is the young and wild thug with street stories about gun battles and partying all night. He's become a man, husband and father.

Nas has blessed the world with street poetry for more than a decade. His newest release, "Streets Disciple," once again fills our heads with political consciousness.

The old school that Nas visits so many times on his new album shows his appreciation for hip-hop forefathers, as well as a new direction for artists to follow. From the intro, "Streets Disciple" brings the listener into the complex world of Nasir Jones.

The first track, "A Message to the Feds, Sincerely, We the People," shows listeners that in a time when club hits reign supreme, Nas still kicks the knowledge. He has something serious to say, whether we like it or not.

Like previous Nas albums, he sticks to several themes throughout the CD. He hits listeners with his political views on songs such as "American Way" and "These are Our Heroes."

The Queens Bridge MC lets listeners know who influenced him on "U.B.R. (Unauthorized Biography of Rakim)." It tells the story of rapper Racism, one of the greatest MCs in the game. "Virgo," a track that features Ludacris, is a throwback to the late '80s hit, "The Show/La Di Da Di," by Slick Rick and his beat box partner Doug E. Fresh.

Nas also gets personal as he tackles issues such as marriage, children and his mother, who passed away a short time ago. "Just a Moment" asks listeners to give a moment of silence and pour out a little liquor for those who have been lost in the struggle.

"Getting Married" delves into the relationship Nas has with wife Kelis, who sings on several of his tracks. He also introduces listeners to his musical roots on the lead single, "Bridging the Gap," which features his blues-singing father, "Me and You" is dedicated to his daughter Destiny, as he spills his heart about the importance of his firstborn.

Like the millions of fans who fell hard for Illmatic in '94, Nas has become a man with grown up responsibilities and more to think about than hanging on the street corner.

His album stays with the same formula, using more of the same choppy beats and street poetry that takes months to fully understand. It is a throwback to when dancing to hip-hop meant bobbing your head to the beat as you chilled at the block party or listening to your headphones while walking to school.

Hip-hop has changed, but Nas refuses to change with it. While the Dirty South gets crunk, Nas brings us back to the East Coast and a time when conscious rap ruled the world.

COURTESY LAUNCH.COM

Nas proves that he still has what it takes to survive the rap game on his new album "Street Disciple."

McGregor, Borman write new novel 'Long way Round'

By Niti Bagchi
U-WIRE

NEW BRUNSWICK, N.J. — Many people know it's possible to go almost entirely by land from London to New York. It's fairly simple: you take the train under the Channel to France, move through Belgium, Germany, the Czech Republic, Slovakia, Ukraine, Kazakhstan, Mongolia, Russia and Siberia. Then you hop on a plane that takes you across the Bering Strait and into Alaska, from where you continue by land across the continent until you get to New York. But no one would actually undertake such a journey, right? Wrong. Ewan McGregor and Charley Boorman, actors and motorbike enthusiasts, set out to do just that, and they tell their story in, "Long Way Round: Chasing Shadows Across The World."

The story is told in the form of a first-person narrative, with McGregor and Boorman alternating the narration. They speak of their dream to ride around the world, the extensive preparations they have to make, their hassles in getting a documentary deal set up so that they can afford the trip, and their fears of leaving their families for three months.

The trouble with a first-person narrative is that it is difficult to maintain a three-dimensional aspect to the story at all times. "Long Way Round" occasionally falls prey to this, and parts of the narrative do drag on. For the most part, though, McGregor and Boorman keep their narrative afloat with funny anecdotes, detailed imagery and honest self-reflection. Each speaker has certain blind spots about himself that the other picks up on and writes about. McGregor and Boorman often detail the same experience or event, each from his own point of view, leaving the reader with a much richer and more detailed sense of the events.

The book's greatest asset is the humorous, and often poignant, stories about the people that the narrators meet along the journey. They speak of sharing a meal with some Mongolian tribesman, only to discover, to their horror, that the meal comprises a soup made of animal testicles. They also speak of their interactions with orphans on the streets of Ulaanbataar, and the heart-wrenching leg of their journey when they ride along Siberia's Road of Bones, built through the labors of Stalin's political prisoners.

Approximately two million prisoners were killed in the area, and many of their corpses were used as landfill for the road — hence the gruesome name. Although the story's strength lies in its numerous stories about help from complete strangers, and the kindness of people the world over, it manages to relate these without getting bogged down in cloying over-sentimentality: this is no Chicken Soup For The Biker's Soul.

For the most part, the book moves at a brisk pace, and holds on to the reader's attention. Ironically, the pace is fastest when the actual journey is moving slowest, and the narrators speak of breakdowns, bad weather, and other obstacles along the way. The book's shortcomings – a sometimes overly detailed narrative, and much complaining about their difficulties – actually work to strengthen the narrative by giving it a very genuine feel. The best recommendation for the book is the difficulty in condensing its strengths into a short review – there is enough to be discussed about it to merit a much longer article. McGregor and Boorman keep the reader interested, with their reflections on traveling through little-visited places like Mongolia and Kazakhstan, as well as their attention to detail and avoidance of cliches.

COURTESY AMAZON.COM

Ewan McGregor, co-author of "Long Way Round," looks to travel from London to New York City almost entirely by motorcycle.

Trend Report: Vintage done right

By Jacky White
Knight Ridder

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — You can tell by the way Christa Wilson's denim jeans are carefully rolled into trendy cuffs just above her gold high-heeled sandals. She is well tuned when it comes to fashion.

So when she began noticing that new clothes coming off designer runways looked, well, old, the 24-year-old Overland Park, Kan., woman turned to original sources. She started scouting vintage stores.

And when she found a fur stole at a Kansas City shop about a year ago, she was hooked with a new obsession.

Melody Le Fever, 37, of Lawrence, Kan., buys and sells antiques through her store, Nine Lives, in Parkville, Mo. Her personal closet includes labels such as Paris-based Chloe and Lilly Pulitzer of Palm Beach, Fla.

But one day about 10 years ago she came upon an authentic Diane von Furstenberg wrap dress, the style that became a uniform for women in the '70s. It was the beginning of a new creative perspective on dressing that has her now zealously searching for the old to blend with new. On a recent trip to Paris, she found a jacket with puffy sleeves and a high collar from an old Chloe collection. And she is always on the lookout for more Dianes.

"I want people to recognize me for my own style," she says of her eclectic mix. This day her look includes Ferragamo's silk print shirt from 1962 wrapped over a new patterned skirt with a new vest, old belt and Frye stub-toed leather boots, her favorite '70s icon. "I wear them with everything."

KNIGHT RIDDER

Let an old school piece shine with simple coordinates and accesories

KNIGHT RIDDER

Vintage flair gives unique style.

Wilson and Le Fever are part of a growing number of style-conscious consumers who have rediscovered an age-old source of apparel in vintage, antique and thrift stores.

Credit today's designers and manufacturers, who are caught in the moments of yesterday. From Prada, Marc Jacobs, Tracy Reese and Ralph Lauren to Banana Republic and Anthropologie, they are mining the archives from the '50s, '40s, '80s, '20s and '30s. The current rage for antique brooches, round-toed shoes, fur and faux fur shoulder wraps, mixed prints and full skirts are fueling the drive.

It's no secret, of course, that fashion designers search for ideas in places such as flea markets, vintage dealers and museum collections. Kansas City dealer Ken Coit, who owns Re-Runs vintage store, says representatives from two Ralph Lauren divisions were shopping his Kansas City warehouse last month.

Business insiders agree vintage sales have surged in the past year. Coit says business this year is up "maybe 25 percent, and the year is not over." Lingerie is popular. So is sparkle.

"People are hungry for beauty. A lot of bad things are going on in the world," he adds. "People seem to be going back to another time, a time of luxury."

Terry Richardson, who owns the Kansas City vintage boutique Revue, says it's one of the biggest years ever. She has had a run on cropped blazers and suit jackets from the '40s and '80s, big stars on designer runways and in magazines this season. "I think I have sold 47 blazers in three weeks. In the past I would have sold maybe 15."

DIFFERENT IS BETTER

The trend is evident across the country. At Screaming Mimi's in downtown New York City, owner Laura Wills says sales are up 25 percent to 40 percent in the last year. Her customers are buying pencil-slim skirts, bow blouses and cardigan sweaters.

Among other reasons, the majority of vintage offers a look for less money than conventional retail sources. Studies consistently show shoppers relish a bargain at any price and prize the mix of high and low couture.

They have come to value the hunt, which they see as a game or pastime. Wilson, a sales associate at Nordstrom's trendy Savvy department, says she usually hits two vintage shops at least once a week.

And perhaps most significant, people have developed a distaste for cookie-cutter fashion. They celebrate personal style and the post-modern trend to eclectic dressing. "You're not going to see someone who looks like you," says Constance White, the fashion director of eBay, the vast auction site.

"I like different," confides Chanel Cousins, a young, adventurous Kansas City area stylist with a platinum '60s flip hairdo. And if everybody is looking at her, she says, "I know I am looking different."

This day she is wearing pink fishnet hose, a close-fitting '50s print dress draped with a new pink stole embellished with vintage pins. She has on this year's pink round-toed shoes, and her hand flashes a large '50s-type cocktail ring.

She says she started scouring vintage stores about two years ago. "I'm in New York a lot. I'm looking at trends and what's hot. And vintage is hot right now."

Richardson says the current quest for the old was pumped up in the '90s by the television show "Seinfeld." More recently, HBO's "Sex and the City" showcased eclectic fashion so effectively it gave it a huge boost. Sarah Jessica Parker's personal mishmash style also has energized the movement.

Another factor is the popularity of vintage couture among celebrities at awards shows' red carpets. Who can forget the dazzle of Julia Roberts at the Academy Awards in a black and white vintage Valentino gown in 2001?

Few people can afford couture prices, but celebrity endorsement removed the stigma. "Vintage has moved away from old clothes," says Blair Schulman, who manages Second Honeymoon vintage clothing store in downtown Kansas City. "When people see someone like Kirsten Dunst in Zandra Rhodes vintage, it makes it more acceptable."

David Brockman, Second Honeymoon owner, does vintage shows in New York and Los Angeles. He says the category has been especially big on the coasts for five years but has moved across the country in the last year.

Cameron Silver is the owner of Decades, a Los Angeles-based upscale vintage designer store where evening gowns run from $850 to $25,000. "Every art form, including fashion, pays homage to the past," he says. "But more people are interested because everything today looks so ubiquitous. People are looking for something else."

IT'S ALL IN THE MIX

Clothes from a distant past have long had appeal. Students have traditionally relished the opportunity to set themselves apart on a meager budget. Costume historians consider them telling symbols of their time. Aficionados tout the quality of clothes made long ago.

What's newest about today's growth spurt is that old pieces, maybe a single jacket or handbag, are mixed judiciously with modern as a means of individual expression.

Mary Dilley, a department manager at Saks Fifth Avenue, is careful how she wears a vintage item. "I think you have to add it to something new," she says.

She considers such pieces accents. For example, she treasures a leopard print bolero jacket she found at a Parkville antique store paired with a black dress. She loves a necklace that belonged to her grandmother and a leopard-print flower she attaches in the middle of a pink suit.

She giggles as she remembers how she wore opera gloves to the recent gala at the Kemper Museum of Contemporary Art. It all brings a touch of "old world glamour," she says.

KNIGHT RIDDER

Vintage style takes a contemporary twist for style perfection.

dailycollegian.com
dailycollegian.com
dailycollegian.com
dailycollegian.com
dailycollegian.com
dailycollegian.com
dailycollegian.com
dailycollegian.com
dailycollegian.com
dailycollegian.com
YOU LOVE IT.

The Mercantile
Books Toys Great Clothing Cards Gloves Gifts
Stocking Stuffers Scarves
Action Figures Clothing Sale Tapestries Rings Bracelets Chains Earrings
Dec. Hours Mon-Sat. 10 am-9 pm-Sun 12-6
Amherst-11 E. Pleasant-Carriage Shops
Northampton-108 Main St.

fancy NAILS
Inside Hampshire Mall
413-584-0210
Walk-ins Welcome
FREE French Manicure w/ full set only
Holiday Special
$2 OFF
w/ fell set or fill
with coupon only

THE HARP
"Come party like you're Irish!"
NEW! Wireless Internet Do your home work...surf the net...WIRELESS INTERNET!!!!
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
Amherst's last great neighborhood pub!
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments
413-548-6900
Check out our new covered deck!
www.theharp.net
MON. - "Bad Karaoke"
TUES. - Our Famous Trivia Night
WED. - Reggae Night
TH. - Special Brew
FRI. - Traditional Irish Sesiun
SAT. - Live Music
Molsen Pints $2.00
Pitcher $6.50
VOTED BEST NEIGHBORHOOD PUB EAST OF THE RIVER

UMass Athletics
UMASS BASKETBALL Vs. CONNECTICUT HUSKIES
Thursday, December 9
9pm
The Mullins Center
LIVE on... ESPN
game sponsored by: MassMutual Financial Group
See the Minutemen take on defending National Champion UConn!
MASSACHUSETTS HOCKEY Vs. SACRED HEART UNIVERSITY PIONEERS
Saturday, December 11
7pm
The Mullins Center
"MULLET NIGHT" IS BACK!
FIRST 1,500 FANS IN THE GATES GET A FREE MULLET WIG!
business in the front MULLET NATION Party in the back
Student Tickets Free!

December 5, 2004

To: Public Forum Presenters

From: Commission on Campus Diversity

Re: Procedures for Public Forum Presenters

The Commission on Campus Diversity welcomes the opportunity to hear your testimony on December 9, 2004. We believe you will provide valuable information and serve as a good resource to the work of the Commission on behalf of the university. The public forum will be held on the Amherst campus at the Curry Hicks Gymnasium from 7:00 p.m. to 10:00 p.m. All presenters are strongly encouraged to arrive no later than 6:30 p.m. Late arrivers will only be seated in between presentations so as not to disrupt presentations to the Commission and audience. Melissa Vara and Lloyd Henley, located in the main lobby, will provide you with a nameplate and direct you to your designated seat. We have attached the times and names of all presenters for the Public Forum. The protocol for the evening follows:

All presenters will have a designated seating area. Presenters will be seated in sequence of presentation times. As names are called, presenters will be directed to the presentation platform, each presenter will place his/her nameplate on the table, facing the Commission members, introduce himself/herself, and immediately begin his/her opening statement. After the presentation, presenter will exit the platform from the left and return to his/her designated seat. Due to the overwhelming response from constituencies to speak, under no circumstances will a presenter be allowed to go beyond a total of five (5) minutes, which includes both the presentation and follow-up questions from Commission members. Specifically, presenters are advised to make a three (3) minute statement and allow two (2) minutes for questions from the Commission. If the Commission does not have questions, the presenter will have two (2) minutes for a closing statement.

Presenters can submit written documentation to the Commission after their presentations.

Presenters who miss their designated time slot are not guaranteed a time for this session of the public forum. The Commission will attempt to arrange a follow-up forum.

The public forum will be video recorded for Commission review.

Professor Frank Hugus, Director of the International Programs Office, will serve as the parliamentarian for the public forum.

The Commission advises all presenters to turn off their cell phones.

The Commission on Campus Diversity thanks you in advance for your assistance.

COMMISSION ON CAMPUS DIVERSITY
UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST
THURSDAY, DECEMBER 9, 2004
PUBLIC FORUM
CURRY HICKS GYMNASIUM
7:00 P.M. TO 10:00 P.M.

TIME	PRESENTER	AFFILIATION
7:00	WELCOME - CHAIR TAYLOR
7:05	ANGELA FLETE	ALANA CAUCUS
7:11	BARAK SERED	STUDENT
7:17	MAKIRI SEI	ALANA INTERNATIONAL COORDINATOR OF GEO
7:23	PAVEL PAYANO	ALANA CAUCUS
7:29	GLADYS FRANCO	ALANA CAUCUS
7:35	AUTUMN BANKS	NATIVE AMERICAN SUPPORT PROGRAM
7:41	KAREN FERNANDEZ	LATIN AMERICAN CULTURAL CENTER
7:47	HINLAN WONG	YURI KOCHIYANA CULTURAL CENTER
7:53	AZUM ALI	MUSLIM STUDENT ASSOCIATION
7:59	VALERIE LOUIS	HAITIAN AMERICAN STUDENT ASSOCIATION
8:05	ANGELA HO	ASIAN AMERICAN STUDENT ORGANIZATION
8:11	KAITLYN SOLIGAN	PRIDE ALLIANCE
8:17	ALEX AUSTIN	STUDENTS OF CARIBBEAN ANCESTRY
8:23	ELVIS MENDEZ	CASA DOMINICANA
8:29	ARLENE AVAKIAN	PROFESSOR AND DIRECTOR OF WOMEN STUDIES
8:35	INGRID HOLM, TAMAR SHADUR,	ENGLISH AS A SECOND LANGUAGE
8:41	JEFF NAPOLITANO	STUDENT GOVERNMENT ASSOCIATION
8:47	OJAE BEALE	EVERYWOMAN'S CENTER
8:53	EBONI RAFUS	WOMEN OF COLOR LEADERSHIP NETWORK
8:59	JANELLY RIVERA	AHORA
9:05	RACHEL WOODS	BOARD OF STUDENT BUSINESS
9:11	LYDIA PETOSKEY	STUDENT
9:17	EMMA TRIPP	STUDENT LEGAL STUDIES MAJOR
9:23	MARISHA LEIBLUM	STPE MAJOR
9:29	ANNALISE FONZA	GRADUATE STUDENT
9:35	ROSA DERAMUS	GRADUATE STUDENT
9:41	FRANCES CORGNATI	ACADEMIC PROGRAM MANAGER; DEPARTMENT OF ELECTRICAL & COMPUTER
9:47	ED CUTTING	GRADUATE STUDENT
9:53	CATHERINE ADAMS	GRADUATE STUDENT: STUDY FOR AFRICAN-AMERICAN LIFE AND HISTORY
10:00	ADJOURN

(F:/ADMIN/DIVERSITY/PRESENTERLISTDEC9-1-1.DOC)

Track team poised for season

By Dave Quinn
Collegian Staff

With all the things to worry about before the opening indoor track meet, the last thing a coach should have to worry about is transportation. Unfortunately for Massachusetts women's indoor track coach Julie LaFreniere, getting a bus to take her team to Saturdays' Boston Five Way Meet turned in to a major hurdle.

Since the pole vault, the opening event, started at 12:30, LaFreniere sent vaulters Sophie Brown and Kristen Bakanowski ahead of the team with men's coach Ken O'Brien while she scrambled to find a bus to bring the rest of the team to Boston.

However, two vaulters were without one very important piece of equipment, their poles, as O'Brien's Pontiac Aztec was filled to capacity. Thankfully, the poles, as well as the rest of the team, arrived at 12:25, just in time for the opening vault.

Despite the chaos leading up to the meet, the Minutewomen performed well splitting the unorthodox dual scored event. Massachusetts defeated both Providence and Maine, but was defeated by Boston University and New Hampshire. With any luck, future events will run a little more smoothly for the Minutewomen. Here's a preview of this year's squad.

Sprinters

Leading the sprinters will be junior Christina Huff. Huff was the Maroon and White's lone dual winner at the Boston Five Way taking both the 55-meter dash and the 200-meter dash with times of 7.38 seconds and 28.51 seconds, respectively. As a sophomore, she had two top 10 conference times, a 7.21 second performance in the 55-meter dash and a 25.58 second sprint in the 200-meter dash.

"She's got great range. She's very good from the 55 right through the 400," LaFreniere said of her star sprinter. "It's not unusual for her to run three events in a meet. She's always on the edge, she's never been an A-10 Champion but she always scores in those events. I know she wants to win the Atlantic 10's she just needs to stay focused."

Another key runner will be Elisabeth Budd. The sophomore was the Atlantic 10 champion in the 500-meter run last winter with a time of 1:16.12. Budd got off on the right foot this season winning her opening 500-meter run in Boston with a time of 1.16.73.

"Elizabeth Budd is going be strong in the 400-500. She's got great range as well from the 200-800. She's going to score points in dual meets. She qualified for ECAC's last year and hopefully she'll get back there this year," LaFreniere said.

Also looking to make an impact are freshmen, Britt Canfield and Kendra Leighton. Canfield is best known for her play on the soccer field. The super sub came off the bench for the Minutewomen and scored eight goals en route to a second team all Atlantic 10 selection.

"She's only practiced with us for two weeks. She was very unhappy with her time in the 200," LaFreniere explained. "You could see her sulking around that she was out of shape, but we'll get her down. She's capable of mid 25's in the 200."

Leighton should be the Minutewomen's best first year prospect. In her first collegiate meet she won the 400-meter dash with a time of 58.99 seconds.

"Kendra Leighton is going to do very well for us this year. Here strengths are in the 200-400.

She's quick and she loves track. She was second in the state in the 400 as a junior in high school. She has tremendous potential," LaFreniere said.

Distance Runners

Freshman Jen Curtain was the lone distance winner for the Maroon and White Saturday, triumphing in the 800-meter dash with a time of 2:26.82. Her win was aided by a small field, but still impressive since just returning to action after suffering a knee injury early on during the cross country season.

"She came here ready to run Cross Country but then she wrenched her knee, so she's only been running for the last few weeks. She has the ability to be a multi-eventer. Right now she's focusing on the base so she ran the 800 on Saturday. She has good form and she's strong both physically and mentally. She's impressive," LaFreniere said of her Freshman.

Curtin will not run in the next meet as a precaution. LaFreniere explained that this meet was used to gage where Curtin was physically.

The majority of the distance runners for this years indoor squad will be coming from LaFreniere's cross country program. Freshman cross country standout Amanda DeRosa will be placed in a number of events including the mile, 3000-meter run and even the 5,000-meter run to get a grasp on where she fits in to this year's squad.

The remainder of the distance squad will be comprised of veterans Amanda Dhalberg, Alexis Anzelone, and Trish Silva, all seniors. Silva was a top five runner for this year's cross country squad, will handle the 5,000-meter runs for Massachusetts. Anzelone, who has been plagued by injuries throughout her career, will run a combination of the 800-meter run and the 3000-meter run. Dahlberg will be running most of the longer events including the mile, 3000-meter run as well as the 5,000-meter run.

"The longer the better," LaFreniere said of Dahlberg. "She just loves to keep going. She's a super hard worker with a great attitude."

Field Events

The field athletes are lead by sensational thrower Jennifer Iasiello. The senior was the 2003 Atlantic 10 Conference champion in the weight throw. Iasiello threw well in the Five Way Meet, but finished second due to a tiebreaker.

"She's our only thrower, but she's also best in the conference. She really steps it up at the conference and New England meet. She's really top notch," boasted LaFrenier.

The vaulting duties will be handled by freshmen Kristen Baknowski and Sophie Browne. Baknowski won her first vaulting event with a leap of 11-feet-5 and 1/4 inches. She also has the ability to run the 200-meter dash, but most likely will stick to vaulting, as the vault event can last several hours.

Katelyn O'Toole will be the primary high jumper while Marissa Kay Callahan will be responsible for bringing home points in the triple jump. O'Toole did very well in the opening meet, winning first place with a jump of 5-foot-1.

Troyanah Evans is the featured long jumper for the 2004-05 season. Evans had a sub-par showing on Saturday, finishing eight with a bound of 16-feet, five and 1/4 inches. LaFreniere believes Evans will bounce back strong and end up in the 18 foot range. LaFreniere also claimed that Evans has the ability to be a solid sprinter in the 200 and 400-meter dashes.

Team Outlook

After thriving in 90s, the Minutewomen are facing the natural progression of things as the past few years have been less successful. LaFreniere believes that this year's squad is the beginning of the upswing and should finish in the middle of the pack, and high as fourth. The majority of the squad won't compete again for over a month until the Boston University Quad Meet on Jan. 18. They will return to action three days later on Jan. 21 for the URI Go Rhody Classic in North Kingston, R.I. As far as the most important meet, LaFreniere doesn't feel as if there is any one single meet that defines the season.

"Every single meet is important for us for the pure and simple reason that we don't have an indoor track," LaFreniere said. "I liked to use our meets to train our athletes so that when we do go to the conference meet or when we do go to the New England meet they have the endurance, stamina and speed to be successful."

Manning compared to legends

By Steve Wilstein
Associated Press

There are traces of Johnny Unitas, Dan Marino, Joe Montana and Steve Young in Peyton Manning, not to mention the DNA of dear old dad, Archie.

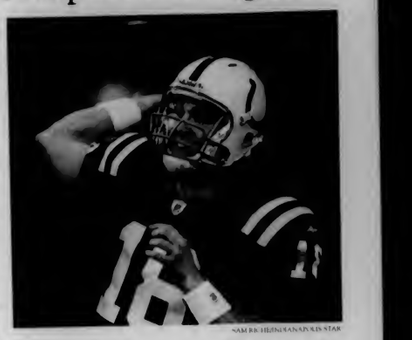
They're all there in his arm, his accuracy, his eyes, his brains.

He commands the field as they did, scanning targets, clicking them off side to side, throwing short or long. The way he passes, the way he's protected by his line, and the way Edgerrin James runs, this Manning need not often risk his limbs or skull scampering around.

Peyton Manning is in the lineage of those quarterback icons and he's snatching pieces of their records one by one, sometimes in one fell swoop.

On Sunday, when Indianapolis is at Houston, Manning needs five touchdown passes to break Marino's NFL single-season record of 48 in 1984. Playing in the Colts' 13th game with three to go, Manning is on pace for 58 TD passes this year. When the Colts hosted the Texans last month, Manning threw for five TDs.

If that is football's equivalent of the home run record, Manning could shatter Marino's mark by a greater percentage than Barry Bonds' 73 home runs or Mark McGwire's 70 eclipsed Roger Maris' 61.



At the same time, Manning is on course to take down Young's quarterback rating record, 112.4, with an astounding 126.3 mark so far.

Numbers like that, plus film of him picking apart secondaries, drive defenses crazy. They look for flaws and see few.

"He's as close to a football god as there is right now," Chicago Bears defensive end Adewale Ogunleye said recently. "The way they're playing on offense, it's like Madden 2005."

It's as new as the latest video game and as old as the vintage teams quarterbacked by the players Manning is surpassing. They commanded offensive juggernauts in their time, playing catch with their favorite receivers.

Manning is at another level. His line keeps him out of sack trouble. James, the NFL's second-leading rusher with 1,291 yards and eight TDs, keeps defenses honest. The air force is deep: Marvin Harrison (67 catches for 870 yards and 12 TDs); Reggie Wayne (56-875, 10 TDs); Brandon Stokley (55-882, nine TDs); Marcus Pollard (23-233, six TDs); and Dallas Clark (18-357, five TDs).

SAM RICHARDS/INDIANAPOLIS STAR

The Colts' Peyton Manning threw three touchdown passes against the Titans on Dec. 5. The Colts defeated the Titans 51-24.

Manning's toughest job is to divide the yards and TDs evenly, keep everyone alert and happy.

His three-TD, 425-yard effort this past Sunday in a victory over Tennessee didn't tire out Manning enough to keep him from trying to keep some other people happy on Monday. Without a lot of fanfare, he hosted 1,100 disadvantaged kids for a holidays celebration at the Children's Museum of Indianapolis, giving them hugs, shaking their hands and signing autographs.

This is the year of the surpassing passer in the NFL. Manning is the best by far, but others are enjoying some of the finest seasons in history.

Philadelphia's Donovan McNabb, having the best season of his six-year career, erased Montana's record for consecutive completions. He hit on his first 14 passes in the Eagles' 47-17 victory over Green Bay on Sunday, a week after completing his last 10 passes in a victory over Eli Manning and the New York Giants.

Against the Packers, McNabb passed for a career-high five touchdowns and a club-record 464 yards to bring his quarterback rating to 110.4, second-best in the league.

Pittsburgh rookie Ben Roethlisberger is flirting with perfection of a different sort, leading the Steelers on a 10-game winning streak.

Roethlisberger didn't get the respect and the money Eli Manning did in the NFL draft last spring, but he has a virtual lock on Rookie of the Year. He is fourth among the six quarterbacks with ratings over 100, and he is the only rookie among them.

In Joe Montana fashion on Sunday night in Jacksonville, Roethlisberger added more luster to his season by engineering a drive that set up a winning field goal with 18 seconds to play.

"Is a rookie quarterback supposed to win a game like that on the road in a hostile environment in prime time?" Steelers guard Alan Faneca asked before answering his own question.

"Probably not. That says a lot about him. He's special."

This is a special era for quarterbacks, as golden a group as any in the past. Brett Favre continues to amaze, though he struggled Sunday against Philadelphia when his streak of games with a TD pass was snapped at 36, second in NFL history.

Where are YOU living next semester?

CHECK OUT PUFFTON VILLAGE!

Excellent location...1/2 mile from UMass
Spacious Apartments--1,2 and 3 Bedroom Townhouses
All rents include heat, hot water and cooking gas
On site laundry, off street parking.
Basketball and Tennis courts.

NEW PUFFTON VILLAGE
1040 N. Pleasant St. #410
Amherst, MA 01002
413-549-0145
www.pufftonvillage.com

THE PRE-BUSINESS GROUP
invites you to apply for the
3rd BUSINESS LEADERSHIP SEMINAR

The Pre-Business Group is accepting applications for its 3rd Business Leadership Seminar to be held at Amherst College in January. The Business Leadership Seminar is an intense four day professional experience designed to teach students of all majors and class years about leadership and business while helping them to hone personal skills, establish contacts, and open the door to new and exciting opportunities. The program is highly selective, but all class years and majors are encouraged to apply.

Companies represented at past seminars include: Accenture • Bain & Company • Bank of America Securities • Bear Stearns • Boston Millenia Partners • Capital Guardian • Citigroup Credit Suisse First Boston • Deutsche Bank • Goldman Sachs & Co. • Lehman Advertising Interbrand • Lehman Brothers • McKinsey & Co. • Merrill Lynch • Monitor Company Morgan Stanley • New York Life Investment Management • Pricewaterhouse Coopers • Skadden Arps • Sponsors for Educational Opportunity • Stern Stewart • Starwood Hotels & Resorts • The National Basketball Association • Columbia Business School Yale School of Business • Harvard Business School • Yale School of Management MIT Sloan School of Management • Stanford Graduate School of Business

INTERTERM 2005: TUESDAY, JANUARY 18 – FRIDAY, JANUARY 21
APPLICATIONS ACCEPTED: NOVEMBER 10 - JANUARY 3
(ROLLING ACCEPTANCE)

For more information or to apply, please visit http://www.prebusinessgroup.org

SPRING BREAK!

DAYTONA BEACH FLORIDA
#1 Party Destination!
Spend less on your travel, more on your party!
Bus & Hotel $339 per person - quad occupancy
Room Only $199
Packages Include:
> 6 nights beach front accommodations!
> Optional round trip transportation!
> Full schedule of parties & night club specials!
> Optional Excursions to Disney World!
LIMITED SPACE!!!
$50 Deposit Due NOW!
Prices increase Dec 15th!
Organized & Operated by Student Travel Services, Inc.
For more info. or to book, visit:
STA TRAVEL
Room 224 Campus Center
or Call 9413-256-1261
Arrangements by Breakaway Tours 1-800-465-4257

SELLING MY BOOKS FOR CASH CHANGED MY LIFE.
BUT INDIVIDUAL RESULTS MAY VARY.
Get cash for your books.

Textbook Annex		Campus Center Concourse		Hampden Lobby-Southwest
12/6-12/10	9am-4pm
12/13-12/15	9am-4pm	12/13-12/17	9am-5pm	12/16-12/17	10am-5pm
12/16-12/17	9am-5pm	12/18	11am-4pm	12/18	11am-4pm
12/18	11am-4pm	12/20-12/22	9am-5pm	12/20-12/22	10am-5pm
12/20-12/22	9am-5pm

WIN BETTER GIFTS Sweepstakes YOU COULD WIN $5000 in our online drawing or instantly win cool prizes or in-store discounts.
See store for details.

UMass AMHERST University of Massachusetts UNIVERSITY STORE
Campus Center • Phone: (413) 545 2619
www.umass.bkstr.com
UNIVERSITY STORE'S Textbook Annex UMASS AMHERST

IOC investigates Jones

By Stephen Wilson
Associated Press

LONDON — The IOC opened an investigation Tuesday into doping allegations against Marion Jones, who could eventually be stripped of her five medals from the 2000 Olympics.

International Olympic Committee president Jacques Rogge set up a disciplinary commission to look into the claims made by Victor Conte, head of the California-based lab accused of illegally distributing steroids.

Conte told ABC's "20/20" in a broadcast aired Friday that he gave Jones performance-enhancing drugs before and after the Sydney Olympics. He said he watched Jones inject herself with human growth hormone.

"The allegations made by Mr. Conte are extremely serious and the IOC is fully committed to bringing to light any elements that will help the truth prevail," the IOC said in a statement.

Jones won three gold medals (100 meters, 200 and 1,600 relay) and two bronze (long jump and 400 relay) in Sydney. She repeatedly has denied ever using banned drugs, and has threatened to sue Conte for defamation.

Attorney Rich Nichols reiterated that Jones has consistently denied use of performance-enhancing drugs, passed a lie detector test and has maintained the same physical appearance.

"Victor Conte is someone who is under federal indictment, facing serious prison time and has a record of issuing a host of contradictory, inconsistent statements," Nichols said in a statement.

"Victor Conte's allegations are not true and the truth will be revealed for the world to see as the legal process moves forward."

The U.S. Olympic Committee did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

World Anti-Doping Agency chief Dick Pound, a senior IOC member, has said Jones should be stripped of her medals if Conte is telling the truth. Any decision on the medals would be made by the IOC executive board.

Rogge advocates a "zero tolerance" policy on doping.

"I hope the truth will emerge," he said last week. "We want the truth. We want to know what happened and the more we know, the better."

Under the IOC charter, Olympic decisions can be challenged within three years of the games' closing ceremony. The Sydney Olympics ended more than four years ago, on Oct. 1, 2000.

But Thomas Bach, the German lawyer and IOC member who heads the three-member investigative panel, said the three-year rule shouldn't apply in this case.

"I don't think it plays a role," he told The Associated Press in a telephone interview.

Pound said there was no actual decision taken in Sydney and the allegations are only coming out now.

Jones, who did not win any medals at the Athens Olympics, has been under investigation for months by the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency, but has not been charged. USADA has said it will take Conte's allegations into account.

Conte, head of the BALCO lab, said he worked with Jones from August 2000 to September 2001. He said he designed a doping regimen for her that included the previously undetectable steroid THG, the endurance-enhancing hormone EPO, human growth hormone and insulin.

Bach said his first move will be to request a transcript of the ABC program.

"First of all we have to check carefully whether the allegations concern the time of the Olympics, and then we have to determine who is concerned," he said.

Bach said the investigation could cover athletes other than Jones mentioned in the program. The panel will ask for athletes' statements and could have them to appear at a hearing, although "we are not in a position to force anybody to appear," he said.

Bach said he doesn't expect to finish the probe before the next IOC board meeting, which takes place Feb. 10-11 in Turin, Italy.

Under Rogge, who succeeded Juan Antonio Samaranch in 2001, the IOC has taken a much tougher stance on doping. The IOC sanctioned a record 24 athletes for duping offenses during the Athens Olympics in August.

The IOC has also been investigating the 1999 doping case involving American sprinter Jerome Young. He tested positive for a steroid in 1999 but was cleared by a U.S. appeals panel and won a gold medal in Sydney as part of the 1,600 relay team.

The IOC could strip the entire team — including five-time Olympic champion Michael Johnson — of the gold medals. The IOC is waiting for the Court of Arbitration for Sport to rule on an appeal by the U.S. Olympic Committee.

Former Celtic player arrested

PORTSMOUTH, R.I. (AP) — A former Boston Celtics player was arrested on drug charges after passing out in his car and hitting a doughnut shop, according to police.

Police were called to a Dunkin' Donuts on Friday morning after Chris Herren, 29, of Portsmouth, crashed his car into a wall near the drive-through, Sgt. Harry Leonard told The Providence Journal.

Officers found Herren unconscious in the car and had to smash a window to give him medical treatment. He was taken to the hospital, where he was treated and released.

Herren, a former star basketball player from Fall River, Mass., refused a blood test at the hospital and was arraigned at Portsmouth Police Station after officers found empty packets that contained heroin residue in his car, Leonard said.

— Associated Press

Bonds is another scar on the game

NOWE on page 12

Gregory Urquiaga/Daily Contra Costa Times

San Francisco Giants' Barry Bonds hits his 690th homerun in San Francisco on Tuesday, Aug. 17.

ation? Will the fans still trust their idols?

Fortunately for Selig, such questions were asked before.

Questions were asked to Kenesaw Mountain Landis, who was hired as baseball's first commissioner in 1920 to solve the Chicago "Black Sox" scandal. The owners gave him complete control of the game solely so he would secure the game's integrity during a time when bookies were trying to take it over.

A U.S. district court judge and a man who was named after the mountain his father fought a battle on during the Civil War Landis was an extremely stern, traditionalistic person.

Landis made an example out of these players by expelling them from his league directly before the peak of the game's popularity in the years immediately following Major League Baseball's first legitimate scandal.

As the seasons progressed and the game further innovated itself, the stories grew, the tradition was padded, and a national pastime had officially hit its stride.

Then, along came Pete Rose. He could arguably be the most successful hitter of anyone who has stepped on a field, but just like the eight members of the White Sox in 1919, he put himself before the game by compromising the sanctity of its tradition.

Not only did he bet on his own games but he has lied, shown a lack of remorse and completely spit in the game's face by marketing his book in casinos.

I applaud Selig for keeping Rose out of baseball, and I will give him a standing ovation if he throws Bonds and the rest of the BALCO all stars out of the game for good. When they walk out of Selig's office, I hope he hands them their stats and Hall of Fame items in a duffle bag.

If Landis didn't do it to the Black Sox, you wouldn't remember the first time you stepped on a field because the game wouldn't be around right now. If Landis didn't outlaw eight of baseball's biggest criminals, the Boston Red Sox would have been the best team in a league that no one right now would know about.

Fenway wouldn't be a ballpark, but a parking lot. Michael Jordan wouldn't have retired to play minor league baseball in Birmingham. No one would question why Deion Sanders couldn't have just stuck to one sport. The name Babe Ruth would mean nothing to you.

Bonds was ultimately after better stats which would bring him more money, money that he makes now because of people like Curt Flood and "Catfish" Hunter who fought for better player contracts just 30 years ago.

When someone like Barry Bonds wants to ruin something that beautiful, something that Bud Selig stands for, what else can the commissioner do besides ban him from the game?

My memories of baseball are so personally significant because of my passion for the game, the same passion that fans shared a century ago.

And I fear that kids in the future won't be able to say the same.

Jeff Howe is a Collegian columnist.

Swim team will rely on teamwork

SWIMMING on page 12

here and are all driving to do well as a team."

Since their 2001 Atlantic 10 championship, the Minutewomen look to continue their success that they have experienced so far. If this year is the year they can capture the championship again, many on the team agreed it would be because of their teamwork.

"This team has attitude as far as training goes," coach Newcomb said. "One attribute is that they are very team oriented and that is very important if you want to succeed in this sport especially."

Amongst the top performers are Nicole LeBarge, Kelly Hoffrage and freshman standout Samantha Dempty, the team leader in the fly event. However, despite all the success, Newcomb stresses that there is always room for improvement.

"It's the little things we have to work on like turning," Newcomb said. "But despite that, we have had some really outstanding performances so far."

With their hectic schedule coming up, the team is working together to make things happen and swim to their highest potential.

"Although it is going to be tough during these upcoming weeks, the motivation of the team really keeps me going," Bourassa said. "Everyone backs you up. There is always 24 other girls cheering you on and it really makes things exciting."

In the previous four years, the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team has won four Atlantic 10 championships. With that past behind them, and a perfect record thus far, the men are preparing for the rest of this year's swim season.

"This is a real good group. Everyone comes in here with a smile and keeps a positive attitude," coach Russ Yarworth said. "The next three weeks [it] is important to keep focus with the stress of finals and the holiday break."

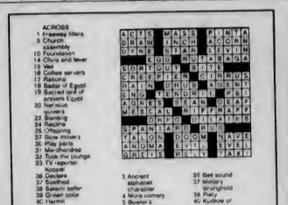
There is pressure that entails being the best team in the Atlantic 10 over the past five years, and the team knows which teams look to end that streak. Schools like St. Bonceventure and La Salle are having decent seasons and will be a challenge in the upcoming month.

"The motto for this season has been drive for five, because coach has stressed that the goal is to get that fifth championship," senior captain Owen Scollan said. "We have some energetic freshman and are making sure that everyone keeps their mind set on our goal."

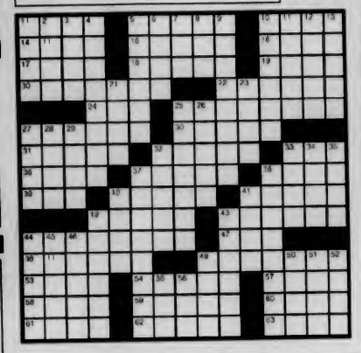
While these out of conference meets are important, the men are all in agreement that it is the Atlantic 10 championship that is their target. They also agreed that they have to remain focused.

"The A-10's are definitely our driving force during this busy next month," sophomore Greg Chartier said.

ALL UP!
creative FOOD & BEVERAGE
GRAND OPENING
ALL YOU CAN EAT BUFFET
With Countless combinations of vegetables, poultry, fish, and meat. Choose from 12 specially created sauces!!!
OPEN 7 DAYS A WEEK FOR LUNCH AND DINNER
Sunday Breakfast
Design your own omelets, pancakes, and french toast 10-4pm
A Fantastic Full Bar Menu
Create Your Own Meal
11:30am - 9 pm
48 Russell Street, Route 9, Hadley
413-584-5155
WWW.ALLFIREDUPHADLEY.COM



EXECUTIVE VALET PARKING
Serving Bradley Airport
Airport Parking College Special!
$25.00*-Up to 7 Days Parking. Valid 11/23-11/30
$50.00*-Up to 5 Weeks Parking. Valid 12/15-02/01/05
Valid College ID Req., Present this coupon or Visit us at:
www.CollegeAirportParking.com
800-218-1297
*Plus 4% Access Fee. Cannot be Combined with Other offers



You'll find smaller classes, the same great teachers, credits that can add to your GPA, with flexible class options so that you can take care of the rest of your life, too.
Your Spring Your Way
Spring Semester 2005
Register Now!
413-545-2414
UMassAmherst Continuing Education
You Choose. Your Future. Your Way.

ISRAEL IS THE CANARY IN THE MINE
The war between Arabs and Jews is not the cause of the war on terror, as apologists for Muslim radicals claim; it is the war on terror.
Twenty-five years ago, there were two non-Islamic democracies in the Middle East: Israel and Lebanon. This was too much for Islamic radicals, Syrian irredentists and Palestinians who joined forces to destroy Lebanon and make it a base for terror.
The goal of the post-Oslo Intifada is not to establish a Palestinian state alongside a Jewish state. Its goal is an Islamic umma extending "from the Jordan to the sea." That is why Oslo was rejected by Arafat even though Barak and Clinton offered him an independent state on virtually all of the land Palestinians claimed in the West Bank of the Jordan and Gaza. That is why the very birth of Israel is referred to by all the present Palestinian leadership as the "Naqba" – the "catastrophe." To Islamic radicals at war with the West, the very creation of Israel is a catastrophe.
American apologists for Arab aggression are also apologists for Islamic aggression. In their eyes, Arab terror in the Middle East has a root cause in the policies of Israel, whom terrorists refer to as the "little Satan." For apologists of the Islamic terror of 9/11 and the Zarqawi terror in Iraq, jihad is not a self-generating creed but has a "root cause" in the policies of "the Great Satan," which is us.
Peace in the Middle East and peace in the war with al-Qaeda and Zarqawi will come only when the terrorists surrender or are defeated, and when Arab governments cease their incitement of hatred against Israel and the United States.
~ David Horowitz

"The interests of Muslims and the interests of the Socialists coincide in the war against the Crusaders." Osama Bin Laden, February 98
30% off if ordered from Frontpagemag.com
WWW.FRONTPAGEMAG.COM

The Moan and Dove
Study Break.
themoananddove.com
460 West St. • Rte. 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
Now accepting applications for:
Assistant Business Manager
For the Spring 2005
Please call 545-3500 or stop by. Applications are due Today @ 4P.M.

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Be prepared to suffer for the next few weeks.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You need to get a good night's sleep. You're starting to act a little crazy.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Try to be tactful when you're trying to get what you want done.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Today you're going to find the perfect gift for your mom. Don't pass it up.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Sometimes the most shocking things come out of your mouth.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Don't lose track of time while you're in your little bubble.

leo • Jul., 23-Aug. 22
When your friends ask you to go to the bars, you go.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Only two more weeks until you can take a luxurious bubble bath.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Today you're going to see a celebrity look-alike on campus. It's amazing.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Crafts are fun; just don't make a mess of your room.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Your sickness is going to take a turn for the better.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Who knows what would happen if you held a black-light to that futon.

Do you know THE SCORE?
The Massachusetts Daily Collegian's annual sports magazine.
Available at selected newsstands and at the Mullins Center.

Quote of the Day

"The least deviation from the truth is multiplied later a thousandfold."

-Aristotle

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Your exams are very important. Your ultimate destiny is the most important. "Final Frontier" coming to your campus soon. www.finalfrontier.tv Check out www.allahsoriged.com

APARTMENT FOR RENT

1 bedroom condo, kitchen, sitting room call Roohina at 549-6091

One bedroom apartment for rent. Puffton Village. Starting in January 765/month. Heat and hot water included. Call 978-502-9036

2 Bedroom 2 Bathroom Lease from Jan-Aug $1,100/Month. Utilities included Contact Jenna @ 917-753-3591

Need an Apt. for 2nd Semester? Short Term Leases, Free Heat, Huge Bedrooms Call The Boulders 256-8534

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. 1 Bedroom units Available Jan 1, 2005 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com Stop by or call 549-0600

AUTO FOR SALE

2001 Nissan Xterra Four wheel drive, excellent condition automatic transmission, Loaded, for photos and more information go to http://hometown.aol.com/mathes4/gr/index.html or call 413-536-8077

1986 Mercury Wagon excellent condition all options 103K $1500 413-773-3346

2000 VW Beetle Turbo Leather all options 73K $6200 413-773-3346

COMPUTERS

Pentium Laptop $99. Pentium III Desktop $99. 413-584-8857

EMPLOYMENT

MAD SCIENTISTS WANTED! PT to conduct fun science after-school programs, parties, etc. Requirements: Experience with groups of children, enthusiasm, car. Performance experience a plus. 1-800-338-5711

"Bartending" $300/Day Potential. No Experience Nesc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Student Brand Manager Motivated? Outgoing? Enthusiastic? Want to build your resume? CampusFundraiser is currently hiring a Student Brand Manager to promote our company on your campus. Start in January. Manage promotions on campus, work 10 hours a week, $100/week salary plus bonuses. Learn more at http://www.campusfundraiser.com/SPM.asp

Student to Assist Local Homeowner, Yardwork + moving furniture $10.00/hr Call Fred 413-734-0526

EMPLOYMENT

Returning to the Greater Boston area this Winter break? Want a fun, flexible job working with kids in their homes? Look no further…call Parents in a Pinch, Inc. TODAY if you have childcare experience/references, at least 1 full weekday free and want to earn $11/hr. Car helpful. 617-739-KIDS Fill out application at: www.parentsinapinch.com

Winter Break Employment at the Boston University Bookstore. Many temp jobs available! Kenmore Square location. Applications accepted Dec 7 & 8 at the UMass Campus Center Concourse or email your resume to bnhmnres@bu.edu

MAKE MORE $$$ NOW than when you graduate. Learn to earn $3-5K/wk Training provided. 24/hr msg: 1-800-294-8654 x1225

ENTERTAINMENT

DJ for Hire Mission 101 Ent. Contact Freely at 413-687-3849

ROOM FOR RENT

Room for rent in five bedroom apartment preferably girl $402.50/month Less than half a mile from campus and town Call Elana 253-0694

For male Grad Student/Professional. Large, quiet, comfortable. 15 min. walk to UMass on Pulsine Avail Jan 549-1578

ROOMMATE WANTED

325/month inclusive call 413-775-9997

SERVICES

PREGNANCY TESTING. HIV TESTING. Birth control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992

SERVICES

Legal Questions? The Student Legal Services Office Offers Free Legal Assistance to Fee-Paying students. Contact us at 545-1995, 922 Campus Center.

Need Just Evacuation and Repatriation Coverage. Check out BETA! $250,000 Evacuation, $25,000 Repatriation COST is $18 for 6 MONTHS! Online enrollment, emailed verification of coverage www.betins.com

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house Certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

TRAVEL

Spring Break Bahamas Celebrity Party Cruise! 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Parties! Cancun, Acapulco,

TRAVEL

Nassau, Jamaica, From $459! Panama City & Daytona $159! www.SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

!SPRING BREAK

Largest selection of Destinations, including Cruises! VIP Club Parties & FREE trips. Epicurean Tours 1-800-231-4-FUN www.BREAKIN.com

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, Florida. Campus Reps Wanted! Free Meals & Parties! 1-800-234-7007 endlesssummertours.com

Spring Break 2005- Travel with STS, America's #1 Student Tour Operator to Jamaica, Cancun, Acapulco, Bahamas and Florida. Now hiring on-campus reps. Call for group discounts. Information/Reservations 1-800-648-4849 or www.ststravel.com

TRAVEL

StudentCity.com The Ultimate Spring Break Experience. 1-888-SpringBreak or www.StudentCity.com to reserve today.

SPRING BREAK '05
SAVE $100 PER ROOM
Clip & Send or Use Code: PRINT. Online
www.sunsplashtours.com
1-800-426-7710

WANTED

Snowboard events intern $50/day, stipend. For job description email jmends@liveexhl.edu

Egg Donors Needed. Help make a couple's dream of becoming parents come true by becoming an egg donor. Very generous compensation and expenses paid. Ages 21-32. Non-smokers only. For more information please visit our website at www.reproductivechoices.com or contact Christine or Liz at 781-769-6900

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 8, 2004 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The tainting of America's pastime

The emergence of steroid abuse is hurting the game

Jeff Howe

Baseball is one of the few things in life that can unite a group of friends or millions of people. It is one of the pure things in life that just about everyone can relate to because of its illustrious history, magical present and assured future.

I grew up just north of Boston — a Red Sox fan — and baseball was one of the first things that bonded my father and I.

I remember playing catch in my backyard after getting my first baseball glove; the expression on his face when he gave me my first Red Sox hat, and being fraternized in 2003 as one of the many Sox fans who have suffered through the team's notoriously agonizing history.

Baseball is a game that stands for so many things to so many people. It united a nation after 9/11. It inspires young kids and brings back old memories when the Little League World Series is put on the world's stage each year.

And just like myself, everyone has their own unique stories that involve the game in some fashion or another.

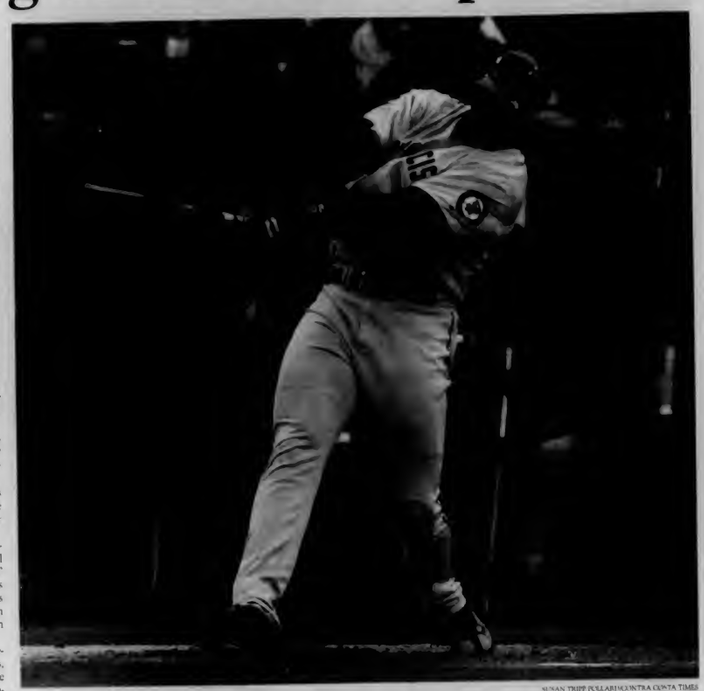
It's the mostly clean history and tradition of the game that make it a cultural phenomenon.

But I say, "mostly clean history" for a reason, because a few have tried to destroy this game's legacy. And though it is still a sport, baseball is mostly a game, and it was certainly nothing more than a game to those who combined cricket and rounders so they could pass the time better with their buddies at local taverns in the mid-19th century.

It was nothing more than a game to the soldiers who set up fields during their breaks from action as soldiers in the Civil War, as it is nothing more than a game to the same soldiers who are doing the same thing in Iraq to this day.

And it was unquestionably nothing more than a game to the young kids who played games of stickball in inner-city alleys so they could emulate their favorite Brooklyn Dodgers and Boston Braves nearly a century ago.

The proof of everyone's prideful love of baseball became official during the first decade of the 20th century when the courts launched an investigation to determine if the game was invented in America or if the English deserved credit because it was so similar to rounders.



Americans actually lined the streets to chant, "No rounders!" because they wanted so badly for baseball to be their game.

But will baseball still have its assured future, its Little League games, its curses, its memorabilia or even its history?

That depends on how this excruciatingly painful steroids scandal pans out. It depends on Barry Bonds' records and their place in the game's almanacs. It depends on the game's outlaws — Gary Sheffield and Jason Giambi — and how they approach their returns in the spring.

Most importantly, if any of baseball's biggest stars like Albert Pujols, Sammy Sosa or Carlos Beltran are found to be juicing, how will commissioner Bud Selig handle the situ-

See HOWE on page 10

SUSAN TRIPP PULLAR/CONTRA COSTA TIMES

Barry Bonds is currently the third baseball player to ever hit 700 home runs, behind only Babe Ruth and Hank Aaron. Bonds has come under scrutiny in regards to his involvement with steriods; also involved are Jason Giambi and Gary Sheffield, both play for the Yankees.

Dayton's coach returns to the bench

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

After taking a medical leave of absence on Oct. 28, University of Dayton women's basketball head coach Jim Jabir returned to the sidelines to resume head coaching duties against Wright State.

Jabir, 42, officially announced his temporary leave of absence on Nov. 3 after being diagnosed with cardiac arrhythmia, a condition that affects a person's heart rate. He was fitted with an artificial defibrillator to minister to his condition, and was hospitalized until Nov. 19 — the same night the Flyers opened their season with a 66-56 win over Akron.

Jabir returned to the practice Thursday mostly to observe assistant coach Greg Williams run the practice. He watched last Saturday's 72-45 loss to No. 10 Ohio State from the President's Suite at the University of Dayton Arena.

But last night, Jabir was able to pace the sidelines for the first time since the 2003-2004 season came to an end.

"I'm just really glad to be back," Jabir said on Dayton's Web site. "I love the people here at UD, and missed them while I was away. I realize how lucky I am to still be around and to be a part of where this program is going."

After going 3-25 last season, the Flyers are 3-3 so far in 04-05, having lost their last two.

GWU in Top 25 for first time since 1998

On Dec. 1, Anna Montanana tallied a season-high 19 points and Jessica Simmonds notched a double-double with 19 points and a career high-tying 13 rebounds as the George Washington Colonials upset the No. 24 Villanova Wildcats with a convincing 62-52 defeat at the Smith Center.

Following the win, the Colonials are now ranked No. 21 in the latest polls. They are the first Atlantic 10 team in '04-'05 to break into the Top 25. GWU also became the first A-10 team to defeat a ranked opponent this season, and has put itself in serious contention among the top of the conference following the win.

It was the Colonials' first win against a ranked opponent since December 18, 2003, when Cathy Joens' 19 points and eight rebounds helped them slam then-No. 21 Oregon 72-52. They weren't so fortunate this year, however, as the Ducks slammed them right back with a 64-40 thumping last Saturday.

Temple, coached by famed WNBA great Dawn Staley, came close to upending No. 1 Tennessee back on Nov. 28, falling 52-48 in the waning minutes of the contest. They are still looking for their first upset of a ranked opponent since beating then-No. 20 Rutgers in the 1989 A-10 Semifinals.

All-America Watch

Montanana has made a serious statement for All-America and A-10 Player of the Year consideration following last week's performance.

The Valencia, Spain native garnered A-10 Player of the Week honors this week following back-to-back 19-point performances against Villanova and Oregon.

Over the last week, the senior forward has averaged 19 points, 6.5 rebounds, three steals and 2.5 assists in two games, while going 10 for 11 from the foul line. After her six-rebound performance against Oregon, she moved into No. 11 all-time on the career rebounds list, with 557.

Montanana took things a step further, however, and put up career numbers Monday night against Brigham Young. She notched a career-high 25 points, including nine of 16 from the floor, but committed a team-high nine turnovers to aide BYU's 76-70 victory.

Richmond is 5-0 for the first time since the 1970-71 season, and senior Kate Flavin is a big reason why. Last Sunday, the forward dropped a game-high 27 points and ten boards to pick up her second consecutive double-double as the Spiders downed VCU 76-67.

Tough road ahead for swimmers

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

While many students prepare for finals and the upcoming winter break, the Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving teams have a lot more to think about. On top of the tests and papers, it has practice everyday, a training session in Puerto Rico starting Jan. 8, the Rhode Island Invitational after that and then two challenging meets the next two weeks after.

Saying they will be busy would be an understatement.

"We have a very tough schedule coming up over the next month," UMass women's coach Bob Newcomb said. "Going from Puerto Rico straight to Rhode Island will be tough on them."

So far this season, UMass has won three meets and lost only one, along with placing second and third in its two invitational. With a recent poll ranking the Minutewomen No. 11 nationally, they hope to carry that success over the rest of the season.

"This team is very diverse as far as events go," freestyle swimmer Aimee Bourassa said. "That way everybody gets a taste of each event."

Senior leadership has been key to the women's success thus far, with captains Colleen Wasson, Jay Yankowski and Lynette Sweeney piloting the team.

"We all work hard and there is a lot of team chemistry that really motivates us," Sweeney said. "We have a great group of freshman

See SWIMMING on page 10

Sox offer arbitration to Pedro

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON — The Red Sox are offering arbitration to pitcher Pedro Martinez and seven other free agents, General Manager Theo Epstein said Tuesday, meaning the club would receive draft choices if they sign with another team.

The World Series champions decided not to offer arbitration to their other six free agents who can sign with any team, including the Red Sox. Boston would get no compensation if they sign elsewhere.

Besides Martinez, the team will offer arbitration to catcher Jason Varitek, shortstop Orlando Cabrera, pitchers Derek Lowe, Pedro Astacio and Mike Myers, infielder Pokey Reese and first baseman David McCarty. Players have until Dec. 19 to accept or reject arbitration and can negotiate with any team until that deadline.

If a player accepts, he is considered signed by Boston for 2005 for a salary to be determined by an arbitrator after the player and team exchange salary proposals. They sometimes reach an agreement before the arbitration hearing in February.

If a player rejects the offer of arbitration, he can negotiate with any team. If he doesn't re-sign with the Red Sox by Jan. 8, he can't sign with them until May 1.

The six free agents not offered arbitration are right-handers Terry Adams, Curtis Leskanic, Ramiro Mendoza and Scott Williamson, infielders Ricky Gutierrez and designated hitter Ellis Burks, who has said he'll retire.

By knowing which players are offered arbitration, general managers at baseball's winter meetings, which run from Friday through Monday in Anaheim, can determine whether it's worth losing a draft choice to sign a free agent. Compensation for any of Boston's top four free agents — Martinez, Varitek, Lowe and Cabrera — would be a draft choice after the first round and before the second

The Red Sox should get a better idea of where they stand with Martinez when principal owner John Henry and chief executive Larry Lucchino visit him Wednesday in the Dominican Republic.

They said they will meet with Martinez during their trip to his home country to attend the one-year anniversary of the opening of the Red Sox baseball academy outside Santo Domingo.

"Certainly we hope to see and meet with Pedro," Henry wrote in an e-mail to The Associated Press on Monday night.

Lucchino stressed in an e-mail that the meeting was intended to be social.

"During our visit, we will meet with both Pedro and (designated hitter) David Ortiz. They are not intended to be business meetings," he said.

J. MERRIM/ILLNEWSDAY

Pedro Martinez of the Boston Red Sox has been looking at offers from the New York Mets.

Brady named 'Sportsman of the Year'

FOXBORO (AP)— Patriots quarterback Tom Brady was named Sportsman of the Year by Sporting News on Tuesday, nine days after the Boston Red Sox received the same honor from Sports Illustrated.

Brady began the outstanding year for Boston teams by winning his second Super Bowl MVP and leading New England to its second NFL championship in three years last February. This season he's played a major role in the team's 11-1 record.

"Brady has come from 199th draft choice to be the face of the NFL," Sporting News editorial director John Rawlings said.

"You'll find quarterbacks with gaudier statistics and some with more hype, but Tom Brady is about winning and that's why they play the game."

Brady was the 199th player selected in the 2000 draft. But he took over for the injured Drew Bledsoe in 2001, leading the Patriots to a 20-17 Super Bowl win over the St. Louis Rams.

Last season, the Patriots went 15-1 en route to another Super Bowl title.

Brady is 45-13 as a starting quarterback At 11-1 this season, New England is tied with Pittsburgh and Philadelphia for the best record in the NFL.

The award is determined by editors of the St. Louis-based Sporting News. His selection will be the cover story of the issue that hits newsstands Wednesday.

Last year, the honor was shared by Kansas City Chiefs coach Dick Vermeil and Florida Marlins manager Jack McKeon.

—Associated Press

Big East Conference

Notebook

A guide to holiday entertainment
ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 6

TODAY • High: 46 • Low: 31 | FRIDAY • High: 43 • Low: 40 | SATURDAY • High: 51 • Low: 30

DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

UMass to host National Champion UConn
SPORTS, PAGE 12

The Daily Collegian

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 9, 2004 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXIV ISSUE 64

White Ribbon Campaign works to prevent violence against women

By Erin Lemkey
Collegian Correspondent

In the days leading up to Canada's National Day of Remembrance and Action on Violence against Women on December 6, the "Voices Against Violence" program and a group of volunteers put together the White Ribbon Campaign, which condems violence by men against women.

During several days of tabling in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center and in various Dining Commons on campus, the White Ribbon Campaign volenteers asked men to sign a petition stating their commitment to ending violence against women. These names ran as an ad in The Daily Collegian this week.

According to the group, the white ribbons are for men to wear signifying their stand against violence, particularly acts committed by men against women. This is the first year that this campaign has taken place at UMass. It is modeled after campaigns in Canada that mark the anniversary of a horrific massacre of 14 women that took place in 1989 in Montreal.

The Montreal massacre was committed by an armed man at the Ecole Polytechnique, who opened fire after declaring his hatred for women and feminism. As a result of this catastrophic event, the White Ribbon Campaign has been going on since 1991. The campaign has also spread to the United States, where one out of every three women will be the victim of some kind of sexual assault or battery during the course of her lifetime, according to White Ribbon Campaign members.

Tom Schiff is one of the leaders of the UMass White Ribbon Campaign as well as the director of "Voices Against Violence" and health educator at the University Health Center.

"Most acts of violence are committed by men, though most men do not commit acts of violence," he said. "The effort behind the white ribbon campaign is for men to become accountable for the frequent acts of violence committed against women by men. The ribbons are designed to spark conversation and dialogue about men's responsibility to acknowledge a culture of violence against women that exists in our society," said Schiff. "Many men don't say anything when they hear jokes about rape because they think they're the only one who feels that it's wrong."

The White Ribbon Campaign at UMass started through the collaboration of Tom Schiff and Senior Finance and Psychology major Jim Darling, who has been committed to educating himself and others about violence against women since high school. Darling is an Educator Advocate with the Everywoman's Center, located between Franklin Dining Commons and the Morrill Science Center.

The Educator Advocate Program, according to the EWC website, is a component of the Rape Crisis Center of Hampshire County, providing various types of workshops for the local schools and the University. As an educator, Darling leads workshops talking to men and women about the prevalence and culture of violence against women that persists in our society. This subject became important to Darling in high school as conversations with female friends made it apparent to him that much of the violence against women was not taken seriously by men, leaving women with much lingering psychologi-

See RIBBON on page 2

COURTESY JEFF NASH/UMASS

SGA President Eduardo Bustamante and Trustee Matt Murphy pose with volunteers involved in the White Ribbon Campaign against violence towards women.

Westfield man arrested for Amherst murder

Victim identified as UMass student

By Matt Elder
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — A Westfield man was arrested and arraigned yesterday on a single count of murder in the death of David C Sullivan, a 22-year-old University of Massachusetts student.

According to a release from the office of Northwestern District Attorney, Elizabeth Scheibel, Bryan Johnston, 23, of 342 Southwick Road, was arraigned before Judge Robert F. Kumor, Jr. at Noble Hospital, in Westfield. Johnson had been a patient in the facility since early Tuesday morning. No details regarding Johnston's medical condition were made public yesterday.

Sullivan's body was found inside the bedroom of his 105 Meadow Street home early Tuesday morning at approximately 12:31 a.m. Sullivan was a Building Materials and Wood Technology major at the school, expected to graduate in the Spring of 2005.

According to the Northwestern District Attorney's office, Sullivan had visible injuries that appeared to be gunshot wounds that investigators believe came from a rifle caliber firearm.

Johnston was ordered to be held at the Hampshire County House of Corrections until today's court appearance, at which time he will be given an examination to test his competency to stand trial.

Despite the recent shooting, UMass director of News and Information, Ed Blaguszewski says the Amherst area has not experienced much violence in the last 10 years.

"I think it's a fair case to say that this is rare," said Blaguszewski.

In October 2002, Jennifer Paluseo, then a UMass senior, was charged with involuntary manslaughter, after she gave birth to a baby boy in a shower stall in James Hall dormitory, and then disposed of the live child in a trashcan.

UMass Police Chief Barbara O'Connor said that the last incident of this magnitude that she knew of was a shooting at Cashin Hall in 1998. O'Connor was referring to an Oct. 30, incident in 1998 when Sukha Doe Chhim of Amherst shot a UMass student in the neck during an attempted robbery.

Blaguszewski said that the UMass Police Department is not involved with the investigation, and that the Amherst PD is among a group involved in an ongoing investigation, including the State Police Detective Unit, and the Northwestern District Attorney's office.

STUDENTS AND FACULTY REACT

As details of the Tuesday morning incident spread across campus, students and faculty reacted to the news.

"Obviously our condolences go out to the family and friends of David Sullivan," Blaguszewski said. He added that he doesn't remember anything like this ever happening here.

"It's not something that I'm aware of," he said.

Vice Chancellor of Campus Affairs and Student Life Michael Gargano commented on how he felt about the incident.

"Obviously we're deeply saddened at any time a member of the UMass family loses his life. It's double daunting because he's so young. He had his whole life in front of him," he said.

Blaguszewski agreed with Gargano's comments on tragedy.

"It's always difficult to grapple with the death of a student," he said.

Gargano, who was in Florida yesterday, said he hasn't heard anything about a motive or anything involving the status

See MURDER on page 2

SGA names new Associate Speaker

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association Senate voted unanimously last night to appoint Mark Morrison as the Associate Speaker to the SGA despite some skepticism that he was hand picked by Speaker Seamus Brennan.

Morrison, who has been the former Attorney General to the SGA as well as chair of the administrative affairs committee admitted that he was reluctant at first about taking the position but realized there was a duty for someone to step up to the position.

"I am doing this to fulfill the duty to you and the Senate," Morrison said, who also accepted the fact that he could potentially become the next Speaker if Brennan is impeached.

"[If Brennan is impeached] I am going to side with the Senate and the student body," Morrison said. He added that he is "not the same person by any stretch of the imagination" as Brennan.

"[Morrison] will do meaningful tasks, and things will get done in a timely fashion," said Eduardo Bustamante, president of the SGA. "Mark is definitely a good candidate, and he has been around forever."

Senator Pavel Payano tried to table the motion to appoint Morrison indefinitely because of the lack of duties that Brennan has fulfilled as current Speaker.

"I don't feel right voting to appoint him coming from Seamus," Payano said, "I want this tabled indefinitely."

The motion which need two-thirds vote to pass, did not; the ultimate vote for appointing Morrison, however, passed unanimously.

Senate members asked critical questions about Morrison's ability to work for the students and fellow senators, hoping that his intentions were not to serve members of the administration.

"I am not going to roll over to the administration," Morrison said, "I am a big stickler for the institutional process."

Last month, the Senate voted no-confidence in the Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano and has refused to work with him on future issues. Morrsion, although he was not present to vote in November, acknowledged the concern from the Senate about working with him in the future.

See SGA on page 2

JASSE LAUCK/COLLEGIAN

Happy Hanukkah

The Hillel House Band kicked off the group's Hanukkah Bash, which featured music and dancing in the Campus Center last night.

Newman Center's Giving Tree program helps local families during holidays

By Adrienne Bossi
Collegian Staff

As they say, the holiday season is a time of giving. And the Newman Center is doing just that.

The Giving Tree Project, now several years old, aims to provide 682 needy children with Christmas gifts this holiday season.

The tree, glowing warmly in the Newman Chapel, is decorated with hand made paper ornaments each containing the age, gender, and wish list of a local area child, one for each child.

"Every time an ornament is taken from the tree, it is replaced with a gold star symbolically telling us about the generosity of the community," said Kathleen Callahan, communications coordinator for the Giving Tree project. "Our goal is to go from a paper tree to a golden tree."

They are almost there. Callahan estimates there are around 100 ornaments left. "There is always a bit of a scramble towards the end of the project, not all the ornaments are taken, or ornaments are never returned with gifts, but it always comes together in the end. Every child gets accommodated for."

One way to aid with the scramble is to take more than one ornament. While most people take just one hoping to "rock this kid's world", Callahan suggests spreading the cheer and brightening more than one child's holiday.

Callahan also points out that, "many of the children on the tree have siblings on the tree as well. There can be a large disparity among the gifts. A child's brother or sister might not be getting as much."

Callahan suggests spending between $20 and $25 on each child. For older children, she recommends gift cards. She also recommends stores where $25 can go the farthest, like Target, Walmart, and Old Navy.

"It's not that we don't want people to be stylish," Callahan joked, "but we also want them to be warm. And some things are as good as any. My socks are from Walmart, too."

"Our focus is on helping families provide for the basic needs; food and clothing," Callahan said. While it is okay to include small toys, dolls, crayons, or books with a gift, the focus should be clothing.

Callahan also understands that many college students are short on cash themselves this holiday season. Students can consider pairing up, or forming groups to pool money. They can go door to door in their dorms and collect money or can ask people at their jobs for a dollar or two. Planning ahead also helps.

"I bought four kids' outfits, each $5, in the spring on winter blowouts," Callahan said.

There are, however, other ways to help with the Giving Tree project that don't require opening a wallet. This Sunday, December 12, the overwhelming task of organizing the gifts will begin. Students are encouraged to volunteer their time with that. Getting the word out and posting flyers is another way.

"Every single person on this project has made a contribution," Callahan said. "Even if all they can do is sit in on one meeting. When it comes to helping kids, we will take whatever help we can get."

"You can't save the world all by yourself, but you can save a piece of it. And that's what we are doing here, one child at a time."

Ornaments can be picked up at the Newman Center chapel. Gifts should be wrapped, ornament attached as a nametag, and returned to the Chapel after morning mass on Sunday December 12. For more information, contact Chris Clark, Campus Minister and Director of Religious Education at chrisclark@external.umass.edu or 413-549-0300 x14.

ADRIENNE BOSSI/COLLEGIAN

The Newman Center's Giving Tree.

Floral designers raise money for trip

By Jennifer Gorson
Collegian Correspondent

The Baird Student Chapter of the American Institute of Floral Designers (SAIFD) held their annual Holiday Bazaar in French Hall on Thursday, December 2. The Bazaar helped Chapter members fundraise for their trip to the 2005 National American Institute of Floral Designers Symposium in Seattle, Washington.

The Baird Student Chapter at the University of Massachusetts began eight years ago as the Horticulture Club. Today, led by advisor Nancy L. Garrabrants, members cultivate their common interest in floral design and play an important role in campus affairs.

If you have ever wondered who designs the floral centerpieces for the Cosby dinner and the Autumn Event for prospective student, the answer is SAIFD.

"It can be long days, but it's relaxing. It helps you unwind from the daily grind," said "Lindsey," a junior majoring in retail floral design.

Although SAIFD tasks are not exactly leisurely, members put in long hours preparing for important University events. The University gives the club a budget for each function, and members must work within their allotted resources to create aesthetically pleasing centerpieces for the campus community.

However, according to members, the time put in is well worth the effort.

"I call it my mental health class," says Lorraine Lapoint, a non traditional student involved with SAIFD.

The combination of

See SAIFD on page 2

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3693 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief: Peter Fountain
Managing Editor: Andrew Mercer
Business Manager: Rich Pacheco
Production Manager: Cory Rosenberg
News Supervisor: Cameron Woods
Advertising Manager: Tiffany Bugnoski
Editorial Production: Samantha Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor: Meghan Healy
Calendar Editor: Alyson Zilbaitis
Editorial Editor: Paige Crum
News Editor: Erika Lovley
Photo Editor: Matthew Reid
Sports Editor: Mike Marinelli
Circulation Manager: Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising: Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager: Josh Riggins
Finance Manager: Hetak Shah
Accounts Clerk: Virginia Frecaut
Human Resources: Sandra Marquez
Assistant Operations: Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising: Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business: Jaclynn Sorenson
Assistant Photo: Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production: Rachael Bruno
Graphics Advisor: Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living: Mike Busack
Asst. Arts & Living: Monique Immanuel
Assistant Editorial: Yousef Mamarzyer
Assistant Editorial: Allison Lilles
Assistant News: Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News: Dan O'Brien
Assistant Sports: Robert McGovern
Assistant Sports: Jeff Howe

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Erika Lovley

PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Jamie Lau

COPY EDITOR
Mike Busack

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Shannon Farrington

PRODUCTION STAFF
Tom Heslin, Jodi Wenisel, Caitlin Kidecker

For the record:
In yesterday's Daily Collegian, UMass Police Chief Barbara O'Connor was incorrectly identified as Bob O'Connor in the article about Tuesday's homicide. We apologize for this error.

One arrested in student's murder of the investigation. However, he expressed his condolences to everyone involved.

MURDER from page 1

"We share the grief with the family and friends," he said.

Many students around campus didn't think that this incident would affect their day-to-day safety.

"It hasn't given me any fear. I don't feel less safe," said Anh-Dao Nguyen, a junior biochemistry major at UMass.

"It's kind of crazy that it happened," said Joe Aquino, a junior math major at UMass.

Aquino said that he doesn't feel any less safe, and that he thinks this was an isolated incident. However, he does believe that the killer probably had motive.

"I don't think that it was some random murder," he said.

Even though he said that he wasn't fearful for his safety, philosophy graduate student Steve Woodside said that he is going to be careful in the days to come if he lived on campus.

"I would definetly walk a little more carefully," he said. He added that he didn't think it would affect the safety of the people on campus.

Central Berkshire Superintendent Paul E. Swem, who was superintendent while Sullivan was in high school, shared his sympathy.

"Certainly we regret the loss of a life that we had to do with the forming of," he said.

Anyone with any information on the incident on Tuesday morning should call the Amherst Police Department at 413-256-4011.

SAIFD holds bazaar

SAIFD from page 2

"Beginner Floral Design" and "Advanced Floral Design" is an optional two-class sequence offered in conjunction with the club through the Stockbridge School of Agriculture.

The classes are open to anyone with an interest in floristry, and give members ample instruction to prepare for the National Symp-osium held each year. Whether retail floral design is their major or their hobby, members list fun, traveling, and creativity as the benefits that make SAIFD so rewarding.

The 2005 National Symposium, which the recent Holiday Bazaar benefited, is a highly anticipated SAIFD event. Retail Floral Design professionals come from around the world to compete and showcase their floral designs at the annual convention. The event was held in New York City last year, and takes place at a different locale each year. SAIFD members from all over the country will travel to Seattle, Wash. this July to take part in the five day, conference style symposium.

"You're busy from 8 a.m. to 6 at night," Garrabrants said.

Although leisure lacks for SAIFD members, the experience is invaluable. Each group of students gets instruction from a renowned floral artist. Most often, the designers have worked for celebrities and various high profile weddings and affairs. The UMass chapter has built up a special rapport with well-known designer Derek Demateos, who is now coming to UMass as part of the "AIR" (Artist In Residence) program.

Though he cannot disclose the details of who exactly enlisted his expertise, Demateos recently worked on a "VIP" wedding covered in People magazine. He will soon come to UMass and instruct SAIFD members on floral design for "parties" and similar functions.

The annual Symposium has been featured on NBC's "Today" show and draws designers from all over the world. The students have not only had the chance to take classes with famous profession-

See SAIFD on page 3

SGA appoints Associate Speaker

SGA from page 1

"I know every single vice chancellor," he said, "and I work in Whitmore."

In response to the no-confidence vote, Trustee Matthew Murphy and Bustamante met with Chancellor John V. Lombardi Tuesday and were both disappointed in the outcome of the meeting.

"[Lombardi] expressed that he was not going to sign the motion of no confidence," Murphy said, "and that he was not going to sign the Freedom of Information Act filed last summer."

Bustamante said that all Lombardi had to offer was a verbatim account of the Wellman doctrine that encourages students to work with the vice chancellors. "It seems slightly absurd to me," he said, "we are the student voice."

Bustamante and Murphy also encouraged the Senate with positive news about the textbook rental system and the process to give students more access to affordability.

"We met with vice chancellor Joyce Hatch, and it was a very positive meeting," Murphy said, "we are working on getting going with the textbook rental system and we are bringing in a consultant. It is a very good opportunity to save a lot of money for students next year."

Bustamante said that this plan would bring greater opportunities and options for students who purchase books.

"There will be an option to rent, so they will have 'new' books, 'used' books and 'rented' books."

He also said that because this plan is in its infant stage, then perhaps rental books will be done class by class, and if the professor agrees not to change the edition for two to three years.

Mark Morrison addresses the SGA shortly after being unanimously appointed as Associate Speaker in last night's meeting.

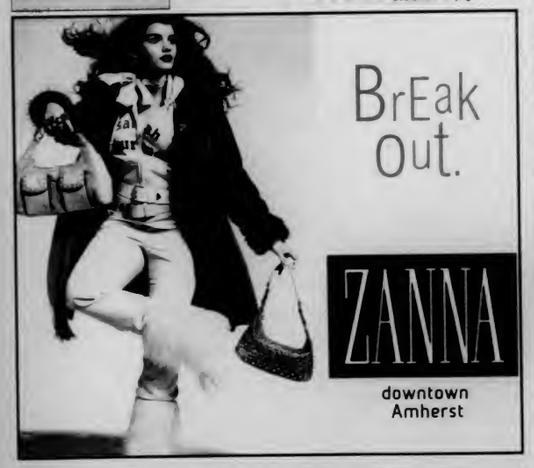
Santa's coming to town!
Hayley, left, and Tyler Schrakamp give their Christmas lists to Santa in Dallas, Texas yesterday.

Ribbon project comes to UMass

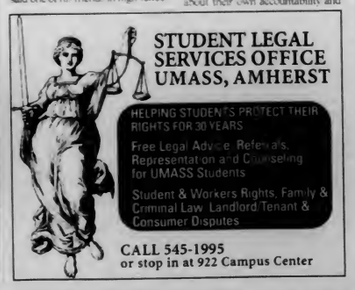
RIBBON from page 1

cal trauma.

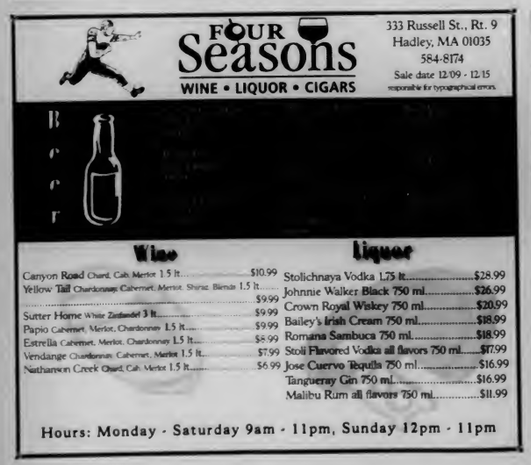
"I hate excuses," he said. Darling said he had many female friends in high school that confided in him about instances of rape, sexual assault, and harassment from boyfriends. "None of these problems were solved. The guys got away with it and the problems were left with the women," he said.



Darling spoke of many situations that were too complicated or too subtle to stand a chance in court, but that upset him greatly. He said one of his friends in high school was diagnosed with anorexia, bulimia, and manic depression, which Darling said he attributes in part to her violent boyfriend. He also said that many students, male and female, don't recognize the problem (or legitimacy) of women being raped at parties while intoxicated.



Darling said one of his best friends was raped five times at a party by a man she knew, and neither individual understood the situation as a serious act of violence. As many of these situations are not easily dealt with through legal means, Darling sees the education of men about their own accountability and responsibility for stopping violence against women as essential.



Darling became aware of the White Ribbon Campaign when he visited Chicago to attend the CALCASA (California Coalition Against Sexual Assault) Institute's annual conference in October. The purpose of this conference was for different colleges across the country to network and listen to speakers about domestic violence, rape, and assault. Darling said that the conference was by far the "best thing I've ever done as an extracurricular here at UMass."

He emphasized that he met great people at the conference, including the head of the White Ribbon Campaign from Canada. Darling said he liked the idea of the campaign, and wanted to bring it to UMass. Upon returning from the conference, he spoke with Schiff of University Health Services, who had coincidentally also been planning a White Ribbon Campaign for early December. With the help of a bunch of volunteers, many of who attended Schiff's educational workshops through sports activities or the dorms, this campaign has had a successful first year at UMass.

According to Ali Hamedani, a volunteer, the campaign has received "mostly a very positive response from the men that we've talked to."

SAIFD raises funds for trip

SAIFD from page 2

als, but they also get to see floral presentations of other students from across the country and receive useful feedback in optional competitions.

A typical competition involves allocating each team the same materials. Then, competitors are free to design their own floral arrangement, such as a boutonniere. Participants are judged on components including design technique, texture, color, and form. At the end of the conference, all of the floral presentations are broken down, and attendees transform the entirety into bouquets. Finally, the symposium donates as many as 1,500 hand tied bouquets to area hospitals.

This year, attending the conference will cost the UMass SAIFD about $6,000. The Annual Holiday Bazaar held last Thursday helps defray the cost.

Members created floral arrangements to sell, and area business donated vases and other needed materials. This year, SAIFD also held a silent auction to bid on holiday gifts. Keep an eye out for next year's Bazaar to get your holiday season decorations. Items for sale include poinsettias, Christmas cactuses, Decorated Wreaths, holiday centerpieces, and Boxwood Tree kits. You can also design your own wreath and have it custom made for pick up at French Hall.

The Holiday Bazaar and the National AIFD Symposium represent just a slice of SAIFD's multiple activities. The UMass SAIFD chapter is a busy group on campus open to anyone with an interest in floral design. If you are intrigued, meetings are held Tuesdays at 3:45 in French Hall 405 or contact Nancy at ngarranbrants@nrc.umass.edu.

Study says new breast cancer drug looks promising for women

By Marilynn Marchione
Associated Press

SAN ANTONIO — A newer drug prevented far more breast cancers from recurring in older women than the old standby tamoxifen and with far fewer side effects, doctors said Wednesday, citing a new study.

Cancer specialists said Arimidex is likely to become the first-choice treatment for most women who have had the disease, and they predicted a wider role for similar drugs of its type, called aromatase inhibitors.

New research suggests Arimidex might be able to prevent 70 percent to 80 percent of the most common type of tumors that occur in women after menopause, compared with the 50 percent that tamoxifen is credited with warding off.

Women with early-stage breast cancer who took Arimidex for five years were less likely to have cancer recur, develop in the other breast, or spread throughout their bodies than women who took tamoxifen.

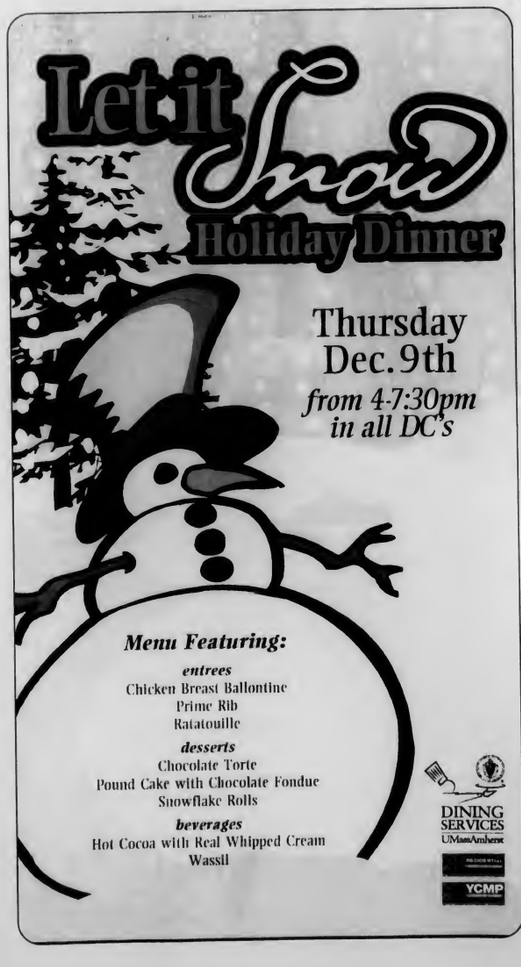
"Arimidex is a more effective treatment. This is a better drug," said Dr. Aman Buzdar, a specialist at the University of Texas' M.D. Anderson Cancer Center. He headed the U.S. portion of the study, which involved about 6,000 women in 21 countries.

Results were reported Wednesday at a meeting in Texas of breast cancer experts and were published online by the British medical journal The Lancet.

Studies involving other aromatase inhibitors showed that women who switched to them after two or three years of tamoxifen also fared better than those who took tamoxifen for the standard five years.

The studies were largely funded by the makers of the newer drugs, but experts not involved in the work were impressed by the results.

"The big message is, women will have a better outcome if they take aromatase inhibitors," said Dr. Paul Goss of Massachusetts General Hospital, an expert on the drugs.



None of the studies change tamoxifen's status as the drug of choice for women who get breast cancer before menopause, because the newer drugs aren't thought to be effective then.

Tamoxifen revolutionized breast cancer treatment when it came into use some three decades ago and studies showed it could cut recurrence risk in half. It blunts the effects of estrogen, a hormone that promotes the growth of about three-fourths of the tumors that occur in postmenopausal women.

Aromatase inhibitors prevent estrogen from being made in the first place, and don't raise the risk of blood clots and endometrial cancer as tamoxifen does. Three are available: AstraZeneca PLC's Arimidex, Pfizer Inc.'s Aromasin and Novartis Pharmaceuticals' Femara.

A doctor gives a woman a mammogram at Providence Hospital.

Experienced Appalachian hiker writes book on journeys

By Jerry Harkavy
Associated Press

PORTLAND, Maine — As a youngster, Mark Warner enjoyed hiking sections of the Appalachian Trail but never gave much thought to the idea of traveling it from end to end.

More recently, however, the 68-year-old retired nature photographer from Newcastle made at least a half-dozen trips along the entire 2,174-mile trail between Georgia and Maine, not on foot but in vintage airplanes he rebuilt himself.

Between those flights and a bunch of shorter ones, he figures that he has logged more than 20,000 miles flying above the trail.

The product of all that travel is showcased in Warner's latest book, "The Appalachian Trail: An Aerial View," a portfolio of pictures of the trail taken from a vantage point of 500 to 2,000 feet above the ground. In addition to the rugged peaks and high ridges the trail is famous for, the photos include lowland meadows, river and highway crossings, and even several towns.

Warner hopes the book will appeal to trail hikers looking for a bird's eye view of the places they've passed through.

Warner, who has worked as a wildlife and boating photographer for 30 years, is the author of two books on nature photography. He said he decided to publish his new book himself in order to retain editorial control.

The Appalachian Trail Conference in Harpers Ferry, W.Va., is distributing the book, which spokesman Brian King said is the first such collection of aerial photos he has seen.

The book, sold at trail shops or through the ATC, should appeal to hikers as well as anyone who enjoys landscape photography, King said.

"I think it gives hikers especially a whole different perspective on where they've been and where it lits," he said.

The project is an outgrowth of Warner's renewed interest in flying, a pastime he gave up years ago. In the early 1990s he stumbled upon a 1947 Piper Cub Super Cruiser in Rockland that needed lots of work. "I made a ridiculously low offer and they took it," he recalled.

Warner, who was then living in Connecticut, spent three years restoring the antique three-seater with the idea of selling it at a profit. But his plans changed after a dinner guest recounted his adventures hiking the Appalachian Trail and Warner decided to fly over the nearest portion of the trail to get a look at it.

His view of the footbridge across Ten Mile River just upriver from the Housatonic hooked him on the project he would pursue for nearly five years: taking aerial shots of the trail with his 1970s-vintage Nikon F2 camera in all 14 states it passes through and putting the best of the photos in a book.

Warner did his research during the winter, combing through hiking guides and other publications to find suitable spots along the trail to photograph.

To locate a potential site, he would determine its longitude and latitude, then enter the numbers into a hand-held Global Positioning System unit that could steer him to the right place while he was aloft.

Once there, Warner would aim for a shot that would show the trail and perhaps include a shelter, footbridge or other landmark. He would check the light angles and shadows before spiraling down to get the picture, usually getting what he wanted by the third run.

"I'd circle three or four times, then get the airplane stable to make the photo run and swing the window open and take the picture," he said. He would hold the stick between his knees to steady the plane as he clicked the shutter.

While it sounds daring, aerial photography by a solo pilot is not inherently risky, said Bill Hemmel, a retired commercial pilot in Belmont, N.H., who now specializes in aerial photography in New Hampshire's Lakes Region.

"It's akin to steering the car with your knees while you eat a sandwich, except that there's no traffic," he said. "It oftentimes takes several passes to get the right angle, the right lighting, the right framing."

Warner did most of the shooting during the spring, before leaf growth had obscured the trail, or in the fall, when the changing foliage colors provided a distinctive backdrop.

Early on, he realized that the Super Cruiser's door and window configuration made for an awkward perch from which to aim a camera.

In November 2002 he located the plane he wanted – a 1959 Piper Super Cub he later rebuilt – in Oklahoma and flew it home via the Appalachian Trail. Many of those pictures from that single trip made the cut.

Powell asks for allies' support

By George Gedda
Associated Press

BRUSSELS, Belgium — Anxious to ease America's international burdens, Secretary of State Colin Powell urged European allies to step up cooperation in support of U.S. efforts concerning terrorism and conflicts from the Middle East to South Asia.

Powell told a gathering of young people Wednesday that trans-Atlantic institutions have been acquiring responsibilities on a global scale in recent years, notwithstanding the "bumps and bruises" and "blustery days" stemming from key European countries' opposition to the Iraq war.

Although he has only a few weeks left in office, Powell's message for the Europeans was decidedly aimed for the long-term.

"We need to have the courage to seek fundamental change and not be satisfied with just managing or containing threats," Powell said. "We must be able to create and seize opportunities."

Powell said the challenges facing the United States and Europe are more diffuse and harder to counter than those of the Cold War. Terrorism, trafficking in weapons, narcotics and people and transnational crime are among the threats that will require greater cooperation, he said.

Although Powell did not say so explicitly, a greater European role in meeting these threats will ease a mammoth burden for the United States. The combined costs of the Iraq and Afghan wars plus other components of the war on terrorism have run into the hundreds of billions of dollars and contributed to huge budget deficits.

Powell said President Bush is anxious for stronger ties with Europe and will travel to the continent in February, the first foreign trip of his second term.

The secretary of state arrived here from Bulgaria in advance of a Thursday meeting of NATO foreign ministers. But he made clear that trans-Atlantic cooperation should involve not only the 26-member defense alliance but other institutions as well, including the European Union and the Organization of Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE).

He said he was hopeful for a break in the impasse between Israel and the Palestinians, adding that U.S. and European institutions must help that process along and make contributions elsewhere in the region.

NATO's outreach is being underscored this week by the presence here of delegations from Israel and six Arab countries – Jordan, Egypt, Tunisia, Algeria, Morocco and Mauritania.

The alliance's secretary general, Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, recently paid a visit to Algeria, the first by NATO's top diplomat to any of the seven countries in its decade-old "Mediterranean dialogue."

NATO had not undertaken a major operation outside Europe until the Afghanistan war. Powell noted that 9,000 NATO troops are deployed in that country and more should be sent in time for Afghani parliamentary elections set for next April.

Powell praised the OSCE role in monitoring Ukraine's Nov. 21 presidential runoff election that the country's top court found illegitimate, and he said he hoped the organization will perform the same role in Iraq next month. Other officials noted that NATO has begun the initial phase of training Iraqi forces and a second

EXECUTIVE
VALET PARKING
Serving Bradley Airport
Airport Parking College Special!
$25.00*-Up to 7 Days Parking. Valid 11/23-11/30
$50.00*-Up to 5 Weeks Parking. Valid 12/15-02/01/05
Valid College ID Req., Present this coupon or Visit us at:
www.CollegeAirportParking.com
800-218-1297
*Plus 4% Access Fee. Cannot be Combined with Other offers

The Mercantile
Books Cards Toys Great Clothing Gloves Gifts
Stocking Stuffers Scarves
Action Figures Rings Bracelets
Clothing Sale Tapestries Chains Earrings
Dec. Hours Mon-Sat. 10 am-9 pm-Sun 12-6
Amherst-11 E. Pleasant-Carriage Shops
Northampton-108 Main St.

THE PRE-BUSINESS GROUP
invites you to apply for the
3rd BUSINESS LEADERSHIP SEMINAR
The Pre-Business Group is accepting applications for its 3rd Business Leadership Seminar to be held at Amherst College in January. The Business Leadership Seminar is an intense four day professional experience designed to teach students of all majors and class years about leadership and business while helping them to hone personal skills, establish contacts, and open the door to new and exciting opportunities. The program is highly selective, but all class years and majors are encouraged to apply.
Companies represented at past seminars include: Accenture • Bain & Company • Bank of America Securities • Bear Stearns • Boston Millennia Partners • Capital One • Citigroup • Credit Suisse First Boston • Deutsche Bank • Goldman, Sachs & Co. • Gresham Advertising • Interbrand • Lehman Brothers • Mckinsey & Co. • Merrill Lynch • Monitor Company • Morgan Stanley • New York Life Investment Management • Procter & Gamble • Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom • Teach For America • The Advocate • The National Basketball Association • Columbia Business School • Tuck School of Business • Harvard Business School • Yale School of Management • MIT Sloan School of Management • Stanford Graduate School of Business
INTERTERM 2005: Tuesday, January 18 – Friday, January 21
Applications Accepted: November 10 - January 3
(Rolling Acceptance)
For more information or to apply, please visit http://www.prebusinessgroup.org

A PLEDGE FOR AND BY MEN ABOUT VIOLENCE

Because:

Men commit the vast majority of violence in our society. This includes racial, homophobic, religious, and ethnic, as well as violence perpetrated against women. Thus, violence is a men's issue.

Men are friends, family, and/or lovers with victims/survivors of violence. Their response can help or hinder a survivor's recovery process.

Men are the primary targets of violence in our society, though women are the primary targets of sexualized violence.

We all have women in our lives we love – partners, daughters, mothers, sisters, friends, grandmothers, and granddaughters.

Thus:

Violence is a MEN'S issue. As men we must work to stop violence. We need to learn and teach positive ways of being that are healthy for our selves, our partners, our families, our communities, and our world.

We, the below signed men of the UMass-Amherst community acknowledge that:

Domestic and relationship violence is a problem that all men must work to end;
All people deserve to live and learn in a safe and loving environment based on equality;
Our lack of action and silence perpetuates the violence in my community;

And we pledge to:

Be violence free
Never commit, condone or remain silent about violence
Challenge other men to recognize that they can be powerful without making others powerless
Encourage all men to work together with women, using their collective voices and resources to end violence - not only at UMass but in all of our communities.

Colin Adair, Jason Alexander, Gregg Allen, Brendan Asquith, Alex Austin, Samuel Ayala, Nick Bagley, Michael Barrett, Uzair Beg, Jason Behrens, Nicholas Belanger, Joe Bennett, Alex Bernsten, Charles Berry-Skillen, Ernie Billittier, Tyler Bolte, Noah Bond, Stefan Boroda, Mike Bosco, Evan Boshi, Nick Botchar, Philip Brady, John Timothy Brodeur, Dennis Bromery, Gordon Brown, David Brown, Will Bunker, Andrew Bunyard, Matt Burto, Blake Buxton, Alan Calhoun, Dennis Canty, Jim Carroll, Craig Carter, Chris Caton, Patrick Cavanaugh, Stefan Chase, Dan Cheney, Nate Chesley, Mike Christman, Jared Collier, Nick Collins, John Cornaccunia, Andrew Couto, Wilder Cusick, Coureton Dalton, Shahzad Dar, Jim Darling, Jon Davenport, Joe Dean, Mark Dean, Joseph Deering, Daniel Delloiacono, Nicholas Demas, Alexander DeSerpa, Frank DeZenzo, Johnny Donaldson, Michael Doolan, Josh Doolittle, Damon Dopfel, Adam Dovale, Stepen Driscoll, Zach Ducharme, Ben Duffy, Greg Dumond, Paul Ellis, Andrew Elm, Josh Essig, Christopher Fagbayi, Matthew Falcone, Oluyemi Famuyide, Matthew Faulkner, Michael Federico, PJ. Fenton, Gus Fernandes, Sid Ferreira, Brian Fitzgerald, David Foley, Jim Forest, Matthew Fox, Shawn Gaines, Paul Galotti, Michael Gargano, Seth Garrison, Eric Giebner, Dave Gilbert, Jamie Gilbert, Rich Giudice, Manuel González, Fernando Gouviea, Nick Graziose, Ali Hamedani, Paul Hansmire, Adam Hartwell, Jeremy Hartwell, Ahmed Hassan, Kevin Hendricks, Royce Henry, Mike Hershey, David Ho, Matt Hoffman, Will Horan, Robert Horowitz, David Hoyos, Grant Ingle, Nikita Iranov, Bailey Jackson, Ed Jaffe, Patrick Silk Johnson, Kevin Judd, Jubin Karimi, Matthew Kennis, Bill King, David King, Timothy Kitchell, Kevin Kliemeint, Eric Kosta, Mike Kostka, Andrew Koziol, Maksim Kuksin, Jonathan Labaki, Daniel Lachar, Kendrick Lau, David Lawrence, Anthony Leonardi, Jonah Lerner, Ty Lerner, George Lindblad, Zack Linder, Joseph Liskowsky, Greg Little, Alex Lonczak, Brian Long, Dan Ludwig, Andrew Lutaya, Desmond Lymon, Pat Lynch, Ben Mabee, Safdar Mahmud, Matt Makara, Dan Maltzman, Keith Manchester, Adam Marblestone, Justin Marques, Shawn Marroni, Manuel Matos, Eric Matsumato, Ryan Maxwell, Brian McCarthy, Brendan McElhiney, Ben McHugh, Christopher Meade, Andy Meehan, Evan Melford, Sam Messer, Greg Meyer, Brad Milley, Mike Monopoli, Jonathan Moore, William Morgan, Paul Moroz, Anthony Mugford, Andrew Mulligan, Yousef Munayyer, Tom Murdy, Brian Murphy, Sean Musselman, A.J. Muszynski, Joules Nahas, Matthew Nalewanski, Jeff Napolitano, Michael Naso, Darren Nichols, Doug Nickerson, Bilal Nizami, Joe Norrall, Matt Norton, Joe Nunes, Anthony Nunes, Levi O'Brien, Zach Oelschlegal, Keith Otis, Soji Otuyelu, Matt Ouellett, Thomas Ouellette, Ralph Pace, Anirban Paul, Pavel Payano, Jeff Pedecine, Nick Pell, Ilan Persing, Phu Pham, Brendon Pires, David Pomeroy, Dan Pomeroy, James Poro, Leor Radbil, Kevin Randall, Doug Rappaport, Brendon Reed, Matt Reynolds, Vino Richemond, Ricardo Rivera, Colin Robbins, David Robbins, Sean Robinson, Donald Robinson, Chris Robuned, Daniel Rogier, Michael Romeni, Eli Rosinha, John Sanchez, Kosal Sarou, Sean Scanlon, Tom Schiff, Thomas Schneeweis, Derrick Schull, Mark Schwartz, Richard Senatore, Andrew Shattuck, Jason Sherman, Paul Sherry, Peter Shields, Trevor Shreeve, Sam Soltani, Jonathan Stahl, Jason Staighter, Dan Sweent, Jonathan Swenson, Peter Tames, John Toffey, Randy Townsend, Nat Trask, Arthur Tuttle, Rashad Uqdah, Ean Van Vliet, Michael Wade, Andrew Walsh, Kyle Walsh, Thomas Wang, Chris Watkins, Jason Welch, Alex West, Ryan Whidby, David Whitehead, Josh Wilder, Teeomm Williams, Andrew Williston, Gabe Winer, Jesse Winn, Ryan Winters, Anthony Witman, Greg Woods, Pat Woodward, Bob Wuzzard, Iliya Yerukhimovich, Nick Zguro, Doug Zohn, Thomas Zoltowski

This message is brought to you by the SGA and the Voices Against Violence Program of the Health Education Division of University Health Services as part of the UMass White Ribbon Campaign. White Ribbon started in Canada in 1991 to commemorate the Montréal Massacre of December 6, 1989, in which 14 women students at the École Polytechnique were systematically killed and 13 other students wounded by a lone gunman, who openly declared this as an act of hate against women and feminism. Men wearing a white ribbon is a symbolic statement against any type of violence against women, and it is a personal pledge never to commit, condone nor remain silent about violence against women. To honor the victims of Montreal massacre, we do not organize events on December 6, nor do we make public statements unless requested by women's groups.
For more information about Voices Against Violence call 577-5133.

Take a Stand. Speak Out. Take Action. Raise Your Voice Against Violence.

VOICES Against VIOLENCE — UNIVERSITY OF Massachusetts Amherst — VOICES Against VIOLENCE

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

Thursday, December 9, 2004 — "The recipe for perpetual ignorance is: be satisfied with your opinions and content with your knowledge." -Elbert Hubbard — Editorial@dailycollegian.com

Farewell southern cross

World Perspectives

Jennifer Kim

I home sweet home. I am finally back in the States after my short, yet fulfilled time abroad in Oz. 'Tis a bittersweet ending to an unforgettable experience. It's a great feeling to be welcomed with open arms and greeted with familiar surroundings that were once so trivial to you. Being away and overseas definitely makes you appreciate the simplest things that you wouldn't have originally given a second thought about. Every-thing is seen in a fresh new light.

Just recently, I went to visit U-Mass and swar-ms of nostalgia and familiarity came crawling back to me. When I missed the campus shuttle, I no longer had to wait an hour for the next one, but merely 20 minutes. When printing out work at the library, I didn't have to pay eleven cents per page as I did back at Unl in Australia. Oh, and by the way, I can go on the Internet whenever I please without worrying if I used up a certain percentage of quota on my account!

I often find myself being sucked into the hustle and bustle of the American culture and forgetting the "no worries" attitude I had so grown to live by back in Oz.

When I am craving food late at night, I don't have to resort to Dominoe's as the only delivery service available within a twenty mile radius. To be able to grab the collegian and read it with a cup of coffee brought me such a comforting feeling, unlike Australia, where we didn't have a newspaper on campus or any source of campus news. Who really knew what was going on at the Unl? Beats me. I no longer have to stress about ordering coffee anymore and receiving a cup of who knows what. In Australia, you have to order a cup of coffee by size, color, length and depth. For example, coffee can be ordered as a "tall short black" or a "small flat white". I would have resorted to tea, but the coffee addict in me needed the beans. This is when I eventually started to enjoy drinking straight up black coffee. These are just a few of the many things that I was relieved to come back to.

I no longer have to worry about finding a place to sleep whether it is in an airport, or a tiny crevice (in which they like to call a room), packed like sardines with ten other backpackers, and making sure that your luggage is locked and secure so that it doesn't get stolen by a fellow roommate. There are no more anxiety attacks after sprinting as if you were in a hundred meter dash through the airport or to the train station to make sure you caught it in time. There is no longer a worry about what to eat or what to do the following day. Nor is there that spontaneity or freedom to do exactly as life intended it to do—to take things as they come day by day—literally. I don't encounter random acquaintances I have met on a previous tour group or in general, meeting new people everyday and chilling with them the entire day. The fact of the matter is, as it turns out, I miss my nomadic and Aussie lifestyle that I had adopted while overseas.

I often find myself being sucked into the hustle and bustle of the American culture and forgetting the "no worries" attitude I had so grown to live by back in Oz. In deep contrast to the American culture, I believe the Aussie way of life is the way to be. It's so free of drama, worries and stress. One thing I have learned from them is to live, love and enjoy life in the present. This easygoing approach on life is portrayed through the people and culture. Never have I seen friendlier, laidback people willing to get to know you without any preempted judgments.

The country, culture and food are one thing, but the friends and experiences we've shared together are under a completely different category. My Aussie mates have taught me so much about their lives (and now my life too), and for this I am truly grateful to them. My fellow American friends from Cali, Texas, 'Sota, Indiana and all across the nation, who have experienced this incredible journey with me, will not be forgotten. Each and every one of us is unique and diverse in our own individual way, but one common factor that links us all together was Campus East, Wollongong, Australia. Who knows when we will all ever meet again, but the memories and experiences we've shared will only be understood amongst us and those will forever be cherished in my heart.

My final thoughts on studying abroad: As the Nike campaign would say, "Just Do It!" I strongly urge everyone to seize this opportunity before it's too late. However, there should also be a warning sign that comes with such an opportunity.

Warning: May cause one to fall in love with the country and people. May also cause increase in addiction levels to travel.

Carpe Diem.

Jennifer Kim is a Collegian Columnist. She is currently on exchange in Australia.

Thefacebook: a stalker's guide

Matt Brochu

Once upon a time, stalking people wasn't just an underrated art form; it was also a huge pain in the ass. Sit back and think about the countless hours you could have wasted: 1) Driving four to five car-lengths behind your stalkee at all times. 2) Dialing her phone number and breathing heavily like "Big Dell" after a round of wind sprints, then hanging up. 3) Taking black-and-white pictures and thumbtacking them to your Shrine Wall, right next to the hair doll and that pencil she picked up for you in CompSci105. 4) Dealing with the bird that crapped on your head while sitting in the oak tree across the quad to take those pictures. 5) Cutting individual letters from magazines to paste together creepy makeshift love notes to tape to her dry-erase board, always signed, "Your Secret Admirer".

Fortunately for all of us, www.thefacebook.com has brought those days to an end. Of course, one would think that such an innovative solution to all of your stalking needs would be sold via an infomercial for three easy payments of $14.95 (and if you call now, they'll throw in a pair of binoculars absolutely free). But you'd be wrong. All you need is an internet connection, an uploadable picture of "yourself", and the desire to poke random chicks (which isn't as cool as it sounds) to put hundreds of vulnerable, accessible college co-eds at your fingertips within the click of a mouse. And if you haven't had the opportunity to re-enact the toilet scene from "One Hour Photo" yet, this may be your lucky day.

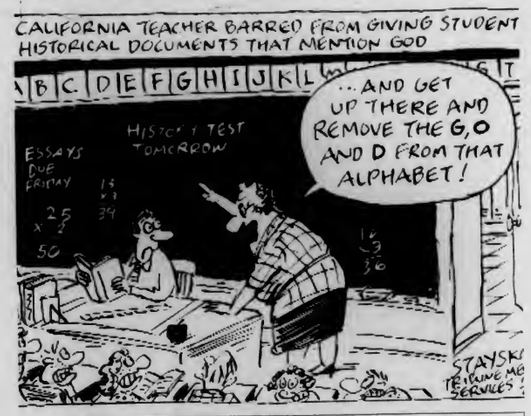
Well, as soon as I heard about this thing a few weeks ago, I logged on and registered immediately (for research purposes only) to see what it was all about. This is what I found. For the seven of you who haven't heard about the facebook by now, it's a Website (thence the .com) that allows you to post much-too-personal information about yourself on the Internet for the entire world to see. In the end, thefacebook is just a cross between your high school yearbook, your AOL Instant Messenger profile, and that unsettling feeling you get when you read the personal ads in the Valley Advocate.

Basically, they assign you some web space for a personal profile, supply you with the categories, and expect you to supply them with the answers depending on how pathetic and attention-starved you are. You can then browse the profiles of fellow UMass students and add people to your group of friends, except unlike the girls who made lists of their friends at recess in 4th grade — you can't distinguish your best friend forever (BFF) from your best friend for life (BFFL) by dotting your I's with little hearts.

Unfortunately, thefacebook's suggested way of making friends is creepier than the old dude with the beard, the "I'm panning for gold" hat, and the cane that hangs out in front of Antonio's every day. And if you disagree with me, I suggest you try this out in the real world (you know, that place where normal people have normal relationships and girls can go to bed without using the halo-ed angel smiley face). Here's thefacebook's method to becoming Mr. Popular, in step-by-step fashion. Insert Patrick Duffy or "Code-man" joke here.

Step 1: Approach a random person in the campus center. Step 2: Poke them with your finger (or with a pelvic thrust, it doesn't really specify how). Step 3: If they're OK with this — I mean, who wouldn't be — simply say, "I request to add you as my friend, but before I can do that, you must confirm that you are in fact friends with me." Sound weird to you? Sounds like a kick-in-the-balls and a restraining order to me.

But here's the deal. Allowing a friend to be on facebook is a lot like allowing a friend to have sex with a really shady guy. It's bound to happen every once in a while, so when they do it, just make sure they do it responsibly. Here's a few ground rules to start you off on the right foot.



Rule 1: When building your profile, keep your cell phone number to yourself. I don't know about you, but I'd rather not have random people calling me ever. Would you go out to dinner and a movie with the next telemarketer who calls to ask about your satisfaction with your newspaper subscription? I didn't think so.

Rule 2: Don't list your school address. If you're that comfortable telling strangers where you live, you might as well take it a step further and add a few new awkwardly personal categories, such as: "Words My ATM Pin Code Rhymes With When Spelt Out", "What I Told My Therapist Last Week", or "If You Were My Social Security Number, What Would You Be?"

Rule 3 (For Guys Only): Keep your damn shirts on. You know who you are (and if you don't know, your last name might just be a well-known salsa brand). But seriously, if I wanted to check out some freshly waxed, oiled-up pecs, I'd go watch "Baywatch" reruns. Hopefully someone gives you the head's up when "Playgirl" shoots their next "Facebook Fantasies" DVD.

So use thefacebook wisely or don't use it all. Just realize that it exists for the same reason that Snood exists, to help your sorry ass procrastinate every night. And if it doesn't help you find love, then you might just have to resort to the old-fashioned way: get drunk and blatantly hit on people. Sure, it might get you slapped in the face, but at least you won't be the loser who pokes people on the Internet.

Matt Brochu is a UMass Graduate Student.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

USTORE AND TEXTBOOK ANNEX ARE JOKES

Somehow I wasn't surprised to open an e-mail from Phill Olson, the store director Of University Store & Textbook Annex, which included the following: "We try very hard to get you top dollar on as many books as possible. We love to hand out big dollars at buyback. We'd rather buy books from our students than from wholesalers, so if you're not going to use a book again, give buyback a try."

I was almost tempted to call this man a physiatrist and have it sent to the textbook annex. He must not realize that in order to "love" doing something you have to have done it. I'm pretty sure that last semester I was offered $4 for a book that cost me $40, and the book was in mint condition.

C'mon $4 bucks can't even buy me a sandwich in the Blue Wall (another University gouge) so obviously it's not going to get me another book for a class.

But don't worry its not just Mr. Olson that is deranged because he keeps saying "We". When he says "We", I'm going to assume that he is talking about the entire administration at the University of Massachusetts.

This e-mail is a perfect example of how they run their university. UMass is not an institution but a corporation that claims it needs to build revenues to improve the quality of education that it gives to its students. What they will never realize though, is that they really don't care about the everyday well being of their students. Students are just an eight-digit number to them.

All they want is money from students and they are pretty good at getting the job done. Don't think this stops when you graduate because they will keep calling years beyond the time you leave Amherst. When you don't donate though, they can't figure out why. Well It's very simple because the alumni that says no is the same kid who was getting screwed on simple things like text books when he/she went here and he/she paid through the nose for his public education. What else could he/she possibly owe UMass?

The culture on this campus will never change unless the administration puts the students first. Unfortunately though they are in favor of doing the complete opposite and they say it themselves, "We'd rather buy bo-oks from our students than from wholesalers". Thanks for the e-mail Phil; I'm going to see if these four bucks can get me a coke and fries in the campus center.

Marc Bertrand
UMass Student

Ethics of the death toll

Katelyn Harding

I am truly thankful that I have not had to say goodbye to any friends or family to go over to fight in the War on Terror in Iraq. The mere thought of having someone I know and loved overseas fighting in a war that will not have any satisfactory outcome would be too disheartening for me to endure. I respect and admire those people who voluntarily gave up their services to go fight in a war that seemed to have good intentions, but is really a war that is being fought for selfish and biased reasons. The soldiers that have gone overseas and given their lives fighting for us deserve to be honored and respected, not to become another name on another long list of those fallen. Instead of being honored the way they should be, they are being put on lists where their number is more important than their name and their background. It is becoming an issue of tally marks instead of fallen heroes, and here is where the American media has gone too far.

According to Aly Colon of PoynterOnline, the deaths of the soldiers have seemingly resulted in pretty numbers to fill up pages in articles about the tragedies of war. Journalists use the huge numbers to lure their readers in, the more zeros included, the more intriguing the story, right? Wrong. The real question of ethics comes down to this, as quoted by Michael Stanton "Do people believe that this is the kind of 'milestone' that is significant to the readership in terms of helping them come to terms with the scope of the nation's involvement in Iraq, or should the 1,000th death not be treated any differently than those that came before?" Do all the zeros written on the page really matter to the outcome of the war? Tough question. Even tougher to answer.

In my opinion, I do not think that the deaths of soldiers should be listed in such a careless way. Each and every single one of these soldiers died for a cause they thought purposeful, and they went overseas and put their lives on the line, because they were doing what they thought right. I do not think we should demean them by adding their death to an always growing list as one of the "unfortunate" soldiers to have fallen in the War on Terror in Iraq. I believe that every soldier should get the respect they deserve, especially after their death overseas. A tally mark and a zero hardly add up to the experiences they had to suffer. It is insulting to those fallen to be labeled as such a marker.

What line have the media misconstrued? It seems as though they are using the rising numbers of fallen soldiers to appeal to some sort of audience. In the media, there is "something attractive about large, round numbers, especially if they include many zeroes". How morbid. So, in other words, there is some attraction to reading about thousands of American soldiers losing their lives overseas? When did we stop caring about human life and start caring about how attractive big numbers can look on a page? It disgusts me that journalists would use these numbers to attract audiences. It is one thing to use numbers such as those to prove a point in saying that too many lives have been taken, but it is an entirely different point to use these numbers to appeal to other people. To me that is morose and completely unethical.

I agree with using the number of deaths to explain the context of those dead. For example, Monica Davey from the New York Times "used the number of deaths to provide information about those affected in a variety of categories: Age, geography, race, ethnicity, branch of service, cause of death, rank, and gender. She also found people who helped humanize the numbers". This is a way of using the death toll in an acceptable manner. Davey is using the number as a mean to honor those passed on, and not using it just as number. She is trying to revive life into those that have died, and I give Monica Davey much respect for doing so. She is using the number of fallen American soldiers in a way that is ethical.

The War on Terror has gone on long enough, and too many American soldiers have lost their lives. I realize and understand that numerous soldiers have gone down, and the only thing that we can hope to do, as the United States, is to bring the remaining soldiers back safely. In today's society, numbers and words have become so entangled with each other, that it is becoming harder and harder for journalists to extricate themselves from the mess. They need to realize the stark differences between these two elements, and not use one to attract the other. The number of soldiers that have lost their lives in Iraq is too large, but do not disgrace them by making them a statistic.

Katelyn Harding is a UMass Student.

www.dailycollegian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS LIVING

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 9, 2004 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

HOLIDAY DELIGHT

Not your average album

Trans-Siberian Orchestra enchants with new disc

By CAMERON J. WOODS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Just give up the fight. You are too old for that dusty cassette of cliché Christmas jingles.

As a child Rudolph, Frosty and Santa may have been your icons of Christmas cheer, but seeing as you seem to think you're big enough to leave the kiddy table, then maybe it is time to choose some more mature holiday tunes.

With part three of their musical trilogy "The Lost Christmas Eve," the Trans-Siberian Orchestra has captured some semblance of the old Christmas magic. That feeling of wonder and anticipation at the sight of a glowing tree, gathering with family members and all the other small pieces that add up to only part of

See ORCHESTRA on page 7

Waters takes holiday music to new level

COURTESY JOHNWATERS.COM

The director's journey into music proves that he is not ordinary on the set or in the studio, on the disc "A John Waters Christmas."

By MICHAEL BUSACK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The holiday season in America is like no other holiday on the face of the Earth. Why, just yesterday I saw a life-sized Santa doll in Wal-Mart that will actually hold your hand and dance with you to all of the holiday classics.

But before Christmas time is here, it is Thanksgiving that we celebrate. Turkey is eaten, naps are taken, and all is good. I am convinced that this is to allow American citizens to have a brief moment of holiday bliss before the onslaught that is Christmas music. For every black Friday, our radio station dials are bombarded by the torturous tradition that is Christmas music. Jessica Simpson, Bright Eyes and Mariah Carey all have their own Christmas albums. God Almighty, what is it that makes musicians think that we

See WATERS on page 7

Top five holiday flicks

With things being the way they are in Hollywood as of late, many of you may find yourself wondering exactly what you did to deserve such awful holiday films. How did we get placed on Tinsletown's naughty list, and why are we being punished with movies like "Christmas With the Kranks?" It's really no surprise that the Christmas film, much like the holiday itself, has become materialistic and exploited. Sure, holiday films have always been fluffy, gut-wrenching and about as sugary as the cookies we left for Santa back in the day, but as of late the holiday selection has been sparse, to say the least.

While flicks like "Christmas With the Kranks" sully film screens across the world, there are a group of classic Christmas movies that the holiday viewer can count on to bring Christmas cheer sans nausea. These movies all succeed in arousing a healthy dose of holiday guilt, which leads to, at the very least, charitable thoughts. They tug at the strings of our winter-worn, frost bitten hearts, making way for enough holiday cheer to make it possible to forgive loved ones for wearing Frosty the Snowman sweaters. Sure, there are plenty of treasures to find in the vaults of holiday films, but the following five movies are the staples in a well-rounded season of movie watching.

See MOVIES page 7

A collection of classics

MOVIES from page 6

"LOVE ACTUALLY"

The 2003 romantic comedy set in London follows the lives of a handful of British men and women, struggling to grasp the meaning of love and the Christmas season. In a shocking casting choice, Hugh Grant plays a stuttering, neurotic, overall nice guy. Colin Firth, Alan Rickman and Kiera Knightly also star in the feel good flick that, despite a less than 'happily ever after' ending, leaves viewers with a general feeling of warmth and happiness. You may want to hate this movie (trust me I really, really wanted to) but ultimately it is impossible not to turn off the DVD player with a smile on your face and a momentarily renewed faith in mankind.

"HOW THE GRINCH STOLE CHRISTMAS"

Personal preference dictates which version, the recent Jim Carey live-action or the older animated feature, you favor, but either way, "The Grinch" is one of the few movies whose arrival on airwaves marks the start of the holidays. The magic of Pioneer Valley native Dr. Seuss' tale of a disillusioned, societal outcast has not diminished with the passing years. Instead, it seems that it has gained more momentum. And no one can deny the chills they get listening to "You're a Mean One, Mr. Grinch."

"NATIONAL LAMPOON'S CHRISTMAS VACATION"

No film spreads holiday cheer like "Christmas Vacation." While the heart-to-heart dialogues, shoeless orphans and miraculous wish granting typical of the genre are all absent from this movie, the Griswold family's hellish holiday will at the very least make you thankful for your own crazy familial unit. Sledding disasters, wildlife-infested Christmas trees and even a good-intentioned kidnapping are just the tip of the iceberg for Chevy Chase's Clark Griswold.

"IT'S A WONDERFUL LIFE"

No holiday movie list would be complete without the inclusion of Jimmy Stewart's perennial classic. The mother of all Christmas movies, "It's a Wonderful Life" has it all: angels, a rousing sing along and a neat, moralistic ending to tie things up. The flick gains points for the nostalgia factor; it seems to capture the essence of a Christmas before the days of materialism.

"A CHRISTMAS STORY"

"You'll shoot you eye out!" Somehow this threat of accidental self-maiming defines Christmas for me. While I never lusted after a piece of weaponry the way that Ralphie (Peter Billingsly) yearned for his Red Rider bee bee gun, "A Christmas Story" can immediately revive that childhood agony and ecstasy of wanting something so badly you can almost feel it in your hands. As I get older the movie's subtle humor takes on a new meaning, proving it is more than just childhood wonderment that keeps me coming back to this film every Christmas Eve.

Meghan Healy is a Collegian editor.

The beauty of 'The Lost Christmas Eve'

WATERS from page 6

what the holidays really are. The Orchestra's 23-track disc radically contrasts with what most people know as Christmas music. With amazing energy each piece from start to finish conveys a sort of telepathic image of wintry perfection.

On the inside of the disc's jacket is a snippet of un-attributed poetry that succinctly sums up the experience of the work it reads, "Here the tragically beautiful, And the beautifully tragic, Drift through this night, In a last quest for magic." Though the sound of each track is different from the rest and the album as a whole lacks the telltale narrative of most rock-operas it does seem to all throb with the same basic message. The whole thing seems to be an artful plea to the listener not to lose the magic of the holiday season, it has a sense of urgency at times and at others the album sort of winds out into jazzier numbers that still tug on the heart strings just with a gentler approach.

The disc seems to take a conventional start with "Faith Noel," a blatant Christmas classic touched up with the ballad style draw out classic rock sound of an electric guitar. Slowing the pace a bit the next track, the title track of the album, has a slow dramatic sound indicative of classic operatic productions. The lyrics are a bit cheesy on the recording but would be perfect if they were being sung live in an opera house.

One of the more inspired pieces, bound to pique some interest is "Wizards of Winter." With a frantic and powerful contingent of violins and piano playing this track is definitely one of the most exciting pieces of Christmas music ever made.

"Christmas Nights in Blue," "Christmas Jazz" and "Christmas Jam" offer an interesting center to the album. Up to this point the music is inspired but still somewhat conventional. These three tracks take a more Bourbon Street approach to holiday music. The switch is sudden and may throw some listeners as the instrumental sound goes from that of a full-blown orchestra to a that of a blues bar quintet with the flip of a track.

The album comes to a close with "Different Wings," a classic acoustic guitar dominated track with angelic vocal accompaniment. The song is a sort of lullaby that draws the whole album to a close maybe an attempt to hush down the inner child the rest of the album so excited.

Formed in 1996 by the collaborative writing works of Paul O'Neill, Robert Kinkel and Jon Oliva the Orchestra was from its inception a unique and magical entity. Fueled by O'Neill's desire to create music that carried a superb emotional charge and his desire to break the conventions of the standard rock-opera the musical troupe has created some of the most innovative and surprisingly stirring contemporary holiday music.

The orchestra has actually split itself into two companies for their winter touring this season in order to bring their sound to any even greater audience than it has been able to in previous years. This tandem storm or holiday tunes is scheduled to perform 30 times between now and Dec. 30. Unfortunately the closest live shows to this area will be held in Pennsylvania and Maryland. Regardless of if you can see them live or not the recorded works are still breathtaking.

From classic opera music overlaid with a squealing electric guitar to classic slow burn jazz tunes "The Lost Christmas Eve" this disc has something to satisfy any occasion this holiday season. Now for the hard part, no playing air guitar.

THE NEWMAN CATHOLIC CENTER invites you to participate in the GIVING TREE

Do something wonderful for a local child.

NEWMAN CENTER
472 N. Pleasant Street
Amherst
www.umass.edu/catholic

Call or stop by with any questions 549-0300 x14.

STUDENTS, STAFF AND FACULTY:
- ☐ COME to the Newman Center (hint: it's located next to Mahar and SOM)
- ☐ FIND the Chapel (hint: look for the stained glass)
- ☐ CHOOSE an ornament from the Giving Tree.
- ☐ PURCHASE clothing for the child.
- ☐ WRAP it up, attach the ornament on top (label side up)
- ☐ BRING it to Newman by noon on Dec 12
- ☐ FEEL the love. Thank you!

FRUGAL FRIDAY
JOIN US FOR OUR SPECIAL SALES EVENT
FRIDAY, DECEMBER 10TH
ONE DAY ONLY
BUY 1 CLOTHING OR GIFT ITEM and get an item of equal or lesser value
50% OFF!*
UMASS AMHERST University of Massachusetts UNIVERSITY STORE
Campus Center • Phone: (413) 545-2619
www.umass.bkstr.com
*Does not apply to sale items, regular priced merchandise only. Not valid with any other offer.

Medeski, Martin and Wood rock NoHo

By Bradley Farberman
Collegian Staff

Northampton — At home (on stage, that is), Medeski, Martin and Wood are a lot like scientists. Tunes are specimens; performance is occasion for dissection and analysis. Conclusions are drawn, information is recorded and, before the last man has left the lab, all findings are destroyed.

Medeski, Martin and Wood
Pearl Street
Northampton
Dec. 3

Yeah, Medeski, Martin and Wood aren't your average scientists. But jazz is not your average science, and music's not your average...well, anything.

And Pearl Street's not your average venue. 10 times out of nine, the pride of Northampton packs its ballroom full of howling youngsters dying to get their ears on the main attraction. Night after night, the energy at Pearl Street rivals that of any Boston or New York city club and Friday night's foray didn't stray from the norm.

When MMW hit the stage, Northampton erupted. Many in attendance thought they knew what they were in for: Tales of Billy Martin's groove run far and wide these days and, undoubtedly, any number of kids at the show might have had the good fortune of catching the trio before.

But, on the eve of their performance, nothing can prepare you for what's to come next. You watch the opening band pack up and the techies test instruments and, as the minutes roll by you realize that what you're about to witness is something real, and something special.

And then, all at once, you're inside the sound. On stage (at home, that is), the games have begun. New England Conservatory grad John Medeski pounds cluttered clusters of distorted tones and space-age noises from an array of vintage electric keyboards; New England Conservatory dropout Chris Wood jumps on upright bass and throws out a funky, ostinato line, anchoring in the freaks around him – Martin coats the proceedings with noisy percussion and arrhythmic clatter.

Until Wood drops us into "Sasa," a track off their new album, "End Of The World Party (just in case)". The tune cooks and, with its big chorus (augmented by the Sex Mob horns on record), opens the show in a solid way.

"New Planet" is next, and Medeski goes to town on clavinet (if you're ever in a position to do so, please, watch his hands up close while he plays – the man's a genius). Wood rides high atop Martin's dirty drumming, and the trio coasts effortlessly on.

Musicians Medeski, Martin and Wood brought their unique sound to the Pearl Street Nightclub on Saturday, playing for a packed house.

The trio, pictured here at a gig earlier in 2004, put on an extraordinary performance in Northampton.

Into "Who The Fuck", a chilling PJ Harvey cover (MMW and Harvey are odd bedfellows, eh?). The tune's stop-time arrangement builds a gross amount of tension and, once a groove is captured, one is left with no choice but to breathe a sigh of relief and get moving.

Likewise, there was no choice but to move to "Shine It," an acoustic number. Medeski's approach here was unusually percussive (good for dancers) and his playing laid the groundwork for some virtuosic bass work (good for everyone).

And, according to "Curtis," the work is never done. In fact, it was during this piece that the trio worked their hardest. Get the tapes: "Curtis" is indisputable proof of ESP. You could just see the gears spinning in each of the musicians' heads as they spontaneously fell in and out of freedom, in unison, without the aid of vocal or physical cues, as if they had practiced doing so well beforehand.

But, of course, they hadn't. First and foremost, MMW are a band of improvisers, and thirteen years down the line, they're the best at what they do.

And they proved it during their outstanding, albeit skimpy (only 90 min.?) set at Pearl Street. Around 11 p.m., the boys brought the house down one last time with "Partido Alto," an animated vamp off The Dropper. The kids cheered like it was a Phish show; who knew it was three funky jazzers from Brooklyn? These cats have it down to a science.

Museum shows how the Cape weathers the storm

By Jay Lindsay
Associated Press

BREWSTER — South Beach has long offered scenic views of coastal Chatham, but it hasn't always been as easy to reach on foot.

In 1987, South Beach was a barrier beach running parallel to the shore before a winter hurricane pounded a hole in it, and the ocean rushed through to reshape the land. By 1994, the sands had connected South Beach to the mainland and nature had again altered the geography of Cape Cod.

Visitors to the Cape Cod Museum of Natural History quickly learn that such dramatic changes are common on the Cape. Pictures of South Beach as it moved landward are among the displays that highlight the Cape's dynamic nature.

"When you stick a peninsula out in the middle of the ocean, it becomes a very fragile piece of land," said naturalist Myles Marcus, a museum volunteer and it's former interim director. "That's why I think things happen so quickly here."

The museum also highlights a variety of land and sea life, from the blue heron the museum adopted as its symbol to whales that congregate in Cape waters. But seeing the changing Cape as it is, was and will be is a common theme in the museum's indoor exhibits, as well as the acres of surrounding land it uses as a sort of outdoor classroom.

"You never have to wait for change on the Cape," Marcus said. "Things change all the time here. It doesn't stay constant."

The museum is emerging from a troubled time that began when its funding dropped during the recent economic downturn. Layoffs last year pared the staff down to two year-round employees, so the museum relies heavily on a roster of 200 volunteers, such as Marcus, to handle tours and run its lecture series.

Betty Bagshaw, 74, a volunteer and frequent visitor said the museum augments what she's learned during three decades exploring the Cape.

"Our Cape is so different. You've got woods, you've got ocean ... you've got the bay," she said. "It's endless, just endless. I can learn so much just from coming here."

The museum is built on 80 acres of property that abut 300 acres of seaside conservation land. A nature trail that runs from the museum to the ocean leads through woods and salt marshes, and gives the museum guides a chance to talk about how different the land looked when the Pilgrims began to explore it in the early 1600s.

For instance, the Cape once boasted forests of hardwood trees, such as maple and oak, instead of the pine that grows now in its sandy soil. The settlers were farmers, and cleared the land to grow crops, Marcus said. By the 1860s, the Cape had been so thoroughly cleared of trees that Henry David Thoreau noted he could see from the edge of Cape Cod Bay to the ocean, Marcus said.

The trail also leads to dunes and an essential, though recently more prevalent, feature of today's Cape geography _ dune grass. Before the widespread grass plantings, Cape's sands blew wildly about, and people shoveled sand from the streets much like they shoveled snow, Marcus said.

Inside the museum, "The Cape Takes Shape" exhibit features a wave tank that erodes the sand below a model lighthouse to show how the ocean wears away at the coastline. Maps show the Cape's geography as it was 12,000 years ago, and project how the peninsula's shifting coastline _ which Marcus said recedes 3 1/2 feet per year _ will look in 8,000 years.

Marcus also points to a spot on the Cape Cod Bay where a populated island existed before the sea gradually swallowed in the 1950s.

The Cape will always be subject to the wind and waves, and Marcus said he hopes the museum will help people appreciate what the Cape is today, as well as the forces that will cause it to change.

"We're at the mercy of nature," he said.

Psst, UMass Amherst Seniors!

You're not going to look like this forever.

Take your senior yearbook pictures today!
Senior Portrait Sitting Dates are:

November 29	November 30	December 1
December 2	December 3	December 6
December 7	December 8	December 9
December 10	January 24	January 25
January 26	January 27	January 28

Go to www.ouryear.com and use school code 147 to schedule your appointment today

Panda East
Fine Chinese & Japanese Cuisine
165 North Pleasant St. Amherst, MA
Voted best Chinese food by UMass students!
Open Hours:
Mon - Thur: 11:30am - 10:00pm
Fri & Sat: 11:30am - 11:00pm
Sunday: 12pm-10pm
Delivery: 413.549.0077
Telephone: 413.256.8923
413.256.8924
We accept OCMP and all major credit cards.
We serve Chinese and Japanese food and also feature a sushi bar.

Where are YOU living next semester?
CHECK OUT
Puffton Village!
Excellent location...1/2 mile from UMass
Spacious Apartments--1,2 and 3 Bedroom Townhouses
All rents include heat, hot water and cooking gas
On site laundry, off street parking.
Basketball and Tennis courts.
Puffton Village
1040 N. Pleasant St. #410
Amherst, MA 01002
413-549-0145
www.pufftonvillage.com

APPLY FOR ARTS EDITOR AND ASSISTANT ARTS EDITOR.
CALL 545-1809 FOR MORE INFO
APPLICATIONS ARE DUE BY FRIDAY AT 3 P.M.

Mass Attack to battle No. 5 UNH

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

At the end of every practice, the players on the Massachusetts hockey team gather at center ice for some final words from coach Don Cahoon, and then scatter in different directions toward the showers or for some extra shots.

Yesterday, that gathering — normally a mild-mannered adjournment — ended with the Minutemen jumping up and down, cheering loudly, as if they'd just won a big game.

Not exactly the picture you would expect from a hockey team that has lost four of its last five games, including a 7-1 thrashing by a conference foe.

However, as the Minutemen (7-9-1, 4-4-1 Hockey East) head into tonight's game at New Hampshire (Whittemore Center, 7 p.m.), it might be the kind of confidence they exuded at the center of the Mullins Center Practice Rink that has been missing all this time. "Confidence seems to waver," Cahoon said, "and the confidence is directly related to our ability to coordinate our play. We're not very coordinated at this point, we're not playing together the way we need, and so that's really been the problem."

The Minutemen have not won a game on the road this season. Their last road win, in fact, was a 1-0 victory at Maine on Jan. 17, discounting their Hockey East semifinal win over UNH at Boston's FleetCenter. The Wildcats (10-3-2, 5-1-1 HEA) are third in the Hockey East standings, with first-place Boston University (8-1-0 HEA) and second-place Maine (6-3-1) within striking distance.

UNH has won six of its last eight, with only a 5-4 loss to Vermont on Nov. 23 and a 3-3 draw with UMass Lowell the only blemishes.

Other than the Colorado Springs World Arena, where they were bounced 3-1 by the Colorado College Tigers, the Minutemen haven't played a road game at an arena that approximates the large ice surface they call home at the Mullins Center. The Whittemore Center's 200-by-100-foot surface is just a hair bigger than the Mullins Center's, and while it can seem like an ocean to incoming opponents, it could be a more comfortable space for UMass, and right now Cahoon will take any help on the road he can get.

"I don't know if it's the sheet, or the mindset, or both," Cahoon said of his club's struggles away from home. "But the confidence and the assuredness, a lot of teams are confident on the road, and that can be a difference."

There seem to be a lot of unanswerable questions about the Minutemen, but the goaltender situation, though it has become a little more complex, has at least given Cahoon some options. The Minutemen began the season with a two-goalie rotation, as Gabe Winer and Tim Warner alternated starts.

However, sophomore Michael Waidlich was thrown into the mix against Denver on Nov. 27, and freshman Jamie Gilbert made two stops in relief against Merrimack on Nov. 6. The goaltending tandem has turned into a three-way combination of Waidlich, Winer, and Warner, with Gilbert on the outside looking in.

"The biggest problem is, I think we've struggled with having four goalies in camp," Cahoon said. "I think it's been difficult not only for Gabe, but difficult for Jamie Gilbert as well. We're focusing on just giving enough work to Gabe and [Warner] and [Gilbert] right now, and just getting Jamie to grow into a part of the future.

"Gabe's still our go-to guy, and Timmy's done a good job backing him up and picking up games, and Mike has shown us where he's at at this point. So we've got a good handle on it, we've just got to figure out how to work it."

Minutewomen hit the road to face Hofstra

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Following last Monday's dismantling of the Toledo Rockets, senior forward Brooke Campbell re-emerged from the locker room for post-game interviews wearing a black shirt that reads "Believe" in white lettering.

It's a motto she carries with her from her high school days in Baltimore, MD to the hardwood confines of the Mullins Center in Amherst. And after the way she has been playing over the last week, averaging a double-double over the last two games (11.5 rebounds, 13.5 points), she is making a bunch of believers out of those involved with Massachusetts women's basketball.

"I've been struggling lately on offense. I just had to find a game, get into it," Campbell said. "Now that I'm into it, this is not going to be my last double-double."

Hopefully, it won't be the last win of the season for the Minutewomen (4-3), as they are carrying the momentum of a their first three-game win streak of the year into Hempstead, N.Y., where they will take on the Hofstra Pride (2-2) to kick off a month-long road trip.

"Hopefully, the win on Monday really added to the kids' confidence because we shot very well," coach Marnie Ducko said. "The starters shot 70 percent, everybody had a chance to contribute; we had [a season-high] 28 assists. We played unselfish basketball - team basketball."

After accounting for one quarter of those assists (a career-high seven), point guard Katie Nelson is beginning to look like the Nelson of old.

"We're close to Katie's old right now," Ducko said. "Her expectations have been high. She's got to stay with it and continue to believe in herself, and she'll be great."

What's more noticeable, however, is the slow but steady movement of backup point guard Monique Govan into a more regular role in the one spot. Nelson's seven assists came on just 23 minutes of play, her lowest total all year, meaning the defensive-minded Govan is showing more prowess in her senior year in Amherst.

Like UMass, Hofstra has been priding itself on its rebounding, as both squads enter tonight's matchup with almost identical rebounding statistics. The Pride average 40 rebounds per game, while the Minutewomen stand just one notch ahead with 41.1 per game.

Averaging over 66 points per game, the Pride feature three players averaging in double figures in scoring, and in turn will be relying on Gigi McCollan (15.5 points per game), Vanessa Giddien (14.3), and Lizanne Murphy (10.5) to spark some offense.

Struggling Werner looking to turn things around on the ice

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

Last Friday night after the Massachusetts hockey team defeated Providence 3-2 at the Mullins Center, questions during the press conference momentarily shifted towards one specific player.

It was an important win for the Minutemen; they all are. But after dropping four straight road games, UMass returned home to play a Hockey East opponent for the first time in 14 days.

Then someone asked junior captain Stephen Werner to talk about his individual play after a big, team win. He admitted that it was the best he has played in the past few games.

Rewind the clock to last spring. The Minutemen just lost a triple-overtime game to Maine in the Hockey East championship at the FleetCenter. They had just completed their finest hockey season since the team returned to varsity status in 1993, but it wasn't a sign of immediate things to come.

They were going to lose four of their best players — Greg Mauldin, Thomas Pöck and Nick Kuiper to the NHL and Mike Warner to graduation — and the rebuilding process would have to start yet again.

This time, the rebuilding would be shaped around Werner, and it was made clear when he was named team captain before this season started.

In house, they know they are temporarily rebuilding, but they are also trying to prove to the outside world that their march to the biggest hockey stage in New England last year was no Cinderella story.

Because of this, the expectations are high, around Werner, around coach Don Cahoon and around the new freshman class that must pick up the slack of last season's departures.

As they fast approach the halfway point of the 2004-05 season, the Minutemen (7-9-1, 4-4-1 HEA) are finding it tough to validate last season's remarkable run.

With Werner admittedly playing inconsistent hockey so far this season, it is up to him to make sure this team — his team — rises back to that top-tiered level. And he knows and can't just be done by riling his teammates up in the locker room; he needs to perform for them on the ice.

"What's important is hard work and playing smart and playing hard," Werner said. "If I can do those things out on the ice, then hopefully it'll help the team move in that direction as well. Goals are going to come. You're going to get bounces, and your scorers are going to score, and you're going to get scoring from other players as well. I think the most important thing (for myself) is just doing the little things out there, trying to play really hard and play smart."

When he plays well, the way he is capable of playing, the way the Washington Capitols, who drafted him in the third round in 2003, know he can play, it shows up in the nightly box score's biggest statistical category, the win column.

"You look at the games we've done well, the games at home: the Lowell game, the Merrimack game at home, the couple of Providence games at home, he's been very good in both of those games. Those have been his best games," Cahoon said. "I thought he played really well at [Colorado College] and not nearly as well at Denver so most of the games we've done well in, he's been a part of that process."

But with Werner's inconsistency comes the team's inconsistency, which has been the plague of Massachusetts hockey this year.

The questions were asked when UMass split home-and-home series with teams like Merrimack and Providence, following a strong showing with a flat performance.

The questions stop being asked when the Minutemen tied No. 1 ranked Boston College and follow it up with a trouncing of Mercyhurst two days later. It looked as though they were cured. Now, with the players' roles a little more established, Werner has settled in and is beginning to perform within himself.

"I tried not to put too much pressure on myself in terms of I've got to score goals because Mauldin's gone, Tommy's gone [Kuiper] and Mikey Warner are gone," Werner said. "Now I'm starting to say maybe I do need to put a little more pressure on myself. After Friday (against Providence), doing the little things right on the ice is a start and the scoring will come. I definitely am going to put more pressure on myself to be a little more successful in that department."

He noted that it helps when players like Matt Anderson and PJ Fenton have done a nice job providing some steady offense to back him up, and Werner's maturity shines as he takes a step back and puts the still-young season in perspective in terms of UMass stance in Hockey East. He also hasn't forgotten that last year's team faced a similar tough streak during the same point in the season.

Likewise, Cahoon has still kept his optimistic perceptive on the man who he knows can step up and turn this team around.

"When Steve is playing at a high level, he's terrific," Cahoon said. "One of the things we're trying to shape is that he plays every game like it's the last game he's going to be playing. We know what his top-end is all about, and it's plenty good enough. It's all-league, All-American, all-everything in terms of college hockey. He just needs to be able to learn to sustain that level of play from game to game."

SPRING BREAK!
DAYTONA BEACH FLORIDA
#1 Party Destination!
"Spend less on your travel, more on your party"
Bus & Hotel $339 per person - quint occupancy | Room Only $199
Portraits include:
> 5 nights beach front accommodations!
> Optional round trip transportation!
> Full schedule of parties & night club events!
> Optional Excursions to Disney World!
LIMITED SPACE!! $50 Deposit Due NOW! Prices increase Dec. 15th!
Organize a small group and travel free! Call for details.
For more info, or to book, visit:
STA TRAVEL
Room 224 Campus Center
or Call 9413-256-1261
Arrangements by Breakaway Tours 1-800-465-4257

We can't promise the hard abs, but we can guarantee the smooth skin.
Laser Hair Removal
Call for a free consultation with Dr. Bob Weltzman, Medical Director
AMHERST LASER & SKIN CARE CENTER
196 North Pleasant St. Suite 11
Amherst, MA 01002
(413) 253-2213
www.amherstlaser.com

ALL creative FOOD & BEVERAGE UP!
GRAND OPENING
ALL YOU CAN EAT BUFFET
With Countless combinations of vegetables, poultry, fish, and meat.
Choose from 12 specially created sauces!!!
OPEN 7 DAYS A WEEK FOR LUNCH AND DINNER
Sunday Breakfast
Design your own omelets, pancakes, and french toast 10-4pm
A Fantastic Full Bar Menu
Create Your Own Meal
11:30am - 9 pm
48 Russell Street, Route 9, Hadley
413-584-5155
www.allfireduphadley.com

Keep Your Job Search Warm this Winter!
Take it With You!
It's easy to upload your resume and search job postings wherever you are!
Call 413-545-2224 or email ccnhelp@acad.umass.edu with your full name, SPIRE #, major and grad year for logon information & instructions on how to use our system.
Once you have your username and password, go to www.umass.edu/careers
CareerServices

UM to host UConn

HOOPS from page 12

do to make our mark on the series."

Currently ranked No. 7 in the nation, finding its way into the win column against this Huskies team will be easier said than done for UMass. A year after watching First Team All-Americans Ben Gordon and Emeka Okafor leave school to become NBA Lottery picks and losing Taliek Brown, the Big East's all-time winningest point guard, to graduation, Calhoun and the Huskies still have a plethora of talent and size that will pose match up problems for the Minutemen on both ends of the court.

With five players in its rotation 6-foot-9 or taller, UConn is a relentless rebounding team that clearly possesses a significant size advantage over UMass. Led by sophomore forward Josh Boone, a part-time starter as a freshman last season who averages 15.8 points and 11 rebounds per game this season, and classmate Charlie Villanueva, a former top recruit who has chipped in averaging 9.5 points and five rebounds per game, the Huskies have averaged an astounding 60-plus rebounds per contest, and have outrebounded their opponents by an average of 40 rebounds per game.

"I've never seen a team with rebounding numbers like that," Lappas said at Wednesday's Alumni Association sports luncheon. "They are clearly as good a rebounding team as there is in the country, and we definitely have our work cut out for us."

Another big contributor up front for the Huskies has been freshman Rudy Gay, a 6-foot-9 former McDonald's All-American who was at the top of the 2004 recruiting class and chose UConn over a number of prominent programs across the nation. Averaging 9.5 points and seven rebounds in an average of 23 minutes per game, Gay has already shown superior athletic ability and an impressive knack for getting to the rim.

"He's the real deal," Lappas said of Gay. "He can run, shoot, rebound and jump through the roof, he's going to be a very good player if he stays."

While Connecticut's overwhelming size up front has been a driving force towards its success in the early going, Calhoun's offense is complimented well by solid perimeter shooting and consistent guard play that make the Huskies a near-impossible match up.

Along with sophomore Marcus Williams, who has taken over for Brown at point guard, Rashad Anderson has emerged as UConn's leading scorer this season at 16 points per game despite shooting an uncharacteristic 29 percent from beyond the arc.

Joining Anderson in giving Calhoun an arsenal of premier shooters is unheralded forward Denham Brown, who has connected on 54 percent of his 3-point attempts, and is second on the team in scoring at 12.5 points per game.

"They both have the green light to shoot from anywhere on the floor," Lappas said. "Good shots, bad shots, open shots, shots with a hand in their face, they can shoot it whenever they want, and they're great shooters. We need to make sure we get out and cover them if we want to contain them offensively."

Is it finally UMass' turn to win?

MCGOVERN from page 12

smiled, and as the final seconds slipped off the clock, the Minutemen were up 30-9.

If you have followed UMass basketball at all over the last few years you know what happened next.

My buzz was going strong; I was running off the negative energy that was produced by the big blue sea known as my section. Nothing could go wrong, the Minutemen were rolling, but then the whole scene imploded on itself in a hurry.

UMass lost that night, 59-48, and was outscored 50-to-18 in the second half.

On the ride home I was sticky. The contents of the 20 ouncer were dried, and as I drove in silence, I was candy-coated and confused.

So here comes UConn again poised and dominating everyone in its way. Not only that, but the Huskies have set the bar for the Minutemen. UConn defeated Northeastern 97-60 on Monday night, dominating the lesser Huskies in every aspect of the game.

Now the Huskies of UConn the No. 7 team in the country and, oh yea, the defending national champions, are coming to Amherst. UConn is coming in as huge favorites, and if they win, no one will think twice.

It's the other side of the spectrum that will pack the house.

The Minutemen need to come out poised and play together. They always get up for this game, but UMass will have to play perfect in order to make history.

So here's another chapter in this one-sided sandbox fight. As usual the Maroon and White have an arsenal to put up a fight, and just maybe set those in attendance loose on the hardwood of the Mullins Center.

I guess we'll just see what kind of day it is.

Bob McGovern is a Collegian Columnist. He can be reached at McGovern@dailycollegian.com.

What the Minutemen must do

KEYS TO THE GAME from page 10

Huskies, then all four of these players, among others, must knock down open shots consistently.

Shooting just five percent from 3-point range and barely better than that from inside the arc, Bowers' woes can likely be attributed to what Lappas calls "Achilles tendonitis." Nonetheless, the Maroon and White cannot afford a sub par effort from any of its main scorers, and Bowers must find a way to chip in and make the shots he is capable of making — whatever shots those may be.

Keep Freeman Involved

As he has, and will, over the course of UMass' 2004-05 season, Freeman will draw double teams from buzzer to buzzer tonight, and must find a way to work out of them and contribute in the scorebook. After being held to just nine points against All-American center Ronny Turiaf in a loss to Gonzaga, Freeman must show he can get the best of other talented big men as he continued to establish himself on the national hoops scene, and must be able to break through against vicious double and triple teams tonight for UMass to have success.

At 6-foot-8, Freeman will be outsized across the board with whoever Calhoun employs to guard him, and must find a way to score despite this. As UMass' foremost scoring option, he must remain persistent on offense and on the glass, and capitalize on any opportunity he receives to score or get to the line. If he is able to move bodies down low and force UConn's big men into foul trouble, then he will keep Calhoun's front line rotation back on its heels and put his team in position to develop a rhythm on both ends.

Stay Out of Foul Trouble

Very simply, the Minutemen have little to no chance against the Huskies if either Freeman or Stephane Lasme has to leave the game prematurely due to foul trouble.

Without a legitimate option in the post outside of freshmen Lawrence Carrier, who prefers to play the wing, and Jeff "Big Deli" Salovski, who is still a step or two behind in his conditioning, UMass will be caught with its pants down if it doesn't have one or both of its big men to combat UConn's mammoth front line.

Neither Lasme nor Freeman can pick up any cheap fouls, and must therefore be extremely cautious in how they play defense and rebound. If they are able to remain aggressive and hold their own without fouling, they will greatly improve UMass' chances of holding its own.

Feel like the only one on campus without an iPod?

You are.

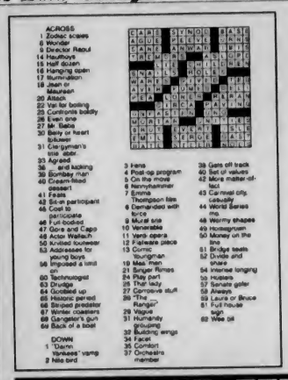
Take advantage of your student discount before you head home for the holidays.

iPod Mini $229 · iPod from $269

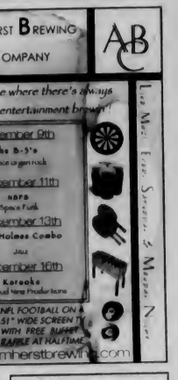
iPod Photo from $469 · iPod U2 $329

Stop by the University Store today to get yours.
The UMass University Store, Campus Center, Amherst, MA 01003

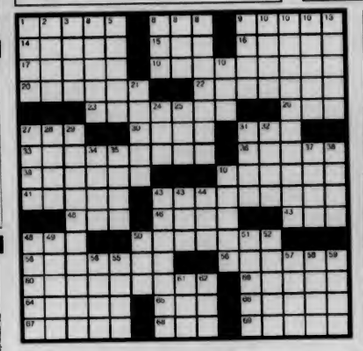
UMass Amherst University of Massachusetts UNIVERSITY STORE
Campus Center • Phone: (413) 545 2619
www.umass.bkstr.com



Apple, the Apple logo and iPod are trademarks of Apple Computer, Inc., registered in the U.S. and other countries.



The Score is coming soon!



• Nikoukari Charron Mahoney PC •
ATTORNEYS AT LAW
• Family Law Matters
• Criminal - OUI
• Immigration
• Landlord/Tenant Matters
Mondana Nikoukari, Esq.
Samuel L. Charron, Esq.
Christopher K. Mahoney, Esq.
2 Mattoon Street • Springfield, MA 01105
737-8008
www.ncm-pc.com

GREAT Reasons to use UHS Eye Care Services
1 → Savings on routine eye exams for students at UMass
2 → A great place to get contact lenses
3 → FREE sample start-up contact lens solutions
4 → Same day replacement of disposable contact lenses, in many cases
5 → Contact lenses mailed directly to your home or office
6 → FREE eyeglass adjustments and one year warranty on frames
SPECIAL OFFER: 10 PERCENT STUDENT DISCOUNT ON ALL FRAMES AND EYEGLASS LENSES!*
"I invite you to use the Eye Care Services"
* Cannot be combined with other insurance discounts.
For appointments or questions, call 577-5383
Frederick H. Bloom, O.D. Director, UHS Eye Care Services
UHS EYE CARE SERVICES

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Don't stress out so much. Stressing won't help you do better on your finals.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Double check to make sure you've done everything you're supposed to.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
A bubble a day keeps the squares away. Everyone knows that.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Today you'll notice lots of eccentric people that you never noticed before.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Today you need a hug more than anything.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Lately your body hasn't been feeling quite right. Give it time to heal.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
It seems like you've been waiting a long time, but it hasn't really been that long.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You should have gone to see Cold Duck Complex last night.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You've been keeping to yourself too much lately; time to socialize.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You don't want to get too far away from the tissues. You might need them.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
It's either on or off. There is no in between with these things.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Everything in your life seems to be strangely connected.

Quote of the Day

"When all else fails, there's always delusion."

-Conan O'Brien

Do You know THE SCORE?
The Massachusetts Daily Collegian's annual sports magazine. Available at selected newsstands and at the Mullins Center.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Announcements

Your exams are very important. Your ultimate destiny is the most important. "Final Frontier" coming to your campus soon. www.finalfrontier.tv Check out www.allabout-god.com

Apartment for Rent

Amherst 2 Bedroom Condo On Bus Line 950+ 256-5467

1 bedroom condo, kitchen, sitting room call Ruobina at 549-6091

One bedroom apartment for rent. Puffton Village. Starting in January. 765/month. Heat and hot water included. Call 978-502-9036

2 Bedroom 2 Bathroom Lease from Jan-Aug $1,100/Month, Utilities included Contact Jenna @ 917-753-3591

Apartment for Rent

Need an Apt. for 2nd Semester? Short Term Leases, Free Heat, Huge Bedrooms Call The Boulders 256-8534

Brandywine Apts. 1 Bedroom units Available Jan 1, 2005 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywinegates.com Stop by or call 549-0600

Auto for Sale

2001 Toyota Corolla S Spd 55K Asking $7500.00 549-5048

2001 Nissan Xterra Four wheel drive, excellent condition automatic transmission, Loaded, for photos and more information go to http://hometown.aol.com/mathesonjr/index.html or call 413-536-8077

Computers

Pentium Laptop $99- Pentium III Desktop $99- 413-584-8857

Employment

MAD SCIENTISTS WANTED! PT to conduct fun science after-school programs, parties, etc. Requirements: Experience with groups of children, enthusiasm, car. Performance experience a plus. 1-800-338-5711

Student Brand Manager Motivated? Outgoing? Enthusiastic? Want to build your resume? CampusFundraiser is currently hiring a Student Brand Manager to promote our company on your campus. Start in January. Manage promotions on campus, work 10 hours a week, $100/week salary plus bonuses. Learn more at http://www.campusfundraiser.com/SBM.asp

Employment

Wanted: Energetic People for Spring Break Flyering / Promotions (Hourly Wage Paid)! Be a Trip Organizer and Earn Free Trips! Call STA Travel / Breakaway Tours 1-800-465-4257

Student to Assist Local Homeowner, Yardwork + moving furniture $10.00/hr Call Fred 413-734-0526

Returning to the Greater Boston area this Winter break? Want a fun, flexible job working with kids in their homes? Look no further....call Parents in a Pinch, Inc. TODAY if you have childcare experience/references, at least 1 full weekday free and want to earn $11/hr. Car helpful. 617-739-KIDS Fill out application at: www.parentsinapinch.com

"Bartending" $300/Day Potential. No Experience Nesc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Entertainment

DJ for Hire Mission 101 Ent. Contact Fredy at 413-687-3849

Room for Rent

Room for rent in five bedroom apartment preferably girl $402.50/month Less than half a mile from campus and town Call Elana 253-9694

For male Grad Student/Professional. Large, quiet, comfortable. 15 min. walk to UMass on Bushne. Avail Jan 549-1578

Roommate Wanted

1 Bedroom Avail in 2 Bedroom Apt Rent 425 Month Contact 917-270-8127

325/month inclusive call 413-775-9997

Services

Need Just Evacuation and Repatriation Coverage? Check out BETA! $250,000 Evacuation, $25,000 Repatriation COST is $18 for 6 MONTHS! Online enrollment, emailed verification of coverage www.betins.com

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house Certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

Travel

1SPRING BREAK Largest selection of Destinations, including Cruises! VIP Club Parties & FREE trips. Epicurean Tours 1-800-231-4-FUN www.BREAKNOW.com

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, Florida. Campus Reps Wanted! Free Meals & Parties! 1-800-234-7007 endlesssummer-tours.com

Spring Break Bahamas Celebrity Party Cruise! 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Nassau, Jamaica, From $459! Panama City & Daytona $159! www.SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

StudentCity.com The Ultimate Spring Break Experience. 1-888-SpringBreak or www.StudentCity.com to reserve today.

Travel

Spring Break 2005- Travel with STS, America's #1 Student Tour Operator to Jamaica, Cancun, Acapulco, Bahamas and Florida. Now hiring on-campus reps. Call for group discounts. Information/Reservations 1-800-648-4849 or www.ststravel.com.

SPRING BREAK '05
SAVE $100 PER ROOM
Clip & Send or Use Code: PRMSR; Online
1-800.426.7710

Wanted

Snowboard events intern $50/day stipend. For job description email jfriend@dkcrfield.edu

Happy Anniversary PW and B.R! (Wishing you Many More!) Love, Bonter

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 9, 2004 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Bring on the champs!

Archrival Connecticut invades Amherst for 9 p.m. showdown

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Throughout its 12 seasons as the home of Massachusetts men's basketball, the William D. Mullins Memorial Center has hosted a number of the nations top basketball programs.

From an epic contest with Tim Duncan's '95-96 Wake Forest squad, to a match up with a Roy Williams-led Kansas team in 1998 to battles with the likes of Florida State, Pittsburgh, Boston College and conference rival Temple, the Mullins Center has been an integral part of the history, tradition and success of the once-proud UMass program.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Sophomore Maurice Maxwell.

Yet tonight, before a national television audience and what is expected to be a rabid, season-best crowd, the Maroon and White will take to the Mullins Center hardwood to face an opponent the likes of which the 9,493-seat arena has never seen, as eternal rival Connecticut will become the first time reigning National Champions to ever play in Amherst.

Tonight's game will mark the 107th meeting between the Minutemen and the Huskies, with UConn leading the all-time series 68-38. Tip-off is slated for 9 p.m., with the game being broadcast on ESPN2. Dave Revsine will call the game, with Len Elmore handling color commentary

"This is always a big game for us, and a game we're going to need to work hard to prepare for," fourth-year UMass coach Steve Lappas said. "It's an opportunity for us. It's a chance to go out there and compete against one of the best programs in America, and see how we measure up, but we have to be prepared."

While the Huskies have dominated the all-time series with UMass of late, the numbers are somewhat skewed due to the fact that UConn coach Jim Calhoun did not schedule the Minutemen during their highly successful seasons under coach John Calipari in the early-to-mid nineties.

Despite having won the last 13 meetings between the two schools and 21 of the last 22, Connecticut has only played in the Mullins Center twice, having earned wins in 1998 and 2000, while UMass' last win in the series came in overtime at the Curry Hicks Cage in December of 1983.

Therefore, Lappas realizes the urgency from within the UMass basketball community to finally get the best of the Huskies.

"This is a series that will always continue as long as I'm here, but we need to win one of these games for it to be a good series for us," Lappas said. "I have a great relationship with [Jim Calhoun] and I have a lot of respect for him from my time in the Big East...[and] we'll always play each other, but the time has come for us to put a solid effort together and do what we need to

See HOOPS on page 10

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Preseason Atlantic 10 Player of the Year Rashaun Freeman, shown here shooting over a Yale defender early this season was held to just nine points in UMass loss to Gonzaga after averaging 15.6 per game last season.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Senior captain Anthony Anderson is 0-3 in his career against UConn.

A good night to beat UConn?

Bob McGovern

The first few weeks of winter have been an interesting time here in Western Massachusetts. The snow has fallen, melted, frozen, and then it came down again. It's such an uneasy feeling of anticipation. Everyday you warily approach the door and brace for the possibilities of snow, ice, rain, or just the bitter cold of a New England morning.

Yet sometimes, it's just a nice day.

It appears that the Massachusetts men's basketball team has been following winter's trends this season. The Minutemen have been good, average, and at times pretty hard to watch.

The UMass fan base has been watching and preparing for another roller coaster year, in hopes that one day, everything with come together as it should. With signs of brilliance and collapse in each of its four games, the Minutemen have yet to really play for a full contest.

So tonight, in front of what should be the biggest crowd to watch the Maroon and White play in Amherst in nearly three years, UMass will be looking for that random fall day, lost in the midst of winter. It will try to do something it hasn't done since Dec. 15, 1983.

Defeat the Connecticut Huskies.

For most people interested in college basketball, tonight's game appears to be just another blowout on the calendar. When people see UMass versus UConn on the stat bar, scrolling along the bottom of their favorite sports show, they chalk it up to the Huskies and move on.

For myself, I try not to think about it. After you watch UMass play UConn enough times, you start to realize that anything is possible. These teams have played three times in as many seasons and I was there for two of them, both exciting, unexpected contests resulting in a Minutemen collapse.

During the 2001-'02 season, UMass was in a similar situation as they are now. It had just dropped a game to a lesser Holy Cross team, which was followed by an 80-78 nail-biting loss to Boston College. The Minutemen came full-circle this season and were outclassed by Northeastern then beaten by a worthy foe in Gonzaga.

Three years ago, in front of 8,894 fans at the Mullins Center, the Minutemen came out slow but played consistent enough to keep the fans interested. With the most energy I had seen at a college athletic event in my life, I was pleased with the performance regardless of the loss.

The following year, things were much different.

I drove over the frozen strip of route 91 that connects Amherst to Hartford, straight into the wolf den. As usual, I showed up late to the game, and found myself running around the Hartford Civic Center, just looking for a place to get in.

If you have never been to the Civic Center, it is quite the loud arena when the fans are upset. As I entered with less than half the period remaining, dirty hat, and maroon shirt, I turned around to see that UMass was up... big.

I flipped back around just in time to get nailed in the face with a 20 oz. drink, followed by laughter and boos from those in the UConn section that I had mistakenly purchased tickets in.

One might think that the fizzy bath would of upset me, but no, not then. The splash was a perfect complement to the shock of what was happening. I sat,

See MCGOVERN on page 10

What the Minutemen must do to win

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

For members of the Massachusetts men's basketball program and all those who support and follow the Minutemen, Jim Calhoun's Connecticut Huskies are the bad guys — the bitter rival that is easy to hate, hard to compete with and near-impossible to beat. Despite their best efforts, the Minutemen haven't beaten UConn since 1983, and have watched the Huskies capture national titles in 1998 and 2003.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Josh Boone, right, is the Huskies leading rebounder at 11 rebounds per game.

However with the dawn of a new season comes hope, and with that a slight glimmer of faith. Tonight, Massachusetts and Conn-ecticut meet again in the latest renewal of a rivalry that has the potential to be great, yet has never reached the point of being competitive. In a make-or-break season for UMass and coach Steve Lappas, the opportunity to finally topple its favorite enemy is clearer than ever.

With the raucous UMass student section likely to be filled for the first time since the last meeting between the two schools three years ago, UMass has a chance to re-ignite a passion for basketball this campus once cherished with just one win. To do just that, here's what the Minutemen must do:

Rebound, Rebound, Rebound

Entering play averaging more than 60 rebounds per game, the Huskies are easily the best rebounding squad the Minutemen will face all season. While it's not realistic for Lappas to ask his team to break even with UConn on the glass, the Minutemen must avoid being dominated on both ends if they want to hang in the game.

With five solid big men 6-foot-9 or taller, UMass is clearly outmatched and outsized along the front line. With that being said, whoever Lappas employs to guard Josh Boone, Charlie Villanueva, Rudy Gay, Hilton Armstrong and Ed Nelson/Marcus White must box out, and box out consistently. If UConn's big men are allowed to camp out down low, their superior height and athleticism will translate into one-shot possessions for UMass and fast-breaks for the Huskies on one end, and easy put-backs for UConn on the other end.

Slow the Pace of the Game

Northeastern proved to Lappas and his players that they must slow the game down to be successful, and that will be no different against UConn. Calhoun's aggressive man-to-man defense is designed around denying position and the ball all over the offensive end to force bad shots, so UMass must be persistent in enforcing its will on offense.

Unlike what they did against NU, the Minutemen must be patient and work the shot clock, much like they did in jumping out to a 31-9 halftime lead over the Huskies in Hartford, Conn. two seasons ago. If they can hold their own on the offensive glass and thus prevent UConn from running up-and-down the court, the Minutemen will have the opportunity to set up their offense and execute it as planned, which will likely translate into numerous touches inside for Freeman, and open shots for UMass' perimeter players.

Make Open Shots

If the aforementioned assertion of its offensive gameplan goes as planned, UMass clearly must make the open shots it earns to have success. While Anthony Anderson and Maurice Maxwell have enjoyed solid starts shooting the ball, backcourt mate Art Bowers and forward Jeff Viggiano have not. If the Minutemen hope to steal one from the

See KEYS TO THE GAME on page 10

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Rashad Anderson has shot just 29 percent from 3-point range this season, but still leads UConn with an average of 15 points per game.

NEWS

the ONION

VOLUME 99 ISSUE 00 AMERICA'S FINEST NEWS SOURCE DECEMBER 2004

Sales Of Guys Gone Wild Video Disappointing

see ENTERTAINMENT page 4C

Area Horse Hung Like Horse

see OUTDOORS page 9D

THE NEW LONGER LASTING AXE EFFECT.

Above: The enormous bra

Enormous Bra Found

HERKIMER, NY—An enormous bra was found in the gutter near the corner of East Lester Street and Jefferson Avenue Monday. The owner of the bra is not known at this time.

The off-white, 48DD Just My Size bra, with its contoured cups and reinforced six-hook back closure, was discovered at approximately 9:30 p.m. by a pair of Herkimer County Community College students.

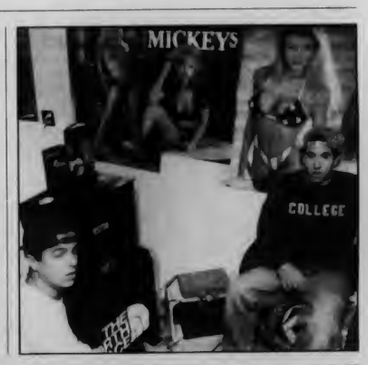
"Me and Jeremy were coming back from the sub shop and, all of a sudden, we were like, 'Whoa—what is that in that puddle by the curb?'" Craig McCrae, 19, told reporters. "Jeremy was like, 'Holy shit, dude, I think it's some kind of humongous bra.'"

"This giant fucking bra was just laying right there in the gutter," said Jeremy Reznicki, 20, who noted that he almost stepped on it. "I was like, what the hell?"

Reznicki said he and McCrae stood staring at the bra for several minutes, encouraging passersby to "check out the giant bra," before continuing on their way home, leaving the item unmolested.

Herkimer police officials said they have few leads in the case.

see BRA page 6



Posters Of Naked Women Fail To Draw Real Naked Women To Dorm Room

BRAMP, KS—A trio of posters depicting scantily clad women, hung recently in a Bramp State University dorm room, have been found to have "little to no effect" in facilitating the presence of actual naked women in that room, a Bramp State housing department study reports.

The posters, manufactured by alcoholic beverage companies as promotional items, were intended to establish a fun, party-like atmosphere, in which the presence of naked women would be suggested and encouraged. But their actual effect was "minimal if not entirely nonexistent," the study's findings indicate.

"The thinking was that these posters would set a tone," freshman Chad Drubham said. "We enjoy beer here in Selham Hall West room 508, and we share an equally enthusiastic

see POSTERS page 6

Short-Distance Relationship Too Much Work

Left: Froeger and Petrakis run into each other yet again.

GASTONIA, NC—After four months together, sales manager Jack Petrakis, 29, and paralegal Justine Froeger, 26, reported Tuesday that dating someone who lives in the same building isn't worth the hassle.

"Everyone warned me that these short-distance things never work out," said Froeger, who recently spent a night with a friend in nearby Charlotte just to escape the stifling proximity of her short-distance boyfriend. "But I thought I would be different, that my love would be strong enough to handle the less than 1,000 feet separating Jack from me."

Froeger, who lives in a one-bedroom on the fifth floor of Manning Towers, and Petrakis, who occupies a studio on the fourth, met in the building's laundry room last September.

see RELATIONSHIP page 6

NEWS IN BRIEF

Woman Ejected From Bed In Cracker-Eating Incident

IRVINE, CA—Citing "insufficient looks," Charles Hausner, 31, threw Amy Glass out of his bed Monday after catching the 27-year-old consuming Saltines. According to Hausner, Glass was not attractive enough to warrant special in-bed cracker-eating privileges. "Had she looked like Claudia Schiffer, I most certainly would have let the transgression slide and allowed her to stay in my bed and get crumbs all over the sheets," Hausner said. "But she doesn't, so I had no choice but to kick her out."

NS/ND/C/DWF Wondering Why She Can't Find Someone

MINNEAPOLIS—Susan Stenerud, a divorced, white, non-smoking, non-drinking Christian who has placed "countless" personals ads over the years, wondered aloud Monday why she can't find someone special. "All I want is to find a D/D-free NS/ND/C/SWM who shares my strong morals and doesn't waste his time going to bars and parties," the 32-year-old said. "For some reason, no men seem to respond to that description."

Girlfriend Dumped After Forwarding Stupid Link

GREAT FALLS, MT—Amanda Manis was dumped Monday after forwarding boyfriend Anthony Madrid a link for the humor web site LunaticLobsters.com. "I was convinced that I had found my soulmate, my kindred spirit, the woman I could grow old with," Madrid said. "Then, out of nowhere, Mandy e-mails me this stupid link. When I saw those Flash-animation cartoons, I knew it was over." Madrid has previously dumped girlfriends for owning roller blades, buying Vegemite, and watching Craig Kilborn.

Ugly Man With Huge Penis Unsure How To Get The Word Out

AUBURN, ME—Overweight and balding Ira Groff, 37, is unsure how to get the word out about his 11-inch penis. "In theory, I could fumble around in my wallet for something and then—whoops!—an extra-large condom falls out," the acne-scarred Groff said Monday. "But that would come off as staged." Groff has also pondered wearing tighter pants, leaving penile-reduction-surgery brochures around his workspace, or sporting a button that reads, "Ask Me About My Huge Cock."

Peeping Tom Tired Of Watching People Watch Television

COLORADO SPRINGS, CO—Jonathan Hargrove, a Colorado Springs-area peeping Tom, expressed exasperation Tuesday, when a fifth consecutive victim did nothing more with her evening than watch hours of television. "I thought peering in on strangers would be more, I don't know, exciting," said the 44-year-old Hargrove, speaking from his hydrangea-bush hiding place. "I guess I somehow expected other people's lives to be more sexy or interesting than mine." Hargrove did note, however, that Big Brother 2 is "really starting to heat up."

Beautiful Nurse Gives Teen Enema

HUNTINGTON, WV—A routine stay at Huntington General Hospital turned humiliating Monday, when Bradley Fiddich, 17, received an enema from shapely, smooth-skinned nurse Stephanie Goodwin, 22. "Oh, my God, I want to kill myself," said Fiddich following his degrading encounter with the attractive, single Goodwin, who rolled him over and inserted an enema tube into his anus, draining the contents of his colon. "I can never look at another girl as long as I live." Fiddich noted with alarm that while conversing with Goodwin, he learned that the nurse's younger sister is in his science class.

Slow-Motion Woman Emerges Glistening From Pool

LOS ANGELES—An unidentified woman in her early 20s emerged from a large, backlit swimming pool at approximately one-third normal speed Monday. According to witnesses, the woman, accompanied by sultry saxophone music, began emerging from the pool at sunset with incandescent pool lights highlighting the droplets of water running down her lithe frame. Upon exiting, the woman reportedly closed her eyes and slowly leaned her head back in preparation for toweling-off procedures.

the ONION presents

Dating Tips

The dating world can be a bewildering place. Here are some tips to help you navigate the perilous waters of love:

- Ladies: Your date's salary divided by your own equals the base you should let him get to on the first date.
- If you are overweight and socially awkward, consider "online dating." You can go on a dragonslaying adventure instead of to a movie, play games on Pogo.com instead of dancing, and masturbate instead of having real sex.
- Do not bathe for several days prior to a date to get your pheromones good and strong.
- Never date a married person, unless he or she is just about to leave his or her spouse and simply waiting for the right moment.
- When planning a romantic candlelit dinner, the right music can create the perfect mood. Put on The Best Of Spike Jones to create a freewheeling, anything-goes atmosphere.
- Maintain a casual, "Let's just have fun" attitude until the other person starts seeing someone else. Then let the tears and accusations fly.
- Remember: There's only one way to console a widow.
- To make a lasting impression on a first date, declare yourself his or her eternal soulmate and propose marriage.
- Why don't you ask that Julie girl out? She's a lovely girl. You're practically 35, for God's sake. Fine, rip your mother's heart out.
- If you are a princess being courted by a low-born but beloved suitor, be sure to elude the watchful eye of the lord high chamberlain.
- Instead of going out tonight, punch yourself in the nuts three times and the heart twice. This will save you approximately $75.

LOCAL

I Think I'm Going About This Cat Breeding Thing All Wrong

By Stan Morrow
Cat Breeder

Last October, my dear wife Lois passed on. The first few months after her death were extremely difficult for me, as I missed her very much. Then, one day, my pastor recommended I take up a hobby to help me get my mind off things.

Now, I've always been what you might call a lover of cats, so I decided to take up cat-breeding. And, while nothing will ever replace my Lois, I have found cat-breeding to be an extremely enjoyable pastime. Only problem is, after months of trying, I still haven't seen a single litter from those furry little gals. I'm beginning to think I'm going about this cat-breeding thing all wrong.

To be honest, I haven't the slightest idea what the problem is. As far as I can tell, I'm doing everything right. I wait until they're well in heat, rubbing up against me and yowling to be serviced. At that point, I bring them out back to the shed, where I've prepared a special breeding area.

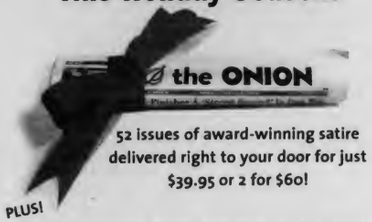
It's cool and dark in the shed, just the way cats are supposed to like it. There are candles and nice music, too. (Actually, those are mostly for me. I know it sounds selfish, since I'm not the one giving birth to the kittens, but I like the experience to be special for me, too.) I've even laid down soft blankets where the actual breeding takes place, and put up chicken wire so my skittish lovelies can't run far if they get scared.

To be honest, I haven't the slightest idea what the problem is. As far as I can tell, I'm doing everything right.

At that point, I'm ready to consummate the breeding process. Gently but firmly, I hold them down with one hand while I carefully and lovingly breed them with the other. You'd be surprised—the tail hardly gets in the way at all. Sometimes I'm afraid I'm hurting them, but all the books I've read say that cats tend to yowl and scratch when breeding, so I usually don't worry too much. (Heck, I yowl and scratch, too, sometimes.) The worst was the time Mrs. Purrs slashed my thigh. She couldn't help it, though—cats' instincts are so strong.

According to the books, the actual mechanical act of cat-breeding only takes a few seconds, but, just to be sure, I usually breed each cat for about 30 to 40 minutes.

According to the books, the actual mechanical act of cat-breeding only takes a few seconds, but, just to be sure, I usually breed each cat for about 30 to 40 minutes.



It seems like I'm doing everything correctly. But after months of trying, not a single kitten has been produced. So, for the past few weeks, I've been breeding them twice as hard and long, making sure to get each of my darlings right on the money. Especially Princess. I've really enjoyed breeding her. She's a delicate Persian with a long, white coat that's just gorgeous. She's always been my favorite. I've rung her bell loud and long, and for weeks I've been imagining tiny little kittens with her beautiful coat and twinkling eyes.

But still, even after redoubling my efforts, none of them has yet to catch pregnant. Bewildered by my lack of success, I went to the doctor last Saturday to get myself checked out. Except for an unusual amount of lacerations and scrapes in my "area," the doctor said I seemed just fine. Not only that, all my tests came back negative. Obviously, either there's something wrong with my method, or there's something wrong with my precious little ones.

Concerned, I dropped off Princess, Dusty and Mrs. Purrs at the veterinarian the other day, and explained the problem. Yesterday, though, I got a call back from the receptionist at the vet's office, and she seemed very upset. For some reason, they won't let me have the cats back. I was shocked—I'd tried so hard to get it right. I hung up the phone, determined to learn more about the breeding process.

I've been reading ever since. I'll breed those cats again someday. I can feel it.

Give The Gift Of News This Holiday Season.

52 issues of award-winning satire delivered right to your door for just $39.95 or 2 for $60!

PLUS!

FREE Onion T-shirt* • 6-month subscription to Onion Premium
• 10% off at The Onion Store throughout the life of your subscription
• Monthly drawings for subscribers-only to win Onion prizes

*With the purchase of 2 paid subscriptions by January 15, 2005.

Subscribe.

recipient's name recipient's address city state zip recipient's email address your name
your daytime phone (in case we have questions) your email address

GIFT SUBSCRIPTIONS:
Fill out this form with the recipient's name and address information, but please include your name, phone number, and email address in case we have a problem processing your order. Gift cards are available; please check the circle.

Please send a gift card prior to the first issue.
name as it should appear on gift card payment.

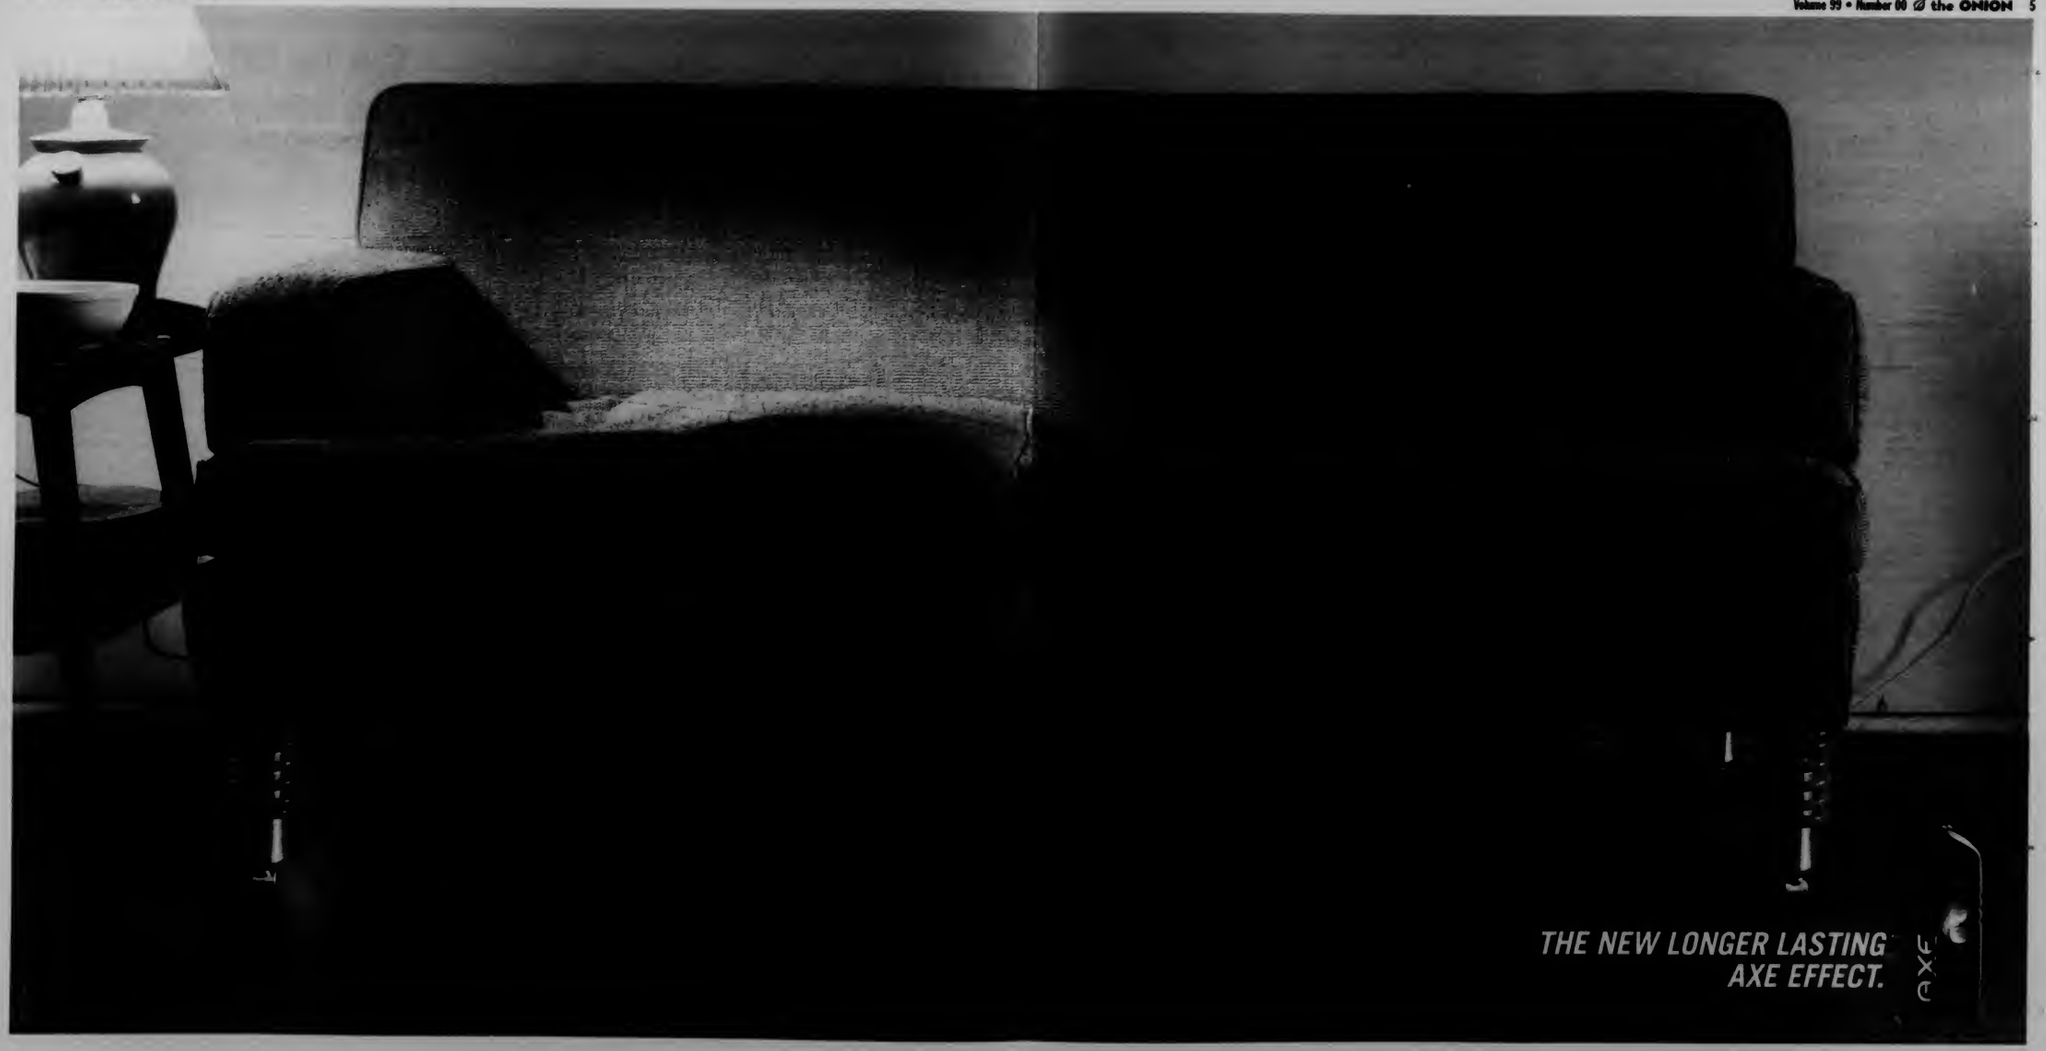
- $29.95 for Students*
- $34.95 for Renewal customers
- $39.95 for US subscriptions
- $110 for Canadian subscriptions
- $200 for International subscriptions



- American Express
- MasterCard
- VISA

card number expiration date
cardholder signature
*with a valid .edu email address

MAIL ORDER FORM TO:
1442 East Ogden Avenue #700-388
Milwaukee, WI 53202
OR FAX: 414-272-3555

CALL 1.866.4ONIONS to order by phone we accept American Express, VISA, or MasterCard

SUBSCRIBE AT OUR ONLINE STORE subscribe.theonion.com | $39.95 or 2 for $60

THE NEW LONGER LASTING AXE EFFECT.
AXE

POSTERS from page 1

interest in naked women. We thought that by combining these two elements, these posters would establish not only a mood of beer-drinking fun, but also one of casual female nudity or semi-nudity."

"Our idea was to create an environment in which nude or semi-nude women would find themselves comfortable and at ease, not only drinking beer, but also just being naked," Drubham added. "We also sort of hoped that they might have sex with us."

"None of these things have happened," Drubham added. "It would appear that our conclusions were completely unfounded."

The housing department report, compiled over the course of three weeks spent monitoring the dorm room and its immediate surroundings, categorically concluded that "there exists no measurable cause-and-effect relationship between the presence of the naked-women posters and the willingness of non-photographic human women to appear naked in or near that location."

The study went on to report no notable relationship between the number of naked women in the room before and after the decision to acquire the posters, other than the fact that in both cases the number was zero.

"I can't understand it," roommate and management studies major Kurt Beem said. "We had it all planned out. I just can't see where we went wrong. Perhaps we need to know more about women in general, clothed and unclothed alike, before we can accurately affect and predict the behavior of the nude ones, specifically."

In a surprising side note, the report did find the posters to have a marked impact on alcohol purchase, causing a notable rise in consumption of the product lines the posters advertised, and an upswing of as much as 35 percent in the case of the wine cooler that sponsored the largest-breasted model's photo.

One reason for the initial enthusiasm in the posters project was the earlier success the roommates had had with other, differently themed posters.

"Everybody liked the Miller Lite poster and the Bud Dry neon sign, and they did in fact seem to be effective in facilitating a bar-like, drinking-oriented dorm interior," Beem said.

"Similarly encouraging results seemed evident after our decision to display our 'Rockin' USA' poster (depicting a guitar rocketing into the air with an American flag in the background)," Beem continued, noting that the poster had indeed made the place seem overall more "rockin'."

"Unfortunately, the technique does not seem to have any effect on glamorous, product-endorsing models," Beem said. "In fact, the only effect of the posters so far has been that we get real horned up when we look at them. Jesus Christ Almighty, get a load of that rack, Man!"

BRA from page 1

"Unfortunately, at this point, we have more questions about this enormous bra than we have answers," said Sgt. Walt Sorensen of the Herkimer Police Department. "Who does this bra belong to? How did it get in the street? And what sort of breasts would necessitate the use of a brassiere of this magnitude?"

By studying the dirt and organic matter accumulated on the enormous bra, police were able to determine that it had been outdoors for at least 12 hours prior to its discovery. The bra also shows evidence of severe fabric stress, which could provide clues as to how it came to end up in the gutter.

"The bra's ruptured stitching, badly distended comfort-lined satin cups and two broken EZ-close hooks may be an indication that some sort of violent struggle took place," Sorensen said. "But, if I had to venture a guess, I'd say this damage was more likely the result of the tremendous demands placed upon it by its presumably ox-like owner over the course of many strenuous years."

Police are currently looking for leads at a Lester Avenue laundromat just four blocks away from the corner where the bra was found, as well as in a nearby residential area where pranksters may have stolen it from a clothesline before discarding it. A sketch artist has also produced a composite rendering of the bra owner's torso, which is believed to be at least 55 inches in diameter. Police have provided local media with the sketch and are urging citizenry with any information about the enormous bra to come forward.

"The bra's ruptured stitching, badly distended comfort-lined satin cups and two broken EZ-close hooks may be an indication that some sort of violent struggle took place," Sorensen said.

Several local residents have already responded to the request for information.

"When I called my 8-year-old son in for lunch Sunday afternoon, he was yelling something about finding 'big boobs' in the bushes," said Eileen Dunne, who lives a block away from the spot where the bra was discovered. "Well, you know how kids are at that age, so I didn't think much about it at the time. But now I wonder if it was the enormous bra."

"I don't know if this helps," local resident Roberta Puhl told police, "but I distinctly remember my kids saying that the boy next door dared them to touch the 'big white thing,' before he picked it up with a stick and flung it at them."

If no one comes forward to claim the enormous bra in the next 30 days, it will become the property of the individuals who discovered it.

"Dude, I don't want that thing," Reznicki said. "The cops can keep it."

RELATIONSHIP from page 1

"We were both down there waiting for our clothes to dry, so we started to talk," Petrakis said. "It turned out we had a lot in common—we shopped at the same grocery store and worked out at the same gym. At that point, I wasn't thinking about the future and how hard this sort of relationship can be."

For several weeks, Froeger and Petrakis enjoyed a protracted honeymoon period, during which the short distance dividing them seemed like an advantage. Friends report that Petrakis and Froeger thought it was adorable to share a mailman, bump into each other near the trash bin, and frequent the same coffeehouse.

"At first, Jack would brag about how cool it was to get a midnight 'booty call' from a sexy girl only three doors down and one floor below," Petrakis' friend Doug Maris said. "He was like, 'I don't even need to change out of my pajamas. I just put on slippers, answer the door, and I'm ready for action.'"

"He's not bragging anymore," Maris continued. "Last week, a bunch of the guys were hanging out at his place when someone knocked on the door. Jack made us all stand there, frozen in place and totally silent, for about five minutes until he could be sure that whoever it was had left."

Both Froeger and Petrakis said they began to experience misgivings about the lack of distance dividing them in early December.

"When I met Jack, I'd just broken up with this guy from Toledo, so I was really looking forward to dating someone nearby," Froeger said. "Now, I realize that having him so nearby that I can hear him whistling every time he uses the elevator isn't an advantage. And I do mean every time he uses the elevator. Seriously, every single time—that same OutKast song."

"Justine is sweet," Petrakis said. "But sometimes it's too much. Once, I stayed at my buddy's house after a late night of drinking. When Justine saw that I hadn't picked up my newspaper from the doormat, she called to make sure I was okay. That's when I started feeling crowded."

"At first, Jack would brag about how cool it was to get a midnight 'booty call' from a sexy girl only three doors down and one floor below," Petrakis' friend Doug Maris said. "He was like, 'I don't even need to change out of my pajamas. I just put on slippers, answer the door, and I'm ready for action.'"

In addition to infringing on each other's privacy, Froeger and Petrakis said the close proximity removes a level of excitement from the relationship.

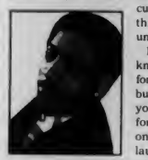
"Part of the fun of getting involved with someone is immersing yourself in a new environment and experiencing new things," Froeger said. "But staying overnight at someone's place isn't as great when you live on the same block. Our apartments overlook the same exact tree."

"Now we have no excuse to make it downtown or anyplace else," Froeger continued. "And believe me, Jack doesn't look for one, either. We just order delivery from the menus we both already know by heart."

Petrakis agreed that "things are getting a little stale."

"Justine and I kiss goodbye in the morning, then I see her 30 minutes later in the parking lot," Petrakis said. "Then I get home, and boom! There she is in the elevator. I don't know what to do. I've told her that I need my space, but her space and my space are practically the same space."

Froeger said she has started to think she needs someone who will "be there for me occasionally."



"The next person I date should live in, say, Chicago or Minneapolis," Froeger said. "There are a lot of nice guys from the Midwest profiled on those Internet dating sites. If I was seeing someone farther away, we could spend a passionate weekend together, but I wouldn't have to sit around at Starbucks for an extra two hours after work until I'm certain I won't run into him."

Petrakis said he agrees that a break-up might be the only answer.

"Next time I'm on the market, I'm gonna get out to a lot of out-of-the-way bars in neighborhoods that I wouldn't normally have any reason to be in, like that area behind the expo center," Petrakis said. "From now on, I'm going to stick with the 50-block rule: no dating anyone who doesn't live at least a 10-minute car ride away."

COMMUNITY VOICES

Let Smoove Rock Your Body And World

By Smoove B
Love Man

Have I told you how wonderful you are? When I am with you, I feel like a whole new Smoove. Since you have asked me not to call you at work, I have opted to discuss your fineness through my column.

I know we have known each other for only two weeks, but I already know you are the girl for me. You are the only one I want to laugh with, talk with, and grind on the dance floor with. You are the only one I want to ride.

I am capable of bringing you to a state of freakstasy that no other man could ever bring you to. You can try to find this level of sexual satisfaction with some other man, but know that if you break from Smoove, I cannot guarantee that I will still be single when you realize that only I can satisfy all your senses. Then, you would be living in a cold, cruel, Smoove-less world, and I would not wish that upon you. You are too special to me.

Damn, girl, you need to take the rest of the day off so I can break you off doggy-style in my bathroom.

Ever since we met two weeks ago, I knew you were the one for me. Your style, your booty, and your class are beyond all compare. In a world populated with many fine women, you are without a doubt the most fine. Let Smoove take you out tonight or, if you are busy, tomorrow night to show you how I treat a lady as exceptional as you. Allow me to break it down:

First, I will pick you up from your house in a white limousine and take you to the finest dance club in the entire city. The people at this club will be attractive and the beats will be crazy. We will not be in the club for a minute before we get on the dance floor. Even though the other people will be good dancers, we will be the best. When you bump, I will bump. When you grind, I will grind. We will move together like twins who happen to like to freak.

When you have had your fill of dancing, I will take you by the hand and lead you to the most romantic corner of the entire club and sit you down on one of the plush, red-velvet couches. While you rest, Smoove will go the bar and purchase a drink for you. Before I bring it back to you, I will taste it, demanding finer gin should it fall short of my expectations for you. Also, I will ask for less ice so that your gin and tonic is not diluted.

While you sip your drink, I will stroke your hair and tell you such complimentary things as "You are like a fine statue carved out of brown marble," and "Your eyes are like pools of creamy Italian butter," and "You have beautiful shoes." You will know that I mean these things because they come from the heart, and the heart is always true.

At this point, we will go back to my place, where I will prepare a dinner specially suited for one as lovely as you. While I am cooking the meal, we will talk about your life, your hopes, and your dreams. At this point, I will unthaw a deluxe bag of jumbo shrimp for you to sample as the appetizer.

There will also be cocktail sauce.

Finally, my dinner of lobster, shipped to me that morning in only the coldest of ice from the finest lobster region in all of Maine, will be completed and placed on the table. Along with the lobster will not only be melted butter, but also side dishes. Some of them will be corn, peas, and baked potato. When the meal is over, we will have dessert and coffee.

Ever since we met two weeks ago, I knew you were the one for me. Your style, your booty, and your class are beyond all compare. In a world populated with many fine women, you are without a doubt the most fine.

At this point, you will be so turned on by this night of dancing and lobster that you will be dying to sex me wild. But instead of taking you to my bedroom to knock boots, I will build your desire even more. I will do this by leading you to my living room, where I will light a fire and hand-feed you the finest strawberries available. If you do not enjoy strawberries, I will have other types of berries at my disposal that can be fed to you in a sexy manner. Between bites, I will offer you sips of champagne in a glass made specifically to maximize your champagne-drinking pleasure.

As much as you want to, you will no longer be able to control your desire. Neither will I. This is when I will lead you to my polar-bear-skin rug so we can do it all night long. You will cry for more, and you shall receive it. I will hit it until you can take no more. Then, when you are 100 percent satisfied, I will stop. After that, I will kiss your belly button and tell you how beautiful you are until you fall asleep in my arms.

Damn.

In the morning, I will make you waffles that have chocolate chips embedded in them. There will coffee waiting for you, and there will also be a cup with cream and two sugars, just the way you like it, cooling on the breakfast bar. If you want toast, I will make it for you and offer you a staggering array of exotic French jams.

Through this display of caring and thoughtfulness, you will see that I am the one for you. We are like two slightly different colored beads on a single ancient necklace. We are so right together, it hurts to even speak your name when you are not around me. Do not doubt my words. Believe me when I say this to you. Smoove's love will rock your world.

Peace.

ADVICE

Ask That Tramp I Saw You With Last Night

By Connie Vance
Wife

Dear Connie:

The other night I came home from work to find my prize azalea bushes completely wrecked. I didn't witness it, but I feel sure I know the culprits: the children next door who are always running wild in our yard. How do I keep my bushes safe without permanently alienating my neighbors?

Frustrated In Fairport

Dear Frustrated,

If you need advice so bad, why don't you go ask that tramp I saw you with last night? She must have had some interesting things to say or you wouldn't have sat there buying margaritas for her every 10 minutes. I'm sure she knows all kinds of things I don't, or you wouldn't have spent so much time talking to her, laughing at everything she said like she was the funniest person on earth.

Dear Connie:

There's a big company dinner party coming up at the boss' house, and I can't decide whether to "dress to impress" or just go with the casual confidence of slacks and a sweater. The invitations say it's just an informal cookout, but this is my boss we're talking about! What do you suggest?

In A Quandary In Quebec

Dear Quandary,

I'm sure that tramp I saw you with last night would know the answer to this one. She seems like the kind of woman who could tell you a thing or two about impressing the big boys! After all, she had you dancing to her tune for hours. I just happened to drive past your office, and your car wasn't in the parking lot. I guess you were working so hard you just had to take a little dinner and dancing break with that cheap slut.

She seems like the kind of woman who could tell you a thing or two about impressing the big boys! After all, she had you dancing to her tune for hours.

Dear Connie:

My mother's 75th birthday is coming up, and I want to get her something really special. I want to go all out on this one, but I'm afraid I'll spend a fortune and end up with something she doesn't like. What would be an appropriate gift for an occasion like this?

Unsure In Utica

Dear Unsure,

I suppose your mother wears blue eyeliner and miniskirts, and hangs out at Eli's Mile High at two in the morning, batting her eyes at everything some big, dumb, married ox says, doesn't she? Maybe if I dressed up like a two-dollar whore and snuck around in the middle of the night, that'd satisfy you. Maybe then you wouldn't go galavanting around at God-knows-what hours! Is that what you really want, a tramp like her? You know what? I'm glad I saw you two. I gave you the best years of my life, you no-good, goddamned, two-timing son of a bitch! Get out of my sight!

Connie Vance's weekly syndicated advice column, Ask That Tramp I Saw You With Last Night, appears in over 250 papers nationwide.

8 the ONION December 2004

New DVD pays tribute to legendary comedian

ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 5

FRIDAY	SATURDAY	SUNDAY
• High: 42° • Low: 37°	• High: 49° • Low: 29°	• High: 43° • Low: 31°

DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

UMass victory leads to un-CONN-trolable celebration

SPORTS, PAGE 10

The Daily Collegian

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 10, 2004 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXIV ISSUE 65

Hillel House Band rocks UMass Chanukah Fest in Campus Center

By MATT HOFFMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

100 people packed the People's Marketplace in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center on Wednesday night to celebrate the Jewish festival of lights, at the Hillel House's Chanukah Fest.

The newly-created Hillel House band began the evening with their debut performance. The Hillel House is a campus organization that provides resources for Jewish students and those interested in learning more about Judaism.

"The turnout is great and the event is awesome," said Matt Bertuzzi, a freshman member of the Hillel band.

Bertuzzi is also a member of the Jewish Cultural Council, which planned the event. This group of five students chose the main entertainment for the night, which was the New York City-based band, Pharaoh's Daughter.

Bertuzzi explained how Pharaoh's Daughter was chosen.

"We first thought about what entertainment would be appealing, and searched for bands in the area. We researched reviews and listened to CDs. When we found out that Pharaoh's Daughter was available, we invited them to appear."

The band was created after one of the band members, Basya Schechter, toured the Middle East, including Israel, Egypt, and Turkey. She created music that combined her Jewish spiritual background with world beat and the intense lyrical detail of a popular songwriter.

During an intermission in the musical group's performance, the entire crowd went outside for a candle-lighting ceremony. As the candles were lit for the second night of the eight-day holiday, the group said the blessing for the occasion. Afterwards, those in attendance broke into traditional celebratory song.

JAMIE LAU/COLLEGIAN

The Hillel House Band performs at yesterday's Chanukah Fest at UMass.

Chanukah is a holiday that commemorates the victory of faith over tyranny, specifically, for Jewish rebels who triumphed over Syrian rulers over 2,000 years ago.

Although Chanukah is technically a minor Jewish festival, it is the only holiday for which Jews exchange gifts. It also is celebrated in the Jewish month of Kislev, which usually falls in December. This combination has resulted in the misperception that Chanukah is "the Jewish Christmas." In fact, this festival has a rich tradition and history of its own.

The Jews of Judea had lived for many years under the oppressive hand of Syria, whose rulers outlawed Jewish worship and desecrated the temple in Jerusalem. Even though they were outnumbered, the Jews took up arms to

See CHANUKAH page 3

Police: murder suspect admits guilt to parents

By MATT ELDER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

HADLEY — A 23-year-old Westfield State College student who allegedly shot his high school friend, University of Massachusetts senior David Sullivan, early Tuesday morning admitted the shooting to his parents, a police report said.

"He had told his parents that he had shot someone," said the police report, written by Amherst Police Lt. Ronald Young and filed in Hadley District Court.

Bryan Johnston, the murder suspect, is originally from Pittsfield. He was pursuing a criminal justice major at the time the crime occurred. He transferred to Westfield State from the University of Hawaii. Sullivan was a Building Materials and Wood Technology major.

Both were seniors at their respective colleges. They were also friends when they attended Wahconah Regional High School in Dalton, where they both graduated in 2000, according to mutual friends.

Information from a firearms check showed that Johnston has a revoked Class A firearm license and he currently owns a Colt .223 rifle.

The rifle is capable of firing the type of ammunition retrieved by police from Sullivan's 105 Meadow St. residence, the police report said. The report also said that six shell casings were removed from the home.

The Associated Press reports authorities found a rifle in the woods off of Bay Road in Hadley that they believe was the murder weapon.

"Obviously this is a very sad situation all the way around," said Westfield State College News Coordinator, Craig Phelon.

Johnston appeared in Hadley District Court today to see if he was competent to stand trial. After a court-appointed examination, he was deemed competent. He is currently being held without bail in the Hampshire House of Corrections until his probable cause hearing on Jan. 26.

He pled innocent to one charge of murder.

At the start of the hearing, Johnston's lawyers said they did not want him present in court because they did not want him to face the media. The judge denied the order, and the defendant was brought into court wearing a suit.

During the hearing, both the prosecutors and Johnston's lawyer Edward Berlin said he was going through steroid withdrawal at the time of the shooting, but that he did not have a motive for the attack.

Johnston's mother said that she wanted her son to remain in Noble Hospital, the Associated Press reported. She said that her

COURTESY GAZETTENET.COM

Bryan Johnston of Westfield is charged in the murder of a UMass student.

See ARRAIGNMENT on page 3

WMUA, 91.1 FM polkathon raises more than expected

By TARA TRAYERS
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The University of Massachusetts student radio station, WMUA 91.1 FM, raised over $40,000 in donations during the station's 25th Annual Polkathon, a weeklong on-air fundraising campaign. The Polkathon began Nov. 13 and ran through Nov. 19 in hopes to raise $28,000 for various upcoming events and equipment for the radio station.

Staff member Billy Belina, a newly inducted International Polka Hall of Fame Personality, hosted the event this year. Belina is an Easthampton resident and a WMUA DJ and University of Massachusetts Housing Services staff member since 1979. He made a compilation CD of his famous Polka songs as well as other songs that were available in a premium package for donations. Over 100 of his CDs sold for approximately $35 a piece.

Many other guest DJs helped with the event, including Annie Goodman, a Pioneer Valley syndicated alternative news program DJ. Her show carried about $10,000 in donations.

Jill Weinstein, the Fund Drive Director and a senior at UMass, has been hard at work on this project for the past year. Just about every day since the semester began, Weinstein has called, made arrangements, and organized for the event. She had to call businesses in the area to enlist their support. The station thanks the businesses by mentioning their support and does not direct advertisements on the various programs through out the week.

"I'm so happy. We raised over $40,000 dollars and surpassed our goal of $28, 000," Weinstein said. "Most college radio stations are unable to accomplish this event."

Weinstein had to find volunteers to devote their time to this weeklong event, that included signing up to volunteer any time from 5 a.m. to 12 p.m. The donations go towards the station's wish list, which includes technical equipment for the station of about 100 members. The volunteers helped to answer the phones throughout the week.

"The Fund Drive Director's job pretty much starts right after the event for next year," Weinstein said. "This event has engulfed my life pretty much since I've gotten back to school," she added.

Weinstein explains that the event planning really picked up around October and November when she was busy getting things into place.

Weinstein's job as fund drive director is a paid position from September to May as she still needs to process the information and send out over 1,000 items to listeners. WMUA-FM is a federally licensed student-run, non-commercial radio station of the

See WMUA on page 2

ALEX DEMOSTHENE/COLLEGIAN

From front left, Mitch Moskal, Helen Szubzda, WMUA general manager Jen Moskal and assistant G.M. Jill Weinstein after volunteering at 91.1 FM's Polkathon, which raised $40,000 on November 19th.

Former Pantera guitarist killed at Ohio concert

By CARRIE SPENCER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

COLUMBUS, Ohio — It looked like something out of a macabre heavy-metal video: The lights dimmed in the smoke-filled nightclub, the rock band Damageplan launched into its first thunderous riffs, and then a man in a hooded sweatshirt ran the length of the stage and opened fire, shooting the lead guitarist at least five times in the head.

In just minutes, the gunman had killed three others before being shot to death by a police officer.

The rampage Wednesday night stunned the heavy metal world and left police searching for answers about what set the gunman off.

The slain guitarist, "Dimebag" Darrell Abbott, 38, was a driving force behind the rock band Pantera, and police are looking into reports from witnesses that the gunman was a fan irate that the hugely influential group broke up.

Some of the 500 people packed into the club to see Abbott's new band initially thought that the gunman was an excited fan or that the shootings were part of the show.

"I figured it was another fan wanting to jump off the stage and crowd surf," said Brian Kozicki, the club's lighting designer. "I think he knew he wasn't going to get out and he was going to take down as many people as he could."

COURTESY VINNIEPAUL.COM

"Dimebag" Darrell Abbott, of the band Damageplan, was killed Thursday.

Police identified the gunman as Nathan Gale, 25, who listened to Pantera music to psyche himself up before football games and would often hang out at a tattoo parlor and make a pest of himself by talking to customers about music.

"We may never know a motive for this, unless he left a note," Sgt. Brent Mull said.

Also killed were Erin Halk, 29, a club employee who loaded band equipment; fan

See SHOOTING on page 3

Officials disputing law school plans

By DAVE FONSECA
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The plan to add a public law school to the University of Massachusetts system is ill-considered and financially unsound, according to two Western Massachusetts authorities. But a UMass spokesman dismissed the criticism, saying the plan as outlined will make the new law school a self-supporting addition.

Skeptics to the plan include UMass Amherst Legal Studies Professor Stephen Arons, who explained that creating a new school is a tough process.

"Setting up a public law school that is both effective and capable of surviving financially and that deals successfully with the commercial bar is very, very difficult, and I have not seen any evidence that UMass has thought it through," said Arons

Another skeptic is Arthur Gaudio, dean of Western New England College in Springfield, who calls the UMass law plan "very, very doubtful." Gaudio is a former deputy consultant on legal education for the American Bar Association.

The criticisms parallel those of Richard G. Huber, a past president of the Association of American Law Schools and former dean of Boston College Law School, who called the planned acquisition of The Southern New England School of Law by UMass Dartmouth a "waste of money" in a recent letter to The Boston Globe. He warned that the process of attaining ABA accreditation could cost Massachusetts millions in tax dollars.

Robert Connolly, UMass system associate vice president, disagrees with these criticisms.

"Skepticism is fine, but at some point facts have to become determinative," Connolly said. "The facts are that SNESL is self-supporting and has been for some time."

Connolly said that the proposed UMass law school would operate on a trust fund and would be restricted from receiving any state funding by law.

"It is as blunt as that," Connolly said. "State law would not allow us to use UMass funds for any law school-related purpose."

One of the major issues facing the proposed school is its ability to gain ABA accreditation. Southern New England School of Law now is regionally accredited, meaning students may take the bar exam in Mass-achusetts and Connecticut. But for students to take the bar exam in any of the other 50 states, the school must be ABA-accredited. To receive ABA accreditation, among other criteria, the school must raise students' average scores on the Law School Aptitude Test and on current bar exams.

According to a document released Oct. 4 by UMass Dartmouth Chan-cellor Jean MacCormack, SNESL has successfully met 90 percent of ABA's accreditation benchmarks, and the remaining 10 percent will be met through an investment of annual operating funds covered mostly by the law school budget.

According to the document, SNESL produces a yearly operating surplus of $350,000 and has a $1.5 million "rainy day" account, which the school intends to use to cover the costs of accreditation.

However, Gaudio said that the plans of the Western New England College of Law are "very, very doubtful." He questioned whether the school would be able to maintain its $19,000 a year tuition while still bringing in better students capable of raising Bar Exam and LSAT scores to a level satisfactory to the ABA.

"They're going to have to offer something to prospective students if they want to get students in," said Gaudio. "And to do that, they're

See LAW SCHOOL on page 3

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Andrew Merritt
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Cameron Woods
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Meghan Healy
Campus Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Paige Crum
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Matthew Reid
Sports Editor Mike Marzilli
Classified Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Kuppens
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Frecaut
Human Resource Sandra Marquez
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Jaclynn Sorenson
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Advisor Charlie Higgins
Asst Arts & Living Mike Busack
Asst Arts & Living Monique Jemmott
Assistant Editorial Yousef Munayyer
Assistant Editorial Allison Edles
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Sports Robert McGovern
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently owned, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the Daily began as Aggie Life, became The Collegian in 1907, the Weekly Collegian in 1971, and the Daily Collegian in 1996. Published continuously since 1967. The Collegian has been awarded seventeen Pacemakers. 1994 Five-Star Rated and Distinguished. Call with days between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Cameron J. Woods
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Adrienne Bossi
COPY EDITOR
Ali Zillmann
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Cory Rosenberg
PRODUCTION STAFF
Nick Belanger, Elliot Chong

We are looking for 5-College writers. Call 545-1762

Campus Perspectives

By Adrienne Bossi

Do you think the punishments the students involved in the campus riots received from the administration are fair? Why or why not?

freshman
Nursing major

"Yes, if you do something stupid, you should expect to have to pay for it."
Andie Johnson

senior
Legal Studies major

"No, I do not think they were given due process."
Sean Bliss

sophmore
Microbiology and Spanish major

"I do think the punishments were fair ... I thought there should have been a few more punished."
Kruti Ravaliya

freshman
Undecided

"No. If they were punished half the school should have been. It was not like they were doing anything different."
Ralph Francis

freshman
Undeclared

"I think it was somewhat fair. They acted stupid, and they deserved to be punished."
Brandom Milardo

senior
Political Science major

"No ... the penalties should have been more severe."
Todd Holmes

U.S. AIR FORCE
CROSS INTO THE BLUE

THINK OUTSIDE

FOUR PERPENDICULAR

SIDES ON A

GEOMETRICALLY

SQUARED BASE.

It takes ingenuity, teamwork and a great deal of effort to pull off some of the high-profile engineering projects being done in the United States Air Force. Engineers who come aboard are immediately put on the fast track and have advancement opportunities typically not found in the private sector. From weapons systems and space station materials to the next generation of X-planes, whatever the project is, it's always fresh, always important and always cutting edge. If this sounds like something you might be interested in, visit our Web site at AIRFORCE.COM or call us at 1-800-423-USAF to request more information.

©2004 Paid for by the U.S. Air Force. All rights reserved

Polkathon raises $40,000

WMUA from page 1

University, serving members of the Connecticut River Valley of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Vermont.

Full-time undergraduate students as well as graduate students, faculty, and staff members primarily run the station. Members of the surrounding communities also donate their time and efforts to help. The station is partially funded from the University's Student Government Association, but needs to raise almost half of their annual operating budget.

The money raised from the Polkathon has allowed the WMUA to purchase and install a new transmitter and antenna, new CD players, cassette decks, and high quality processing equipment. First started as an AM radio station in 1949, the station continues to operate to provide various programs including blues, jazz, rock, hip-hop, polka, and other music programs as well as providing news throughout the day.

WMUA is an alternative radio station, which has a mission to provide programming not readily available elsewhere on the radio not covered in mainstream media often working in genres by commercial radio.

Other volunteers included over 70 UMass students and several community members who are donating few hours to help take calls. Most volunteers stayed about two hours, excepting the dedicated Polka people that stayed from 5 a.m. until nighttime.

"There were so many people and tables of food including bagels from Bruger's Bagel and many polish foods," Weinstein said.

Most of the listeners and donators are from Polish associations.

Weinstein describes the event as being just plain crazy saying, "About 20 people were running around with not a second of rest. The phones were ringing off the hooks," At one point during the show, a CD player was causing some problems.

"Many people called in with donations of their Polka bands CDs," Weinstein said. "We used most of their CD's for the event," she added.

The station itself had its 15 departments working hard on the event as well. "Each department was responsible for big role. For example, the Music Director had to round up the CDs to play, the Publicity Department had to print out advertisements, and the Visual Media Department had to make pictures for the shirts and other prizes," Weinstein said.

The biggest amount donated by one person was $200, while the smallest amount was about $15. As a thank you for tax-deductible donations, CDs, gift certificates, concert tickets, T-shirts, and other special premiums were available for the donations.

The WMUA streams its programming live at www.wmua.org-/listen, where listeners can tune in anytime. The programming during the week includes blues, jazz, rock, hip-hop and other music programs. During the weekend, specialties are aired. Polka, oldies, and dance music plays on Saturdays, while country, bluegrass, gospel, and electronic music play on Sunday. The station airs sports coverage throughout the week. The coverage includes basketball games from the University as well as traveling to Chicago to air the sports show. The studios are located in the basement of the Campus Center.

Officials disagree on new law school gonna have to up the discount [on tuition.]"

LAW SCHOOL from page 1

"[The UMass planners] don't have an appreciation of what it takes to become accredited," Gaudio added. "A law school, to become accredited, must show students can pass the Bar Exam. [At SNESL,] they've got a history of students passing at around a 30 percent rate."

But Connolly added, "We are fully confident that our financial model will work ... [Dean Gaudio] seems to be grasping at straws in an effort to fend off competition that he really doesn't have to worry about."

At last month's Nation Moot Court Competition, Connolly pointed out, SNESL won a spot in the semi-finals along with teams from Suffolk School of Law, Boston College, and Boston University, by edging out Western New England College.

"Maybe Dean Gaudio should be paying more attention to Western New England and less attention to Southern New England," Connolly said.

The proposed UMass law school would offer 25 scholarships of $9,500 (half of one year's tuition) to students who promise to work in the public realm, the cost of which Connolly said could easily be easily covered by the school's yearly operational surplus.

In addition, Connolly added, though the operational surplus will cover the cost of the scholarships, UMass planners also are confident that outside benefactors will be willing to donate funds, should they be needed.

"Chancellor MacCormack believes she has some benefactors who are poised to make substantial contributions to defray the cost of public service scholarships," Connolly said.

But Connolly's explanations don't satisfy Arons, who said he thinks the president's office has not been forthright with its academic agenda for UMass Law.

"If all they have for their concept of an academic plan for a public law school is handing out these scholarships, and offering fellowships, then I think they have barely scratched the surface, and I think they owe the public a better explanation," said Arons.

Connolly replied that the UMass Dartmouth administration has made every effort to coordinate its financial and academic plans with sources throughout the UMass five-campus system.

"Certainly there has been involvement from the higher levels of academic leaders at all five campuses," Connolly said.

Halliburton passes $10 billion mark

By Matt Kelley
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Halliburton Co. has passed the $10 billion mark in work orders from the Army for services supporting U.S. troops in Iraq.

The Army Materiel Command has ordered $8.3 billion in work from Halliburton under a contract to support troops with meals, laundry, housing and other services. The Army Corps of Engineers awarded an additional $2.5 billion to Halliburton under a no-bid contract to light oil fires and help restore Iraq's crumbling oil industry infrastructure.

Allegations of financial misdeeds, including corruption and overcharging, have led to criminal, congressional and Pentagon investigations of Halliburton's work in Iraq.

Congressional critics say the Bush administration is going easy on the oil services company, which Vice President Dick Cheney ran from 1995 to 2000. Cheney and Halliburton deny any preferential treatment.

Rep. Henry Waxman of California, the top Democrat on the House Government Reform Committee, has been one of the main congressional critics of Halliburton. Waxman issued a statement Thursday criticizing the Army's decision not to withhold partial payments to Halliburton while some accounting issues are straightened out.

"The mounting value of the contracts has been accompanied by a growing list of concerns about Halliburton's performance," the statement said.

Halliburton spokeswoman Wendy Hall said the company has done a good job serving troops and helping to rebuild Iraq.

"This latest statement is simply recycling old, unfounded allegations in an effort to discredit a company that is providing much-needed services in support of our troops on the ground in the Iraq and Kuwait," Hall said.

The investigations of Halliburton's work in Iraq include a criminal investigation into whether kickbacks were involved in Halliburton's use of a Kuwaiti subcontractor to provide gasoline for Iraq's civilian market. Halliburton says it notified federal authorities after an internal probe found two of its former employees may have been involved in corruption worth $6.3 million.

COURTESY PHOTO

Vice President Dick Cheney, who was CEO of Halliburton from 1995-2000

Hillel House Band rocks C.C.

CHANUKAH from page 1

defend their lifestyle and religion. They overwhelmed the Syrians in two decisive battles.

Legend has it that when the Jewish army entered the temple to re-consecrate it, their first task was to rekindle the Eternal Light, a sacred oil lamp that was left burning continuously. There was only one jar of oil to be found, enough to keep the flame lit only for a single day. A messenger was sent out to find and bring more sanctified oil, and it took the messenger eight days to return. Miraculously, the Eternal Light continued to burn those eight days. Chanukah, which also is called the Festival of Lights, celebrates that wonder.

Shiites preparing for election

By Marriam Fam
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Under the guidance of Iraq's most powerful Shiite cleric, Shiite parties presented a list Thursday of 228 candidates for next month's elections. Minority Sunni Arabs, who had been favored under Saddam Hussein, must now decide whether to join the race or renounce a vote that will help determine the country's future.

The announcement of the list of 23 parties, dubbed the United Iraqi Alliance, followed weeks of haggling. Members of participating groups said the coalition's platform would include a call for working toward the withdrawal of U.S. and other foreign troops in Iraq.

"There must be a timetable for this," said Hussein al-Mousawi, an official of the Shiite Political Council, an umbrella group that has some parties represented in the alliance. The candidates list includes two powerful Shiite parties, as well as an array of independent Sunni tribal figures, Shiite Kurdish groups and members of smaller movements.

Importantly, the roster does not include the movement of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who appeared to be waiting to see whether the vote will be considered legitimate before he joins the political process. With violence roiling the country and key Sunni leaders demanding the Jan. 30 vote be put off, a credible election is by no means certain.

There were already signs that Sunni ranks were breaking: One group that had called for a delay, the Iraqi Islamic Party, quietly submitted a 275-candidate list Thursday. Party officials told The Associated Press they wanted to reserve the right to take part in the vote if the election is not postponed.

In violence Thursday, seven Iraqis were killed in clashes in Baghdad and the volatile western city of Ramadi.

A car bomb also rocked a busy vegetable market in the northern city of Mosul, wounding two civilians, while a U.S. soldier was wounded by a roadside bomb in the capital.

Iraq's leading Shiite cleric, Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, appointed the committee that set up the 228-candidate list. He has been working to unite Iraq's majority Shiites ahead of the vote to ensure victory, and include representatives from Iraq's other diverse communities. Shiites make up 60 percent of Iraq's nearly 26 million people.

The major Shiite political parties, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution and the Islamic Dawa Party, were on the list. Both have strong links with Iran, a Shiite but non-Arab neighbor.

The 228 candidates also include independent Sunni Muslims, members of the Yazidis minority religious sect, and a Turkomen movement, among others. Also listed are members of the Iraqi National Congress, led by former exile and one-time Pentagon favorite Ahmad Chalabi.

Suspect confesses to his parents, police say son could have a medical emergency, like a heart attack, as a result of the withdrawal.

ARRAIGNMENT from page 1

"The defendant may have medical concerns to be monitored," the bail form said.

Young's police report said that at 10:33 p.m., Johnston called Sullivan to go out, and Sullivan refused. The report also said that on a prior occasion, Sullivan and Johnston were involved in an altercation, although it did not give the specifics.

Sullivan's roommate, Stephen Kubicki, called the Amherst Police at 2:26 a.m.

When police entered Sullivan's bedroom, Sullivan was unresponsive, the report said. It also stated that there were gunshot wounds to the body as well as trauma to the torso and left hand.

"There were no signs of forced entry," Young's report said.

At 12:45 a.m., according to Young's report, Hadley Police stopped Johnston seven miles from Sullivan's residence. The police released him, but around 4:00 a.m., Johnston contacted his parents and was admitted to Noble Hospital for his own protection, the report said.

"What appeared to be blood on his clothing and the interior of his car was observed and recovered by the officers assigned to the Massachusetts State Police Crime Scene Services Unit," Young said in his report.

COURTESY PHOTO

David C. Sullivan, who was killed in Amherst Tuesday night, police said.

People at the two's old high school claim that they were well-liked.

"They were very alike, almost the same type of kid, hard workers. People liked them. This is shocking," mutual friend Ryan Allessio, a UMass student, told the Berkshire Eagle.

"Sully [David Sullivan] was a good guy," Wahconah Principal Thomas Callahan said to the Berkshire Eagle. "A good student, well-liked, and I think he had a pretty good career here."

"We have nothing to say. We are devastated, that is all," said Sullivan's grandmother Anne Sullivan.

Dimebag killed in club

SHOOTING from page 1

Nathan Bray, 23; and Jeff Thompson, 40.

Two others were hospitalized after the shooting. The nature of their injuries was not disclosed.

With his frenetic, ear-splitting guitar riffs, Dimebag Abbott created an aggressive sound for Pantera and attracted a cult following in the early 1990s. The band was nominated for Grammys in 1995 and 2001. The Abbott brothers left Pantera last year and released Damageplan's debut album, "New Found Power," in February.

"I'm absolutely beside myself with grief. I can't for the life of me understand why someone would do this," said heavy metal legend Ozzy Osbourne, who often toured with Pantera.

Write for news!

Call Erika, Julie, or Dan at 545-1762

The Mercantile
Books Cards
Toys Great Clothing Gloves
Stocking Stuffers Gifts Scarves
Action Figures Rings
Clothing Sale Tapestries Bracelets Chains Earrings
Dec. Hours Mon-Sat. 10 am-9 pm-Sun 12-6
Amherst-11 E. Pleasant-Carriage Shops
Northampton-108 Main St.

Where are YOU living next semester?

CHECK OUT PUFFTON VILLAGE!
Excellent location...1/2 mile from UMass
Spacious Apartments--1,2 and 3 Bedroom Townhouses
All rents include heat, hot water and cooking gas
On site laundry, off street parking.
Basketball and Tennis courts.
PUFFTON VILLAGE
1040 N. Pleasant St. #410
Amherst, MA 01002
413-549-0145
www.pufftonvillage.com

CLOTHING SALE!
TONS OF GREAT CLOTHING FOR GUYS & GIRLS FROM ONE OF THE HOTTEST RETAILERS.
"Brand Named"
Jeans, Shirts, Tees, Sweaters, Outerwear, Accessories & so much more!!
Located at
University of Massachusetts Student Union Ballroom
December 14th-17th
Tuesday-Thursday 9am-9pm
Friday 9am-5pm
Everything from $5-$20
(first quality, irregulars, returns)
COME BY & CHECK IT OUT!!
VISA MASTERCARD & CASH ACCEPTED
presented by
Retail Sales 101, llc.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 10, 2004

"The recipe for perpetual ignorance is: be satisfied with your opinions and content with your knowledge." -Elbert Hubbard

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

U.S. needs to step up on educating its youth

The intelligence of high school students in the United States was recently ranked in an international survey comparing the mathematical skills of 15-year-olds to those of other countries around the world. The United States placed 28 out of the 40 countries surveyed and was cited as having the poorest outcomes per dollar spent, according to The New York Times, which published the results of the survey. Although the survey dealt strictly with high school students, the results are not overly surprising. For a country whose majority of spending has been devoted to the military, it seems almost expected for the country's funds directed toward education to be misapplied and not used adequately.

The study, according to the article, was released Monday by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, a group based in Paris. Among the students from the United States, only 10 percent placed in the top two performance groups. Countries such as Canada, Hong Kong and Finland had students of the same age who performed significantly higher than those from the United States.

There is a common phrase used in today's society to offer an explanation for the underachievement of American's youth. The phrase "dumbing down America" has been used as a label, affixed to certain things such as excessive viewing of television and video games. However, this phrase does not offer a solution to the intelligence problem of America's youngsters, but merely points the finger at what is seemingly causing the problem.

According to the results of the study, "while spending on educational institutions is a necessary prerequisite for the provision of high-quality education, spending alone is not sufficient to achieve high levels of outcomes." The United States certainly falls into this slot and seriously needs to reevaluate its financial spending when it comes to the education of its potential future leaders. Perhaps this is a comment on the intelligence of today's current influential heads of state: money can buy you an education, but what you do with it is a completely different story.

It is vitally important that the standards of educating today's youth are raised and the money awarded to public schools is spent wisely. Since competition within the international arena has always been a concern of the United States, the results of this survey should serve as a wake-up call to the educators of the country. The United States may be one of the wealthiest countries in the world, but if its money is not spent properly on the preached "prospering educational systems", then that title is worthless. What the United States must do now is take this study and learn from the results, not only where priorities are flawed, but how the educational systems of the country can be adequately improved.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

Purchasing patriotism

Stephen Post

If you're like me, you don't like sitting around doing nothing when there's a war on. As much as you like lounging on the couch watching reality shows, you think that maybe there's something else you could be doing, you know, for your country.

You and I both need to get off our duffs and take a ride ... to the mall. The holidays are here and you'll have to get gifts eventually, so plunk down the plastic in the name of peace. Have fun. Treat your friends and family. Heck, treat yourself. Buy some toys. Just don't shoot your eye out!

For starters, check out what toy-fanciers think is this year's "hottest" plaything: Robosapien. "A full function fast moving robot minion suitable for all your world domination needs," says manufacturer Wow Wee on its website. It's the perfect gift for little Rummy, Dickl, Condi and Dubya. For a cool $100, you (or your special someone) can have a robot designed by a NASA robotic physicist who worked on the Mars Rover.

Check it out: Robosapien is 14 inches tall, and he comes ready to perform 67 pre-programmed functions, all at the push of a button on his "ergonomic" remote control. He walks, of course, but he walks with style. He talks too, in a language his creators call "international 'caveman' speech." Oh, he doesn't exactly talk, he grunts ... so he can be properly understood in, well, less civilized parts of the world – the ones we'd like to dominate.

Nonetheless, Robosapien is great to have around the house. Feeling lazy? He picks things up. Feeling violent? He does Kung-Fu. Feeling funky? He raps. Feeling rude? He belches. And, oh yes, he farts. Dominating the world can cause indigestion.

There's no need to feel guilty about buying this precocious robot. Parenting magazines give Robosapien their enthusiastic seal of approval. Why not get it for your five-year-old? But then, why not get it for your husband, boyfriend or your favorite fraternity-boy? After all, you can make Robosapien pick up your beer. Stave off that winter break boredom for at least a little while. Voyeur Magazine says Robosapien is "sure to entertain for a few hours at least." It'll even clean up afterwards (check your manual for specifics). So why settle for something lame like a robot-dog when you can dominate the world with Robosapien?

If there's one thing about terrorists that really irks me, it's that they have no sense of style. They obviously never played with Barbie.

If there's one thing about terrorists that really irks me, it's that they have no sense of style. They obviously never played with Barbie. Remember her? Well she's back, this time with her very own cell phone. Barbie has voicemail! She's as perky as ever and ready to rock the toy box. There's Kate Spade Barbie, sporting a Kate Spade a handbag, of course. There's Barbie with capri pants, Barbie with camo jeans, Barbie with a faux fur coat, Barbie with knee-highs and an oh-so-skimpy skirt, Barbie with an "Asian-like" print jacket (how multicultural!) and Barbie in Holiday get-up (Caucasian or African American, just to cover all the bases).

Fight the ultimate battle between good and evil with The Lord of the Rings Collector's Series action figures, featuring "Birthday Bilbo" and "Coronation Arwen", not to mention "Gandalf the Grey with light up staff", Treebeard "with branch lifting action", and an armor-bedecked Pippin with "removable helmet and sword", replete with the obligatory "sword slashing action". But let's not kid ourselves. What you really want is the "Deluxe Talking Gollum": It has two "talk" buttons and two interchangeable heads, one for Gollum and one for Smeagol. Be honest with your inner selves: we wants it, we does!

Help reduce our dependence on fossil fuels by buying a Corvette C5 Power Vehicle with eco-friendly rechargeable battery. It's supposed to be for three-year-olds but you'll fit; just squeeze yourself in and go. Pull into Haigis Mall with the top down and wave to all the cuties waiting for the B43. For under $400 you can have that flaming red 'vette you've lusted after since driver's ed. Be sure to allow extra travel time though, as maximum cruising velocity is only 5 miles per hour.

Yes, there's much to do, but as you can see, you can do a lot. This holiday season, do yourself a favor. Do your country a favor. Shut up and shop!

Stephen Post is a Collegian columnist.

2004 popular culture roundup

Erin McNamee

2004 is rapidly drawing to a close, and boy am I feeling the ramifications. Since this is my last fall semester at UMass, I find myself bombarded from all angles by the inevitable "So what are you going to do after graduation?" question. It seems professors, friends, relatives, and random strangers all have to know what I'm going to do with the rest of my life when I've barely got it figured out for myself. But that's not the point of this week's column. Perhaps I'll wax philosophically on the meaning of life after college closer to graduation, but for now I'll go superficial and discuss my favorite pastime: pop culture.

For me, 2004 was a year of great personal growth: I studied abroad for a semester, held down my first internship, lived away from home over the summer, and was even run over by a hot dog cart in Prague (don't ask). But these things can't hold a candle to the pop cultural achievements of people I don't even know. So as someone who rabidly follows all the up-to-the-minute news in music, movies, television and celebrity gossip, I can't help but feel let down by 2004's broken promises and squandered opportunities. Here's my take on the good, the bad and the ugly of pop culture in 2004.

"Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind," "The Incredibles" and "Garden State" are a few movies that were particularly good. But since most of the so-called "Oscar-worthy" films either aren't playing on a screen near you or failed to live up to the hype, I find it difficult to accept that I'll only have one or two films to root for come Oscar night. Looking back on last year, I saw one good movie, sometimes two, almost every weekend. This year I've seen only a handful and ironically most of them were released during the summertime. I can't remember another year where the summer blockbuster films were actually better than the "cerebral" artsy holiday season films, but this phenomenon certainly occurred in 2004. "Harry Potter and the Prisoner of Azkaban," "Anchorman," "Shrek 2," and "The Bourne Supremacy" were all fun, entertaining movies and frankly that's all I've ever asked of Hollywood. I just want are films that are entertaining without forcing me to compromise my dignity. Last summer's offerings certainly fit that bill to a tee.

Obviously following pop culture doesn't create brain cells or promote intellectualism, but let's face it: pop culture is literally everywhere and we like it.

The music scene fared a bit better. Kanye West, Franz Ferdinand, The Killers, The Scissor Sisters, and The Arcade Fire all had notable and promising debuts. I saw Madonna's "Re-Invention Tour" and six months later I still get chills thinking about it. Still, nothing really big or exciting happened in music this year. There were some blips on the radar with that whole "indie bands learn how to dance!" craze that lasted for about five minutes, but nothing approached the scale of last year's epic "Speakerboxxx/The Love Below" by Outkast. The only thing that comes close in terms of a phenomenon is the inexplicable ubiquity of Usher, but besides the pure fun of "Yeah!" the rest of his album is pure crap.

Television provided a double whammy of greatness: "Desperate Housewives" and "Lost" revitalized the fiction genre and proved that originality can still thrive if the networks take a few risks. While these shows hint at the promise of the television industry's re-birth, networks aren't out of the red just yet. The sitcom genre is nearly dead and two of its funniest and most original offerings, "Scrubs" and "Arrested Development," are on the brink of cancellation for lack of viewers. In 2004, the television industry showed signs of life, but the jury is still out in regards to its future.

Even in terms of celebrity gossip, nothing too scandalous or shocking occurred in 2004. If you're in the camp that finds Janet Jackson's Super Bowl fiasco shocking, then I'm sorry. I wasn't shocked by all that hoopla; I was simply bored by the media saturation and disgusted by America's prudishness. Similarly, Britney's two quickie marriages weren't at all surprising but rather reaffirmed the pop diva's ever-quickening descent into lunacy. J-Lo got married again but this surprised no one. The tabloids desperately prayed for the break- ups of several high-profile Hollywood couples including J-Lo and Marc Anthony, Jessica Simpson and Nick Lachey, and Justin Timberlake and Cameron Diaz, but the only scandalous bits they could uncover included a feud with an ex-wife, a bachelor party stripper and a paparazzi tussle, respectively. Help! I'm falling asleep and I can't wake up!

Obviously following pop culture doesn't create brain cells or promote intellectualism, but let's face it: pop culture is literally everywhere and we like it. Most of us enjoy going to the movies, listening to music and watching television, but most of all we love to discuss and argue and analyze it all to death with our friends, in internet forums, and with random people on the PVTA. So the next time someone asks me what I'm doing after graduation, I'll reply, "Oh, I don't know – maybe cause a wardrobe malfunction or two, go barefoot to a gas station bathroom and convert to Kabbalahism?"

Erin McNamee is a Collegian columnist.

The death of a music icon

John Fenuccio

The death of an amazing guitarist, icon of the music world, but an even better human being. "Dimebag" Darrell Abbott, has proven that we, as a society, have learned nothing from the past.

Abbott was the guitarist of heavy-metal act Damageplan and formerly of Pantera. Every person has their own uniqueness that makes them different and special from everyone else. Abbott was no different, and his gifts to the world were his signature guitar riffs.

While many turn away at the thought of a heavy-metal band, Abbott's style was like no other before him. However, his death has proven to be something that, unfortunately, has happened to many artists before him.

From the shooting of John Lennon to the Warwick Nightclub tragedy, we as a society haven't learned, and at this point it doesn't seem like anyone's going to get it. The killing of such an influential musical icon will be more detrimental to the world than anything else, and the worst part about it is that David Gale, his murderer, was killed that night himself.

This situation, however, should be looked upon as a prime example of how the level of security at such events is in much need of improvement. How is it a man can pass security at the nightclub, with a gun, and not be detected? The safety standards at these clubs haven't improved despite the Warwick fire that took 100 victims because of a pyrotechnic mistake.

For those who are personally affected by the death of Dimebag Darrell (the name the music community knows him by), who are we to be mad at? With Gale being fatally wounded by a police officer that reportedly arrived on the scene within two minutes of the outbreak, the longing to place blame is a void especially large today.

It seems that in the music world, a few gems come around every once in a while. With Darrell on guitar and his brother Vinny Paul (drummer of Damageplan and former drummer of Pantera) together they had the best musical connection among brothers I've ever seen. In an age where rock music is evolving into something slower and different, Abbott's contributions to the music world always stayed true to his roots. How many icons are we going to have taken from us prematurely, one way or another? John Lennon, Jimi Hendrix, Janis Joplin, Jim Morrison, Kurt Cobain and now Dimebag Darrell are just some of those gems who have been taken too early but whose contributions to the world are priceless and timeless.

We as a society need to take this opportunity to step back and look at ourselves as people, and see that the security at music events isn't the only thing that needs to have a complete overhaul in this country. I figured the Warwick nightclub fire was going to be the single tragedy that would cause the U.S. to look at this situation and change. Knowing that someone was able to get into a concert with a gun, an event that welcomes people of all ages, is absolutely ridiculous.

If it weren't for the countless Pantera songs that were ingrained in my head during my youth, I probably would have never picked up a pair of drumsticks and started jamming away myself. One of the worst parts is that Abbott's new band Damageplan only released one CD. For any fan, it's heart-breaking to learn of his death. His death will result in the music world never again having the pleasure of listening to Dimebag Darrell's guitar riffs scream through the massive amplifiers he stood in front of.

Whether you're a fan of heavy-metal/rock or not: it doesn't matter. The fact is that the world has just lost an extremely talented man due to preventable causes. I want to live in a society where people don't decide to take their own personal crusades out on others simply because of a breakup of a band. It seems like American society can't be trusted enough to even venture out to see their favorite music group anymore. R.I.P. Dimebag Darrell, you will never be forgotten.

John Fenuccio is a UMass student.

www.dailycollegian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 10, 2004

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

A LESSON IN COMEDY FROM BILL HICKS

By Michael Burack
Collegian Staff

Bill Hicks was not your average comedian. With an incredible intelligence, Hicks was able to do what many comedians are not: he tackled serious topics like politics, the military, and religion, and still threatened to make you pee your pants.

Before his tragic death from pancreatic cancer in 1994, Hicks left his mark on comedy, and the world. A new DVD, titled "Bill Hicks Live: Satirist, Social Critic, standup Comedian" was released on Oct. 26 on Rykodisc. The first DVD release from the artist is sure to be a collector's item for new and diehard fans alike.

As a young boy, Hicks first became intrigued by jokes he heard from Woody Allen on records. By the age of 13, Hicks performed his first standup routine.

In 1978, with the opening of the Comedy Workshop in Houston, Hicks began visiting the club frequently. They even let him perform sometimes.

In 1983, after experiencing some hard times in the industry, Hicks began experimenting with drinking and using drugs before taking stage. He would often get angry at shows, provoking heated arguments and criticism. At one particular show, two Vietnam War veterans harshly criticized Hicks' body of work, by breaking his leg. Another disgruntled audience member became angry after he attempted to heckle Hicks, but Hicks continued to gain the upper hand in he argument. The man in the audience showed Hicks just how serious he was, when he pulled out a gun.

Hicks' comedy began to influence a larger fan base. Fans were attracted to his candor and interesting look at life, but it was music that really sparked Hicks' interest. He often talked about the music scene in his routine, and what he thought about the latest pop stars. He once said that he thought we live in a backwards world where John Lennon was killed and Barry Manilow still continues to produce records.

Hicks' work began to develop into stronger, more mature topics. He discussed controversial topics that other comedians wouldn't dare touch. In his act he began to incorporate his ideas about the incidents in Waco, TX. He said "If the FBI's motivating factor for busting down the Koresh compound was child abuse, how come we never see Bradley tanks smashing into Catholic churches?"

He was truly before his time. Hicks continued to work fervently for the next year, touring the country, despite chemotherapy treatment he was undergoing for his cancer.

Oct., 1, 1993 was Hicks' last scheduled television appearance on the David Letterman show. His act was later canceled because his material about pro-life protesters was considered too controversial.

"If you're so pro-life, do me a favor: don't kick arms and block medical clinics," Hicks said. "If you're so pro-life, kick arms and block cemeteries."

Hicks was so angry about his act being canceled, he wrote a 39 page letter to The New Yorker's John Lahr. A pro-life commercial was later aired during Letterman's Show.

In February, Hicks died at his parent's home in Little Rock, Arkansas.

This DVD is the greatest example of Hicks memorabilia that has been released to date. It has three and a half hours of raw Hicks material, from smack in the middle of his prime. Hicks is charismatic, intimidating, hilarious, but most of all brilliant. The DVD is a must see.

Information from billhicks.com was used in this report.

Eve ponders past loves, new flames, and her best friend

Original Sin
Eve

I have come to learn that absolutely nothing can be solved by walking away, and that is exactly what the new guy in my life chose to do. The argument which caused his action, however, was something I had chosen.

Which leads me to my next question: is it wrong to maintain a friendship with an ex, and is it normal to feel slightly jealous of this relationship? The only problem is that we are both communicating with our past, and we are both making this an issue in our present. Let me explain.

My high school sweetheart and I are presently in close contact. We were together for two years as teenagers, and we have remained loyal to each other as adults. He has been the only guy that I can truly depend on, and that will always pull through in a time of need. Even if we rarely find time to see each other due to circumstance, I know he will always be a phone call away.

Last week the circumstance changed when I was invited to my five-year high school reunion. I knew he might show up, and I was excited to see him. The reunion setting enhanced nostalgic memories and I anxiously awaited his arrival. On cue, he made his appearance and immediately scanned the room for me. I walked over to him and fell into his comforting embrace. It was so nice to be able to let go, to let my guard down, and to trust someone whom I know would never hurt me.

Our connection is incredibly strong, and it is not just an unspoken sexual attraction. We really just love each other as close friends. Some say it is impossible to have a platonic relationship between a guy and a girl. Some say that one of the two will always want more, and for the most part, I do agree, but I find that it is usually the guy who is secretly attracted to his friend, and rarely is it the other way around. He might be, but that is not my problem.

As for the new guy, am I more justified in questioning him for staying in contact with his college sweetheart? As far as I know, and as much as he tells me, I think I might be. He was with her a year ago, and they were passionately in love, and as expected from anyone with initial passion, their feelings simmered down and they broke up. But I think it was his decision, and he probably broke her heart in the process.

I assumed he was the type to move on if his feelings were not involved, especially if his relationship with her was more of a fling than anything else. But if so, why is she still around? What sort of comfort could he possibly get from her? Does this make sense? I cannot help but reiterate my feelings toward age differences. I am twenty-two years old, and he is not even close. I was a senior in high school five years ago. My friendship with my sweetheart is almost seven years and counting. How can the new guy be fully justified in questioning and distrusting our alliance? I understand his feelings, but it is not fair for him to compare our situations. He was with her for a few months, and they have stayed friends for a little less than a year. It is a completely different scenario. I really do not mind if he continues to speak with her, but I do mind how long it took him to admit to this.

He is usually honest and open about himself and his past, and also quite mature for his age. That is why it confuses me to experience such unnecessary drama about such unnecessary distrust. I know he likes me, and I know he knows I like him. Why can't it stay that simple? I guess this is what happens when you really like someone. All of those feelings, all of the natural human insecurities tend to burst out unexpectedly, and then what? I don't know. But these arguments always begin to happen when the relationship turns from casual to serious. And that is exactly what I refuse to let happen. My security, my dignity, and my level of maturity are all too important to give up on a petty argument. And I am relieved to remember this fact before it is too late.

Long awaited 'Half-Life' game released

Press Start to Play

Reid Davenport

One of the most popular and well-known PC games has returned. After a six-year absence and a year of dealing with reports that the game's source code had been leaked, Valve and VU games finally introduced one of the most anticipated games of 2004. Gamers once again strap on their eco-suite and grab a crowbar as Dr. Freeman in "Half-Life 2."

'Half-Life 2'
PC
Publisher: Vivendi Universal
Developer: Valve Software
Rated M

Valve had to deal with a lot to get the sequel out. The leaked source code was only a slight problem because you would need a lot of patience to attempt to get it running. Unlike "Doom 3," they decided to hold back until they were sure they could have a smooth running final release of the game.

With all of the teaser trailers and demos taunting fans until the final release date, Valve had secured a large amount of buyers for the Nov. 16 release. They also started new software called the "Steam Network" which makes sure that the gamers who decide to pirate the game will not get the full experience.

In "Half-Life 2" you are once again seeing a strange world through the eyes of Dr. Gordon Freeman. The world you were introduced to in the original "Half-Life" is nothing like this new world called City 17. You now have extremely realistic abilities as do the other characters and enemies. Right off the bat you will run into the security forces that will impede your quests throughout the game. Through some mildly humorous meetings with guards, you will learn how to pick up just about any object and use it.

See 'HALF-LIFE' on page 6

ANGUS B. DUSTAN / Staff Photographer

Doo Wop back in action

The Doo Wop Shop, one of the University's acapella groups, will be performing their final show of the semester tonight at 8 in Mahar auditorium. They will be performing with the all female UMass acapella group, the Six Minutes, as well as a co-ed acapella group, Alabaster Blue from UNH.

Domestic diva tries reality T.V.

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Martha Stewart may still be in the clink, but it appears there's no caging her appeal as television's domestic diva.

Stewart will revive her daily homemaking show next September, it was announced Wednesday — this time before a live audience, with celebrity guests and the help of "The Apprentice" producer Mark Burnett.

Stewart, not allowed to conduct business in prison, was not involved in the deal with NBC Universal to syndicate the show but is very pleased, said Susan Lyne, president of Martha Stewart Living Omnimedia.

NBC-owned stations in 14 major cities have already agreed to air the daytime show, and deals will be sought in other cities.

"Millions of people feel that Martha got a raw deal," Burnett said. Stewart and her former stockbroker were convicted in March of lying to investigators about why she sold ImClone Systems Inc. stock in 2001. Stewart, who's appealing her conviction, is serving a five-month sentence at a minimum-security federal prison for women in Alderson, W.Va. She'll be released next March.

For five months after that, she will be fitted with an ankle bracelet and confined to her Bedford, N.Y., estate, but allowed to conduct business for 48 hours a week.

Her old show, "Martha Stewart Living," was put on hiatus last summer after its 11th season. She will tread familiar territory on the yet-to-be-titled new show, including cooking, entertaining, decorating and home renovation.

Burnett said he watched several hours of outtakes from "Martha Stewart Living" and often found them more entertaining and reflective of her personality than the show itself. Interaction with a studio audience and guests will add a new element to what she does, he said.

Judging by celebrities who turned out at Stewart's trial to offer support — Rosie O'Donnell, Bill Cosby and Brian Dennehy — Burnett said he expected many to be willing to appear as guests.

Stewart went into prison promising to learn something new every day, Lyne said. "Knowing her, I am convinced that much of it will end up on the show," she said.

Burnett and NBC Universal Television Group chief Jeff Zucker would not comment on whether they have any prime-time plans for Stewart, including whether she might someday be a candidate to replace Donald Trump on "The Apprentice."

At a news conference at Martha Stewart Living headquarters in Manhattan, the executives took pains to say they had not talked business with Stewart since her sentence started. Burnett said he and Zucker first met with her last spring.

'Half-Life 2' release critically applauded

'HALF-LIFE' from page 5

Some of the weapons you will pick up are familiar, such as the crowbar, handgun, machine gun, and so on. But one of the cooler weapons you will be given is the anti-gravity gun. This weapon enables you to pick up and move objects that are out of reach or to launch explosives at a group of enemies. Some of the more fun objects to launch at human enemies are the bladed objects. You can launch these objects at guards to make them halt the men they used to be.

Another interesting weapon that makes use of the unique graphics engine is the crossbow. You can literally pin up enemies like the posters on your dorm walls. You can have plenty of fun trying to nail them all in a row or aiming to nail up their hands and feet to the wall.

One more added feature that gamers will absolutely love is the ability to drive different vehicles throughout the game. The speedboat and the dune buggy may not be the easiest vehicles to ride, but they are realistic in their reactions to terrain and surrounding objects. One of the nicer perks is running over guards that decide to get in your way.

The graphics and sound for "Half-Life 2" are extremely mind-blowing compared to any other game. Compared to this, "Halo 2" is simply a scratch on the surface when it comes to creating a realistic feel. Everything from the grinding of blades on metal to the look of the water, makes the gamer feel they are really controlling the life of Gordon Freeman.

The graphics design also allows you to activate traps to take out large numbers of guards. In the first speedboat level, you can wipe out the support beams for the bridge and let the guards plummet to their death, or you can shoot a flammable barrel and send other barrels hurdling into the guards. It gives the game even more replay value so you can simply run through again and try to find the traps and triggers you missed.

The only downside to the game is the loading time in between areas. It can range from a few seconds to five minutes. The good side is that everything else is free flowing. There's no big cut scene every few minutes or a pause for character interaction.

The characters around you will also be very handy when you get a group following you to take on the guards. They will also be polite and get out of your way if you need to get by them in close quarters. If you can help them survive they can lead you to passages and ammo supplies that you might need.

The multi-player has been enhanced wonderfully and brings back the online series that had fans loving the game even more: "Counter-Strike." The same graphics engine is used as in the single-player, and the guns are even more incredible. You will play the same games that "Counter-Strike" fans are used, to along with the money spending catch when It comes to weapons and ammo.

"Half-Life 2" is quickly becoming one of the most popular games of the year and may get by "Halo 2" as game of the year.

With a graphics engine that makes the game as close to reality as you can get today and a fan basis like no other PC game, "Half-Life 2" is the PC game to get this holiday season. Just make sure your PC has the requirements before running out and purchasing it.

Finding the best gym for you

By Michael Precker
The Dallas Morning News

OK, you're infatuated. Enticing looks, a seemingly ideal match, the promise of many long and fulfilling years together.

But in weighing any long-term commitment, don't let your impulsive heart overwhelm the common sense of your cool, logical head, or you could be stuck in an unhappy, expensive relationship.

We're talking health clubs, of course. High season is fast approaching, when the perfect storm of extra holiday pounds, New Year's resolutions and alluring deals propel many people to look for a place to work out.

"By far and away, January, February and March are the three biggest months in the calendar for us, says Bill Howland, director of research for the International Health Racquet and Sportsclub Association. "It's prime time for our industry."

But as sure as winter turns to spring, the holiday rush will fade.

"If everybody who belonged to a health club actually went, you wouldn't be able to get in the door," says James Hood, president of consumer allairs.com, a consumer watchdog Web site. "It would be too crowded."

Cedric Bryant, a vice president at the American Council on Exercise, figures the health club attrition rate mirrors the percentage of people who start exercising but don't stick with it.

"Everybody comes in with so much enthusiasm, and about half the people drop out," says Dr. Bryant, an exercise physiologist. "Unfortunately, a lot of facilities are banking on that."

Sam Mulroy, who owns health clubs in the Dallas area, disagrees. No matter what cynics think, he says, no club wants you to sign up and then stop showing up.

"It doesn't cost me an extra dime to have this place full," says Mulroy, who hopes to open more of his Fitness Evolution clubs in the area. "My electric bill is the same as when it's empty."

And when it's full, he says, customers are spending money on everything from energy bars to training sessions. When people like the club and renew memberships, he doesn't have to work as hard to recruit new ones.

"I don't want people out there saying, 'I'm a member at Fitness Evolution but I never go,'" Mulroy says. "That's no good for anybody. You want the energy in your club."

Nobody disputes that the first key to maintaining that energy is picking the right club.

"Approach this as a long-term relationship," Howland says. "This is not a short-term fling."

To make sure this love lasts, Bryant says, "It just takes a little bit of homework."

Here are a few lessons.

LOCATION, LOCATION

"People will make any excuse not to work out," says Mulroy, who's also a personal trainer. "The number one reason is proximity."

So the No. 1 consideration is to find a club near your home or office. Howland says clubs figure that members won't drive more than 15 minutes to work out, with 8-10 minutes a more likely time frame.

"It's got to be convenient, because you've got to make it part of your day," concurs Josh Mandel, director of sales and marketing at the Baylor Tom Landry Fitness Center. "If you really fall in love with a club that's 30 minutes from your home or office, you'll have the best intentions, but you won't go."

WHAT ABOUT MY NEEDS?

America is all about choice, which is why there are clubs for grunting bodybuilders, clubs for women only, clubs for people more concerned about lattes than lats.

"I don't want to sound like Stephen Covey," Mandel says, referring to the business guru, "but you've got to begin with the end in mind. No club can be all things to all people."

So before you check out clubs, check out yourself.

"What type of person are you and what are you looking for?" says Mulroy. "Do you want a pool? Do you want a lot of machines or just a treadmill to run on when it's cold? Are you a big meathead (club talk for a no-nonsense bodybuilder), or do you want a nice atmosphere and a lot of classes?"

And when you're finished asking yourself all those questions, ask your friends. "People want to work out with people they know and like," Mandel says.

KICKING THE TIRES

Take a tour, of course. Check the place out — from machines to mildew to music to meeting members, and then check it again at the time of day you're most likely to work out.

"Clubs have a different feel on a Friday night than they do at 2 o'clock on a Monday," Howland says. "See how crowded it is when you're going to be there."

Then come back with your gym bag.

"I can show you the club and tell you what we offer, but you've got to feel comfortable," Mandel says. "You have to try the club and see if it's where you want to be. Any club that won't give you a free trial period, it's like, 'What are you hiding?'"

PAPERS, PLEASE

"People get in all kinds of trouble by not reading contracts," says Hood, the consumer advocate. Still, he says the contract obliges you to pay, "but it doesn't oblige them to do anything, like maintain the club."

So if you're dubious about a club keeping its promises or even staying in business, Hood suggests making monthly payments by credit card. "That way, you can dispute the charge," he says. "If you gave them a check, you're out of luck."

KEEPING PASSION ALIVE

Mandel says his experience teaches that health club members want three things: "They want a clean facility, they want the equipment to function and they want people to be nice to them."

He pledges to do all that, but thinks members have a responsibility as well.

"People need to be comfortable to ask for help," he says. "We know there's going to be a rush in January and there will be people who look lost, aren't sure what class is going on or how to work the equipment. We try to be proactive, but we want you to speak up."

At Fitness Evolution, Mulroy says, the people most likely to stick it out are the ones who know the most about the club's programs and equipment.

He starts new members with a free trainer session and tries to make sure they get to know the staff.

"I tell them, 'Tell us what we can do for you. I don't want you to be the person who joins and works out for a month and is gone."

Strength and conditioning specialist Justin Allen is shown practicing some weight lifting and conditioning excercises at the Baylor-Tom Landry Fitness Center where he works in Dallas.

Psst, UMass Amherst Seniors!

You're not going to look like this forever.

Take your senior yearbook pictures today!
Senior Portrait Sitting Dates are:

November 29	November 30	December 1
December 2	December 3	December 6
December 7	December 8	December 9
December 10	January 24	January 25
January 26	January 27	January 28

Go to www.ouryear.com and use school code 147 to schedule your appointment today

ALL creative FOOD & BEVERAGE UP!
GRAND OPENING
ALL YOU CAN EAT BUFFET
With Countless combinations of vegetables, poultry, fish, and meat.
Choose from 12 specially created sauces!!!
OPEN 7 DAYS A WEEK FOR LUNCH AND DINNER
Sunday Breakfast
Design your own omelets, pancakes, and french toast 10-4pm
A Fantastic Full Bar Menu
Create Your Own Meal
11:30am - 9 pm
48 Russell Street, Route 9, Hadley
413-584-5155
WWW.ALLFIREDUPHADLEY.COM

UMass upsets UConn

UPSET! from page 10

themselves, but another strong move to the hoop by Bowers ended in the ball rolling in and out as the buzzer sounded.

After UMass scored the initial four points of the second half on a pair of Freeman lay-ups, UConn stormied back with a 13-2 run, highlighted by back-to-back thunderous, breakaway dunks from highly-touted freshman Rudy Gay that gave the Huskies their largest lead of the game at 42-37.

With the teams trading baskets over the next few minutes, UMass was able to even the score when a Lasme free throw and Anderson's first basket of the game, a 3-pointer at the 8:28 mark, made the score 46-46.

Rashad Anderson answered right back with a 3-pointer of his own, however, and the Huskies used six points from the free throw line to pull ahead by five at 55-50 with just under five minutes to play.

From there the Minutemen battled back, however, and five consecutive points from Connecticut's own Jeff Viggiano gave UMass a 59-55 lead with 55 seconds to play. Two free throws apiece from Boone and Gay tied the score at 59, before Freeman gave UMass fans a reason to flood the court for the first time in recent history.

Examining recruiting

ATHAS from page 8

me will tell you that. But plain and simple, this was not the football I knew. I didn't end up enrolling in either of the two colleges, and while these incidents were not the overriding reason for my decision, they definitely had an effect on it. Coming out of a small high school, college football turned out to be a whole different ball game.

My sense of college recruiting was obviously a negative one, which is not to say that everyone has a similar impression. There are plenty of successful college athletes at all levels who did not run into the same roadblock that I did. There are also many college athletes out there who are genuinely respectable. I cannot come out and say that this goes on at every college because I only know this about two schools. But I will say that I wouldn't be surprised if this type of recruiting turned out to be evident at many institutions.

As a sportswriter, the game is what I enjoy to write about, rather than the game outside the game. After my personal experiences with college sports and the senseless fights that took place at NFL, NBA and college football games recently, I believe, unless there is some kind of change in the system, sports will continue on this path. The game used to be sweat, strength and heart, but now, with money, drugs and other misconduct, the line that separates the field or court from life is a thin one.

Perhaps someday in the future we can go back to a world of sports that seems so distant at this point, the days when baseball wasn't steeped in steroid controversy. When you could read about your favorite professional team in the sports section, and not in the police reports. Maybe. But for now, reality says the sun is setting on sports.

Time is running out. And the game is almost gone.

Eric Athas is a Collegian columnist.

Players, fans charged in Pacers-Pistons brawl

BRAWL from page 8

Green threw a drink at Artest, who then charged into the stands and attacked a man he thought had done it. Other Pacers followed him, and the brawl spread through the stands and then back on the court as some fans walked down to confront the players.

David Wallace is one of three fans who face only a single count each of misdemeanor assault and battery. The others are John Ackerman of Grand Rapids and William Paulson of Grand Blanc, each accused of throwing a cup or liquid substance at players.

Auburn Hills Police Chief Doreen Olko said Charlie Haddad and Alvin "A.J." Shackelford, both of Burt, are charged with violating a local ordinance that prohibits fans from entering the court. That violation is punishable by up to 90 days in jail and a $500 fine, Lt. James Manning said.

Olko said investigators planned to continue trying to identify all fans who entered the court during the fight and those who dumped drinks and debris on players as they exited the floor. Gorcyca said more charges could be filed.

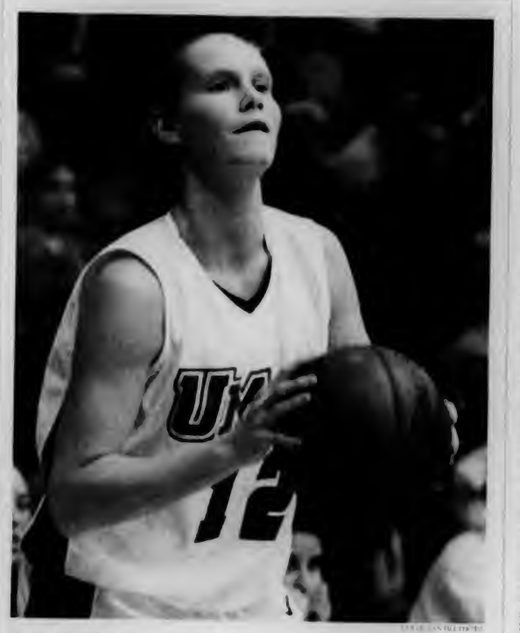
Pacers chief executive Donnie Walsh said he would not comment until the cases were resolved. "In the meantime, we will continue to support our players in every possible way for the duration of these proceedings and afterward," he said.

THE SCORE is coming!

Sports@dailycollegian.com

This is the "HOT" Yoga
BIKRAM YOGA Amherst
www.bikramyoga.com
665-yoga
The room is heated to open you...
The series is powerful to challenge you.
The yoga is BIKRAM to change you...
Designed for all levels, BIKRAM yoga will challenge you physically, focus you mentally and allow you to relax on a very deep level
TRY IT FOR 10 CONSECUTIVE DAYS FOR ONLY $20!!!

The Pre-Business Group
invites you to apply for the
3rd BUSINESS LEADERSHIP SEMINAR
The Pre-Business Group is accepting applications for its 3rd Business Leadership Seminar to be held at Amherst College in January. The Business Leadership Seminar is an intense four day professional experience designed to: teach students of all majors and class years about leadership and business while helping them to hone personal skills, establish contacts, and open the door to new and exciting opportunities. The program is highly selective, but all class years and majors are encouraged to apply.
Companies represented at past seminars include: Accenture • Bain & Company • Bank of America Securities • Bear Stearns • Boston Millenia Partners • Capital One Financial Group • Credit Swiss First Boston • Deutsche Bank • Goldman, Sachs & Co. • Gotham Advertising Interbrand • Lehman Brothers • Mckinsey & Co. • Merrill Lynch • Monitor Company Morgan Stanley • New York Life Investment Management • Proctor & Gamble Skadden Arps • Sponsors for Educational Opportunity (SEO) • Starwoods Hotels & Resorts • The National Basketball Association • Columbia Business School Jack School of Business • Harvard Business School • Yale School of Management MIT Sloan School of Management • Stanford Graduate School of Business
Interterm 2005: Tuesday, January 18 – Friday, January 21
Applications Accepted: November 10 - January 3
(Rolling Acceptance)
For more information or to apply, please visit http://www.prebusinessgroup.org



Worship at Dwight Chapel
We are an Interdenominational Evangelical Church serving the entire valley since 1886.
Sunday morning worship at 8:30 & 10:45
FREE SHUTTLE FROM UMASS (HAIGIS MALL @ 10AM)
If you are interested to know more about the church, visit us at www.Dwightchapel.org
For more information call 413-256-8059
Dwight Chapel, 885 Federal Street, Belchertown, MA 01007

SELLING MY BOOKS FOR CASH CHANGED MY LIFE.
BUT INDIVIDUAL RESULTS MAY VARY.
Get cash for your books.*

Textbook Annex	Campus Center Concourse	Hampden Lobby-Southwest
12/6-12/10 9am-4pm	12/13-12/17 9am-5pm	12/16-12/17 10am-5pm
12/13-12/15 9am-4pm	12/18 11am-4pm	12/18 11am-4pm
12/16-12/17 9am-5pm	12/20-12/22 9am-5pm	12/20-12/22 10am-5pm
12/18 11am-4pm
12/20-12/22 9am-5pm

WIN BETTER GIFTS Sweepstakes YOU COULD WIN $5000 in our online drawing or instantly win cool prizes or in-store discounts.
See store for details.
University of Massachusetts UNIVERSITY STORE
Campus Center • Phone: (413) 545-2619
www.umass.bkstr.com
follett.com ONLINE. ON CAMPUS.
UNIVERSITY STORE'S The Textbook Annex UMASS AMHERST
*Current market value applies. Sweepstakes runs from 11/15/04 through 12/31/04

Road Warriors

Ashley Sharpton and the Massachusetts women's basketball team were victorious on the road once again, this time downing non-conference foe Hofstra 64-57 in Hempstead, N.Y.

The ups and downs of college recruiting

Eric Athas

Money, drugs, sex and alcohol are all words that can be associated with college athletics these days. It's no secret at this point, especially after the recent scandals involving big-name schools around the country.

Colorado had the incident where a female member of the football team was allegedly raped by both students of the school and high school students being recruited. Ohio State had the notorious Maurice Clarrett episode involving an alleged exchange of money to players, a clear violation of NCAA rules. And then there is the Baylor incident, which had perhaps the worst outcome of corruption when basketball player Patrick Dennehy, who received money and other illegal profits from coaches, was allegedly murdered by a teammate.

College sports are beginning to sound like a bad soap opera. Last year I experienced a taste of what it's all about when I visited a number of colleges in hopes of playing football. What I learned, however, is how little football had to do with anything. The schools I visited were not high-profile Division I schools like Colorado or Ohio State. They were smaller, Division II and III colleges that don't offer scholarships, so I figured they would be much more civilized and more similar to high school. I was wrong. I visited numerous schools and stayed overnight for football recruiting weekends at two schools in particular. These were the two schools I was most interested in playing football at.

I stayed over at these colleges to get a decent idea of what the football program was like. Like I said earlier, football didn't have too much to do with it. Now, some of the actions that took place during these weekends are more prone to shock the general public rather than an 18-year-old in the 21st century, like myself.

At one point during my first visit, the quarterback of this team was snorting prescription painkiller Vicodin up his nose, at which point another player inquired if he was snorting "blow" (more commonly known as cocaine). I was later informed that a lot of the upperclassmen on the team would get drunk the night before football games during the season. In short, my visit did not make a very good impression on the quality of this football team. The "football-recruiting visit" only involved football for a few hours.

About a month later I stayed overnight at a second recruiting weekend, this time at a different college. I happened to visit when the team there was pledging and witnessed college hazing firsthand. "The seniors are choosing three freshman to be cupids tonight!," one freshman told my host in a both humored and anxious tone, shortly after I arrived to the dorms. That night, three freshmen would be transformed into these "cupids", appropriate for the occasion, since it was Valentine's Day. Later that night at a senior's house, those three freshmen were brought into a room on the upper level of the house, with the door shut and locked. A few hours later, the three emerged from the room, incoherent, and wearing only thongs, painted red all over in recognition of the holiday. Actually, only two made it downstairs, the third remained on the steps as he threw up continuously. I was later waitlisted from this school after being informed by the head coach that being accepted to the school "wouldn't be a problem."

Some may say that "boys will be boys" and this is something that will go on no matter what. But where do you draw the line? You can't say that corruption at all of these institutions is okay, as long as it doesn't lead to rape or murder like it did at Colorado and Baylor. Because it was the same type of wrongdoing that takes place at the schools I visited that leads to the tragic actions at other schools. Hopefully there is some kind of change on the horizon.

I love sports, especially football, and everybody who knows

See ATHAS on page 7

Minutemen fall to No. 5 New Hampshire

UM loses Anderson to ugly knee injury

ANDERSON from page 10

thing that might keep him out for a long time, if not the season."

Cahoon was careful not to make any conclusions about the immediate future for Anderson, but the look on the coach's face said a lot, and a word that will certainly bring winces in the Pioneer Valley — "fracture" — was uttered as a possibility.

It's just one more splash of gasoline thrown on the inferno of doubt that the Minutemen's season has become. UMass has won one game in its last seven, and that victory, a 3-2 decision at home against Providence, is beginning to look more like an aberration than a slump-buster.

While there's no way to tell now the effect that Anderson's absence will have on the team, the worst message that can be gathered from last night is that the slippery slope the Minutemen have been on for a month solid isn't firming up at all. Although they were very much in last night's game until Jacob Micflikker opened the scoring with just 22 seconds to go in the second period, the Minutemen couldn't solve UNH's left Pietrasiak, and for the most part couldn't even get to that puzzle, taking just 14 shots in the game.

Although the puck movement on the power play, which has been a staple of the problems the Minutemen have had over the last few weeks, was more lively and inventive last night, it still didn't produce any result.

18 games into the season, there have been ups and downs for the Minutemen, but very little consistency, and very few truths about the play of a team everyone expected to at least tread water this year. Cahoon, though, may have offered the answer, somber and harsh, after last night's game.

Maroon and White fall flat in Durham

HOCKEY from page 10

"I think we made the most of our scoring opportunities, and I think that was the difference in the game," UNH coach Dick Umile said. "I think we generated more opportunities. We played well tonight. We beat a good team."

The shot disparity between the two teams was the biggest obstacle for UMass to overcome as they were out shot 27-17, and the Wildcats scored on three of their 11 third period shots.

"When we can only generate [17] shots, we're going to have a hard time winning games ... Obviously, things aren't going well for us right now," Cahoon said.

The contest got off to a slow start as both teams struggled to grab control of play in the first period. UNH out shot UMass 11-4, but the Wildcats didn't have many clear looks at the net as they were trying to figure out UMass' trap defense, which was very efficient through most of the night.

New Hampshire's best chance to take an early lead came just under 11 minutes into the contest when Preston Callander crossed the blue line into the UMass zone unabated but failed to take advantage of his one-on-one opportunity with Minuteman goalie Gabe Winer.

Winer made an all-or-nothing play, diving headfirst up the ice and knocking the puck loose from the UNH co-captain's stick to keep the score knotted at zero.

"For awhile there in the second period, even towards the end of the first period, it looked like we might have had a shot at getting that first goal and maybe put a little bit more pressure on [UNH]," Cahoon said.

"Then, obviously, there was a little leakage, and things got away from us."

The second period saw most of the same, two teams trading possessions with neither one gaining any momentum.

But with 90 seconds remaining in the second frame, the Wildcats began mounting a charge.

Freshman Craig Switzer received a quick pass from Sean Collins just to Winer's right but clanked his shot off the right post, causing a previously quiet crowd of 5,675 to stand and applaud, thinking Switzer's shot made it home.

The Minutemen collected the long rebound and took off down the ice on the counterattack, but before they could set anything up in their offensive zone, Garrett Summerfield was called for a hooking penalty.

With their home crowd now involved in the game, the Wildcats set up their offense as Daniel Winnik hit Jacob Micflikker with a pass. Micflikker skated into Winer's crease and somehow forced the shot into the net, giving UNH a 1-0 lead with his power play goal heading into the final period.

The Minutemen still appeared optimistic at the beginning of the third period as they had two great chances to tie the score early on.

John Toffey stole a pass that caromed wildly off Robbie Barker's stick in the UMass zone. Toffey quickly turned towards the net and fired a shot that went wide right.

Just seconds later, Peter Trovato put a shot on net from the left point, but UNH goalie Jeff Pietrasiak, who registered his first career shutout, made a spectacular glove save over his left shoulder.

The Wildcats put a dagger through the collective Minuteman heart just over four minutes into the last period, though, when Sean Collins collected a rebound from Callander's shot and knocked it into the back of the net for a 2-0 game.

The dagger was twisted when Collins added his second goal of the night and seventh of the season nine minutes later. He took a weak shot from the right point that slid right through Winer's legs.

Callander closed the scoring book and capped off a great individual night by adding a garbage goal with 1:01 to play.

EXECUTIVE VALET PARKING
Serving Bradley Airport
Airport Parking College Special!
$25.00*-Up to 7 Days Parking. Valid 11/23-11/30
$50.00*-Up to 5 Weeks Parking. Valid 12/15-02/01/05
Valid College ID Req., Present this coupon or Visit us at:
www.CollegeAirportParking.com
800-218-1297
*Plus 4% Access Fee. Cannot be Combined with Other offers

We can't promise the hard abs, but we can guarantee the smooth skin.
Laser Hair Removal
Call for a free consultation with Dr. Bob Weitzman, Medical Director
AMHERST LASER & SKIN CARE CENTER
196 North Pleasant St. Suite 11 Amherst, MA 01002 (413) 253-2213 www.amherstlaser.com

Players charged in Pacers-Pistons brawl

By Sarah Karush
Associated Press

PONTIAC, Mich. — After weeks of poring over videotape from one of the worst fights in U.S. sports history, prosecutors filed charges against five Indiana Pacers players and seven Detroit fans.

Pacers players Ron Artest, Stephen Jackson, David Harrison and Anthony Johnson were charged Wednesday with single counts of assault and battery, a misdemeanor that carries a maximum penalty of about three months in jail and a fine of up to $500.

Jermaine O'Neal, a three-time NBA All-Star, was charged with two counts of assault and battery for his actions in the brawl at the end of a game last month.

Five fans were charged with misdemeanor assault and battery, including Pistons star Ben Wallace's brother, David.

Fan Bryant Jackson also was charged with felony assault for throwing a chair. That crime is punishable by up to four years in prison, but he could get up to eight years because he has prior convictions, Oakland County Prosecutor David Gorcyca said.

The other fans and players most likely would face only fines and probation if they have clean records. Two other spectators were charged with violating a local ordinance for walking onto the court.

Gorcyca said there was no video evidence that any Pistons players threw punches.

Lawyers for two players and one of the fans said their actions had been reasonable in the context of the chaos that erupted.

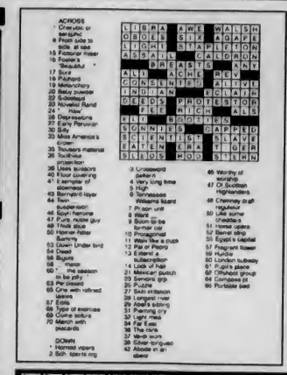
Gorcyca said one man was more to blame than the others: John Green of Oakland County's West Bloomfield Township faces two assault counts and is the man accused of throwing the cup that sparked the brawl.

"I would like to hold Mr. Green more accountable, because had not he thrown that cup and struck Artest, we wouldn't be here today," the prosecutor said.

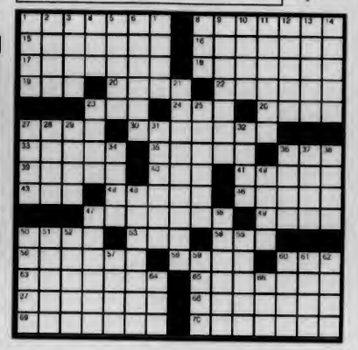
Gorcyca personally identified the 39-year-old Green early in the investigation because they were neighbors years ago in the Detroit area. Green also has a prior record, so his penalty could be stiffer if he is convicted, Gorcyca said.

Green's lawyer, Shawn Smith, called the charges against his client "outrageous and the worst kind of politics" and said the prosecutor was caving to the big business of basketball by "picking on the little guy."

"He's setting an example," Smith said of Gorcyca. "And I'm all for setting an example, but tell him to leave the game, don't prosecute him."



The fight among spectators and players broke out near the end of a Nov. 19 game at The Palace of Auburn Hills after an on-court dispute over a foul. Gorcyca said



See BRAWL on page 7

CINEMARK
The Best Seat In Town
CINEMARK AT HAMPSHIRE MALL 6
367 Russell St. 413-587-4233
Schedule for 12/10/04 - 12/16/04
DIGITAL SURROUND SOUND IN ALL AUDITORIUMS
Purchase Tickets Online @ cinemark.com
Blade Trinity
Ocean's Twelve
After The Sunset
Spongebob Squarepants
Alexander
The Polar Express
Bridget Jones: Edge of Reason
The Incredibles
Christmas with the Kranks
Ray
National Treasure
Finding Neverland
Tim Burton's Corpse Bride
Million Dollar Baby
Meet the Fockers
Polar Express
Tickets on sale now
• NO PASSES, NO SUPERPASSES
Tickets & showtimes available at cinemark.com

Amherst Computerworks, Inc.
PC & Laptop Sales/Service/Repair 5-College Certified Vendor
Laptop & LCD Projector Rentals
Repairing Macs and all brands of PC's
Selling new Custom desktop & laptop PC's
9 East Pleasant St. Amherst, MA 01002
Phone: (413) 548-8900
Fax: (413) 548-8030
aci@acipc.com
Est. 1990

The Moan and Dove
Trust us.
Be here when we open on sunday.
Just trust us.
themoananddove.com
460 West St. • Rte. 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day

Want to Jumpstart your business?
Advertise with the Collegian

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Everything you cook tastes awful. When will you learn.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Don't go too crazy this weekend, even though you will be tempted.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
For some reason, you have been acting very shy lately. It's uncharacteristic.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Next time you hear that beat, get up and dance.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
The last day of class can be very sad. Don't be afraid to let your emotions show.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
This weekend you will persist until you find the answers you are looking for.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Something you never thought you would like before is suddenly very appealing.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Don't give up yet. The semester is almost over. There is a light at the end of the tunnel.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You should find out more about what has been bothering your friend.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 20
Follow your gut instincts. You are getting strong messages.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
No one has yet discovered the male fairy. You will be the first.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You have tasted the magical powers of the kava kava plant and you are strong.

Quote of the Day

"Mr. Madison, what you've just said is one of the most insanely idiotic things I have ever heard. At no point in your rambling, incoherent response were you even close to anything that could be considered a rational thought. Everyone in this room is now dumber for having listened to it. I award you no points, and may God have mercy on your soul."

-The Principal, Billy Madison

Do You know THE SCORE?
The Massachusetts Daily Collegian's annual sports magazine. Available at selected newstands and at the Mullins Center.

THE SCORE
STEVE BAYLARK
5

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Your exams are very important. Your ultimate destiny is the most important. "Final Frontier" coming to your campus soon. www.finalfrontier.tv Check out www.allabourgod.com

APARTMENT FOR RENT

1 bedroom condo, kitchen, sitting room call Roohina at 549-6091

One bedroom apartment for rent. Puffton Village. Starting in January. 765/month. Heat and hot water included. Call 978-502-9036

Brandywine Apts. 1 Bedroom units Available Jan. 1, 2005 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com Stop by or call 549-0600

APARTMENT FOR RENT

2 Bedroom 2 Bathroom Lease from Jan-Aug $1,100/Month, Utilities included Contact Jenna @ 917-753-3591

Amherst 2 Bedroom Condo On Bus Line 950+ 256-5467

Need an Apt. for 2nd Semester? Short Term Leases, Free Heat, Huge Bedrooms Call The Boulders 256-8534

AUTO FOR SALE

2001 Toyota Corolla S Spd 55K Asking $7500.00 549-5048

2001 Nissan Xterra Four wheel drive, excellent condition automatic transmission, Loaded, for photos and more information go to http://hometown.aol.com/matheosup/index.htm l or call 413-536-8077

COMPUTERS

Pentium Laptop $99- Pentium III Desktop $99- 413-584-8857

EMPLOYMENT

MAD SCIENTISTS WANTED! PT to conduct fun science after-school programs, parties, etc. Requirements: Experience with groups of children, enthusiasm, car. Performance experience a plus 1-800-338-5711

Returning to the Greater Boston area this Winter break? Want a fun, flexible job working with kids in their homes? Look no further... call Parents in a Pinch, Inc. TODAY if you have childcare experience/references, at least 1 full weekday free and want to earn $11/hr. Car helpful. 617-739-KIDS Fill out application at: www.parentsinapinch.com

EMPLOYMENT

Wanted: Energetic People for Spring Break Flyering / Promotions (Hourly Wage Paid)! Be a Trip Organizer and Earn Free Trips! Call STA Travel / Breakaway Tours 1-800-465-4257

"Bartending" $300/Day Potential. No Experience Nesc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Student Brand Manager Motivated? Outgoing? Enthusiastic? Want to build your resume? Campus-Fundraiser is currently hiring a Student Brand Manager to promote our company on your campus. Start in January. Manage promotions on campus, work 10 hours a week. $100/week salary plus bonuses. Learn more at http://www.campus-fundraiser.com/SBM.asp

ENTERTAINMENT

DJ for Hire Mission 101 Ent. Contact Fredy at 413-687-3849

ROOM FOR RENT

Room for rent in five bedroom apartment preferably girl $402.50/month Less than half a mile from campus and town Call Elana 253-9694

ROOMMATE WANTED

Roommate wanted for one large bedroom in house big enough for two to share. Closest house to campus! Call Marissa at 413-549-4561

1 Bedroom Avail in 2 Bedroom Apt Rent 425 Month Contact 917-270-8127

325/month inclusive call 413-775-9997

SERVICES

Need Just Evacuation and Repatriation Coverage? Check out BETA! $250,000 Evacuation, $25,000 Repatriation COST is $18 for 6 MONTHS! Online enrollment, emailed verification of coverage www.betins.com

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house Certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst, 548-9992

Pregnant ? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

TRAVEL

Spring Break Bahamas Celebrity Party Cruise! 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Nassau, Jamaica, From $459! Panama City & Daytona $159! www.SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Spring Break 2005- Travel with STS, America's #1 Student Tour Operator to Jamaica, Cancun, Acapulco, Bahamas and Florida. Now hiring on-campus reps. Call for group discounts. Information/Reservations 1-800-648-4849 or www.ststravel.com.

StudentCity.com The Ultimate Spring Break Experience 1-888-SpringBreak, or www.StudentCity.com to reserve today

TRAVEL

!SPRING BREAK
Largest selection of Destinations, including Cruises! VIP Club Parties & FREE trips. Epicurean Tours 1-800-231-4-FUN www.BREAKNOW.com

SPRING BREAK '05
SAVE $100 PER ROOM
Clip & Send or Use Code: PRMNG Online
www.sunsplashtours.com
1.800.426.7710

WANTED

Snowboard events intern $50/day stipend For job description email jtriends@deerfield.edu

Happy Holidays from the Massachusetts Daily Collegian

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEEKEND

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 10, 2004 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

MADNESS AT MULLINS!

UMass pulls shocking upset of defending champion UConn

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

They did it.

The members of the Massachusetts men's basketball team finally did it. The team that hasn't had a winning season in five years, the team that has put head coach Steve Lappas on the ropes because of its poor performance during his tenure and the team that has watched its fan base dwindle to an all-time low did the one thing that no one thought it could do – it earned the one win that fans young and old who bleed maroon and white thought they may never see again.

On a cold, winter night in early December, the Massachusetts Minutemen took on, hung with and eventually beat archrival Connecticut – make that defending NCAA National Champion and No. 7 Connecticut – 61-59 before one of the more raucous and supportive crowds in the history of UMass basketball - 9,037 strong.

They accomplished, in one night, what every UMass basketball team since the departure of John Calipari was not able to do. They re-ignited a dormant passion for basketball on the campus of the state university of Massachusetts that hasn't seen a win of this magnitude in over half a decade, and did so in one small window of time when the eyes of the college basketball world were focused not just on the small college town of Amherst, but ultimately on the return of UMass basketball to the spotlight of national prominence.

"It feels like we just won the National Championship," Anderson said. "I've been waiting my whole career for this, and for it to finally happen is just amazing. It's an incredible feeling, and I don't want it to end.

"I still can't believe what just happened," sophomore forward Rashaun Freeman added. "I'm going to have to watch it again on SportsCenter to make sure it's really real."

Freeman led the Minutemen with a game-high 18 points, while Jeff Viggiano chipped in with 12 points.

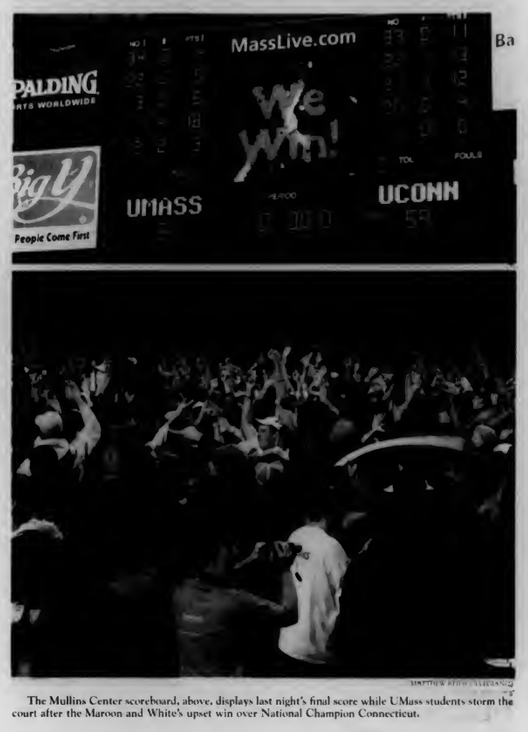
Freshman Rudy Gay paced Connecticut with 13 points, and was joined in double-figures by Josh Boone with 12 points and Denham Brown with 11 points.

"This ranks up there with some of my top wins of all time," Lappas said. "These guys really deserved this win, and to see the UMass fans fill the Mullins Center for a night like this is just tremendous."

With the game tied at 59 with just nine seconds remaining, Freeman's breakaway lay-up off a feed from classmate Art Bowers on a 2-on-1 fast break gave UMass a 61-59 lead it did not relinquish, as UConn's Denhant Brown was short on a game-winning 3-point attempt at the buzzer, sending the delirious UMass students flooding onto the court in pandemonium.

"It's just a testament to how hard these kids have worked," Lappas said. "They put themselves in position to make this happen, and they were able to do it for themselves, our team, this program and this university."

Feeding off the energy of a raucous student section and a season-best crowd, the Minutemen came flying out of the gates against the defending National Champions. After trading baskets with the Huskies over the first two minutes of action, a pair of easy baskets from Freeman sandwiched around a Stephane Lame dunk helped spark a 12-3 run that gave UMass an early 18-7 lead and further ignited the crowd.



UConn answered back with a mini 5-2 run of its own to pull within seven, but UMass continued its success on the offensive end by scoring the next five points to increase its leads to 25-13 with just under nine minutes to play in the half.

With the Maroon and White struggling on offense in scoring just four points over the final 8:15 of the half, the Huskies utilized four points from Boone and five from Denham Brown as part of a 14-4 run that culminated when Villanueva tied the game at 29 with a breakaway dunk at the 2:03 mark.

Bowers then gave the Minutemen the last laugh before the buzzer, converting on a strong driving layup to give UMass a 31-29 lead heading into intermission.

The Huskies could have elected to hold for the last shot, but Antonio Kellogg attempted an alley-oop lob to Villanueva that the sophomore forward clanged off the side of the rim. The Minutemen then elected to hold for the last shot

See UPSET! on page 7

The Mullins Center scoreboard, above, displays last night's final score while UMass students storm the court after the Maroon and White's upset win over National Champion Connecticut.

UNH shuts out Mass Attack on the road

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

DURHAM, N.H. — The story almost told itself at the Whittemore Center last night.

The Massachusetts hockey team was able to keep up with the New Hampshire Wildcats (11-3-2, 6-1-1 Hockey East) for two periods, but when things got rough for the Minutemen (7-10-1, 4-5-1 HEA), the wheels fell off and UNH kept piling on third period goals to spell a 4-0 win over UMass.

UNH	4
UMass	0

Just like the Minutemen did against Maine three weeks ago and Boston University just last Saturday, they were able to stick with one of the top-level Hockey East teams before self-destructing late in the game.

Massachusetts returns to action tomorrow night against Sacred Heart at the Mullins Center at 7 p.m. on "Mullet Night".

Just when things couldn't get any worse for UMass, leading point-scorer Matt Anderson was checked hard along the left boards by Mike Radja with 10 minutes to play in the game and the contest seemingly decided.

UMass coach Don Cahoon said after the game that the leg injury didn't look promising, and it is possible that he fractured his leg, which could end his season. Cahoon did want to clear up, though, that he wanted to wait for official word from the medical staff on the injury before any conclusions were made.

See HOCKEY on page 8

UMASS

Weekend Schedule

Friday, Dec. 10

Sport	Opp./Event	Time
Women's Ice Hockey	vs. Trinity	7:00 p.m.

Saturday, Dec. 11

Sport	Opp./Event	Time
Men's Hockey	vs. Sacred Heart	7:00 p.m.

Sunday, Dec. 12

Sport	Opp./Event	Time
Men's Basketball	vs. Davidson	2:00 p.m.

Anderson goes down with potentially serious knee injury

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

DURHAM, N.H. — The gasps could probably be heard from Durham to Amherst. As if the Massachusetts hockey team needed another blow, another reason to be concerned about getting anything out of this season, the worst yet came in the form of sophomore Matt Anderson, crumpled on the ice near the UMass bench.

Anderson, who has provided the Minutemen with seven goals and 13 assists in 17 games this season, was the recipient of a hard, but by all accounts clean, check against the boards from Mike Radja with a little over 10 minutes to go in the third period of last night's 4-0 loss to New Hampshire. Anderson didn't put a shot on the final stat-sheet, but his presence as a playmaker was certainly still felt on the ice.

The worst fear, of course, would be that he had re-aggravated the right shoulder that kept him out all of last season, erasing the possibilities of a stellar second year in the maroon and white.

Early speculation, however, suggests that the shoulder was not the injury that sent Anderson off for the remainder of the game. Assisted by a pair of teammates, Anderson glided to the corner zamboni exit with his right foot off the ice, using only his left leg for support. While medical privacy rules prevent the team from releasing any detailed information, it would seem that the prognosis will likely be a right leg injury.

So, it's probably not the infamous shoulder, leading to the possibility of a return by Anderson this season. But the centerman was down on the ice for several minutes, which would hint at a fairly serious injury that could keep him out of tomorrow's game against Sacred Heart at the Mullins Center.

"The preliminary information is that it isn't good," Cahoon said. "I don't want to be rash, but there's a chance it's some-

See ANDERSON on page 8

Members of the UMass ice hockey team, shown here celebrating a goal during a recent home game, had no reason to celebrate last night after being shut out by Hockey East rival New Hampshire.

'Ocean's Twelve' turns out to be a holiday treat

ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 6

TODAY	TUESDAY	WEDNESDAY
• High: 32° • Low: 11°	• High: 32° • Low: 16°	• High: 26° • Low: 18°

DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

Hurricanes storm over UMass

SPORTS, PAGE 12

The Daily Collegian

MONDAY, DECEMBER 13, 2004 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXIV ISSUE 66

Commission on Campus Diversity listens to statements from students

By Sean Whalen
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Commission on Campus Diversity held a public forum on Wednesday night in the Curry Hicks Gymnasium. Thirty pre-registered participants comprised of students and faculty addressed the commission in five-minute statements, and answered questions from commission members directly following speaking.

The first participant to address the commission, Barak Sered, a student in the class of 2005, stressed the need to combat racism from within the University structure.

"Though diversity is indeed an important goal, a community can never achieve it so long as racist factions are supported by the people representing the institution itself," Sered said. "Vice Chancellor Michael Gargano has become a weight on this community, and in planning the restructuring of our university, I urge you to consider restructuring him out." This statement was followed by a thunderous applause from the audience, and it's duration led Chairman Orlando Taylor to inform the audience that they were taking away Sered's allotted time.

Alex Austin, a student speaking on behalf of the Students of Caribbean Ancestry, cited his numerous trials and tribulations being an African American student, and the diminishing financial and academic support allotted for minorities. During his statement, he mentioned three younger brothers doing well in school. When asked by the commission if he would recommend UMass, he firmly said, "No, I will not let them. I will not let them stand before a commission like this, or have to beg for funding."

Analise Forza, a graduate student at UMass, edited her statement prior to speaking, which said in part, "There's seven police officers at this event tonight, it says quite a bit about the racial climate on this campus," referring to the heightened security and officers garbed in black on black suits.

Many speakers focused on the trend of UMass turning into an elitist university, devoid of racial diversity, gravitating towards privatization and business. This opinion was elequated by Pavel Payano, a student speaking on behalf of the ALANA Caucus.

"There's one vision that comes straight from Boston down to Whitmore. In this vision, education is a privilege and not a right and UMass Amherst will only be accessible to the wealthy," Payano said. "There's another vision for the University, a vision that follows UMass Amherst's mandate as a land grant institution, a vision of a top-level university, but not of an elite university.

We see a university that serves the needs of the community that it is a part of."

In reference to minority student programs' declining financial support, senior Ismelly Rivera spoke fondly of the Bilingual Collegiate Program at UMass. When she arrived as a freshman in 2001, she said, "Without this program, I don't know how I would have survived my first few weeks here."

Citing a lack of funding and institutional support, she stated, "when I came back my sophomore year, everything was gone."

"We must remember that if it wasn't for the students, there'd be no university. So I am here as a student representative, not asking but demanding, that we need to start changing things now," she said

The public forum was scheduled from 7 p.m. to 10 p.m., with the five minutes allotted for each speaker timed with a large clock, and rigorously enforced. The absent speakers allowed for ten minutes of questions from the committee to the forum participants.

"We celebrate our faculty, they have been tremendous, and the recent hires have been great," Sered said.

In stark contrast, Analise Forza, a grad student and professor who holds three different degrees from three other sate uni-

See DIVERSITY on page 3

ADRIENNE ROSSOUW/COLLEGIAN

The Commission on Diversity hears stories regarding racial issues on campus from a range of UMass students and faculty at a forum held in Curry Hicks Cage Wednesday night.

Robotic contest to transform Lederle

By Matthew Reid
Collegian Staff

Room A307 of the Lederle Graduate Research Center will be transformed into an Incan maze this afternoon, as part of a robotics competition described as "Indiana Jones meets RoboCop."

The competition is the culmination of Computer Science 403, Introduction to Robotics course at the University of Massachusetts. Students in the class have been working all semester to program small robots, called AmigoBots, to perform complex motion and behavioral actions that allow the robots to remotely navigate a maze.

The class is taught by Oliver Brock, assistant professor in the department of Computer Science and co-director of the Laboratory for Perceptual Robotics.

The competition will feature a theme based on the hidden treasures of the Incan Empire. The robots will "parachute" into the Incan maze of Sacsayhuaman, where the Incans supposedly hid their vast reserves of gold. The AmigoBots will act as machines assigned by the CIA to rescue the gold from thieves.

Students have programmed the AmigoBots using the C++ computer language to navigate the maze and find specific locations, referred to as "cells," and then find their way back out. For the competition, each robot will be provided with an electronic map of the maze that will help them find the location of the gold. Students will not know where in the maze their robots will be placed prior to the competition, adding to the complexity and unpredictability.

One of the central elements of the course has been the element of teamwork.

"Students are learning how to work in a group to get something done, which is what they will need to do in the real world," said Brock. "They are learning how to compensate for other team members if something goes wrong, and how to go to their team members if they get stuck with something. It's a fun bonding experience for them."

Scott Myers, a senior

See ROBOTICS on page 4

More construction for next semester

By Adam Sutton
Collegian Correspondent

Students returning to the University of Massachusetts next semester can expect to see more ditches, dirt and heavy construction equipment on campus.

Construction is planned to begin next semester near the Student Union, Whitmore Administration Building, Holdsworth Hall and Flint Lab. The plans are aimed at replacing decayed underground steam pipes, according to Campus Energy Engineer and Energy Performance Project Manager, Jason Burbank.

The dilapidated pipes have permitted excessive steam to leak into the ground, causing heat loss and pollution, according to the UMass facilities Web site. The steam pipe replacement project is a small part of a $42.7 million campus-wide energy and water conservation project contracted to Johnson Controls, Inc., of Milwaukee.

The project's purpose is to reduce the energy and water consumption at UMass by renovating the lighting in buildings, installing low flow toilets and other campus-wide improvements.

Replacing the current three to five gallon toilets with new 1.6 gallon toilets will be a major contribution to water conservation, Burbank said.

Overall, monetary savings over 10 years that will be generated by the campus' efficiency increases are expected to pay for the entire project, according Burbank. The entire project's construction is expected to go on "no longer than three years," Burbank said.

The steam pipe replacement construction in the lower Central residential area and around Health Services has continued throughout the fall semester and students living there have grown weary of noise during the months of construction.

"[The construction] wakes me up every single morning," said Mike Hall, an exchange student from England. "Sometimes you think a bomb has gone off."

Walking in lower Central during the past month, one could expect to see dump trucks, men jack hammering, large fenced-off ditches and heavy construction equipment surrounding residence halls while construction workers were replacing the underground steam pipes.

While most of the ditches are filled in and construction is winding down, Wheeler resident Corey Harris, a sophomore, says the area is "like a war-zone" from the mess and noise of the construction.

Burbank said he "hoped to have [the steam replacement in lower Central] done by the end of summer," however due to the "slow bureaucratic process" and "unforeseen underground utilities", such as abandoned steam pipelines that required removal, the production was slowed.

While major construction in lower Central is expected to be complete by next semester, there will be some paving of a "connection to a manhole right in front of [Health Services]" next spring, Burbank said.

CVS pharmacist denies birth control pills to a UMass Amherst sophomore

By Amy Grzybinski
Collegian Correspondent

Earlier this semester, a University of Massachusetts student went to the CVS pharmacy on University Drive, where a pharmacist refused to fill her prescription for birth control pills.

The UMass sophomore, who discussed the issue on the condition that she remain anonymous, had sought to refill her prescription of Aviane, an oral contraceptive, online. But when she arrived at the pharmacy, she said a male pharmacy technician told her he had deleted the request from the computer because, as she claims, "he didn't want to fill it."

The student then waited 15 minutes, while another pharmacist at the store filled the prescription for her instead.

Calls to a variety of CVS outlets, local and corporate, got no responses to requests for comment, but a pharmacy technician at the CVS pharmacy located on North Pleasant Street in Amherst, who talked on condition he be identified only as "Robert," said that state law and CVS company policy both protect the rights of pharmacists to refuse to fill a prescription on moral grounds.

However, CVS policy, Robert said, requires that those who object to filling such prescriptions find either another technician in the store or another store location where the customer can have her prescription filled.

"I'm pro-life and about as far right as you can go," Robert said, "but I still fill [the prescriptions], because there are other medical reasons requiring the use of birth control and emergency contraceptives."

Robert said he fills such prescriptions "as a courtesy."

According to USA Today, pharmacists nationwide are refusing to fill prescriptions for oral contraceptives because doing so violates their moral beliefs.

And the UMass sophomore is not alone in Massachusetts. These kinds of refusals are happening across the state, mostly concerning prescriptions for Emergency Conception.

A steady stream of calls comes to centers at the Planned Parenthood League of Massachusetts, mostly because the organization provides a service called "EC online," according to Erin Rowland of PPLM. This service allows women to request a prescription for EC through the Internet and have it filled at either a Planned Parenthood pharmacy or a local pharmacy if it is more convenient.

Planned Parenthood personnel hear about such pharmacist refusals when women call, sometimes "in tears," says Rowland. In other cases, outraged pharmacists will call in anger at being presented with these prescriptions.

Oral contraceptives come under fire as well as EC because of how these drugs work, either before or after conception, Rowland says.

The controversy arises around the question of when life begins, and whether these drugs interfere with the implantation of a fertilized egg. In the rare circumstance that an egg is fertilized while birth control pills are taken, oral contraceptives including EC, which works in the same way, prevent the fertilized egg from implanting in the wall of the uterus. In addition, Rowland says that "about 50 percent" of fertilized eggs don't implant naturally, when a woman is not taking hormonal contraception.

However, the pro-life Pharmacists for Life Web site, http://www.plli.org, states "at the precise and unique moment of conception, a woman is pregnant with a new individual. This is an accurate and informed medical description."

The argument by opponents of these contraceptives is that life starts at conception, and if the fertilized egg is not implanted, it is the equivalent of abortion.

Two years ago, Marlene Fried, a professor who teaches about reproductive rights at Hampshire College, had her class survey Western Massachusetts pharmacies. She said her students called all the pharmacies in the area, asking to fill a prescription for EC, in order to "test the awareness" of the issue on the part of pharmacies. The students found, besides a "very uneven" knowledge of EC, that there was an "amount of judgment" by the pharmacists questioned. Fried said that one student, who wasn't even pregnant, stopped making the calls because she became so upset.

Rowland said those at

See CVS on page 4

Slam Jam Fest fighting AIDS

By Cameron Methner
Collegian Staff

The Cape Cod Lounge hosted the Slam Jam Fest on Thursday night, featuring the artistic stylings of the participants in an open mic night for AIDS awareness.

Residence Hall staff from around campus organized the open mic night to raise awareness of the HIV and AIDS epidemics that have taken hold of many different types of people around the world. Each performer received a carnation after their appearance.

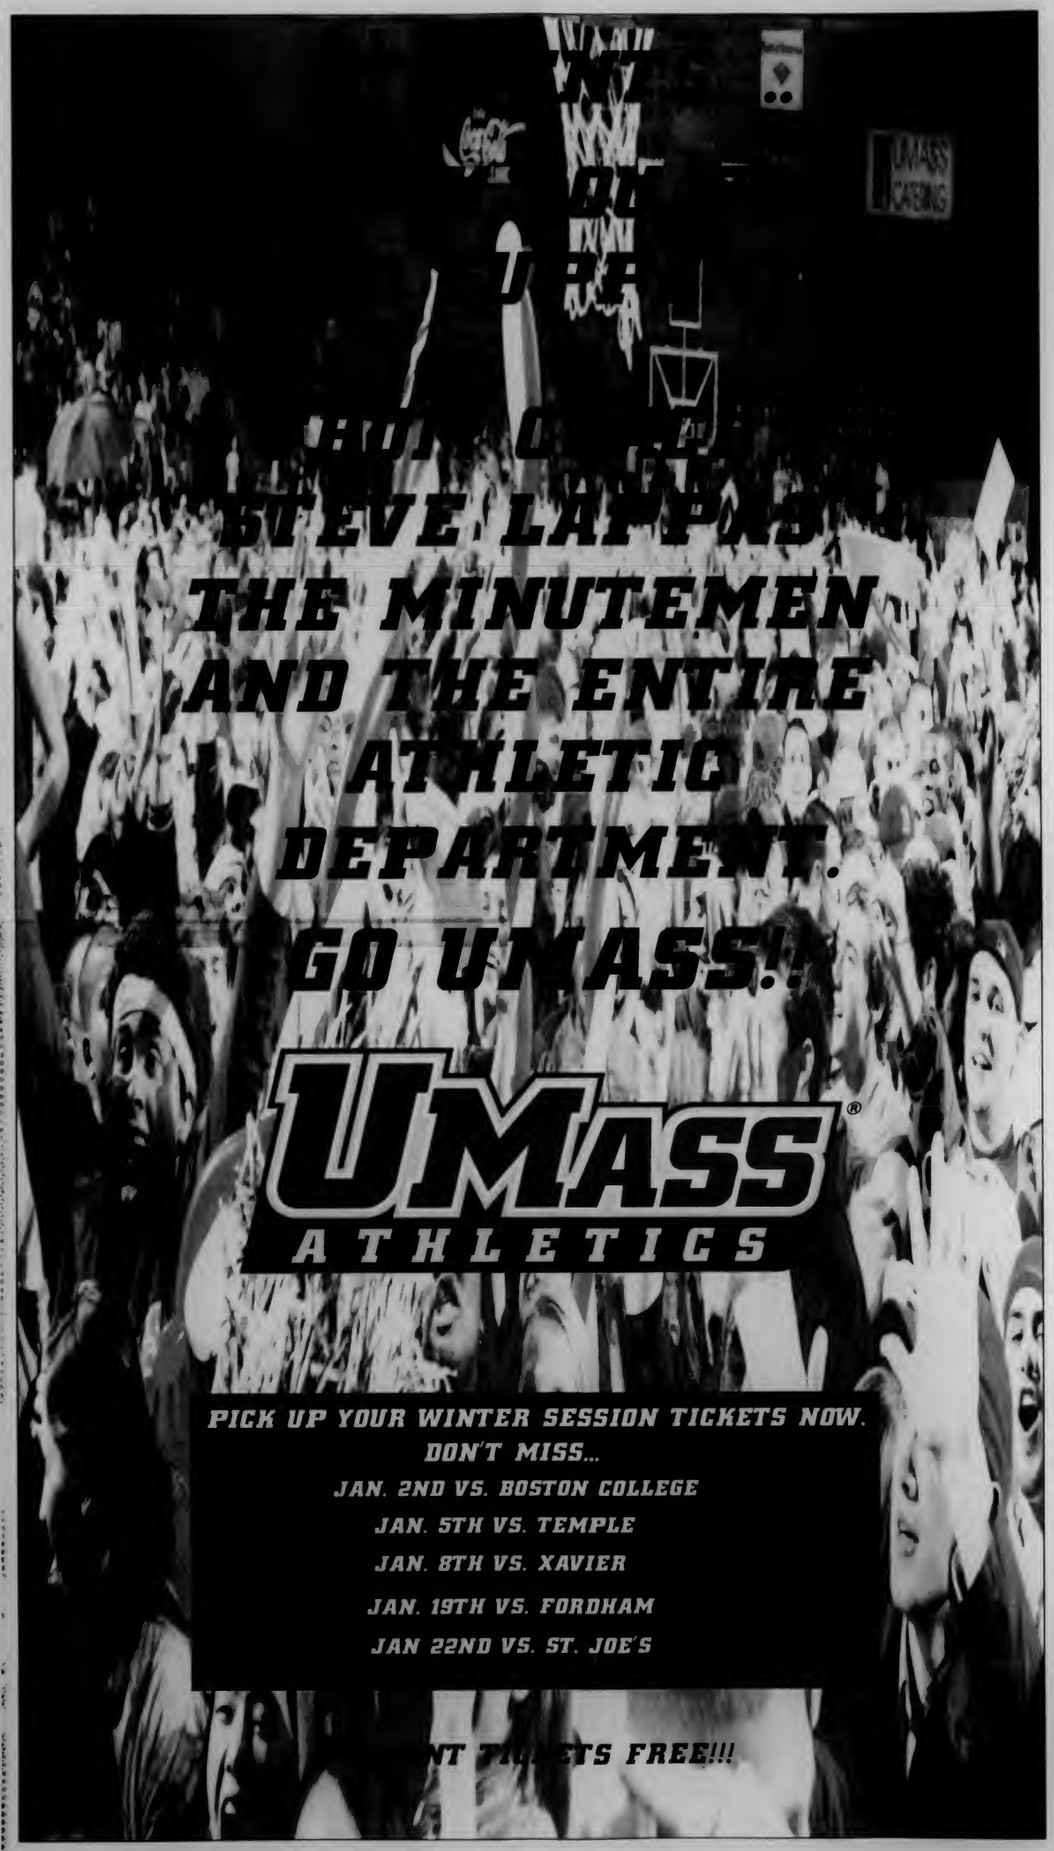
The stage presented many different styles of poetry, solo guitarists and spoken word performance. Six Minutes, the all female acapella group made an appearance along with the fraternity Omega Psi Phi doing a step performance. Omega Psi Phi brother, Will Onuaha talked about why it was important to participate in an event like this.

"Our chapter and our fraternity are very involved in community service. We want to help and support anyone trying to find a cure. AIDS affects us all. This is a fight that no one should have to fight alone," Onuaha said.

The event held a raffle between performances and gave away DVDs, UMass water bottles and a DVD player among other gifts. Each audience member held an AIDS ribbon and a fact about the affects of AIDS.

Jennifer Kirmes, a resident assistant from Baker stressed that AIDS affects us all.

"We are busy college kids and we often do not take time to reflect on important issues that affect us all, like AIDS. An event like this is important," Kirmes said.



See AIDS on page 4

KNIGHT RIDDER

Santa Training

A student of Santa Claus University finishing school at the Hilltop Mall in Richmond, VA.

Fire rips through apartment

AMHERST — The Amherst Fire Department is reporting that a fire caused $10,000 worth of damage to a unit in the Mill Valley Apartments on Riverdale Drive at approximately 8:52 p.m. Saturday night.

Amherst Fire Department reported that residents observed fire coming from a bedroom window in unit 780 H shortly before being notified of the incident via phone and a box alarm. Eight on-duty firefighters were summoned to the scene in two pumper fire trucks and student volunteers in their pumper, along with all off-duty Amherst Fire personnel, according to a fire department press release.

The first fire truck arrived on the scene at 8:59 p.m. The firefighters from that truck stretched a hose line into apartment 780 H and extinguished a fire in a bedroom. A dog was also rescued from the apartment. As more firefighters arrived, they checked the remainder of the building for occupants and ventilated smoke from the building.

A total of 30 firefighters in 4 pumpers, an aerial ladder, an ambulance and two squads along with three chief officers and the Fire Department chaplain responded to the scene. There were no civilian injuries reported. However, firefighter Heidi Olmstead injured her arm when she fell at the scene. She was transported to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton for evaluation. A supervisor at the hospital said she believed Olmstead had been treated and released, but could not confirm this report as of press time.

Amherst Fire Department investigators are still determining the cause of the fire, which is thought to be accidental. The apartment was being occupied by Jenna Mann and Juliana Salter.

Western Massachusetts Electric Company was on the scene and cut power to apartment 780 H. The Amherst Police Department provided initial evacuation of the building and helped with crowd and traffic control. The Amherst Building Depart-ment is determining at this time if apartment 780 H can be re-occupied.

The complex is owned by the Mill Valley Limited Partnership, representatives of which were on the scene initiating some door repair and boarding up broken windows.

—Dan O'Brien

Commission hears students

DIVERSITY from page 1

versities stated, "From my numerous experiences, I find them aloof and not caring."

The commission repeatedly questioned the forum participants on funding and support for white students compared to minority students. These questions were repeatedly unanswered citing lack of information.

Chairman Orlando L. Taylor announced that another public forum would be scheduled shortly after winter break, with the date yet to be announced. Taylor cited the enormous amount of people wishing to address the committee, and emphasized the committee's commitment to giving everyone an opportunity to address their grievances.

Among the 22 members of the commission is Taylor, vice provost for research and graduate school dean at Howard University. Other members include educators, lawyers, psychologists, two UMass students and University presidents, 13 of which are from the University.

The commission was formed in the wake of student and community outrage in response to members of the SGA posing with KKK imagery, and an overall heightened racial climate on campus.

Anniversary of Iraqi takeover

By Nick Wadhams
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — In the year since he was captured and hustled away to a secret location, Saddam Hussein has taken up gardening, undergone a hernia operation and written poetry that one visitor describes as "rubbishy."

What he has not done is meet with any of the 20 lawyers who claim to represent him. And with the country in the grips of an insurgency that remains strong, predicting when Iraq's most famous prisoner will be tried is no easier now than it was on the day he was pulled from his hiding spot in a spider hole near his hometown of Tikrit.

When Saddam first appeared before an Iraqi court in July, some officials predicted a swift trial. Ever since, they have said October, November, or by the end of the year. Now, they expect it no earlier than the beginning of 2006, Iraq's National Security Adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie told The Associated Press.

"This is going to be probably the trial of the century and we have to get it right," al-Rubaie said. "We can't suddenly try him and sentence him to either life in prison or whatever, execute him a 100 times as some people want to do."

Officials say the work of gathering evidence — documents, mass grave sites, testimony from victims — continues away from the public eye and beyond the reach of the insurgents. They insist that it is being done meticulously and legitimately.

American officials with the Department of Justice's Regime Crimes Liaison Office are advising the Iraqi Special Tribunal on the process of bringing Saddam to trial. The Americans paid the tribunal's budget of $75 million 2004-2005.

But with elections approaching on Jan. 30, the Iraqi government is in flux and is likely to stay that way for another year until a new constitution is drafted and another round of elections are held next December.

Kerik no longer cabinet nominee

By Donna De La Cruz
Associated Press

Bernard Kerik speaks outside his New Jersey home Saturday.

WASHINGTON — The White House renewed its search for a homeland security chief Saturday as the candidate President Bush thought ideal apologized for an immigration problem involving a family housekeeper that forced him to withdraw.

"I owe the president ... a great apology that this may have caused him and his administration a big distraction," Bernard Kerik said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press.

Speaking from his home in Franklin Lakes, N.J., the 49-year-old Kerik said he had discovered a few days ago that he did not pay all required taxes for a family nanny-housekeeper and that the woman may have been in the country illegally.

The surprise withdrawal by the former New York City police commissioner sent Bush back in search of a nominee to head the sprawling Homeland Security Department, which was created after Sept. 11, 2001, to improve coordination and protection against future terrorist attacks.

On Saturday, former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani, who has been mentioned as a possible choice, expressed no interest in the job. "I am not a candidate," he told reporters in New York.

Sen. Susan Collins, the Maine Republican who heads the Senate committee that will take up the nomination, said two "terrific choices" would be Asa Hutchinson, the department's undersecretary for border and transportation security, and Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn.

Among the names that had been circulating for the post before Kerik's selection on Dec. 3 were Joe Allbaugh, former director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency; Mike Leavitt, former Utah governor and now head of the Environmental Protection Agency; and White House homeland security adviser Fran Townsend.

But it was still possible that the White House would break the search wide open again rather than return to the previous stable of top contenders, said a senior administration official, speaking on condition of anonymity.

"We will certainly work to name someone as quickly as possible," White House spokeswoman Claire Buchan said Saturday.

Meanwhile, questions continued over how the White House review process could have missed the kind of "nanny problem" that scuttled high-level appointments in both the Clinton administration and the first Bush administration.

"There's a standard vetting process that we go through with all nominees and certainly we did that" with Kerik, Buchan said. She said it was solely Kerik's decision to withdraw late Friday.

Bush, leaving a Maryland hospital after his annual physical Saturday, ignored a question about Kerik's withdrawal.

Giuliani, a close friend of Kerik's, said Bush administration officials asked Kerik from the beginning whether there were any issues involving domestic employees.

"He didn't think he had a problem," Giuliani. "He made a mistake."

Bush advisers, now having to deal with the kind of messy situation they had so far avoided, were taking Kerik at his word that he had not intentionally misled them, the official said.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Fotinelos
Managing Editor Andrew Mercer
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Cameron Woods
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sagabiel
Editorial Production Samantha Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Meghan Healy
Copy Editor Alyson Zilkowski
Editorial Editor Paige Crim
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Matthew Reed
Sports Editor Mike Marcelli
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Riggins
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Freeman
Human Resources Sandra Marquez
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Jaclynn Sarmiento
Assistant Layout Thomas Hurley
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Advisor Charlie Higgins
Asst Arts & Living Mike Busack
Asst Arts & Living Monique Jeannott
Assistant Editorial Yousef Munayyer
Assistant Editorial Allison Elbert
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Sports Robert Mc[illegible]
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

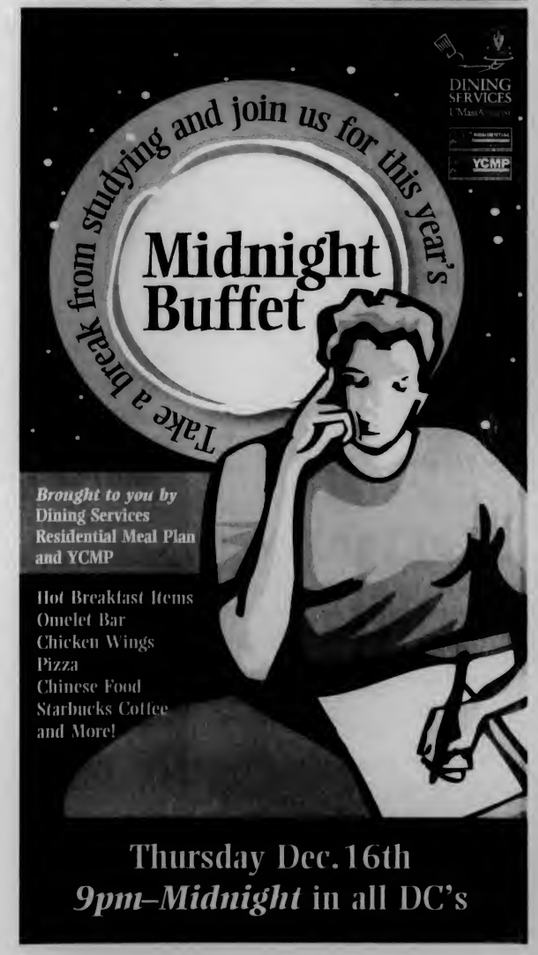
The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts academic semester. The Collegian is an independent student-run newspaper. Subscription rates are $[illegible] per semester. The Collegian has been the paper of record at Amherst College since 1890, the College Signet in 1901, the Women's College Index in 1910, and the Lit. Massachusetts Collegian in 1938. Postage paid at Amherst, MA 01002. The Collegian is a member of the Associated Press. Since 1890 the Collegian has been printed on recycled paper. Rates and information are available at [illegible] or by calling 545-3500.

Production Crew
On staff today

Night Editor
Meghan Healy
Photo Technician
Adrienne Bossi
Copy Editor
Matt Elder
Production Supervisor
Samantha M. Nielsen
Production Staff
Amanda Allen, Alyson Zilkowski

Wanna write about sports?
sports@dailycollegian.com

Dear Students,



Good luck on your finals - it has been a pleasure to serve you.

We look forward to serving you next semester with a new menu featuring many fresh items and display cooking concepts.

Best Wishes,
Staff of Dining Services

P.S. Don't forget to join us for the Midnight Buffet on December 16 from 9:00 pm to 12 midnight at all DCs.

DINING SERVICES
UMassAmherst
RESIDENTIAL
YCMP

'Indiana Jones meets Robo Cop' today at Lederle G.R.C.

ROBOTICS from page 1

Computer Science major and member of the class' Scorpion team, says that while the class was very difficult, with over 5,500 lines of code were written by the team members, it was a unique and rewarding experience.

"It's much different than most other computer science classes," Myers said. "It deals with new concepts and new ideas, and was a lot of fun."

Another key element that Brock has tried to get across to his students is the practical application of what is learned in the classroom.

"One of the most important educational points for the course is for students to see why they've had to learn all the math and programming skills. You actually get to take what you learn and see the results."

The course, described as "truly multi-disciplinary" by Myers, requires students to incorporate elements of physics, linear algebra, geometry, trigonometry, probability theory, engineering and even sociology.

Last year, the first year Brock taught the course, students used small, simple robots guided by a mounted palm pilot. These robots were bought for approximately $350 each, after Brock applied for a faculty grant. Students enjoyed using the palm pilot robots, but felt they were not capable enough. Brock then went to Computer Science department chairman Bruce Croft and asked for funds to purchase five AmigoBots, which cost $2,000 apiece and are much more sophisticated and able to do more complex functions than the palm pilot-based robots.

They come preprogrammed to perform primitive actions and movements. The students must program the AmigoBots to perform more complex behavioral patterns. They have a red plastic case and are seven inches high and weigh approximately nine pounds.

The 19 students in the class have been broken up into five teams, who will compete against each other to see who can be the first to find the "Incan gold." The five teams competing in the competition will be "Lesco," "Midnight Oil," "Red Dwarf," "Scorpions" and "Hawks."

The competition, which is free and open to the public, will take place in room A307 in the Lederle Graduate Research Center today at 4 p.m.

Residence Life holds 'Slam Jam' to raise AIDS awareness

AIDS from page 1

The walls had sheets of paper that had written statements from students all over campus about how they are affected by AIDS. The event also offered free soda, sweet treats and coffee donated by Coca-Cola. Earthfoods and People's Market. There were also AIDS awareness bracelets available for a donation of $2, which can still be purchased at the Cluster Offices of Baker in Central and Cance in Southwest.

Erica Piedade, the Residence Director of Cance Hall, organized the event with help from many of the other clusters around campus. She spoke about why it was important for the campus to have such an event.

"The people on this campus believe they are safe, they don't make the connection of AIDS to their relationships. When I talk to young people they say it's a 'clean campus' and they think no one has HIV or AIDS here, my heart skips a beat," Piedade said.

Piedade has been in Residence Life work for more than 5 years and felt that it was necessary to bring AIDS awareness to campus.

"This disease is preventable, and people who are infected can stay well. Those people who are infected are motivators of awareness. Even with education, abstinence and monogamy people are still getting infected," she said.

Piedade, along with staff from Gorman, Wheeler, Grayson, Field and many other dormitories around campus were able to help promote the event. The events were brought to campus this whole month in hopes of raising awareness.

"It is so critical to get the word out that this disease can be preventable. The people at this campus feel that they are infallible and they need to know the truth," said Piedade.

The proceeds of the raffle bracelet sales and food all go to Tapestry Health, which is a local non-profit health organization that provides HIV/AIDS prevention and support services.

Leighanne Regan, the resident director of Baker, Chadbourne and Greenough, commented on why she felt bringing the open mic night to campus was important.

"There is a lack of awareness on campus, and in society. The more knowledge we can give students the more of a difference we can make. Presenting this program to campus is only one way to bring awareness and bring a community together. It is also one way to make a small change in a larger societal problem."

UMass Police clear the air while Emerson takes action

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

Emerson College students are making progress to cease the use of less-than-lethal weapons as the Boston Police Department banned the use of the FN303, according to the department's media relations.

The FN303 gun killed that one of their peers and is similar to the weapons that were fired on University of Massachusets students in October's riots, but UMass police say their weapons are safer than those used in Boston.

The Emerson Student Government Association passed a resolution on Nov. 16 that petitions the Boston City Council members, Mayor of Boston Thomas Menino, and Boston Police Commissioner Kathleen O'Toole to cease the use of less-lethal weapons. The petition passed following the death of Victoria Snelgrove, the 21-year-old Emerson student who was killed by a projectile fired from a FN303 rifle during riots near Fenway Park after game seven of American League Championship Series.

"The SGA addresses you with only the deepest respect; we are confident that the city wants what is best for its constituents," wrote Emerson SGA President Emily Garr in a letter sent to Boston Police. "As we believe our recommendations to be in the best in interest of the Boston community, we hope that you will take our recommendations seriously, as we believe them to be necessary to ensure that events like those of Oct. 21 never happen again in the city of Boston."

The resolution is currently being reviewed by Menino and O'Toole. Emerson SGA president Emily Garr said they received a thank you from a mayor's liaison, but is yet to receive "an official thank you" from the mayor. Garr also said the SGA will discuss about whether or not to put their names to the national petition to ban the use of less-than-lethal forces.

Some UMass students worry that they could suffer Snelgrove's fate. The fear arises because UMass Police used similar "less-than-lethal weapons" to control thousands of students per night during the October riots, which resulted in over 100 arrests.

"[UMass Police officers] are trained to force people around like cattle," Michael Markhan, a junior engineering major, said. "The Red Sox just won the World Series, what do you expect? People gather; that's what they do. These acts of force are geared towards serious crimes, but this is not a serious crime. It's not even a riot and there is no place for that kind of force."

"The use of the Pepperball system can be an effective was to control crowds, considering it is a 'less-lethal-method.'" Emily Colton, a junior resident of Southwest, said. "But, when it becomes deadly, like the case in Boston, then obviously it is being used in the wrong way. Apparently, there should be an even 'less lethal' kind of method."

But UMass Police Sgt. Ian Cyr said the chances of serious injury in Amherst are much less, because of a difference in the equipment used by the UMass Police. Cyr, who bought the Pepperball system used at UMass, said the word "pepperball" is used too generically, referring for anything that delivered a pepper powder projectile.

"It's the same as asking for a Kleenex, not a tissue." Cyr said. "It is a specific brand name for a pepper delivery. The launchers we have are specifically for law enforcement, but they are very similar to a paintball launcher that can be bought in any local paintball store. So, we have the Pepperball System and the Boston police have the FN303 by FN Hestel."

According Cyr, the FN303 guarantees maximum effects on impact and a kinetic impact shock that instantly stops a subject. According to the FN Hestel website, the FN303 is designed to use less-lethal projectiles in ranges of 50 meters accurately to 100 meters maximum.

In contrast, the Pepperball System used at UMass lacks the impact and range of a FN303. The Pepperball System, in addition to having a range of 30 feet accurately, is less powerful than a normal paintball, and uses talcum powder that dilutes the pepper spray to make the effect "leaves people to become uncomfortable," Cyr said.

The major difference in the two less-than-lethal forces is the make-up and impact of the projectiles in each launcher. The Pepperballs used at UMass weigh only 3.5 grams, compared to the 8.5 gram projectiles used in a FN303. Although both projectiles are made of plastic, the FN303's plastic covers are harder and deliver an impact up to 24 foot-pounds of force, three times more force than the pepper balls, according to Cyr.

"When you take our projectile and throw it at a brick wall, it breaks apart," Cyr said. "It doesn't take a great amount of force to fracture that projectile. That's different from the FN303 projectiles, because FN303 has a heavy powder called Bismuth that is naturally heavy and under the force of the launcher, it becomes more compact and dense."

Contraception nearly denied

CVS from page 1

Planned Parenthood hope that the issue is mainly the pharmacists' understanding of this issue. By providing outreach and pharmacist education, they are trying to create more discussion about the birth control pill and EC.

Fried said the Pharmacists for Life group "encourages pharmacists to assert their right of conscience in practice." That may be okay for an individual, she said, but not for a business created to serve the public.

"By refusing [to dispense birth control pills, pharmacists] are putting their moral judgment on a person," she said. To her, pro-life groups are politicizing sexuality, morality and religious beliefs.

"These aren't just a few kooks," she said, but people who have "back-up in high places," referring to the Bush Administration.

"This is an issue of women's autonomy," added Arlene Avakian, professor and director of the Women's Studies program at UMass. "Any kind of [religious] fundamentalism is dangerous toward women."

The issue of access is not so great in the Pioneer Valley, according to Amanda Collings, a health educator at University Health Services, who specializes in women's health and reproductive issues. Because UHS and its pharmacy make it the goal to provide "quality care for students" in a non-political way, prescriptions will always be filled, and emergency services will always be available. However, access becomes more of an issue when a student returns home, to a town where pharmacies have different policies.

Fried also called the issue one of access. She said this issue was a "big deal" for women who do not live in a city, who cannot easily go to another pharmacy to fill a prescription.

Avakian said that in the larger picture, women are "teetering on the brink" of abortion being inaccessible.

"My hope is for your generation to be outraged, and to take to the streets," Avakian said.

Sunday River

GREAT SNOW. GREAT TIMES.

COLLEGE WEEK
January 2-6, 2005

Gotta Rock College Week '05 has a full schedule of parties, concerts, dinner and drink specials and more. You'll find nightly entertainment all week long at the resort and at venues up and down the access road.

College Week – $239
Includes five nights lodging in a slopeside condo, a five-day lift ticket, and free daily Perfect Turn® clinics.

One Night Stand – $55
Includes one night lodging in a slopeside condo, one-day lift ticket and free Perfect Turn clinic.

Lift Tickets – $29
All week, daily lift tickets are only $29.

Tuesday Night Rail Jam
The Wailers

800-543-2SKI | www.sundayriver.com

*Valid college ID required for all packages and lift ticket rates. Lodging prices are per person, based on maximum occupancy and do not include 16% tax and service charge. Based on availability. Certain restrictions may apply.

Sunday River is a registered trademark of Sunday River Skiway Corp.
© 2004 American Skiing Company

Finally there is Help during the Holidays!!!

The Holiday Season is here!! It's the time for long lines, hunting for hours for parking spaces, gifts and sales. All this and trying to study for finals.

Isn't the Holidays supposed to be about losing stress and not sleep?

The solution Http: WWW.SCIIONLINE.COM

Shop on your time and terms (Paypal accepted)
No more long lines
Great Discounts, less than most major retailers
Unique products that you will only find here
No Tax
We will even ship gifts straight to loved ones!!
No Stress, No Hassle It's how the Holidays should be!

Digi Cams
Flat Screens
migos
& Much More!!!
Speakers
Media Centers

Have a safe and Happy Holiday!!
From your friends at SCI

ShopNow :Http://www.sciionline.com

ALL creative FOOD & BEVERAGE UP!

GRAND OPENING
ALL YOU CAN EAT BUFFET
With Countless Combinations of Vegetables, Poultry, Fish, and Meat.
Choose from 12 Specially Created Sauces!!!

OPEN 7 DAYS A WEEK FOR LUNCH AND DINNER
Sunday Breakfast
Design your own omelets, pancakes, and french toast 10-4pm
A Fantastic Full Bar Menu
Create Your Own Meal
11:30am - 9 pm

48 Russell Street, Route 9, Hadley
413-584-5155
WWW.ALLFIREDUPHADLEY.COM

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

Monday, December 13, 2004

"A writer doesn't solve problems. He allows them to emerge."
-Friedrich Durrermatt

Editorial@dailycollegian.com

The miracle of Adoption

Larry Goldbaum

November 13, 2000 was one of the happiest days of my life. On that cold and dreary Wednesday morning, my wife and I walked into a courtroom half way around the world, in the Republic of Kazakhstan, and adopted our son Isaac.

The judge's signature on a two-page decree, written in Russian, profoundly changed all three of our lives.

Jody and I were finally parents, the culmination of a dream that could only have happened through adoption. Neither simple biology nor modern medicine were able to help us conceive the child we so badly wanted. So for us, adoption was a miraculous gift.

Had Isaac not been adopted, he would have spent the his childhood in an orphanage, until he was old enough to enter the army. Who knows what his life would have been like? But one thing is certain: he would not have had a family of his own.

I grieve for a world that bestows riches on some while denying even the most basic needs — food, shelter, love — to others, and I feel compelled to do whatever I can to struggle against that injustice.

Isaac's caretakers at the orphanage clearly loved him and gave him the best care they possibly could. "Baba" Luba and "Mama" Tatiana cried the day we bundled up our little 15-month-old toddler and took him away. We cried too.

But no matter how much they loved him, Luba and Tatiana weren't Isaac's parents, and the baby home wasn't his family. At age three he would have been moved to another institution, and then again at age six, and at least once more when he was older.

No matter how much they loved him, his caretakers would have come and gone. He would never have had the stability of a real family, with parents who would love and care for him forever.

Every year on Isaac's birthday (the fourth of July!) and on Mother's Day and Father's Day, we honor the memory of his birth parents, the man and woman who gave him life. We mourn their loss, and we grieve Isaac's loss of his biological parents, a loss which he will feel throughout his life.

The whereabout of Isaac's birth parents are unknown, so we don't know why they abandoned their newborn baby. Tragically, poverty probably had something to do with their decision. They may also have been very young. These are the reasons why many children in the U.S. and other countries are abandoned or placed for adoption.

My heart goes out to any parent who must give up their child because of poverty. It's an injustice that tears my heart apart. I grieve for a world that bestows riches on some while denying even the most basic needs — food, shelter, love — to others, and I feel compelled to do whatever I can to struggle against that injustice.

Poverty is not the only reason children are adopted, however. Some parents are simply too young, or unmarried and unable to raise a child by themselves. Others are incapable of providing for the safety and welfare of their children, and these are perhaps the most tragic adoption stories of all. Sadly, the foster care system in Massachusetts and other states is overflowing with children who have been neglected or abused by their (birth) parents.

The neglect or physical, sexual or emotional abuse of a child is taken very seriously in Massachusetts, as it should be. In documented cases of abuse or neglect, the Department of Social Services removes children from their families of origin and places them in temporary foster families, to protect them from further abuse. It is a painful solution to a tragic problem.

I've known far too many of these children, and their stories are harrowing. In some cases the child is eventually reunited with their birth family, after the person responsible for the abuse leaves the home, or after psychological counselling or drug treatment solves the underlying problem.

In other cases, the child goes from one temporary foster family to another, usually receiving good care but without the stability of a permanent family. In those instances where the parental rights of the birth parents are legally terminated, the child becomes free for adoption. I know several such children who now have loving and permanent families, forever free from the neglect or abuse that threatened to destroy their young lives.

There is nothing simple about adoption. As I've explained, the reasons why children are adopted are varied and complex.

But one thing is clear: My family, and many adoptive families like mine, celebrate every day the miracle of adoption, the miracle that has made us parents and has provided a loving family for our children.

Larry Goldbaum is director of the UMass Office of Jewish Affairs.

Children forgotten

Matthew Reid

The United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) released its tenth annual report on the "State of the World's Children" to the countries of the world last Thursday.

The news is far from promising.

The report revealed shocking revelations of the deplorable living conditions faced by many children across the globe. More than one billion children are being denied the rights to a healthy, protected childhood promised to them by the United Nation's 1989 "Convention on the Rights of the Child," which has been signed by 117 nations.

UNICEF's report provided statistics that are almost unimaginable. It states that more than one in six children across the world go hungry and one in seven has no access to adequate health care. Over 640 million children do not have adequate shelter and 140 million do not have the option of going to school. Over 400 million children have no access to clean water and nearly 500 million live without basic sanitation.

The single biggest reason for these statistics is war. War-torn nations must deal with several aftermaths, the least of which is the living conditions children must deal with on a daily basis. In the media and at water coolers everywhere, war is seen as an "us versus them" situation. It is fought for a common good between good guys and bad guys. There are the figureheads in the respective governments that can say the world will be a better place afterward, but in the meantime, it is the innocent and helpless children that must suffer.

Some argue that wars are fought for the good of the world, while others say war is never the answer. While these points can be argued, what can't be argued is that of the 3.6 million people who have been killed on the front line in wars around the world, almost half of them, 1.5 million total, have been children. And that is just the front-line deaths — the number of indirect deaths caused by war is a number too high to count.

Take, for example, children in the Darfur region of Sudan. Children in Darfur suffer from disease and poverty resulting from over a year of conflict between rebel factions and the Sudanese government. Pediatrician Jerry Ehrlich, who recently visited the region to offer medical supplies, told the Philadelphia Inquirer that "children in [Darfur] can be 2 years old, but look like they're 102 ... They are so malnourished, so severely immuno-compromised, and so many of them die."

While these points can be argued, what can't be argued is that of the 3.6 million people who have been killed on the front line in wars around the world, almost half of them, 1.5 million total, have been children.

"The children are wasted by illnesses few American children ever know," the Inquirer article continued.

"What we are saying in this report is that choices made by political leaders in many cases are very often negative when it comes to children," UNICEF executive director Carol Bellamy said in regards to the State of The World's Children report.

Despite signing the "Convention on the Rights of the Child," many governments across the world are failing to fulfill its principles. The convention is described on the UNICEF website as a "universally agreed set of non-negotiable standards and obligations, spelling out the basic human rights that children everywhere – without discrimination – have." These rights, the rights of survival and protection, are not being met by countries that combined spent 1.3 trillion dollars on weapons used in wars last year alone. Ironically, it is these weapons that cause over a billion of the world's children to live in such awful conditions.

It is hard to find hope in a situation marred by such dismal and horrific figures. But there is at least a glimmer of hope. While more than 10 million children perished in 2003, child mortality rates fell by a fifth over the past decade. England Prime Minister Tony Blair recently announced plans that Britain will take the lead on ending poverty, debt and war in Africa. UNICEF officials, at a forum last week in Abuja, Nigeria addressing the world's progress on improving global health, announced that new measures would be leveled in the months to come that will provide aid several countries in need of support.

President Bush has said that the War on Terror is a different kind of war, because it involves enemies from all over the world, not just one centralized enemy with one centralized agenda. The same can be said for the war to end childhood suffering, which up until now is a war that is not being fought. This is a war against a faceless enemy, an enemy who cannot simply be eliminated with a gun or a landmine. This enemy can only be defeated by reprioritizing our worldview and realizing that this is a problem worthy of our attention.

Matthew Reid is Collegian editor.

Learning to fit in

Becky Martins

It is funny how much things can change in the course of a year.

Last December, as a freshman at UMass Amherst, I was anything but happy. In the process of completing my first semester of college, I already could not wait for graduation. The three and a half years that lay ahead seemed as long as a lifetime.

Posted on my dorm room wall during the last post-Thanksgiving break weeks was a calendar with December 21 circled in red pen. As each day can to a painfully slow end, I would 'x' it off; bringing me one step closer to reaching my ultimate goal: home. I wanted nothing to do with UMass. If I were to leave and never return, I felt there would be little to miss. Essentially, college was not proving to be the 'best years of my life.'

Looking back now, I understand the reason for my forlorn feelings. Freshman year, I was forced to live in Sylvan: my fifth choice living area. My suite was primarily upperclassmen, most of who were over UMass' social scene. I also had a roommate who was as miserable as I was: a bad combination when trying meet people. As my peers adjusted to college life and befriended others, I felt as though I was being left behind. 'Why was a social person like myself so unhappy?' was one question that constantly crossed my mind.

Second semester, though, proved to be an entirely new experience. Upon returning to school, I was not looking forward to the following months. For all I knew, they would only be a repeat of the previous semester: a time I felt I would be better off forgetting. But surprisingly, just a few days after moving back, college began to take on a new meaning for me. The people residing in my suite proved to be good friends, instead of just suitemates.

My floor mates were actually interesting individuals and were worth getting to know. My classes became outlets to meet others, many of whom were going through similar experiences such as me. By the time May arrived, I was no longer the same person I had been at the beginning of the semester. I was genuinely enjoying my college experience and was sad to leave it, even if it were only for the few months of summer break. I now understood why my high school friends were so enthusiastic about their 'second life' away from home.

One would think after having such a traumatic first year, I would do anything to avoid the situation again. But against the advice of many, I decided to begin my sophomore year on a fresh note: moving to Southwest by myself and leaving all that was comfortable behind. I knew I did not belong in Sylvan: I just had made the best of my situation while there. Southwest fit me better as a person and was the place I should have been all along. And while I knew it was not the easiest way to begin my sophomore year, it was something I had to do.

At first, this semester began similarly as the beginning of my freshman year. Though I had many friends on campus, the majority of them resided in other living communities. Again, I found myself in a new place surrounded by unfamiliar faces. But luckily, my feelings of unease were short-lived. It was not long before I adjusted to my dormitory change. Strangers became the friends who made my new living area a home. Any doubt I had felt about my decision to move, disappeared. As I sit here, remembering how I had felt only a year ago, it feels good to know how far I have come and how happy I am.

One lesson I have learned from my shaky college experience is to give life a chance. Things may seem hopeless at times, but in most cases, things do work out: they just may take more time than expected. When I hear freshman complaining about school and contemplating transferring or dropping out completely, I so badly want to put them in my shoes. I understand what they are going through, since I was once there myself. But they also need to realize that life gets better and it is hardly as bad as it seems.

Today, I am completely satisfied with my college experience and am looking forward to the remainder of it. Instead of wishing these years away, I now find myself valuing my time left. My past at Umass may have been slow going, but I am certainly enjoying all the school has to offer in the present.

Becky Martins is a Collegian columnist.

Divest from distruction

Ramzi Kanazi

For several months now, the Presbyterian Church has been taking heat for its 216th General Assembly decision to endorse selective divestment from the state of Israel. In addition, according to the Church's website, www.pcusa.org, "the Assembly voted by large margins to condemn Israel's construction of a "security wall" across the West Bank; disavow Christian Zionism as a legitimate theological stance and direct the denomination's Middle East and Interfaith Relations offices to develop resources on differences between fundamental Zionism and Reformed theology; and study the feasibility of sponsoring economic-development projects in Palestine."

One of the major companies the church is targeting, one central to many other divestment campaigns, is Caterpillar Inc. It makes the bulldozers that the Israel Defense Forces have used to demolish thousands of Palestinian homes since the country's purchase of them. It is also a recipient of worldwide criticism for its complacency and negligent sales of these machines to the state of Israel.

While I know that most of you were planning to buy new Caterpillar bulldozers as gifts for the holidays, I suggest buying one from a different company this year.

The Presbyterian Church is breaking away from the contemporary Evangelical stance in America, which wishes to hasten the Apocalypse. Those right-wing Christian Zionists who call for Armageddon side with the Government of Israel (GOI) while many socially conscious Presbyterians have chosen to diverge from this ideological lunacy and support ideas that may not be quite as important to the divine creator—like human rights. The Presbyterian Church should be applauded for realizing that the means to reach God's ultimate calling cannot not be achieved through violence, but instead through morality.

Many have expressed that the Presbyterian decision is an anti-Semitic one. The Anti-Defamation League (ADL—the group that placed propaganda posters about Israel all over campus last year) has been working to persuade the Church to reverse its decision. The ADL, however, has not yet officially called this specific instance anti-Semitic. They may be too busy searching for examples of Anti-Semitism on college campuses and in Arab countries. I don't mean to argue semantics and etymology right now, but I'm pretty sure that many of the people the ADL criticize as anti-Semitic are Semites. If one were to use a connotatively less exclusionary term to describe their pretense, it would be anti-Arab.

Regardless of what certain groups feel about the Presbyterian decision, divestment is not anti-Semitic, anti-Jewish or anti-Israeli. There are a number of Jewish and Israeli groups that call for divestment to end an occupation that they feel is unjustified. Divestment is a non-violent action, admonishing the state of Israel for its government's misdeeds. As the sanctions against Iraq after the Gulf War were not imposed to discriminate against the Iraqi people, this divestiture is a reaction to the GOI's continued brutality against the indigenous Palestinians. It is an action that many colleges review and one that the Presbyterian Church is now courageously embarking upon. It does so amidst the vast majority of organizations in the country, which seem to fear nearly any relation to criticism of Israeli action.

One important element of the discussion to remember is that the Church is not trying to say that Israel or its collective people are a problem, but the government is. The GOI has long been in violation of international law and has committed an excessive number of human rights violations against the indigenous population. They continue to do this with overwhelming monetary assistance from the American government and American businesses.

So what can you do? While I know that most of you were planning to buy new Caterpillar bulldozers as gifts for the holidays, I suggest buying one from a different company this year. Besides Caterpillar, many other corporations contribute to the GOI's revenue. By boycotting some of these businesses, you will be doing your body a great favor too. As a general rule, regardless of social consciousness, don't eat fast food or drink soda (I hope I can do the same). Many of these companies, in addition to ravaging the health of Americans, contribute to the marginalization of Palestinians and, incidentally, others in third world countries. Remember the Coke killings in Columbia?

If you are interested in being a little more proactive, then consider a positive action like investment. Take a look at some Palestinian products on sites like www.palestinedirect.org. One of their products is fair trade, organic olive oil. They make this oil from the olive trees that the Israeli government hasn't gotten around to uprooting.

Petition Umass and the other area colleges to divest. Considering Umass' well-known yet unspoken efforts to make the college more elite, it could consider that most of the Ivy League schools have active divestment campaigns.

Finally, if you are Presbyterian, support your church and its actions. They are commendable, and I hope that others follow their lead.

Ramzi Kanazi is a Collegian Columnist.

SUBMIT A LETTER OR OPINION

In order to be considered for publication, all submissions must include the writer's name, address, and telephone number or e-mail address. Letters should be no longer than 450 words in length and addressed as 'Letters to the Editor.' Commentaries should be no more than 750 words and addressed as 'Editorial/Opinion.' Submissions may be edited for clarity and condensed. You may write, fax, or e-mail your submissions to:

E-mail: editorial@dailycollegian.com

Fax: 413-545-3699

Mail: Letters to the Editor, 113 Campus Center, Amherst, MA 01003

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, DECEMBER 13, 2004 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Damon, Clooney steal the show again; 'Ocean's Twelve' shines at box offices

By JOE PIEDRAFITE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

They're back. Yes, they're ALL back. Trading glitzy and glamorous Las Vegas for exotic European locales, Danny Ocean and his band of accomplices are back for another go around. They have three European targets to shake, each one seemingly more impossible to accomplish then the previous. This time however, Catherine Zeta-Jones becomes a player in the game as Isabel Lahiri., a detective and ex-girlfriend of Brad Pitt's character Rusty Ryan.

With "Ocean's Twelve," you need to go into the film knowing the plot is going to be even more ridiculous and implausible than the first, but so outrageous that it could actually be true. Confusing yes, but it certainly makes for great storytelling.

'Ocean's Twelve'
Directed by Steven Soderbergh
Starring Brad Pitt, George Clooney
Warner Bros.
Rated PG-13
125 mins.
Grade A-

For those of you out there who missed "Ocean's Eleven" three years ago, here's a quick recap: Danny Ocean (George Clooney) and his merry men pulled off an unthinkable heist, taking $150 million from three Las Vegas casinos, The MGM Grand, The Mirage and The Bellagio, all owned by casino impresario Terry Benedict (Andy Garcia). In addition to taking Benedicts money, they also took his girlfriend (and Danny's ex-wife), Tess (Julia Roberts).

Fast- forward three years to "Twelve" and Benedict wants his money back — all of it ... plus interest. Since Ocean and Co. are too well-known stateside, they decide to take their venture across the pond and pull scams in Amsterdam and Rome. Obviously, hilarity, mishaps and hijinks ensue. With Benedict breathing down their neck, a mysterious French rival simply known as "Night Fox" seemingly always one step ahead of them and the unstoppable (and extremely sexy) detective Lahiri hot on their trail. "Twelve" constantly keeps the audience guessing "will they or won't they?"

Directing maverick Steven Soderbergh is again at the helm as he was in "Eleven," and he handles his cast with the greatest of ease. Soderbergh doubled as cinematographer, and "Twelve" is a beautifully shot film. All of the locations sparkle and shine, almost leaping off the screen. The final scene with Rusty and Isabel on the Italian coast is exceptionally stunning; with some of the bluest ocean you're bound to see on screen this year. All of the production values for that matter were sumptuous, a constant feast for the eyes, and with slick and sophisticated costumes complimenting the gorgeous sets.

Hollywood royalty is on screen in "Twelve", and the performances are intoxicating. From George Clooney's suave Danny Ocean to Shaobo Quin's hysterical Yen, all of the actors seem completely comfortable in their roles and with each other. The film must have been exciting and fun to make, and you can see how much fun they all really had in their performances. Celebrity cameos are rampant, and they make the film all the more fun. There is one scene in particular with the majority of the cast that will no doubt bring a smile to New England audience's faces, but you'll have to see the movie to find out.

The one-standout performance in "Twelve" in a glittery ensemble (and that's a very hard thing to do) has to be Matt Damon's magnificent turn as Linus Caldwell, a sort of Danny Ocean-in-training. Linus wants to be more involved with the heists this time, and its hysterical watching him fumble through learning the ropes, and you can't help but cheer when it finally comes time for him to step up and take the lead. If there is any justice in my world, Matt Damon would be nominated and win the Best Supporting Actor Oscar this year for his performance of Linus Caldwell, it was that good.

There were some minor problems with "Twelve," mostly its run time. About 20 minutes could have been cut from the film, mostly in the middle. There is also one sub-plot that the film could do without, which also would have trimmed down its running time. While "Ocean's Eleven" was edited at a breakneck pace, "Twelve" seems to lag in a few places, and at times is uneven. The dialogue also leaves a bit to be desired, there are quite a few good one liners, but they feel flat and stagnant next to those of "Eleven."

All in all, Christmas has come a couple of weeks early to Hollywood, as "Ocean's Twelve" will no doubt have Warner Bros. producers seeing mounds of green over the upcoming holiday weekends. While "Twelve" probably won't see much awards season glory, it's just the ticket for the Christmas season. Soderbergh and his crew have created the perfect holiday treat, a light and fluffy piece of cinema that's so delicious it can only come around at this time of year.

COURTESY WARNER BROS STUDIOS

The "Ocean's Twelve" gang is back again. The all-star cast includes Julia Roberts, Brad Pitt, George Clooney, Eliot Gould and Don Cheadle.

Preparing for the end of 'America's Next Top Model'

Style 101
Monique Jemmott

I have been against reality TV since it infested its way onto every television network in existence today. I've never understood why anyone in their right mind would want to watch people live in the wilderness, live with strangers or eat things for money in their spare time.

But of course to every rule there is an exception, and to every declaration there is the gray area – mine's regarding reality TV is "America's Next Top Model." The UPN show takes ordinary beauties, and puts them to the test of seeing how they handle the grueling schedule, and not always glamorous life, of supermodels. In the end, the winner gets a modeling contract, and lives happily ever after.

Now in its third season, the show, hosted by supermodel extraordinaire Tyra Banks, has gained a cult like following, with Web sites, and online message boards in support of viewers' favorite contestants.(I have come across three separate sites in support of Jocara, the feisty plus-sized model eliminated four episodes ago). Fans can't get enough of the television show — its drama, fashion and glamour all rolled into one hour.

The show started off with 14 contestants (including a University of Massachusetts student, who unfortunately was eliminated early on in the season). As the week's have gone by, we've watched the girls dwindle away, until we were left with just three: Amanda, Yaya, and Eva, all exquisite beauties who throughout the contest continue to overcome great odds by the standards of the modeling world (Amanda is legally blind, Eva is only 5'7 in height, and Yaya struggles with an acne problem), but they have weathered the storm, and in the season finale which airs this week, one of them will be crowned queen bee.

As cliché as it might sound, there really is more than what meets the eye on this show. All of the contestants have represented various aspects of life, and have overcome some type of odd to reach their goal.

Amanda has not let her vision keep her from fully participating in the competition, and its challenges, which have ranged from posing with a live tarantula, to posing on roller skates, she has stepped up to any challenge and left a lasting impression on the judges. Eva, has dealt with her personal demons, and struggled with being a less spiteful and hard individual, and even seemed to find a strong bond with contestant Ann, until she was eliminated, and declared Eva was not really her friend. As the shortest model in the bunch, Eva's tenacity, has helped her produce quality pictures, and become a favorite amongst the judges. Yaya, despite her acne, which can prove to be a problem in an industry that tries so hard to endorse perfection, has relied on her unwavering confidence and grace, has been the leader of the pack winning countless challenges that are given to the contestants.

For fans of the show, the finale will be bitter sweet. Of course, we all want to see the best girl win (I'm rooting full steam for Eva the Diva), but at the same time, we don't want to see the show end and to soon be wondering "what happened to the winner of that model reality show?" — I have yet to see Yohanna, the winner of last season's show in any endorsements.

So we all sit anxiously waiting to see what will happen, and pray that season four is in the works.

Monique Jemmott is a Collegian editor.

COURTESY UPN.COM

In the last episode of "Top Model" only Yaya, left, Eva, top right, and Amanda remain.

Goo Goo Dolls rock out in rain on 'Live in Buffalo' CD

By JERRY GORDINIER
MICHIGAN DAILY

ANN ARBOR, Mich. — There is a torrential downpour in Buffalo, New York. It's that kind of oppressive rain: cold and relentless. It comes down in sheets, soaking the worn crowd in Buffalo's Niagara Square. A few umbrellas pop up, but most of the fans raise their arms to the sky. They are there for one reason.

No one is more aware of this than Johnny Rzeznik, lead singer of the Goo Goo Dolls. Soaked to the bone, staring out from the stage with a sly smile on his face, Rzeznik stops and takes it all in. The soft acoustics of "There Is Gone" begin to fill the night. Johnny plaintively asks, "It feels good, don't it?"

Watching the Goo Goo Dolls homecoming performance on the DVD included with "Live in Buffalo," there is something magical in the air. Even absent the rain, which doesn't fall until the last third of the show, the songs fill the night. The raw instrumentation is the most notable aspect, evident in "Black Balloon" which beautifully juxtaposes delicate acoustic picks against evocative piano. The album gives no hint as to when the storm starts, a credit to the band's professionalism. During the show, however, the shower gives the show an epic, almost religious, quality. The slow, precise, acoustic work of "Iris" plays against painful mandolin, and gives way to quick, distorted, electric lines. "Iris," a song of longing and heartbreak, pours like the rain from the storm.

Sadly, absent the atmosphere of the performance, the songs lose a little something in comparison to their original recordings. The most appealing aspect of a ballad are the vocals, and Rzeznik can't match his production values. This is especially noticeable in songs such as "Big Machine," when it feels as though Rzeznik is talking more than singing. There is a unity, a different kind of intimacy, in the live production. This comes from Rzeznik's harsh, plaintive voice. It comes, however, at the expense of vocal range.

Some critics may say this album, like many live releases, is only for the die-hard fans. To some extent they are right, as simply hearing the album is not justification to purchase it. Yet, there is something special about this Independence Day concert. There is a love of music in that band, playing against nature, playing for its fans. There is something in those fans with their arms raised to the sky. "Live in Buffalo" has heart.

COURTESY WARNER BROS

Alternative rockers Goo Goo Dolls give fans yet another musical treat on their new album "Live at Buffalo."

Holiday CD review: the best (and the rest) of the festive

By KATHY BERDAN
KNIGHT RIDDER

A soundtrack sets just the right mood in a movie, so why not for the holidays? A festive party, a quiet night by the fire, cocoa with the kids. New releases this holiday season offer as many types of soundtracks as there are reasons to celebrate.

Here's a look at a few:

What: "Frank Sinatra: The Christmas Collection" (Reprise)

Soundtrack for: All your swinging hipster holiday parties. (Aluminum tree recommended to set the mood.)

Why buy it? : Contains loads of finger-snapping tunes, plus several previously unissued songs with Bing Crosby, such as "The Christmas Song" and "White Christmas." It opens with a grand version of "I've Got My Love to Keep Me Warm." Only Dean Martin sings lyrics such as: "Who needs an overcoat, I'm burnin' with love" better than the Chairman of the Board.

What were they thinking?: One song with offspring Tina and Frank Jr. is sufficient. Three? At least lose "The Twelve Days of Christmas" where the kids "bought their loving dad a most lovely lavender tie."

What: "Peace on Earth: The Best of Tingstad and Rumbel Christmas" (Narada)

Soundtrack for: A woodsy little gift shop that smells like pine.

Why buy it?: Lovely, acoustic, simple carols such as "Away in a Manger" and "O Little Town of Bethlehem."

What were they thinking?: Soothing can quickly become all-sounds-the-same snoozers.

What: "Barenaked for the Holidays," Barenaked Ladies (Desperation)

Soundtrack for: The ride home from college for holiday break.

Why buy it? : The Hanukkah songs are swell, and "Footprints" is a sweet song about seeing a crush's footprints in the snow and making your own so that it looks like you've been walking side by side.

What were they thinking? : It's all Barenaked Ladies, all the time. These guys can even turn "Jingle Bells" into a Barenaked Ladies song.

What: "Silver and Gold," Vanessa Williams (Lava)

Soundtrack for: A holiday brunch.

Why buy it?: Smooth tunes, only occasionally overwrought. "Mary's Little Boy Child" has a nice tropical beat.

What were they thinking?: The only person who should ever sing the title song is Burl Ives.

What: "Ultimate Christmas 2," various artists (BMG)

Soundtrack for: A gathering of people you don't know very well. Nothing too challenging here.

Why buy it?: If you're an "American Idol" fan, your buddies Ruben Studdard and Kelly Clarkson are here, along with Christina Aguilera, Britney Spears and TLC.

What were they thinking?: It's near sacrilege to mix Elvis and the Jordanaires, Alan Jackson, Santana and the Eurythmics with "American Idol" stars. If you really want an Ultimate Christmas CD, buy the first edition (1998) with Nat King Cole, Bing Crosby, Elvis, Aretha Franklin, Luciano Pavarotti, Johnny Mathis and Judy Garland.

What: "The Lost Christmas Eve," Trans-Siberian Orchestra (Lava)

Soundtrack for: A holiday reunion of friends who used to sit in your dorm room and listen to Pink Floyd.

Why buy it? : Because Christmas rocks! And this is a rock opera, "a story about Christmas and its ability to change endings," says Paul O'Neill, according to TSO's creator, producer, lyricist and primary composer in press materials.

What were they thinking? : This is the music of epic struggles, and this season I think I'll confine my epic struggles to holiday shopping at the mall.

What: "A Lovemongers' Christmas," Heart (Sovereign)

Soundtrack for? : A train station or airport runway – so you can't hear it.

Why buy it? : If the only music you listen to is Heart, and you have to have everything the duo ever recorded. Otherwise, there's no reason to buy this screeching album filled with awful lyrics.

What were they thinking: How bad can lyrics get? A song titled "Mary" describes her son going on to fame: "While the angels are singin' his praises in a blaze of glory/Mary stays behind and starts cleaning up the place./Mary you're covered in roses, you're covered in ruin./You're covered in secrets/You're covered in treetops/You're covered in birds ..." Huh?

What: "Maybe This Christmas Tree," various artists (Nettwerk America); this is the third in a series of these collections – part of the proceeds go to Toys for Tots.

Soundtrack for: After watching "The O.C."

Why buy it? : Earnest young artists who are best when they're being earnest. Copeland's "Do You Hear What I Hear," Belasana's "Bittersweet Eve" and Jars of Clay's "Christmas for Cowboys" merit repeated play. And the Pogues' "Fairytale of New York" is slow enough so you can actually understand all the words.

What were they thinking? : Sometimes, it gets a little too earnest, as with Ivy's "Christmas Time Is Here" (the Charlie Brown song).

What: "Everything You Want for Christmas," Big Bad Voodoo Daddy (Big Bad/Vanguard)

Soundtrack for: A party. A big, bad party.

Why buy it? : Where else will you get a copy of "Mr. Heatmiser," from the '70s Claymation TV special "The Year Without Santa Claus"? A rip through "Zat You Santa Claus?" Or "Jingle Bells" set to a cha-cha beat? If you've always wondered what it would be like to go out on a tear with the bearded guy, check out "Last Night I Went Out With Santa Claus." (I knew he was a party dude.)

What were they thinking? : OK, so it's a little wrong to think about Santa belting down a few scotches ...

What: "The Soulful Sounds of Christmas," various artists (Rhino)

Soundtrack for: Consenting adults consenting beneath the twinkle of the Christmas tree.

Why buy it? : Usher is hot, and he'll warm your eggnog with "Comin' for X-mas?"

What were they thinking? : If you've ever seen the "Saturday Night Live" holiday skit where Whitney Houston sings "Little Drummer Boy," you'll surely have that image in your head when she does "Do You Hear What I Hear?"

What: "Watching the Snow," Michael Franks (Rhino)

Soundtrack for: The Jack Johnson crowd, who would do well to get to know this veteran singer.

Why buy it? : "I Bought You a Plastic Star (for Your Aluminum Tree)" is tasty, as are other poppy jazz grooves on the CD, if you can get past the sugary lyrics.

What were they thinking? : Poetry or insipid goo? "Elation for precipitation of the frozen kind/Begins to grow when we are both below/A quilt watching the snow/The crystals fly the wood is dry/And you are wearing only fireglow/Like a Vermeer tableau/Inside watching the snow." Gack.

A few more: "Heavenly Voices," the Boys of King's College Choir, Cambridge (EMI Classics); "A Christmas Album," James Taylor (Hallmark); "My Favorite Time of the Year," Dionne Warwick (DMI).

COURTESY ZAMOLT/MALOTT/ATKINS RECORDS ET

Frank Sinatra, left, and Barenaked Ladies have relased their own versions of some of our favorite holiday songs.

Where are YOU living next semester?

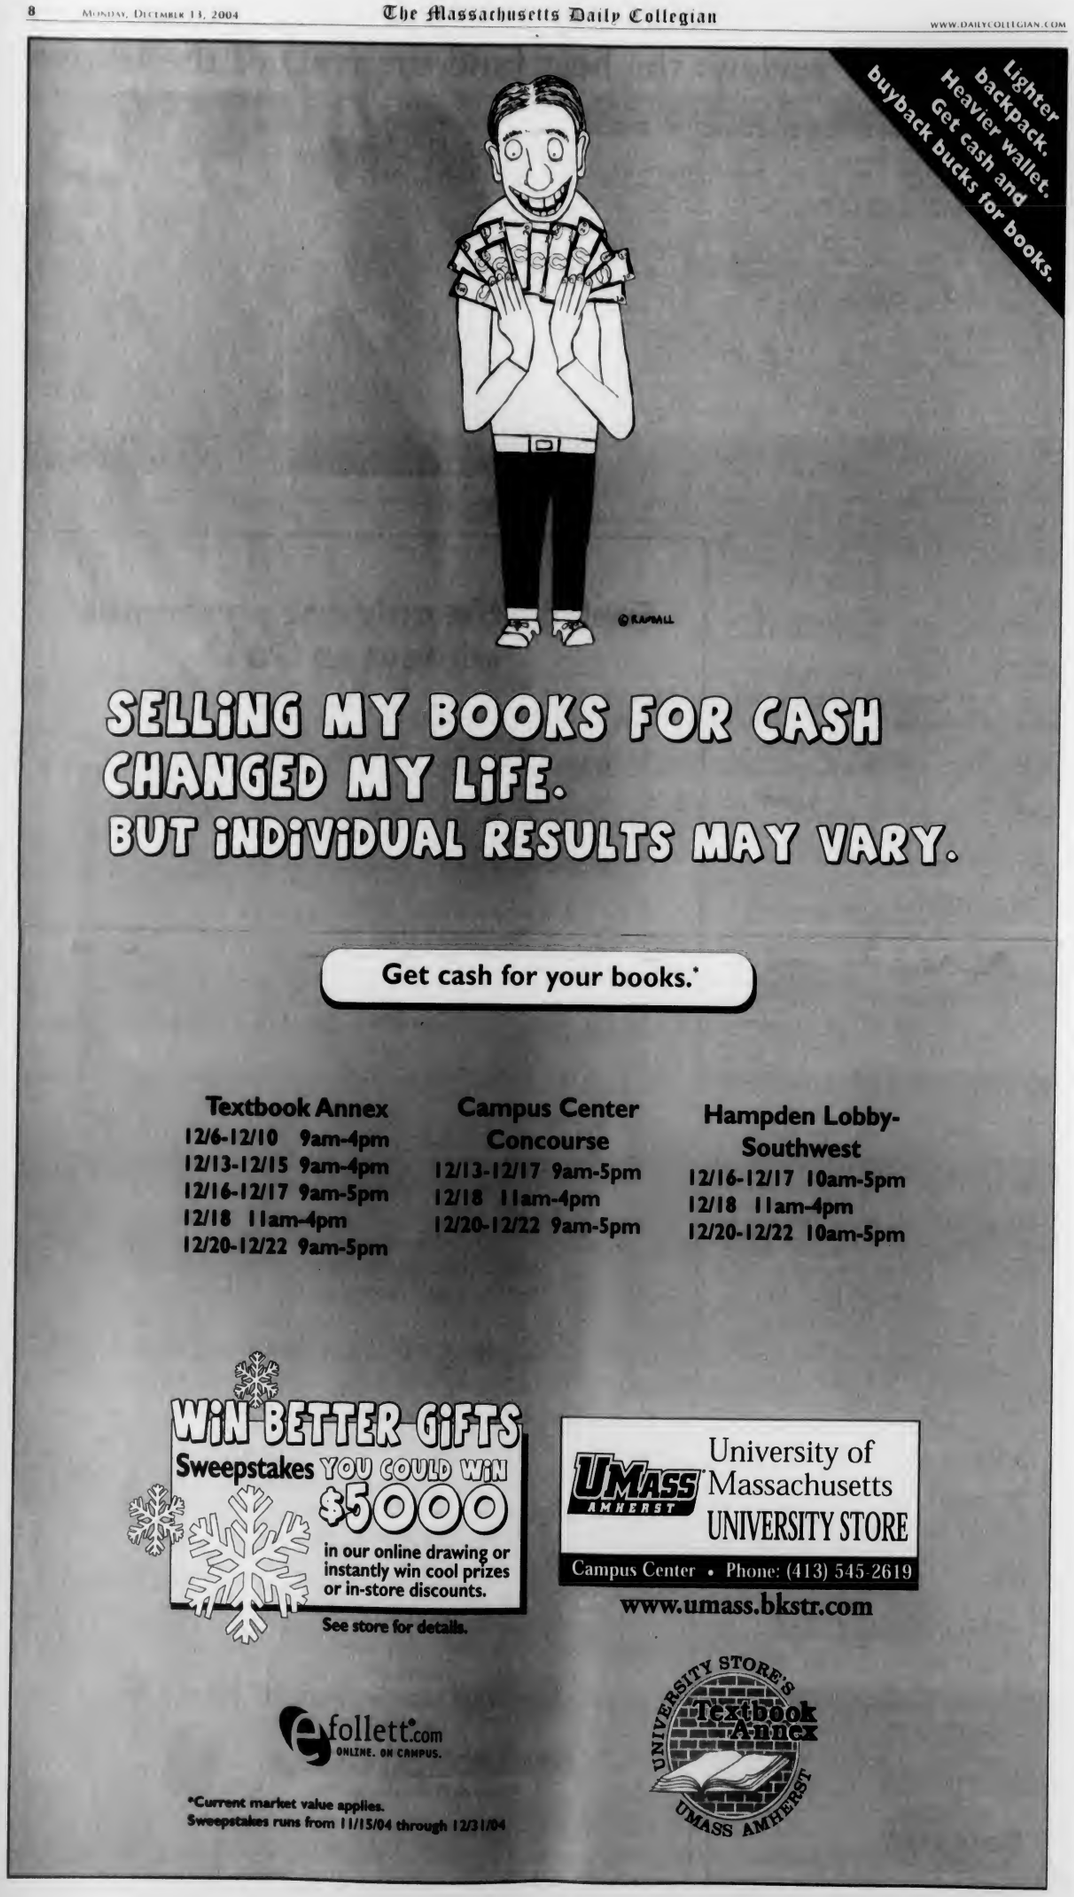
CHECK OUT PUFFTON VILLAGE!

Excellent location...1/2 mile from UMass
Spacious Apartments--1,2 and 3 Bedroom Townhouses
All rents include heat, hot water and cooking gas
On site laundry, off street parking.
Basketball and Tennis courts.

NEW PUFFTON VILLAGE
1040 N. Pleasant St. #410
Amherst, MA 01002
413-549-0145
www.pufftonvillage.com

Feel like the only one on campus without an iPod?

You are.



Take advantage of your student discount before you head home for the holidays.

iPod Mini $229
iPod from $269
iPod Photo from $469
iPod U2 $329

Stop by the University Store today to get yours.
The UMass University Store, Campus Center, Amherst, MA 01003

UMASS AMHERST University of Massachusetts UNIVERSITY STORE
Campus Center • Phone: (413) 545 2619
www.umass.bkstr.com

Apple, the Apple logo and iPod are trademarks of Apple Computer, Inc., registered in the U.S. and other countries

Dillon carries Pats past some old friends

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBORO — Tom Brady passed the New England Patriots into the playoffs by guiding an offensive system that may be on display at Notre Dame next season.

And their defense held off the Cincinnati Bengals for a 35-28 win Sunday.

Brady threw for two touchdowns — with offensive coordinator Charlie Weis calling plays while close to becoming coach of the Fighting Irish — and the Patriots got their 27th win in 28 games.

Corey Dillon ran for a touchdown and 88 yards on 22 carries against the team he left amid harsh feelings and, for the first time in his eight pro seasons, reached the playoffs. New England (12-1) clinched a postseason berth and claimed the AFC East championship because the Jets lost to the Steelers.

But the Bengals, who totaled 83 points in their previous two games, made it 35-28 on Jon Kitna's 27-yard TD pass to Kelley Washington with 3:50 left after Troy Brown ended another threat when he intercepted Kitna's pass in the end zone early in the fourth quarter.

Carson Palmer threw two touchdown passes for the Bengals (6-7) before leaving with a sprained knee with 3:10 to go in the third quarter.

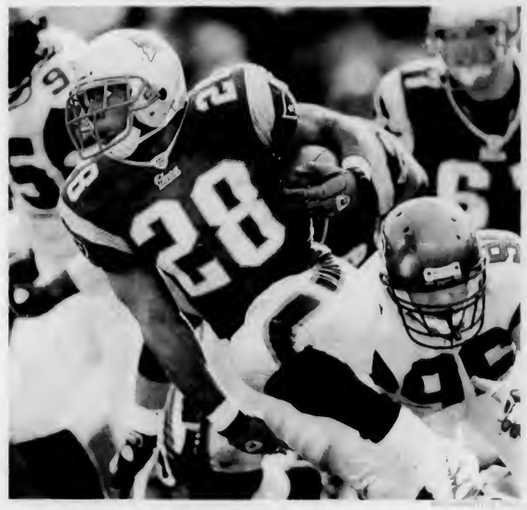
But he also threw an interception that Asante Samuel returned 34 yards for a touchdown and a 21-7 lead midway through the second quarter. The Patriots came up with two other turnovers that ended Cincinnati threats — a fumble recovery by Willie McGinest at their 16-yard line and Brown's interception.

On offense, Weis hardly seemed distracted while watching the Patriots increase their total to 77 points in their last two games. Notre Dame was close to hiring him to replace Tyrone Willingham, and an announcement is possible as soon as Monday.

Weis had the athletes to carry out his game plan, especially Brady.

He completed 18-of-26 passes for 260 yards and even connected with Patrick Pass for a seven-yard gain while sitting on the ground after he tripped.

The Patriots scored first for the 18th straight regular-season game, an NFL record, on Dillon's 1-yard run on their first series. That streak was in jeopardy until McGinest recovered Rudi Johnson's fumble.



The Bengals tied it on Palmer's two-yard scoring pass to Matt Schobel, ending an 11-play drive. But the Patriots scored two touchdowns over the next six plays on Brady's 48-yard pass to David Patten and Samuel's interception.

Palmer's five-yard pass to Chad Johnson on Cincinnati's next series made it 21-14.

Then Brady got the ball back and marched the Patriots to Kevin Faulk's four-yard touchdown run with 22 seconds remaining in the half for a 28-14 lead.

Brady was at his best on the opening series of the second half. He completed six-of-seven passes for 65 yards, capped by a 17-yard touchdown pass to a wide-open Christian Fauria.

The Bengals cut the lead to 35-21 on Kyle Larson's 11-yard touchdown run off a fake field goal and nearly drew within a touchdown as Kitna led them to the Patriots 10. But on third down, his pass was intercepted by Brown with 12:30 left in the game.

Corey Dillon rushed the ball 22 times for 88 yards and a touchdown yesterday against the Cincinnati Bengles in New England's victory. The Pats claimed the AFC East title with their win and the Jets' loss.

Weis flies out to Notre Dame after Pats 'W'

Charlie Weis is hoping to bring the Irish back to their glory days. Notre Dame is expected to officially announce his hiring today.

By Tom Coyne
Associated Press

SOUTH BEND, Ind. — New England Patriots offensive coordinator Charlie Weis has told friends he has accepted the Notre Dame coaching job, returning to the school he graduated from in 1978.

And Patriots quarterback Tom Brady said Sunday the team wants to send Weis out "the right way."

Mark Bavaro, a former Notre Dame player who was with the New York Giants while Weis was on the staff, said Weis told him Saturday that he was taking the job at Notre Dame.

"He was excited, but he was much more concerned about the Cincinnati game today," Bavaro said Sunday. "That's the way he is, very focused."

Dr. Jim Benenati, who roomed with Weis for four years at Notre Dame, said Weis had told him he has agreed to take the job and he was excited about becoming a head coach.

"It's the greatest thing that could ever happen to the school and probably the best thing that could ever happen for Charlie," said Benenati, a radiologist in Miami.

The Fighting Irish have been searching for nearly two weeks for a replacement for Tyrone Willingham.

A university source, speaking on condition of anonymity, told The Associated Press on Saturday that Notre Dame was close to a deal with Weis, but it was not a done deal.

Asked as he left the field after New England's 35-28 win over Cincinnati for his thoughts on Weis, Brady told CBS, "I even though he's leaving I think everyone's going to enjoy these last few games and hopefully we send him out the right way."

Weis will attempt to restore Notre Dame to the powerhouse program it was when he attended the university as an undergraduate while Ara Parseghian and Dan Devine coached the Fighting Irish. Weis never played for Notre Dame.

Associate athletic director John Heisler said Sunday afternoon that the school "was not in a position to make an announcement yet."

"We're not prepared to say it's official yet," he said.

New England coach Bill Belichick wouldn't comment about Weis' status after the game.

Patriots owner Robert Kraft was asked after New England defeated Cincinnati on Sunday about Weis.

"Tomorrow, when they announce it," he said, declining further comment.

Weis was not available after the game.

ESPN reported that Weis has agreed to a six-year contract worth about $2 million a year.

CLOTHING SALE!
TONS OF GREAT CLOTHING FOR GUYS & GIRLS FROM ONE OF THE HOTTEST RETAILERS.
"Brand Named"
Jeans, Shirts, Tees, Sweaters, Outerwear, Accessories
&
so much more!!
Located at
University of Massachusetts Student Union Ballroom
December 14th-17th
Tuesday-Thursday 9am-9pm
Friday 9am-5pm
Everything from $5-$20
(first quality, irregulars, returns)
COME BY & CHECK IT OUT!!
VISA MASTERCARD & CASH ACCEPTED
presented by
Retail Sales 101, llc.

Hurricanes storm past UM

HOOP from page 12

gle lead change of the day.

Diaz scored Miami's first six points on two 3-pointers and senior forward William Frisby followed suit with a lay-up, tying the game. Diaz was the leading scorer of the game with 20 points, but Haith attributed much of the Hurricanes' success to Frisby, who was making his first start of the season.

"I thought Will had a great game tonight, in terms that we inserted him in the starting lineup, and we had to get him going," Haith said. "I thought he performed well, you know 14 [points] and eight [rebounds]. He ran the court well and we need that out of him."

UMass struggled offensively for most of the first half, shooting a miserable 33 percent from the field. Conversely, the Hurricanes were unstoppable and went eight-for-14 from behind the arc.

"You've got to give them credit. They just shot it," Lappas said. "If that was a shooting drill and nobody was guarding them that would be impressive."

Lappas mentioned that he might have slightly underestimated the guard trio, who scored 54 of Miami's points between them. UMass altered its defense several times but was unable to control the perimeter throughout the contest.

"The problem with what we did was that we didn't get back in transition fast enough, and we let them get threes in transition, and that got them rolling," Lappas said. "After that it was like a snowball that just kept coming. We tried every defense that we had today. It was the first time this year that we played with every defense that we owned."

After his 18-point performance against UConn, including the game-winning lay-up, Rashaun was shut down by a tenacious Miami defense. Freeman is the leading scorer for the Minutemen this year, but he also leads the team in turnovers with 24.

Most teams have double-teamed Freeman throughout the season, leaving the player on the opposite block open for a pass. The Hurricanes would bring one of their guards down to the paint, causing Freeman to turn the ball over seven times.

"They did a great job. They did something really different today most people haven't done. They were letting him catch it and coming to get him with a guard," Lappas said. "They had some pretty big bodies in there, so that made it hard. He's turning the ball over too much now, but he's working really hard at fixing that."

KAREN WINGERTER/CLASS

Stephen Lasme scored two points and hauled in four rebounds during UMass' blowout loss down in Miami yesterday.

Minutemen have a full slate over break

SCHEDULE from page 12

come to Amherst to begin conference play on Wednesday, Jan. 5 at 8 p.m. The game is scheduled to be televised locally on CN8 as well. UMass split the season series with the Owls last year, including a dramatic home win sparked by an Art Bowers game-winning 3-pointer with just under 20 seconds to play. The contest will mark the continuation of the A-10's premier rivalry, which began in the mid-1990's during both programs' ascension to national prominence, but has dwindled in significance over the last few seasons.

After tangling with the Owls, the Minutemen will host A-10 West Division foe Xavier, which advanced to the Elite Eight in the 2004 NCAA Tournament in March. The Musketeers are led by new coach Sean Miller, who replaced Thad Matta and is looking to make up for the loss of All-American forward Romain Sato and point guard Lionel Chalmers to graduation.

UMass then returns to television as they hit the road in-conference. Games at St. Joseph's on Wednesday Jan. 12 at 8 p.m. and at George Washington on Saturday Jan. 15 will be shown locally on CN8 and A-10 Television, respectively. They will also mark UMass' final television appearance in 2004-05, barring a trip to the postseason.

Like Xavier, the Hawks are looking to reshape a team decimated by the loss of National Player of the Year Jameer Nelson and backcourt mate Delonte West, both of whom were first-round picks in the 2004 NBA Draft, as well as a serious injury to forward and captain Pat Carroll.

The Colonials, meanwhile, have emerged as the class of the league, and have cracked the national top-25 at No. 21 after upsetting No. 12 Maryland and No. 9 Michigan State in consecutive games.

The Marston and White will then return home to the Pioneer Valley for two more home games and will remain in-conference play, hosting Fordham on Wednesday Jan. 19 at 7 p.m. and St. Joe's on Saturday Jan. 22 at noon.

NOTE: Thursday's historic and dramatic upset of archrival No. 7 Connecticut will be re-aired on Thursday night at 7 p.m. on ESPN Classic.

After struggling over the past few weeks, the Minutemen are 8-10-1 heading into their 18-day break. The second half of their schedule kicks off on Dec. 29 against Princeton at the Mullins Center.

Freshmen propel UM past Sacred Heart

HOCKEY from page 12

shoved to the ice by a Pioneer defender, got off a wrist shot that beat LaPointe with 4:41 to go in the opening frame. Burto earned an assist on the goal, as Fenton had done on the first score.

"[The freshman line] is a line we've had together before," Cahoon said. "There's a chemistry there. Dan Gordon has great vision, and Fenton and Burto are very unselfish players. I would bet that you'll see a lot of those guys together."

The Minutemen didn't need another goal to earn the win, and while a 2-1 decision against an Atlantic Hockey Association team might not be quite the convincing victory one might expect, the game wasn't that close the rest of the way, save for an abbreviated 5-on-3 that the Pioneers enjoyed — but didn't use — late in the second period.

After giving up the off-putting first goal, Winer settled in quite nicely, and while the 20 shots the Pioneers put on his net weren't quite as daunting as the 27 he saw from New Hampshire in Thursday's 4-0 loss, he did well to keep Sacred Heart at bay.

"[The first goal] is not a good way to start out, but you've just got to realize that there are still 59 minutes left," said Winer, who earned career win No. 37 Saturday.

LaPointe was almost equally as solid on the other end, save for the two-goal first period, making 34 stops in the game.

That LaPointe had such a heavy workload was representative of a new tack by the Minutemen, which featured a lot more shot attempts than they had been taking previously.

"I threw the number '35' at them before the game," Cahoon said, "I wanted us to work on taking 35 shots on him."

The Minutemen entered the game averaging 25.8 shots per contest, and the 36 they took against LaPointe was the third-highest total of the season, behind the 40-shot output they threw at Connecticut's Brad Smith on Oct. 24, and the 43 attempts they took against Merrimack on Nov. 6.

The UMass power play was a strong factor, something that has hardly been true thus far this season. The extra-man crew entered the game with an anemic .122 percentage, and while Burto's goal doesn't count as a power play tally, it was the Minutemen's strong two minutes of play with Giatrelis in the box that set the goal up.

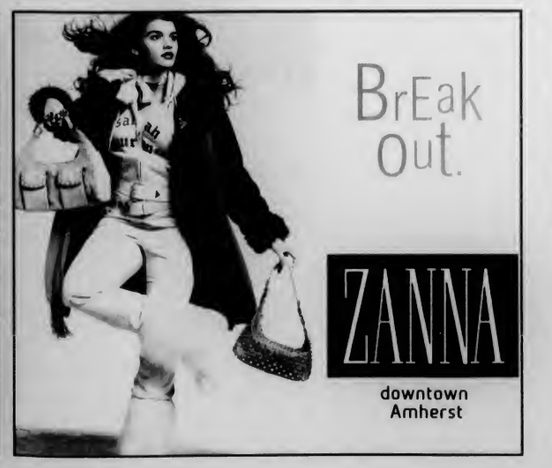
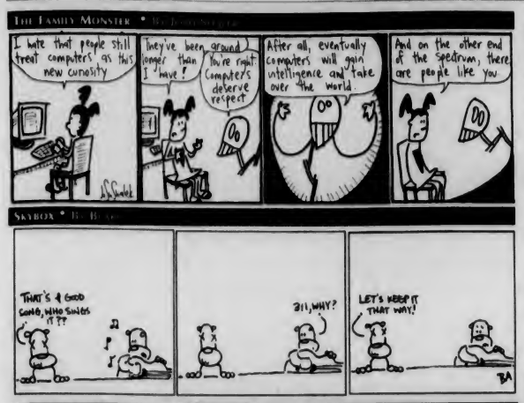
The Minutemen have a week and a half off for the holidays, before they return to action on the 29th against Princeton. The next night they'll host Nebraska-Omaha, to whom they paid a visit for Thanksgiving weekend last year. UMass gets back into Hockey East action against UMass Lowell on Jan. 7, and then host the Maine Black Bears on Jan. 14 and 15, continuing the conference's newest rivalry — the Black Bears won last year's conference championship in a triple-overtime thriller against UMass in Boston, just one season removed from the Minutemen's shocking playoff sweep at Maine's Alfond Arena in the 2003 Hockey East quarterfinals.



UMass will then play its third game against Lowell, who the Minutemen beat in overtime on Oct. 22, followed by a home-and-home series against Boston College to begin the semester.

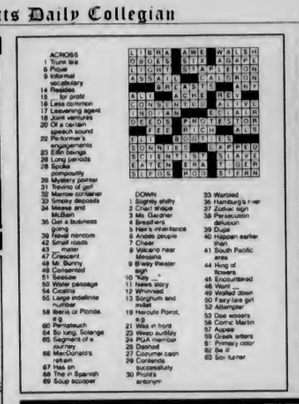


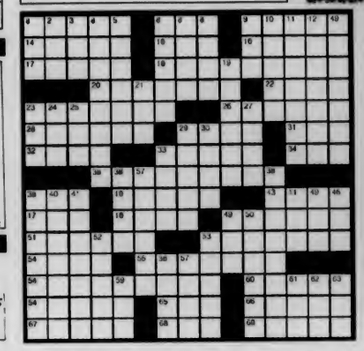
STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE
UMASS, AMHERST
HELPING STUDENTS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS
Free Legal Advice, Referrals, Representation and Counseling for UMASS Students
Student & Workers Rights, Family & Criminal Law, Landlord/Tenant & Consumer Disputes
CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

The Mercantile
Books Toys Great Clothing Cards Gloves Gifts
Stocking Stuffers Rings Scarves
Action Figures Clothing Sale Tapestries Bracelets Chains Earrings
Dec. Hours Mon-Sat.10 am-9 pm-Sun 12-6
Amherst-11 E.Pleasant-Carriage Shops
Northampton-108Main St.

EXECUTIVE VALET PARKING
Serving Bradley Airport
Airport Parking College Special!
$25.00*-Up to 7 Days Parking. Valid 11/23-11/30
$50.00*-Up to 5 Weeks Parking. Valid 12/15-02/01/05
Valid College ID Req., Present this coupon or Visit us at:
www.CollegeAirportParking.com
800-218-1297
*Plus 4% Access Fee. Cannot be Combined with Other offers

HAMPSHIRE FITNESS club
90 Gatehouse Road, Off Rt. 9, Two miles East of Amherst Center
On the Bus Route • TEL: 256-6446
Shopping for a health club? • Do your homework first
JOIN NOW!
for our Winter Special
15 weeks - For Students: $179! -Includes HFC Free T-Shirt for New Members!
Inclusive membership / No additional fees
Hampshire Fitness Club has it all for you
•FULL SIZED INDOOR POOL •AQUA AEROBICS •CYBEX/NAUTILUS CIRCUIT •BOXING STUDIO
•CYBEX FREE WEIGHTS •FULL COURT BASKETBALL •VOLLEYBALL •INDOOR TENNIS
•YOGA/PILATES •AEROBICS/STEP/BOSU •JACUZZI/SAUNAS •CARDIO-VASCULAR EQUIPMENT
Open: 6am to 10pm Mon-Fri 8am to 9pm Sat-Sun





Quote of the Day

"Invention, my dear friends, is 93 percent perspiration, 6 percent electricity, 4 percent evaporation, and 2 percent butterscotch ripple."

—Willy Wonka

JUNGLE
Full Service Hair Salon
PEDICURES
$13 Acrylic Fills
$10 Manicure
$20 Acrylic Sets
$20 Pedicures
233 North Pleasant St (in carriage shops) Amherst
413-549-1840

Want to take your Business to New Heights.....
Advertise with Us
The Daily Collegian
1-800-366-3600

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Wear a helmet today. Don't ask why, just do it.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Don't worry, that thing you don't want anyone to see isn't showing.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Too bad you missed out on the baked potato bar yesterday. It was the Sunday Special.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Sing songs from "The Sound of Music" in the shower. You'll never be happier.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
If you feel like you're having a stressful week, just be glad you're not the president.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Eat some whipped cream and watch "Honey, I Shrunk the Kids". It's a good combination.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Remember, you can't drink in a bar in your pajamas.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Don't eat too much chocolate before bed tonight. You need your sleep.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
The next time you go to the DC, check out the ice cream. Your favorite topping is there.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You're so sweet, you give people cavities.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Today is a good day for a walk into town. You never know who you might bump into.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
The silly little games you play are quite delightful.

Do You know THE SCORE?
The Massachusetts Daily Collegian's annual sports magazine. Available at selected newsstands and at the Mullins Center.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Announcements

Your exams are very important. Your ultimate destiny is the most important. "Final Frontier" coming to your campus soon. www.finalfrontier.tv Check our www.allaboutgsd.com

Apartment for Rent

Amherst 2Bed 2Bath on Bus Line Sublet Jan 1-May 850+ No security deposit Michelle 413-256-1593

2 Bedroom 2 Bathroom Lease from Jan-Aug $1,100/Month, Utilities included Contact Jenna @ 917-753-3591

Brandywine Aprs. 1 Bedroom units Available Jan 1, 2005 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com Stop by or call 549-0600

Apartment for Rent

Amherst 2 Bedroom Condo On Bus Line 950+ 256-5467

Auto for Sale

2001 Toyota Corolla S Spd 55K Asking $7500.00 549-5048

2001 Nissan Xterra Four wheel drive, excellent condition automatic transmission, Loaded, for photos and more information go to http://hometown.aol.com/mathesoup0/index.html or call 413-536-8077

Computers

Pentium Laptop $99. Pentium III Desktop $99. 413-584-8857

Employment

"Bartending" $300/Day Potential No Experience Nesc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Employment

Returning to the Greater Boston area this Winter break? Want a fun, flexible job working with kids in their homes? Look no further....call Parents in a Pinch, Inc. TODAY if you have childcare experience/references, at least 1 full weekday free and want to earn $11/hr. Car helpful. 617-739-KIDS Fill out application at: www.parentsinapinch.com

Student Brand Manager Motivated? Outgoing? Enthusiastic? Want to build your resume? CampusFundraiser is currently hiring a Student Brand Manager to promote our company on your campus. Start in January. Manage promotions on campus, work 10 hours a week. $100/week salary plus bonuses. Learn more at: http://www.campusfundraiser.com/SBM.asp

MAD SCIENTISTS WANTED! PT to conduct fun science after-school programs, parties, etc. Requirements: Experience with groups of children, enthusiasm, car. Performance experience a plus. 1-800-338-5711

Entertainment

DJ for Hire Mission 101 Ent. Contact Fredy at 413-687-3849

For Sale

ATTENTION: FACULTY & STUDENTS! Discounted Academic and Collegiate Software – Save 50%-80%! www.academic-collegiate.com 800-429-1686 Cool Ordering Website!

Room for Rent

For male grad student / professional. Large, quiet, comfortable. 15 min walk to UMass. On Busline. Avail Jan. 549-1578

Room for rent in five bedroom apartment preferably girl $402.50/month Less than half a mile from campus and town Call Elana 253-9694

Roommate Wanted

Roommate wanted for one large bedroom in house big enough for two to share. Closest house to campus! Call Marissa at 413-549-4561

1 Bedroom Avail in 2 Bedroom Apt Rent 425 Month Contact 917-270-8127

325/month inclusive call 413-775-9997

Services

Need Just Evacuation and Repatriation Coverage? Check out BETA! $250,000 Evacuation, $25,000 Repatriation COST is $18 for 6 MONTHS! Online enrollment, emailed verification of coverage www.berins.com

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house Certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

Travel

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

Travel

Spring Break 2005. Travel with STS, America's #1 Student Tour Operator to Jamaica, Cancun, Acapulco, Bahamas and Florida. Now hiring on-campus reps. Call for group discounts. Information/Reservations 1-800-648-4849 or www.ststravel.com.

Spring Break Bahamas Celebrity Party Cruise! 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Nassau, Jamaica, From $459! Panama City & Daytona $159! www.SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Travel

tSPRING BREAK Largest selection of Destinations, including Cruises! VIP Club Parties & FREE trips. Epicurean Tours 1-800-234-4 FUN www.BREAKNOW.com

StudentCity.com The Ultimate Spring Break Experience. Learn SpringBreak, or www.StudentCity.com to reserve today.

SPRING BREAK '05
SAVE $100 PER ROOM
Clip & Send or Use Code: PRIME Online
www.sunsplashtours.com
1.800.426.7710

Wanted

Snowboard events intern $50/day stipend For job description email friends@deerfield.edu

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, DECEMBER 13, 2004 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Minutemen stormed over by Hurricanes

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

CORAL GABLES, Fla. — Riding the crest of its biggest win in recent memory, the wave carrying the Massachusetts men's basketball team crashed down hard on the beaches of Miami yesterday afternoon.

Miami	80
UMass	53

A day-and-a-half and 1,469 miles after defeating the UConn Huskies 61-59 in Amherst, the Minutemen received an 80-53 reality check at the hands of the Miami Hurricanes.

UMass went on a brief shooting spree at the end of the second half, but its ineptitude to cover the perimeter throughout the day put the game well out of reach. The Hurricanes' guard trio of Anthony Harris, Guillermo Diaz and Robert Hite were lights out from the floor, combining for 39 points behind the arc on 13-for-20 shooting.

Miami coach Frank Haith was pleased with his team's play, especially on the offensive end.

"I thought it was our best performance of the year from start to finish," Haith said. "I thought our ball movement and our player movement was excellent tonight from an offensive standpoint. Offensive execution was very good. You have to make the shots, and our guys shot the ball very well"

The Minutemen trailed by 15 at halftime and never came within striking distance after Miami went on an 18-2 scoring run to start the second half, led by the shooting of its guard trio.

Several baskets, however, came from offensive rebounds and a passive Minuteman frontcourt.

UMass coach Steve Lappas didn't see the rebounding energy the Minutemen had against UConn and questioned whether his team was mature enough to bring the same intensity.

"We didn't rebound the ball with the passion that we did the other day. My concern coming into this game was maturity," Lappas said. "You have to come into a situation now, off a win like that, against a good team on the road and go do it."

UMass started the game as it left off on Thursday night. Anthony Anderson broke the ice with a three, which fueled back-to-back layups from Freeman. The Minutemen led 8-3 when Miami went on a brief scoring run and caused the sin-

MATTHEW KEHR/COLLEGIAN

After the biggest win in UMass' recent memory, Anthony Anderson and the Minutemen got blown out down in Miami.

See HOOP on page 10

Taking a look at the schedule over break

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

CORAL GABLES, Fla. — Still basking in the glow of one of the program's more inspiring victories — a stunning 61-59 upset of defending National Champion Connecticut on Thursday night — the Massachusetts men's basketball team ran into the buzz saw that was the Miami Hurricanes' red hot backcourt on Sunday, and will head into a week-long exam break even at 3-3 on the young season.

The Minutemen clearly struggled to execute on both ends against Miami, but it was the 'Canes relentless shooting barrage from guards Guillermo Diaz, Anthony Harris and Robert Hite that buried coach Steve Lappas' team in a hole it couldn't dig itself out of. Now UMass must use its week off to prepare for the home stretch of the non-conference schedule; a set of games that presents the Maroon and White with the chance to improve its overall record and continue to develop prior to the start of the Atlantic 10 schedule.

Following exams, the Minutemen will host a pair of non-conference foes at the Mullins Center just prior to Christmas, with perennial NCAA tournament contender Davidson arriving for a 2 p.m. tip-off on Sunday Dec. 19 and Rider visiting on Thursday Dec. 23 at 7 p.m.

After returning from holiday break, UMass once again returns to the Mullins Center to face intra-state rival Boston University. The alma mater of former Massachusetts coach and athletics patriarch Jack Leaman, the Terriers are also a likely contender for an NCAA bid out of the America East Conference and will provide the Minutemen with a final tune-up before the annual Commonwealth Classic, which will also be held at the Mullins Center in 2005.

Set for 2 p.m. on Jan. 2, the Classic will match UMass with bitter rival Boston College in the latest installment of the annual series the Minutemen haven't won since 1999-00. Last season, before a sparse crowd at Silvio Conte Forum limited by blizzard-like conditions in Boston, the Maroon and White took the Eagles to overtime, before eventually falling 76-75.

UMass then remains at the Mullins Center for a classic A-10 opener, as rival Temple and legendary coach and foe John Chaney

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

Rashaun Freeman could only score seven points and grab five rebounds in UMass' loss yesterday. He turned the ball over seven times.

See SCHEDULE on page 10

Broken ankle to sideline leading scorer

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

The news isn't as bad as it was first expected, but that doesn't mean that the news is good.

Matt Anderson, the leading point-scorer on the Massachusetts hockey team, suffered a broken right ankle against New Hampshire on Thursday night, and he will be sidelined for at least eight weeks.

Nothing was torn, and there is no damage to his knee, clearing up the rumors that have been floating around the area for a few days.

Anderson said that he is scheduled to undergo surgery tomorrow at South Shore Hospital in New York to repair the damage to his ankle, and he will wear a cast for six weeks.

"They said [the surgery] is going to be in-and-out, a one-day process. Hopefully, sometime next week I'll be back up here taking my tests and finishing up the rest of the school year," Anderson said. "From what I understand, it's a pretty basic surgery, and I should be in and out in no time."

On one hand, it couldn't have come at a worse time for the Minutemen, who are 8-10-1 and have lost six of their last eight games, but on the other hand, they don't have a game scheduled until Dec. 29 against Princeton, and the final stretch of Hockey East games doesn't begin until Jan. 7 at Lowell.

The big question on the timetable for his return rests on his rehabilitation process, as this appears to be an injury that is different from person to person. Ironically, if he can make it back in eight weeks, it would be for the home-and-home series against UNH that kicks off at the Whittemore Center on Feb. 11.

Anderson, who has scored seven goals and tallied 13 assists for 20 points this season, missed all of last year after undergoing shoulder surgery. He scored three goals and dished out two assists against Clarkson on Oct. 9 in his first game in a year-and-a-half, proving that he could be a key piece on a team that reached the Hockey East championship game last year.

Anderson was hit along the left boards with about 10 minutes remaining in the third period Thursday night. After a several-minute delay in action while he was lying on the ice, teammates Jeff Lang and Craig MacDonald draped him over their shoulders as he was in obvious pain while being taken off the rink.

"My leg got caught underneath me and bent back. I just heard a little bit of a crack, and I knew it was pretty bad," Anderson said. "Thank God it just turned out to be an ankle."

"Matt is a great player," goalie Gabe Winer said. "We're going to miss him on the ice. Personally, I just feel terrible for the kid because of what happened last year having to sit out with his shoulder. We feel badly for him. We'll definitely miss him, but at the same time we're going to help him through this."

Coach Don Cahoon is trying to stay optimistic because he is so familiar with Anderson's work ethic, but he also wanted to refrain from much comment on any medical details because it could be such a long and complicated process.

"Each and every individual is different in terms of recovery, and I know Matt is real disciplined," Cahoon said. "He obviously knows how to deal with a setback like this, so he'll give it his best shot to try to get himself healthy enough and [get back] later in the season so that he might be of service to us at the end of the year. But there's no assuredness of that at all."

Anderson doesn't seem intimidated by the severity of the injury, and he certainly isn't asking for any sympathy as he stairs directly into the face of another one of life's cruel challenges.

"Sometimes things don't go as well as planned, but it's life, and it's how you deal with things that makes you who you are," Anderson said. "I hope to come back stronger and even better than what I was. Who knows what could happen? In eight weeks I could be back on the ice and back playing, or in eight weeks I could still be rehabbing. We'll see how it goes. You never know, bottom line."

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

Matt Anderson suffered his second serious injury of his UMass career Thursday night against UNH. He has scored seven goals and tallied 13 assists this year.

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

Rolling along

Tamara Tatham helped the Minutewomen beat Siena 59-49 yesterday. She had a career-high 21 points and tied a career-high with 11 rebounds. The Minutewomen improved their record to 6-3.

Freshman line makes most of their call to action in victory

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts hockey team finished off an ostensibly disappointing first half of its season on a bright note Saturday night, thanks to a bunch of rookies.

The Minutemen, who found out this weekend that star forward Matt Anderson's broken right ankle would require surgery, edged Sacred Heart 2-1 in front of 2,932 Saturday night, on goals from freshmen Matt Burto and P.J. Fenton.

UMass	2
Sacred Heart	1

UMass improves its record to 8-10-1 overall, and the Pioneers fall to 6-9-1. The Minutemen's 4-5-1 Hockey East record puts them fifth in the conference — two points behind Boston College — where they'll stay until league play kicks up again in January.

The UMass win comes in the last game before the Minutemen's longest break of the season, an 18-day respite until they host Princeton on Dec. 29, and puts a positive spin on the opening stretch of the season.

"It leaves a good taste in our mouths for the holidays," said defenseman Marvin Degon, who took five shots in the game.

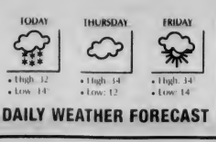
It was a night for freshmen, as UMass coach Don Cahoon opted to start the game with an all-rookie line of Burto, Fenton, and Dan Gordon at center, with first-year blueliner David Leaderer in back.

The young guns paid dividends early, although it took a quick Sacred Heart goal to rev the Minutemen's engine.

Just 22 seconds into the game, William Billinghurst got the Pioneers on the board, taking the puck all the way from his own blue line, untouched, to UMass goaltender Gabe Winer's left side, where he slipped it between Winer and the right post.

Sacred Heart continued to pressure the Minutemen for the first minute of the game, but the hosts eventually woke up and returned fire.

Leaderer took a hard slap shot from the left point, and while Pioneer goaltender Kevin LaPointe made a sharp kick save, the rebound trickled back out to the front of the crease, where Burto turned and deposited it to tie the game at the 7:22 mark of the first period. The goal came just six seconds after SHU's Peter Giatrelis finished serving a two-minute interference penalty.



The Minutemen earned the deciding edge just under eight minutes later, as Fenton carried to the slot with Giatrelis in the box again — this time for charging — and as he was being

See HOCKEY on page 10

Ray Lamontagne: he could be your next favorite

ARTS & LIVING, SECTION B

DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

Minutemen find success over winter break

SPORTS, SECTION C

The Daily Collegian

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 26, 2005 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXV ISSUE 66

Officials say no students lost in tsunami

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

No University of Massachusetts students or faculty members were lost in the tsunami that swept across 11 countries in Asia on Dec. 26, according to Frank Hugus, director of the International Programs Office.

University officials reported that 350 students originate from countries hit by the tsunami. Three hundred and four are from India, and 32 are from Thailand. Seven are from Malaysia, five from Indonesia, and four from Sri Lanka.

The IPO office and the Dean of Students office asked faculty members and students in an e-mail to report any problems, but so far no one has been unaccounted far.

"As I hope, no news is good news," said Hugus. "We have not heard of any problems, other than one or two people in the area who were accounted for," said Hughs.

Gov. Mitt Romney's office has offered aid to private and public universities in the state.

"The governor's office actually called and were very concerned about any of our students or faculty who might have been involved," said Hugus.

FACULTY, STAFF JOIN EFFORTS

Relief efforts and donation centers for the tsunami victims continue to develop in the Five College Area. Haneef Sahabdeen, a radiation safety services officer for Environmental Health and Safety, has set up bins around campus to collect clothes and money for the victims.

The 10-year UMass employee is originally from Sri Lanka, and moved to Amherst in 1982 with his family. When the tsunami hit, Sahabdeen's parents were visiting the country.

"We couldn't find any information," he said. "We were trying [the phones] almost every hour to make sure

See TSUNAMI AID on page A5

UMass student survives tsunami

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

It was an estimated 10 meter wall of water. Striking the shores of 13 countries with a deadly force, the tsunami killed over 212,000 people, according to CNN. It created one of the largest natural disasters in history, reminding the world just how powerful Mother Nature and the ocean can be.

For the people in the countries such as India and Sri Lanka, the decisions they made on the days surrounding Christmas would determine their fate.

For University of Massachusetts abroad student Lazarus V. Morrison, 23, his decision not to spend Christmas night camped on an Indian beach probably saved his life.

On his December recess from the Indian Institute of Technology (IIT) in Bombay, India, the fifth-year senior from Massachusetts traveled the country, sleeping on the southeastern beaches of India. On Christmas Eve, he stopped in the city of Chennai, the largest city in south India, hoping to catch a train back to the city.

Tired and unable to buy a ticket, Morrison decided get a hotel room in the city, rather than staying his usual beach lodge.

"Luckily, in retrospect, I was too lazy to find a beach lodge," he said in an e-mail interview with the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. "I am extremely lucky to have missed the [tsunami] and I am thankful for every small choice I made that kept me off the beach that day."

When the earthquake struck the country at 6:30 a.m. the morning after Christmas, Morrison said he woke up briefly to a loud creaking sound.

"I checked the legs on my bed, listened at the wall ... and then dismissed the incident as a mixture of poor construction and rowdy European neighbors and went back to sleep," he said.

A women surveys the destruction of her village in Indonesia after the tsunami.

When Morrison would wake up at 11:30 a.m., an hour after the tsunami, the death toll for the country of India would be climbing toward a current total of 10,749. Today, 5,640 people are still missing, according to CNN.

Morrison said he was shocked when he turned on BBC News International in his room.

"The first report I saw was a video of Chenna — much to my surprise — with people wading through streets covered in dirty water," he said.

Morrison said the ocean water came a half mile into Chennai, but his hotel was a mile from the shore — far enough inland not to be damaged by the wave. However, Morrison said he knew the event was serious.

"As soon as I saw the images of the flooded city so far from the shore, I knew it would be an unimaginable disaster," he said.

All the phone lines were busy, but Morrison remained in an international phone booth until he was able to get through to his parents and girlfriend in Mass.

See STUDENT on page A8

UMass graduate and employee struck by car; scholarship fund created in her memory

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

SUNDERLAND — The comfortable, well-loved dining room table was covered with stacks of newspapers and photos, all bearing the bright, smiling face of a young woman with long brown hair and dazzling eyes.

"She always looks happy," said Joseph Zak, looking fondly at the college senior picture of his step daughter, 25-year-old Jessica Hayes.

The newspaper clippings, however, tell a much sadder story.

Hayes, a 2001 University of Massachusetts graduate and acting office manager in the Biochemistry and Molecular Biology Department died Dec. 21 after being struck by a car while crossing the road near her home on Route 116 near the 7-Eleven in Sunderland.

"She used to tell me how to cross the road. She would travel with the crowd, figuring that was the safest place," said Zak. "Somebody just couldn't bother to stop," he said, closing his eyes painfully and leaning back in his living room recliner.

Zak said Hayes caught the PVTA bus to and from work at the Sunderland bus stop for the past nine years. She would then call her stepfather to drive her the last mile home. However, Zak said he never received a call that night.

The Jeep Wrangler that struck Hayes was driven by Tara Sudyka, 31, of South Hadley. The accident is still under investigation, and no charges have been pressed. Even after a month since the tragic accident, Zak and Hayes' mother, Maureen Zak, struggle to make it through each day. Maureen was disabled after undergoing brain surgery for a tumor 10 years ago.

"I can't be alone without crying," she said. "[Joe] and I don't want to leave each other alone."

A WOMAN IN A MAN'S WORLD

As the youngest and only daughter of three children, the 1997 Frontier Regional School grad-

Jessica Hayes, a UMass graduate and employee, was struck and killed by a car on Dec. 21 in Sunderland. Below, Hayes favorite poem.

"Ever more dreams follow
Doors to open paths to explore
Ever more joys to find
And more friends to share in them
Ever more lengths to reach Ever more life to live"
—Anonymous

uate adored her extensive teddy bear collection, grocery shopping and caring for her mother. But according to Joseph, who is a self employed and repairs steel-cutting machinery, Hayes also played an more rugged role — she was his work partner.

"She was always around in a man's world," he said. "She was cute as can be wearing steel-toed boots and a helmet with a pony tail."

Accompanying her step-father to steel mills from an early age, she learned to create computer programs for steel cutting machines to fashion steel into cat-shaped coat hooks, motorcycle kickstand holders and spark-plug bug ornaments.

The Isenburg School of Management graduate eventually turned her creations, or "Arc Work," into her own business. But Hayes' ability to work with steel also earned her the respect of the men at the mills.

"In a shop where there had never been a woman, she was their real live pinup girl," Joseph laughed. "They would go clean the men's bathroom — the only bathroom — and then stand guard for her. That's how much they liked her."

On the UMass campus, Hayes excelled at her job in the Lederle Graduate Research Center, charming coworkers and administrators alike with her "unflappable," warm personality and dry wit.

"She was an incredibly pleasant person to be around. She could take any situation, get rid of the stress and make it a moment to smile," said Lila M. Gierasch, department head. "Everybody was so incredibly stunned and sad when we found out."

"She loved her job," said Maureen Zak. "She came home and said she was on top of the world and every day was better than the last."

In her honor, the Biochemistry and Molecular Biology department set up The Jessica Hayes Scholarship Fund. Awarded as an endowment, it will be given to a woman pursuing a career in the

See HAYES on page A11

Public law school wins trustee votes

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Provisions are now underway to merge the Southern New England School of Law with the University of Massachusetts; creating the first ever public law school in the state.

During a vote with the Board of Trustees just three days before the Christmas holiday, the merge gained overwhelming support from SNESL faculty and students, state trustess and UMass members according to Ryan Benharris a current law student and alum of the University of Massachusetts Amherst.

"UMass was elected to merge with SNESL on December 21," Benharris said. "It is the first public law school in the state of Massachusetts. The Board of Trustees voted 12-2 to merge with the school, the support was overwhelming, over 100 people showed up including several local legislators, UMass students and SNESL students and faculty."

He also added that Massachusetts was only one of five states in the country not to offer a public law school.

"This is absolutely wonderful," he said. "[UMass] has such a prominent name, everyone knows UMass, it is a crucial time for this to happen."

Benahrris noted that it is important that the state recognizes the importance of public law because with the number of IV league institutions offering law schools in the state, often times public law can be overlooked.

"We're so focused on private institutions," Benharris said, "people ask, 'we're in Massachusetts, why do we need a public law school?' it's a no brainer."

People who are involved in the merger plan to finalize the process after meeting with the Board of Higher Education in mid February, after that, according to Benharris, the merge will be complete.

"We are still waiting to make a pitch in front of the Board of Higher Education," he said, "if the vote is in

See LAW on page A9

Missing student's parents angry over police investigation

Missing UMass student Maura Murray poses with her father, Fred Murray, last Feb. while vacationing in the White Mountains before her disappearance.

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

It has been almost one year since University of Massachusetts junior Maura Murray vanished without a trace. As her family and friends continue to hope and pray for her safe return, they have also expressed anger with the New Hampshire State Police who allegedly botched the investigation.

The 21-year-old nursing student from Hanson packed up her belongings in her Kennedy Hall dorm room on Feb. 9, 2004. In recent months, the Murray family has discovered that police have made several critical errors in the investigation, and allegedly lied to the news media.

At approximately 7 p.m. on Feb. 9, Maura was driving on route 112 in Haverhill, NH, police said. As she was trying to negotiate a curve, her car slid off the road.

According to witnesses, after the crash Maura appeared to be frightened, but physically unharmed. A passing school bus driver stopped and asked Maura if she needed help, but she refused saying she had already called "Triple A" from her cell phone. However, there was no cell phone service in that area. The bus driver said he drove a short distance to his home and called police, but Maura had left the scene before they arrived. It looked as if she had disappeared into the cold night.

Neither the New Hampshire State Police nor Haverhill Police questioned anybody who lived in the vicinity of where Maura was last seen until 36 hours after her disappearance. This is just one in a series of critical errors that has angered the Murray family.

In a June interview with WCVB-TV, the police officer in charge of the investigation, Lt. John Scarinza of the New Hampshire State Police, Troop F, claimed that authorities had found a note in Maura's dorm room that she had wrote to her boyfriend, Army Lt. Billy Rausch of Ohio, indicating troubles in their relationship.

"Sometime between Sunday and Monday morning, she packed up all her belongings in her dorm room, to include

See MURRAY on page A10

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor-in-Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Marzelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Meghan Heals
Assistant Managing Editors Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Bunock
Calendar Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Yousef Munayyer
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthenes
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Assistant Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Kuggens
Front Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Frecaut
Human Resources Sandra Marquez
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Accountant Josh Greenberg
Assistant Treasurer Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Typist Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Adviser Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst. Arts & Living Chris Gazzara
Associate Editor Allison Edles
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brunner
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts Amherst semester by Collegian Corporation, an independent nonprofit organization operating entirely without University funds. In 1890 the paper began as Sunset Light. Became the College Signal in 1891, the Weekly Collegian in 1914, and the Daily Collegian in 1958. Published continuously since 1890. The Collegian has not endorsed any candidate since 1994. For rates and information, call 545-3500.

University officials say SPIRE system should be ready for class registration

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts officials say they don't expect SPIRE, the self-portal system that provides students with online access to class schedules and registration, to suffer another crash during this week's start of the spring semester.

The system shutdown the day before first day of classes on last fall, leaving many students and faculty unable to access class schedules, housing and course enrollment. The malfunction was blamed mostly on a user overload that taxed the software.

Ed Blaguszewski, director of the UMass News and Information Office, says the system has been fully tested by the Office of Information Technologies since last fall.

"They have tested it thoroughly and are hopeful that they have anticipated potential problems," he said. "The real test will be [this] week."

"We have made a lot of changes and done a lot of load testing," said Heidi Dollard, director of the Administrative Computing Support Organization. "I think we're going to be fine."

Blaguszewski said there were several causes for the system's malfunction last year, namely the system's inability to respond to the increased load of users during the first few days of the semester. A large number of users forgot their password that enabled them to access SPIRE, and requested the system to help. This number was larger than officials had anticipated.

When the system fails, no previous data is "lost" or completely inaccessible. Information such as class times and housing assignments are contained within a major database, which is accessible by administrators.

MEGAN BRUNNER/COLLEGIAN

A UMass student registers for spring classes on the SPIRE system. University officials say they don't expect the system to crash during class registration this spring.

"This is an extremely complex system if you think of all the information and how much data it processes," said Blaguszewski. "It is an effective and impressive system for the most part, but there were some problems."

The system experienced high traffic during the class registration period in December and performed well, but students should still be prepared in case of a malfunction. Last year, many students were registered for classes, but unable to access their schedules from the system. Many were also confused by rumors that classes were canceled, which Blaguszewski says should be ignored.

"People really should not make that presumption unless they see it in an official e-mail," said Blaguszewski.

The OIT homepage posts routine updates on the status of SPIRE as well as other announcements. Students should check for their UMail accounts for e-mails updates from school officials. Also, a list of classes and locations can be found on the registrars Web site (www.umass.edu/registrar).

Finally, students should make a hard copy of their classes ahead of time.

"Print out your schedule!" said Blaguszewski. "We hope and expect you won't need it, but have a backup available."

Hearing today for UMass murder

The man on trial for the murder of a University of Massachusetts student last semester will return to court today for his probable cause hearing.

Bryan Johnston a 22 year old criminal justice major at Westfield State Collge is being accused of the murder of Senior Building Materials and Wood Technology major David C. Sullivan. Johnston and Sullivan, who according to high school friends were "well-liked" allegedly had a disagreement in the hours leading up to the shooting.

Johnston allegdly shot Sullivan three or four times a his Meadow Street apartment in Amherst early Dec. 7, 2004. Police declared Johnston a suspect after they found a weapon that matched the one used in the murder near the Connecticut River. Johnston admitted himself into a hospital hours after the murder claiming that he was mentally incapable of standing trial. The courts deemed his condition okay for his arraignment on Dec. 9, but the case has been continued until today.

Johnston plead innocent to one count of murder since his arraignment and has since been held in Hadley House of Correction without bail.

Police and authorities have no leads or motives in the case.

Although UMass is not involved with the investigation students, faculty and administrators are deeply sadened and shocked at the incident.

"Obviously we're deeply saddened at any time a member of the UMass family loses his life," said Vice Chancellor of Student Affais and Campus Life. "It's double daunting because he's so young. He had his whole life in front of him," he told the Massachusetts Daily Collegian last December.

—Julie O'Donnell

Provost encourages Univ. Outreach program

By Casey Novak
Collegian Staff

Dr Sharon Tross Vice Provost for University Outreach at the University of Massachusetts, spoke on the importance of public universities being engaged in their states and communities, as she addressed the Faculty Senate at their final meeting this past December, before the University's winter break.

Tross, who joined University Outreach this past September, discussed the national definition of outreach and how it differs at other universities versus how it's been defined here.

"Outreach organizations have become increasingly important to flagship universities, especially in the last decade," Tross said. "And they really are the part of the university that allows it to be accessible to external constituencies, such as public businesses, industries, and government organizations."

States look to public universities to be engaged with them, she said, which is why other universities are ensuring that their presence be felt by the surrounding community.

"UMass has elements of that, by having an Outreach organization and a Faculty Outreach Council and the like, but it hasn't been as fully developed as it is at other universities," Tross said. "So what I'm doing in this initial assessment is looking at the strength of the programming and the strength of the University in order to bring those strengths together to create a comprehensive

See SENATE on page A8

Doctor Sharon Tross.

Production Crew
On staff today

Night Editor
Mike Marzelli
Photo Technician
Alex Demosthenes
Copy Editor
Meghan Heals
Production Supervisor
Cory Rosenberg
Production Staff
Samantha Nielsen, Richel Bruno, Jen Zeliga, Molly Eggleston

Located in Hampshire Mall near Dick's Sporting Goods

EST. 1969 Ground Round GRILL & BAR
Route 9, Hadley
(413) 582-0017

EST. 1969 Ground Round GRILL & BAR $5.00 off
A MINIMUM $20 FOOD PURCHASE.

Offer good towards your next purchase. Non-Negotiable. Valid at participating Ground Round restaurants only. Present this coupon to your server. Not valid with any other offer. One coupon per party. No cash value. Does not include tax, gratuity or alcohol. Coupon not for resale. Coupon will not be honored if reproduced. Offer expires 2/17/05.
2005 Ground Round, I.O.C. LLC • www.groundround.com.

Over 50 shops, restaurants, and department stores!

Hampshire Mall
Route 9, Hadley
(413) 586-5700

Opening March 2005!
Dick's Sporting Goods • Best Buy • Endless Communications

Now Open!
Target • JCPenney • Trader Joe's • CineMark Theatres • Ground Round
Bath & Body Works • American Eagle Outfitters • Pacific Sunwear
Aeropostale • Hot Topic • Kay Jewelers • Radio Shack

Open Mon-Sat 10am-9pm; Sun 11am-6pm • Online www.hampshiremall.com

World reacts to tsunami devastation

Californians to aid victims

By Caitlin Jennings
Collegian Correspondent

SAN FRANCISCO— Though the immense natural disaster of the Asia tsunami has affected all of America, it has especially hit a Californian nerve. Although California and Thailand are two different worlds in many regards, they also have quite a bit in common. Samantha Duvall, a San Francisco native and Boston University student was in Thailand, north of the disaster, when the tsunami hit.

Duvall returned home safe from her trip, describing pre-tsunami Thailand as "California in different cloths." Like Thailand, much of California's economy, identity and way of life depend very heavily on the sea. Also, the San Francisco Bay area has far from forgotten the earthquake of 1989 in which hundreds of lives and homes were lost to an environmental force.

The similarities between Thailand and California have made the recent disaster more of a reality for California's youth and have thus urged many to come to the aid of the victims.

"My friends and I surf pretty much every day after school," said University of California Santa Barbara student Katie Zuppan.

"The situation in Thailand is the epitome of my worst nightmare . . . I can really feel the terror of the people on the beach that day".

Zuppan has translated her feelings into a productive force and has been devoting many hours to The UCSB Tsunami Response Force, a program recently set up at her school.

Like UC Santa Barbara, many California colleges have set up programs to help Thailand. Megi Lammotte, a student of UC Davis, helps run the UCD Tsunami Relief Task Force.

Lammotte said that the student run foundation has gained a great amount of support in a comparably short amount of time. One of the foundation's tactics in gaining support is to relay specific loses to put a face to the problem.

Japanese compare tsunami's destruction to country's recent earthquake off coast

By Melissa Blanksteen
Collegian Staff

TOKYO— During last month's tsunami in Southeast Asia, the International Christian University, located in the western suburbs of Tokyo, Japan, had two exchange students directly involved in the disaster who have returned to school safely. The tsunami has not yet invoked any student-driven charities but has altered many perspectives on campus.

"I think they are dealing with it very well," Zenora Rackham, ICU counselor for overseas students and teacher at the ICU high school, said of the two students involved. "They've talked about it, they have written about it, they've talked to their families about it."

According to Rackham, the students were in Thailand when they saw the tsunami coming and ran up a nearby hill. Friends living in the area allowed them to stay while they recovered from their ordeal.

"We have been really lucky," she said. "When I think of it, students often go there during the holidays."

Last year, Rackham said, 20 students visited the country during break. University officials say they do not know of any Japanese students affected.

Thailand Is a popular tourist destination for many ICU regular and exchange students because of its proximity and because it is often much cheaper to travel there than within Japan.

ICU returned to session on Jan. 6, but, as of mid-January, no charities except from the on-campus church have been started.

Jun Hasegawa, the International Student Advisor, has sent out an e-mail to the student body, consisting of fewer than 3,000 students, to ask if anyone needed help or if anyone had any ideas how ICU could help victims.

"We have had a very big earthquake in Niigata," Hasegawa said in an interview, speaking of the 6.6 magnitude earthquake on Oct. 23, 120 miles northwest of Tokyo. "Many in the student body were willing to help those people by receiving donations and going there to help."

"We haven't had anyone asking to go there [Southeast Asia] to help the affected people," he said. "The University doesn't recommend that because another disaster might come."

There are several reasons why ICU has yet to reach out and respond to the tsunami disaster.

Rackham said that it is still too early for students to react because school just returned to session. She said that some on-campus clubs might be planning something.

Tomoko Ishikawa, a 22-year-old ICU student, thought news coverage was partly to blame.

"You see it on the news but they don't show much," she said. "I watch CNN or BBC to see what really happened."

"The [Niigata] earthquake is more close to us than the tsunami," ICU student Mayumi Nakagawa, 19, said. "We have to focus on Niigata I think. There are 21 dead Japanese over there for tourist reasons."

Nakagawa also felt that people in Japan might be too used to earthquakes themselves. The recent tsunami has also just served as a reminder that an earthquake might happen to Tokyo soon as well, something that many are talking about.

See JAPAN on page A13

Dutch mourn the loss of life

By Nicole Vreeman
Collegian Staff

AMSTERDAM— On Jan. 5 at noon, Holland fell still. Prime Minister Jan Peter Balkenende and other members of the government gathered in The Hague. Balkenende held a speech followed by three minutes of silence-- a silence heard in the whole country. Classes stopped, trains, busses, trams and even planes that were supposed to take off came to a halt. All the television stations showed the same images and all the radio stations seemed to be nonexistent for those three minutes. Cars, bicycles and people walking in the street stopped in their tracks. Even the busiest place in Holland, Schiphol International Airport, stopped. The silence was intense.

On Jan. 6, a radio station was created called RADIO 555 (named after the bank account number to which donations for tsunami victims could be made). DJ's and radio hosts from all different radio stations joined their efforts and presented their programs on that one station all day.

Listeners could call and request a song for 1.50 Euros or text message their request for the same price. All the money was for tsunami-stricken Asia.

On Jan.1, the Dutch Queen said in her New Year's speech: "Saying Happy New Year just seems like an absurd thing to do right now."

Two women charged with raping female

NORTHAMPTON— Two women including one Smith College student were arrested on several charges of raping and assaulting a 20-year-old female earlier this month according to authorities.

According to Detective Jody Kasper from the Northampton Police Department, the victim was assaulted and raped between 7 p.m. and 4 a.m. on Jan. 14 to 15. The victim then reportedly went to the station where she was then transported to Cooley Dickinson Hospital where she was treated and released.

"She had lacerations on her body caused by a knife. She also had bite marks and bruises throughout her body."

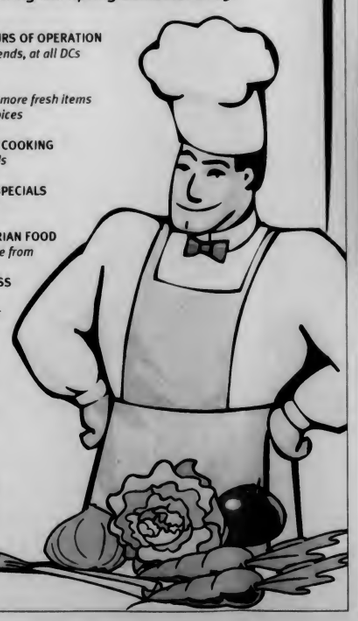
The name of the victim has not been released.

The two other women are identified as Smith College student Augusta C. Kendall and friend Rachel A. Klobertanz, both 22 of Northampton.

Kendall and Klobertanz were arrested and arraigned Tuesday, Jan. 17 at Northampton District Court. The pair pleaded not guilty to charges of assault and battery with a deadly weapon and rape.

Northampton District Court Judge W. Michael Goggins set bail at $2,500 cash or $25,000 surety for Klobertanz and Kendall during their arraignments. According to the district court, Kendall was released on bail the following morning.

The case will be continued to Feb. 8, 2005 according to the Northampton District Court.



—Julie O'Donnell

Rent One of Ours
No additional fee for 21–25 year old drivers
POTTERS
• Cars
• Passenger Vans
• Trucks
• Direct Billing to Insurance Companies
• Free Local Pick Up
• Locally Owned and Operated
at North Amherst Motors
Collision Repair Center
549-RENT (7368)
75 Sunderland Road, North Amherst, MA 01059
www.northamherstmotors.com
On Bus Route • One Mile North of UMass

SPRING 2005
To the World's Best Customers

At UMass Dining Services, we are always cookin' up something. Here is what we are planning to bring you during the Spring Semester 2005:

- ✓ EXTENDED HOURS OF OPERATION including weekends, at all DCs
- ✓ NEW MENUS featuring many more fresh items and healthy choices
- ✓ MORE DISPLAY COOKING daily at all meals
- ✓ MORE THEME SPECIALS that you desire
- ✓ MORE VEGETARIAN FOOD options to chose from
- ✓ TASTE OF UMASS in April at the Mullin's Center

DINING SERVICES UMassAmherst
NO ARTIFICIAL YCMP

Where Does Your Money Go?

Your money matters.
A dollar spent here, stays here:
shop your local textbook store.
Better for your wallet.
Better for your community.

JAN 22-FEB 6
8:30-8 MON-SAT
12-5 SUN

JEFFERY AMHERST COLLEGE STORE
Downtown Amherst
Behind the Jeffery Amherst Bookshop
253.7816
textbooks@jeffbooks.com

A Member of the National Association of College Stores

HEALTH EDUCATION WANTS YOU!

GET INVOLVED! MAKE A DIFFERENCE!

CALL 577-5181 FOR MORE INFORMATION ON ANY OF THESE PROGRAMS.

SEEKING VOLUNTEERS:

1. FRESH & SOBER

Fresh & Sober is an anonymous recovery-based student support program for UMass students recovering or seeking recovery from alcohol and/or other drugs. This program can benefit any student who is questioning their alcohol and/or drug use who would like a non-judgmental person to talk with, any student who would like more information about recovery and Alcoholics Anonymous, and already in the fellowship of AA who would like to offer their experience, strength and hope to others. Call Diane at 577-5188. All calls, conversations and inquiries are confidential.

2. NOT READY FOR BEDTIME PLAYERS

The Not Ready for Bedtime Players is a student theater troupe that performs on campus on Wednesday evenings throughout the academic year with opportunities for special performances. Our lively and entertaining skits address sex, masturbation, coming out, relationship violence and much more. Check the UMass events calendar for our schedule. Call 577-5181 for more information.

3. ALANA HEALTH EDUCATION AND OUTREACH

The purpose of the ALANA Health Outreach and Education program is to support students of color to access health care at University Health Services, raise awareness about health issues and concerns that impact ALANA communities, promote healthy lifestyles, and provide advocacy, education and referral. This is done through customized workshops, educational forums, consultation, and leadership development. Call Rani or Jamielle at 577-5068 for details.

4. THE WOMEN'S HEALTH PROJECT

Come and be a part of a group that educates students at UMass and the surrounding communities on issues that affect women! The Women's Health Project conducts weekly workshops on contraception in the residence halls, sponsors the clothesline project, breast health workshops and UMass Orgasm Week, all while having a great time! Independent study credits available. Come to our meetings every Thursday at 7:00 p.m. in UHS Room 302. Call Cherry at 577-5182 for details.

5. HEALTH REACH INTERNATIONAL (HRI)

HRI helps international students, scholars and their families to stay healthy while facilitating easier access to the health services offered at UMass by providing information, organizing and presenting workshops on health related topics, and networking and collaborating with other organizations to address the concerns of international students. For more information, call Yeshi or Tom at 577-5168 or 577-5133.

6. THE STUDENT HEALTH ADVISORY BOARD (SHAB)

SHAB is the officially recognized voice of the student body in matters pertaining to UHS, and participates in the planning, financing, implementation and evaluation of student health programs. SHAB provides input into the recruiting of health professionals, reviews and makes recommendations regarding the Student Health Trust Fund and the Supplemental Health Benefits Program, and serves as a liaison to other student organizations. Come to our first meeting of the semester, Monday, January 31, 4:30 p.m. in UHS 302. Call Tom (577-5133) for details.

7. HEALTHY EATING/ HEALTHY BODIES

Nutritionists are seeking students interested in supporting others on ways to eat healthy while on campus and feel good about their bodies. Students majoring in Nutrition, Exercise Science and Public Health, or those with a strong interest in these fields are encouraged to call or email Caren Weiner 577-5174 (cweiner@uhs.umass.edu) or Arleen Thomson 577-5171 (athomson@uhs.umass.edu).

OTHER SERVICES:

Health Education will be happy to meet with individuals or groups to discuss any health related topic. Come to our offices on the 3rd floor of UHS to obtain information on contraception, safer sex alcohol, drugs, stress or any health topic.

Call 577 5181 for more information about these topics or any of the services listed below.

NEW! THE CENTER FOR ALCOHOL AND OTHER DRUG PREVENTION
Housed in Health Education at UHS, this new service is for all members of the UMass community. Its mission is to create a campus environment that supports responsible decision-making about alcohol consumption and to decrease incidents of high risk drinking among UMass students. Services include training, education, individual assessment, support of alcohol free activities, online education courses, and much more. Watch for more details coming soon. Call Sally or Diane at 577-5181 for more information.

AHEP (THE ATHLETIC HEALTH ENHANCEMENT PROGRAM)
Provides information and education to student athletes.

ANONYMOUS HIV ANTIBODY TESTING
Call 577 5126 to make an appointment for anonymous testing.

CONTRACEPTION EDUCATION
Classes are offered Wednesday evenings in room 302 of UHS and Monday evenings in the residence halls. Contact Health Ed for additional dates and times.

MEN'S HEALTH PROGRAMS
Workshops on topics such as Sexual Health, Body Image, Masculinity, and more. Please come to an initial planning meeting to form a Men Against Violence RSO on February 2, 7pm, Campus Center 165-9. Call 577 5133 for more information.

NUTRITION SERVICES
Nutritionists are on staff to meet with students individually to discuss concerns about eating, proper diet and weight loss. Please call 577-5314 to schedule an appointment at UHS.

PEER HEALTH EDUCATORS
Earn 6 credits while learning and educating others about alcohol, drugs and much more in this year-long course. Call Sally at 577-5181 for details.

TOBACCO TREATMENT SERVICES
Assistance to quit smoking. Individual and Group Sessions. Presentations. Please call 577-5133.

VOICES AGAINST VIOLENCE
Committed to working with the UMass community to address violence in all its forms, with a particular focus on men's violence against women. Voices Against Violence utilizes a bystander approach to violence prevention and regards student participants not as potential perpetrators or victims, but as empowered bystanders who can confront abusive/violent peers. Peer educators wanted. Academic credit available. Call Tom at 577-5133.

UMassAmherst

University Health Services • Health Education Division
150 Infirmary Way (third floor) • 577-5181 •
www.umass.edu/uhs

UMass President's office, Alumni Club moving to new Boston building

By Dan O'Brien and Hirak Shah
Collegian Staff

Building plans for the University of Massachusetts Amherst alumni club in downtown Boston are going ahead as scheduled, according to UMass President Jack Wilson's office.

The new club — complete with an upscale dining room, a fitness center, plush arm chairs and a view of Boston Harbor — is part of the University's plan to join the ranks of private schools that use similar methods to increase loyalty and pride among graduates.

"I'm very excited about the response we've received from alumni and pleased there will be a UMass club where members can connect with classmates and connect with the University," said Wilson on the UMass Web site.

Universities that already include such upscale accommodations for alumni include Harvard University and Boston College, allowing members access to a vast network of people.

The alumni club is expected to open next summer. It will occupy over 20,000 square feet on the 33rd floor of the State Street Bank building on Franklin St. The old club was located at One Beacon St. and was a symbol of excess by former UMass President William Bulger.

At Bulger's old location, rent was $1.1 million per year. Wilson's new club will only cost $552,000 for the first year, saving the University $900,000.

The UMass administrative offices will also be moving to the State Street Building, but on the less glamorous 12th floor, into 7,640 square feet of office space. That move is supposed to occur on the second year of the lease, with an annual rent of about $1,012,000. The cost is expected to save $470,000 in rent and utilities than the cost at One Beacon.

Wilson's spokesperson Robert Connolly told the Associated Press that rent would be locked in at roughly $500,000 per year for the next ten years.

According the UMass News Service the move, "from One Beacon St., where the President's Office has leased more than 30,000 square feet since 1997, is expected to save more than $5.1 million over the next 10 years. The current rent at One Beacon is $1.1 million, and an increase of $314,600 had been proposed for 2005-2006."

Unlike the administrative offices, the alumni club will be funded entirely by membership fees and dues, said Executive Director of Alumni Affairs Robert Goodhue. He added that no tuition money or state funds would be used to pay for the club.

A one-time initiation fee will be less than $1,000 and dues will be less than $100 for members.

UMass officials went forward with the idea of an alumni club after surveying 14,500 alumni last year. The survey indicated a strong show of support for the club idea; one-quarter of those surveyed said they would join the club if it opened. Goodhue also said a strong number of people have been turning out to the alumni breakfasts over the past four years.

There are about 220,000 UMass alumni living in Massachusetts, with 160,000 living within the I-495 corridor.

"The majority of the UMass alumni live in Eastern Massachusetts," Goodhue said. "The biggest problem for them is finding a way to relate to UMass. Right now they can look at the sports scores, but they don't have a tangible way to relate to the university."

Other public universities that have started alumni clubs in other parts of the country include University of Georgia in Athens, Florida State University and University of North Carolina. One of the more elegant clubs is at Florida State University, which is housed in its football stadium with two rooftop patios that can hold 1,000 fans.

The seven-year-old Boston College alumni club has widely been considered a success. It has currently attracted over 2,450 members with a waitlist of over 100 people. Membership fees are around $800 per person. After the costs to maintain the club are covered, the remaining fees are used towards a B.C. scholarship fund.

COURTESY UMASS.EDU

The State Street Building is the new site for the UMass President's Office.

The Harvard University club has two locations: a main clubhouse, with guest rooms and an athletic center, on Commonwealth Avenue in Boston, and a downtown club with an elegant skyscraper dining room on Federal St. Annual dues are $1,200, or less for students and senior citizens.

UMass officials acknowledge that they expect more donations to UMass and its alumni club once relationships between alumni club members grow.

Sri Lankan faculty member raising funds

TSUNAMI AID from page A1

they were okay."

After two anxious days, Sahabdeen finally was able to connect with them through a phone call. He said the Third World phone lines in the country were saturated and overwhelmed, much like they were in the U.S. during Sept. 11.

Although his parents were unharmed, his wife, who is also Sri Lankan, has 15 family members who are still unaccounted for.

"One of her cousins was married with three kids. He survived but his family didn't," said Sahabdeen. "A couple of her aunts living in the area made it but lost everything."

Sahabdeen says he has raised approximately $1,500 so far. He plans to ship many of the clothes to his father-in-law, who will distribute them directly to schools and orphanages.

"I want to help as much as I can. Thousands of children were displaced ... they're going to need help for a long time," he said.

With classes resuming this week, Sahabdeen says he hopes to work with interested students to organize fundraisers.

"It's going to be an ongoing process [throughout] the semester," he said.

The Smith College Staff Counsel in Northampton have joined forces with Sahabdeen by placing bins in 30 different places on campus to gather personal hygiene products from faculty members, such as toothbrushes and soap.

"We [heard] about Haneef and the staff wanted to something to help out ... as a gesture in the Five College Community," said Marti Hobbes, College Relations news assistant.

"Everyone could afford picking up some deodorant at CVS. It's a good way to help out."

Area student efforts

A night filled with beautiful images of Sri Lankan beaches, a speaker from the Red Cross, and delicious Sri Lankan desserts — all to raise money for disaster victims.

See TSUNAMI AID on page A13

Bustamante may not seek re-election

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association is revealing big plans to enhance requests from the student body as well as set perspective goals for the future of the SGA for the spring 2005 semester.

Jeff Napolitano, press secretary of relations for the SGA, told the Massachusetts Daily Collegian that President Eduardo Bustamante and his cabinet have been busy this winter break working on both long and short term goals.

Napolitano also mentioned that Bustamante and his running mate, student trustee Matthew Murphy, might not seek re-election this coming semester. Last April, Bustamante and Murphy were voted into the SGA overwhelmingly despite requests that the voting process was not fair.

Napolitano said the there is a "50-50" chance that Bustamante will run again, but he is also considering the future of the SGA and the leadership qualities that younger candidates may be able to learn and embrace for years to come.

"[Bustamante] knows that this is the best way to accomplish the goals for the student body, these goals may not be accomplished within a year or two or three — we need to build a sense of continuity," Napolitano said. "He is urging younger people to run, we want someone to be president who knows what they are doing — but," Napolitano added, "[Bustamante] still might run."

The SGA proposed many ideas last year, some of which are nearing completion. Others will be worked on continually over the next few years.

"We have made great progress with the [textbook rental program]," Napolitano said, "we have been working with Vice Chancellor Hatch and we met with the head of Follet, [the company that provides books to the textbook annex] Phil Olsen, and it's slow, but we're making progress, and we're making it easier for progress to be made in the future."

The SGA has proposed a textbook rental program for the University to eliminate the high costs of textbooks for students. Bustamante said he believes that this will increase the affordability and accessibility of the university.

"At the very least, whatever kind of rental system is going to exist in the fall — books will be cheaper for the student population," Napolitano said. He also encouraged that students turn to Books for Books in a "worst case scenario." Books for Books is a program run by students, for students, to offer a trade off for textbooks.

Members of the SGA have also been following up on a controversial issue from last year that now, according to Napolitano, is an active case in the state's attorney general's office.

Several requests were made last summer to the administration asking for certain specific information pertaining to statistics about UMass students. Some of the information was not given because of FERPA regulations, but some of the information that had been granted to past SGA members including current Graduate Student Senate President Uri Strauss, has been withheld, which has led some students to question the University's commitment to diversity.

During a weekly meeting last November, the Senate body voted 'no-confidence' in Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano because of his alleged involvement in withholding the information.

"We have not worked with Vice Chancellor Gargano, and the case against UMass is now at the Attorney General's office," Napolitano said. "UMass is still in violation with the department of records...there is a reasonable lack of accountability on behalf of the administration."

No Cals No Carbs

Last Call™
anti-hangover & nutritional drink

No Hangover

The All-Natural Anti-Hangover & Nutritional Drink

Last Call... a one-of-a-kind Natural beverage is specifically designed to alleviate fatigue and hangover symptoms by replenishing the body with a special formula consisting of specific, minerals and herbs.
Last Call... can be enjoyed BEFORE, DURING, OR AFTER consuming alcohol.
Last Call ... Makes a great mixer and comes in two delicious flavors -

Mango* and *Pina Colada

Last Call* WORKS!
Active ingredients include:

Vitamin B Complex (all B vitamins) - counteracts achy, sluggish and weak feeling resulting from workout or excess alcohol consumption.
Vitamin C - aids in breaking down alcohol.
Vitamin E - an antioxidant, which helps prevent cell damage.
Electrolytes - replenish the minerals that are depleted after a workout or alcohol consumption and aide with re-hydrating your body.
Ginseng - improves energy and vitality, particularly during times of fatigue or stress.
White Willow - is a natural pain reliever that does not interact with the liver.
Milk Thistle - a liver detoxifier and protectant.

Last Call is also a great ALL NATURAL alternative to sports and energy drinks

Last Call is available now at:
Liquors 44, Four Season's Liquors, Stoney's Pub, Holyoke Liquor Mart, Pop's Liquors, R&P Liquors and Niedbala's

Last Call is coming soon to your other favorite stores, restaurants and drinking establishments

Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more Information
Distributed By Baystate Beverage Distributors, Westfield, MA 413-642-0150

ONCE A YEAR SALE!
Amherst Drop Zone
ARMY/NAVY STORE
Route 9 • Hadley (227 Russell St.)
Just past the Registry
EVERYTHING IN STOCK
30% OFF!
4 DAYS ONLY
Thursday, Jan 27th to Sunday Jan 30th
Daily 9-8, Sunday 12-5
CLEARANCE!
DON'T MISS THIS HUGE SALE!

Little Black Dress

Grand Opening!

Saturday, Jan 29th
11:00am-6:00pm

"It! Jeans", Hot Kiss, Lani, Jewelry by Sebastian Mazzarelli, and much more!

Drawings, Giveaways, and Discounts!
Gift Bags featuring
SOUPer BOWL, Hair East, Summa Massage

413 253 7727
98 N. Pleasant St.
Amherst, MA 01002

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 26, 2005

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

New law school a plus for UMass

The University of Massachusetts will soon be welcoming a new expansion to their institution with the addition of a law school. This law school, former Southern New England School of Law in Dartmouth, will be the first public law school and has become a very high priority for the University as a whole and rightly so. Having a law school join the UMass community is an excellent step in the right direction to help expand the opportunities available to students all while maintaining public state university costs.

Such a move like this is only to be expected given the previous expansions made by other major universities and UMass as well. Typically higher education at the post-undergraduate level is extremely costly, especially given the amount of money previously spent on obtaining an undergraduate degree. By having a law school that is part of a public state university, students will be able to obtain the same quality education as more well-known private universities that cost twice as much.

While many state universities have a very high student population, the addition of a law school brings up the issue of selectivity among students. The majority of students that attend state universities are, naturally, students from that particular state. In addition, there are a fair amount of tax-payer dollars that go into funding the state schools. Therefore, those state universities have obligations to those tax payers when it comes to in-state student admissions.

As a result of the majority of students being accepted not solely on their academic achievements but on their in-state status as well, there is an issue of competitiveness among the applicants. One way the new proposed law school will combat that stereotype is by keeping its size small compared to the other mainstream law schools as well as the other UMass campuses. According to "In The Loop," a UMass online newsletter sent out to staff and faculty, the new law school located at the UMass Dartmouth campus will have an enrollment cap of 585 students. Given the fact that so few students will be admitted to the school in the first place, it further enforces the importance of academic achievement and competitiveness.

"Three decades ago, another UMass board had the wisdom and foresight to create the University of Massachusetts Medical School, now recognized as one of the best medical schools in the country. We look forward to working with our friends throughout the Commonwealth to make the University of Massachusetts School of Law the next jewel in the University's crown," said James J. Karam, Chairman of the Board of Trustees, in the "In The Loop" newsletter. Having seen the success of the UMass Medical School in Worcester alone, there is every reason to believe that the new UMass law school will be a much welcomed addition to the UMass community.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

Peaceniks sickening

Ben Duffy

I don't get a lump in my throat when I see white dove and olive branch imagery. Maybe it's because I understand that sometimes war has justification. Maybe it's because "peace" has become a more palatable codeword for "defeat," which is what some peace activists really want. Or maybe it's because some insidious characters have hijacked the images and vocabulary of pacifism.

Recently, the German news program "Panorama" did a story concerning the "Ten Euros for the Iraqi Resistance" fundraising drive. As one might expect, the movement is an effort to funnel money to the same Iraqi guerillas that are shooting election workers, beheading civilians, bombing police stations, and killing allied soldiers.

The "Ten Euros" campaign is the pet project of a group calling itself Campo Antiimperilista. Campo writes on its Web site, "... for the oppressed peoples the resistance is a dream. They hope that one day the occupants will be forced to leave not only from Iraq. We share this hope and want to support it with our militant solidarity." They encourage "all the anti-imperialists who oppose the American Empire" to start an "international collection of funds supporting the Iraqi national resistance movement."

To the benefit of Campo Antiimperilista, they make no claims to pacifism. Revolting as they might be, at least they're forthright about their intentions. But the "Panorama" story then interviewed Joachim Guilliard, a member of the Heidelberg Forum "gegen Militarismus und Krieg" (Heidelberg Forum against Militarism and War). The Heidelberg Forum was raising money for the "Ten Euros" campaign, and Mr. Guilliard commented about the resistance in Iraq: "Resistance, also military resistance against the occupiers, is naturally legitimate. This has no relation to terrorism." An unnamed "peace activist" in the story noted that "I support the Iraqi resistance even if it is run by people who used to support Saddam Hussein ...I have nothing against that."

I wonder what they would think if I started a campaign to kill them. We could call it "Ten Dollars for the Death of Joachim Guilliard." Shoot a peace activist, save a soldier.

Apparently the Heidelberg Forum sees nothing incongruous between peace and armed resistance. Clearly, "peace" has taken on a new meaning that I can't find anywhere in my dictionary.

I'm ashamed to say that these monsters come from the German city of Heidelberg, a place very close to my heart. I lived there for more than two years, and I fell in love with it. In fact, after looking at their flyers and banners, I discovered that I was acquainted with this group already.

I encountered their propaganda all over the city in the run up to the war. I remember their "Krieg ist immer Terror" (War is always terror) banner that they carried on their marches toward the US/NATO headquarters at Campbell Barracks. I guess they were kidding when they said "War is always terror." After all, they've already said that military resistance "has no relation to terrorism."

I also remember the day I dropped by one of their protests. I didn't cause a scene, but rather I went to observe and to listen. I sat a few feet away from the protestors as they had their pathetic rally and yelled their tired catchphrases at the gates of Campbell Barracks. One man tried to recruit me into the rally, but I wasn't having any of it. I was too nauseous to protest. What really made me sick were the recreational and social aspects of the rally. Even as they were feigning outrage, they couldn't hide their glee.

Protesting was a form of entertainment for these people. Several of the protestors looked old enough to be veterans of 1960s' radical causes, which made me wonder if the protest was some sort of midlife crisis. There is nothing like screeching nonsense into a bullhorn to make an aging flower child feel young again.

But this organization no longer makes me nauseous. It makes me furious. Now that I know about their participation in the "Ten Euros" campaign, I look back on that event in a new light. The "peace activists" of that day thought nothing of funding people who once tried to kill me on the banks of the Tigris. I have nothing but contempt for them.

I wonder what they would think if I started a campaign to kill them. We could call it "Ten Dollars for the Death of Joachim Guilliard." Shoot a peace activist, save a soldier. Of course I don't advocate any such thing, but I wonder what Herr Guilliard might think if he found out that someone was bankrolling AK-47 toting thugs who wanted to kill him.

In my outrage, I've fired off a series of letters to people who should be doing something about this. I seem to remember that Germany was our "ally", wholly united in our fight against terror, and that they had promised to freeze the funds of terrorist organizations. And yet the Heidelberg Forum continues to operate out in the open, with complete impunity. I want action on this immediately, so I'm petitioning the German government to do something about it, and the U.S. government to put pressure the German government. I've written to my congressman, Secretary of State Colin Powell, and the American ambassador to Germany, Daniel R. Coats. I encourage all of my readers to do the same. The more voices of outrage, the better.

In the alternate universe in which we live, our "allies" won't lift a finger to stop the funding of our enemies, and "peace activists" are fundraising for militant Ba'athists and al-Zarqawi's Al-Qa'eda ... so much for the dove and olive branch.

Ben Duffy is a Collegian columnist.

A conscience scarred

Yousef Munayyer

"Don't cheerleaders all over America form pyramids six to eight times a year?"

This was the response given by Guy Womack, attorney for Charles Graner, in defense of a photo of naked Iraqi prisoners piled on top of each other with bags over their heads. Graner, a reservist, was found in the incriminating and now infamous photographs from Abu Ghraib.

Womack's comment is the epitome of everything that is wrong with Abu Ghraib. He perpetuates the torture of American values, the same values that every soldier carries into battle, and the same values that allow many leaders to sleep at night. Still this is just the tip of the iceberg.

In December of last year the American Civil Liberties Union requested the release of countless documents relating to the treatment of prisoners at the Guantanamo Bay (GTMO) facility where prisoners from the "war on terror" are being kept with out trial. By the first week of the year the FBI complied with the request permitting the release of emails, memos, and various other documents between several organizations tied into the prisoners at GTMO. The results were disturbing, yet after the photos, which leaked from Abu Ghraib, it is hard to be shocked.

Documents shed light on several abuses at GTMO as well as miscommunication between officials in the FBI and the Department of Defense, allegations of sexual assault, and of course the abuse of prisoners.

A November 2003 report documented, "information concerning the impersonation by DOD at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba who represented themselves as officials of the FBI in conjunction with interrogation techniques not endorsed by the FBI."

In GTMO it has come to the point where the "techniques" used are so illegal that the FBI is making sure to wash its hands clean of it. In this instance department of defense personnel falsely identified themselves as FBI officers and proceeded to use torturous tactics to extract information.

Another undated report submitted by the FBI and labeled "FBI Background" regarding the treatment of detainees at Abu Ghraib and GTMO detailed other cases of abuse. FBI agents noted the following:

"A detainee's mouth was duct taped for chanting the Koran; detainee had long hair and a beard, military employee who applied the duct tape found it amusing."

"Detainees being subjected to considerable pain and very aggressive techniques during interrogations."

"Detainees being threatened (either personally or orally) by dogs."

Humiliation was the goal. Alone in a room a detainee sat, draped in an Israeli flag, with music blaring and lights flashing.This humiliation highlights the insensitivity and incompetence with which the "war on terror" is being conducted.

An FBI official also filed a witness report, labeled "sensitive but not classified," dated July 30, 2004 regarding "techniques" that were witnessed at GTMO. Having heard loud noises coming form an interrogation room she peered inside and noticed "a detainee sitting on the floor of an interrogation room with an Israeli flag draped around him, loud music being played, and a strobe light flashing." The eyewitness statement was concluded with, "I understood prior to deployment to GTMO, that such techniques were not allowed, nor approved by FBI policy."

Humiliation was the goal. Alone in a room a detainee sat, draped in an Israeli flag, with music blaring and lights flashing. This humiliation highlights the insensitivity and incompetence with which the "war on terror" is being conducted.

Another document, a letter sent by the Deputy Assistant Director of the Counterterrorism Division to Major General Donald Ryder at the Army's Criminal Investigation Command on July 14, 2004.

This detailed letter describes the abuse of detainees and one particular abuse that capture the humiliation and insensitivity of the torturous interrogations. An unnamed FBI agent recalls looking over an interrogation room through a two way mirror between the interrogation room and the observation room. The female interrogator duct taped the curtain inside the room over the mirror. The interrogation was still viewed through the camera in the room even though the interrogator had placed her body between the camera and the detainee. The detainee was seen grimacing and pulling away against the restraints. The interrogator later indicated that she had grabbed his genitals. The FBI agent filing the report notes that this was during Ramadan a time when, "physical contact with a woman would have been particularly offensive to a Moslem male."

The rest of the report details a detainee's reaction to isolation in a room that was constantly filled with high intensity light. The agent noted that this resulted in psychological trauma including the detainee talking to non-existent people, talking to his self, and crouching the corner of a room covered in a sheet for hours.

These documents, which follow the horrifying photographs at Abu Ghraib, further detail the interrogation "techniques" that are being used to extract information which seems to be non-existent. This must shake our very moral foundation. Not because we fear for the treatment of captured soldiers. Not because we fear that this will strengthen the resistance against the American military occupation of Iraq. Not because we fear that for every detainee who is humiliated, beaten or tortured another bin Laden is born.

Though we should worry about all these things, the greatest infliction is the scar on the American conscience, the torture of our values; the rights of the human being. This is a scar we as a people will forever carry into battle in the "war on terror."

Yousef Munayyer is a Collegian editor.

Blogging the tsunami

Erin McNamee

There is so much to say about the recent tsunami disaster in Southeast Asia. I could write about President Bush's slow response to the situation in terms of aid and leadership, the outpouring of donations by the American public, or the need for us, Americans, to see this experience as a wake-up call in terms of being more aware of the rest of the world, but I know you've probably heard about that stuff to death by now. Instead, I'd like to discuss a relatively remarkable phenomenon I stumbled upon while searching the Web for a suitable charity to donate some pennies and pocket lint to: the role of "blogs" in creating awareness of the tsunami disaster.

Many blogs pertaining to the tsunami disaster have popped up in the last few weeks and thought some aren't worth your time, others provide a valuable undiluted look at the aftermath...

In case you live under a rock, blogs (short for "Web logs") are usually written and maintained by people wanting to publicize their opinions in hopes that total strangers will randomly stumble upon their Web space and become avid, loyal readers. While there are countless blogs ranging in subject from political musings to mundane personal details, some blogs are actually quite good and have a substantial readership, a feat that can often garner the author a shout-out in a major newspaper or a link off another prominent blog. Many blogs pertaining to the tsunami disaster have popped up in the last few weeks and though some aren't worth your time, others provide a valuable, undiluted look at the aftermath of the tsunami and serve as both a place to offer and seek help for those in need.

The most comprehensive blog I've found is called "The South-East Asia Earthquake and Tsunami Blog," (www.tsunamihelp.blogspot.com). Dubbed the "SEA-EAT Blog" for short, its highlights include personal accounts of the tsunami, a list of missing persons, photographs, opportunities to donate money to the relief efforts and a place to seek out missing loved ones. My favorite section of this blog is the "Help Offered" page where people from around the world can post their desire to go where help is needed. For instance, one person wrote, "I am a manager with a broadcast/IT/telecoms engineering firm. I and other engineers would like to volunteer to go to South-East Asia region to assist in the restoration of telecoms etc. We would also like to help get local radio stations up and running/back on air so people can share important information. I know healthcare and food is critical right now but we just want to help. I'm making inquiries but if anyone can suggest who I should contact so our effort has maximum effect please, please email me." Similar offers range from a woman offering her childcare expertise to a South Africa-based medical rescue and evacuation company seeking deployment where needed.

What struck me most while browsing this and other similar blogs is the sense of community created amongst their readers. Instead of passively watching CNN with a snack and a glass of wine at your fingertips, reading a blog forces you to become a somewhat active participant in a dire situation. While it is unrealistic to expect the majority of people to be able to offer physical assistance and it is impossible for others to provide financial aid, reading and posting in a blog provides a more honest and pure outlook of the situation while giving you a direct connection to the people affected by and involved in the tragedy. The material you see is unedited and unadulterated by network censors or drama-seeking television producers. Best of all, you're allowed to interpret the information for yourself before it's filtered through the mainstream media.

I'm not saying not to donate money if you're able. As a "poor college student," I managed to scrape together a small sum for the American Red Cross, in effect sacrificing perhaps a few trips to the movies and a couple burritos at Bueno Y Sano. To me, this is a small price to pay; I can easily do without these "creature" comforts when so many people are without any comforts at all. So, while donating money and/or time is obviously extremely important in this and other critical situations around the world, it is equally important to remain connected and keep a constant, unwavering gaze on the tragedies that are occurring everyday around the globe. So while it isn't my intent to preach or tell you what to do, I urge you to take a look at the SEA-EAT blog and any other blogs you find of interest. Even if you post a simple "thinking of you"-type message, rest assured that it will be read by people all over the world and, I guarantee, will touch at least one person, somewhere, somehow.

Erin McNamee is a Collegian columnist.

Planning my future

Stacy Kasdin

As a senior who hopes to be employed full-time by next September, I have been spending most of my recent free time applying for jobs. It's hard to believe that after all those, "what do you want to be when you grow up" questions, the time has finally come. Apparently, at some point when I was looking the other way, quite possibly distracted by something shiny, I've grown up. Now, it's time to figure out what I want to be.

I've had a lot of different thoughts on this subject throughout the years. I'm sure I don't remember all of my career goals, but I distinctly remember wanting to be a singer (I think I'm tone-deaf), an Olympic ice skater (I'm a klutz), and a mermaid (I have an excessive amount of legs for this position). Once those options were deemed impossible, I settled on going to college for acting, which is the major I had in mind when applying to schools. Sometime between my junior and senior years of high school I had an epiphany and realized that what I was actually destined for was social work. Thus, I entered college as a sociology major.

I found my sociology coursework very interesting, and was pleased with my decision. Then I had to declare a concentration, and for one reason or another (in all honesty, no reason comes to mind other than watching far too much "Law and Order") I declared criminal justice as my concentration, and decided that instead of social work I was really destined to be a special agent for NYPD's special victims unit. At some point during my sophomore year it was brought to my attention that detectives not only have the potential to be shot at on a regular basis, but have to pass a grueling physical evaluation as well. With that, it was time to find a new career path.

One of the first things I ever wanted to be, at least as far back as sixyears old, was a writer. I began to wonder why

I suppose the lesson to be learned is that the reason everyone has had so many different answers to "what do you want to be when you grow up," is because there isn't just one answer to the question.

I'd strayed from that path in the first place, but instead of wondering for too long I walked myself down to Bartlett and switched my major to journalism. Journalism: the face of my future. Maybe. I'm applying for work at an assortment of publications around the country. I went for one of my first interviews a few days ago. I got all dressed up in my grown-up clothes (no sweatshirt, no jeans, no holes or stains), with my grown-up purse (no backpack, no special compartment for a juice box), and went to a building where other grown-ups were walking around in their grown-up clothes going to meetings, typing, and filing paperwork.

I began to wonder how long it would take me to stop feeling like I was playing dress up. I wondered how long it would be before I realize that this isn't a game, this is actually my life. This is how it's going to be for the next 30 years. Well, it certainly hasn't happened yet. I figure if I still feel this way in five years, maybe I should start worrying. Until then, thinking of it as a game might make it more interesting, but then again, hopefully I'll be doing something enjoyable enough to not have to talk myself into thinking it's interesting.

It's all a very nerve-wracking process, trying to plan the rest of your life. I have enough trouble trying to plan from one day to the next. What helps is trying not to look at it as planning for the rest of my life; it's just what will come first. I suppose the lesson to be learned is that the reason everyone has had so many different answers to "what do you want to be when you grow up," is because there isn't just one answer to the question. At my interview one woman I spoke to told me she went from working in a biology lab to working for an advertising company.

What you major in doesn't have to be the rest of your life. Your first job probably isn't going to be the rest of your life. Some jobs may, in fact, encourage jeans and juice boxes. Fulltime employment isn't going to be the end of the world. It's just going to be the start of a new adventure, and come September, I think I may actually be ready for it or at least willing to give it a shot. For now, it's back to applications and three hours of class a day, and that's okay with me.

Stacy Kasdin is a Collegian columnist.

The mosaic of truth

Elizabeth Carter

Have you forgotten? Or have you simply never taken the time to learn the truth? And oh what a fun term "truth" is. Real "truth" is the ability to see from all sides and all points of view yet also to be able to reconcile these difficult abstractions so that one is left with a picture that comes full circle, encapsulating the good the bad and the horror inherent in the fact that each side is simultaneously both right, and wrong. The left, the right and all the degrees that fall in between are but painters of a massive mosaic. Up close, each creates an individual piece of artwork, and while their paintings are subject to personal preference and point of view, to step back and to see the greater picture of it all, we then achieve the only thing that can be called the truth — the ability to see that each individual picture painted is only part of a whole massive work of art: a mosaic that stands as a greater body made up of little truths.

Thus, I am led to think of the world today — shaking in shambles — as many nations try desperately to be "right," working with the assumption that being right on a global scale is an individual, rather than collective effort. I am led to think of our currently reelected presidential administration, which I'm beginning to believe, believes it's self. Now I take the viewpoint that things in this world are not good and bad, but rather "good" and "less good." How disturbing it is to see the presidential administration of the freest nation in the world believing desperately in the idealism of "less good." For while I strive to believe all things are born in good intentions, it seems sometimes amidst all this amicable intent reason has a propensity towards polarization and blindness, leaving some benefiting and others flailing in the wind. Therefore, certain viewpoints are still "good," yet they are "less good" than others due to the fact that such narrowness does not allow all pictures to be seen, all truths to be interpreted, all people involved to be considered, and all factors to be accounted for.

How ironic is telling the free that they are enemies of freedom by excercising their right to be free? Now if that sentance didn't sound like a paradox to you, then what does?

Once again my eyes fall upon our own government — believing that bombs heal hardened ethnic wounds, and that the "us vs. them" mentality will lead to a nation and a world united by the ideological dream of fair democracy. A government looking with unwavering eyes at its own little self-portrait and getting mad as hell when their opposition responds by justly crying out, "Yes we know you want to help, but look! There are other pictures! Other points of view! Please look around! You are determining the fate of domestic and global politics, consequently impacting world stability." To such reasonable pleas they bite back, with razor sharp adages for any and all to silence themselves, for if we do not view their portrait of freedom, then we must be enemies of freedom. This is of course not taking into consideration that the greater idea of freedom, is something which urges people to think differently, and encourages opposing points of view. How ironic is telling the free that they are enemies of freedom by exercising their right to be free? Now if that sentence didn't sound like a paradox to you, then what does? For while I believed that this administration truly hopes to bring about greater good, I also know that the greater good cannot be seen nor accomplished with one's face pressed so close up against the mosaic of truth that only one tiny truth, their tiny truth, can be seen.

A president, especially in this country, should be a man who has and exercises the ability to consider all options, see all viewpoints, and use a vast knowledge of past and present to attempt to weave together a stable and solid future. Nevertheless this type of governing is something we have yet to see of the Bush administration, and the types of tapered viewpoints they are displaying are very dangerous. Yet at the same time also very appealing, they require little thought or research, they require little analysis or consideration and most importantly they do not require one to do the most difficult thing of all—see from other view points.

So now I urge all of you, hardened liberals and hardened conservatives alike, for just one moment go, drop your biases — and I mean that literally for just one moment drop them to the ground, and read a piece of literature from the camp which opposes your own favorite method of thought. Read that piece of literature and empathize, immerse yourself in that mindset until for a moment it is yours. Then, understand, and relate back to your own thinking what the other view point's intent is, what its hopes are, and whether or not it truly is malicious, or simply a little blind. You may just find that neither side is bad, yet sometimes a viewpoint can be very singular, and therein lays the trap, not mal-intent, but rather lack of broad view. For when all sides are viewed, within both a past and present context, then and only then is it possible to learn, and to truly know. But the real question is will you even try?

Elizabeth Carter is a Collegian columnist.

Payday loans

Andrew Freeman

Imagine you're running short on cash and want to buy something but your paycheck doesn't come for another week. While online, a pop-up catches your eye, advertising fast, easy money, and you follow the link to a Web site offering a $100 loan. You give the company access to your bank account, they give you the cash, and a week later they will remove $115 from your balance, the price of the loan plus interest. You've just paid on $100 an annual interest rate of 780 percent.

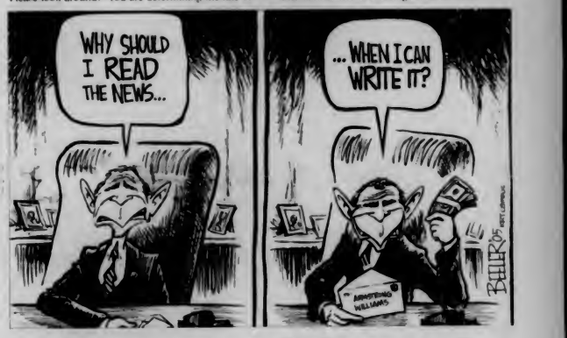
The practice of loaning small amounts of money for a short period of time at astronomical interest rates is known as payday lending, and it is becoming increasingly prevalent. Thirty-seven states allow payday-lending companies, and the states like Massachusetts that prohibit them cannot regulate the multitudes of payday Web sites springing up online. With rates higher than any bank or credit card, such businesses pose a dire threat to consumers.

The only difference between it and loan-sharking is that the former is legal throughout much of the nation and Massachusetts is right to outlaw both of them.

To receive a payday loan, you have to provide a company with either a check for the assigned amount or access to your bank account, so they can withdraw the money. Although the companies often claim that such loans are temporary, approximately 91 percent of the lenders' business is people with five or more loans, according to 2003 Center for Responsible Lending study. Because the high interest payments on their loans leave them with more expenses, many people chose to take out addition loans, entering into a downward spiral of debt. Worse, payday lenders impose substantial fees in addition to the interest. These vary from application fees to cancellation fees, to fees for extension of the loan, to fees for bounced checks.

In addition to the high fees, many online payday lenders collect more information than necessary. A survey of Web sites in 2000 by the Massachusetts Division of Banks found lenders soliciting social security numbers, personal identification numbers, license plate numbers, eye color, and even the customer's mother's maiden name. Because of limited regulation, and difficulty contacting company operators, there is no way of ensuring this information is not sold or shared.

A major target for payday operations is military personnel. According to a December 7th New York Times article, 26 percent of military families had at one point used payday loans. Many such lending companies set up shop outside military bases - one even sought endorsement from a leading officer," Robert Walker. However, such practices endanger soldiers' jobs. The government considers servicemen with excessive debt to be a security risk since they might sell information to stave off bankruptcy, and may decide it safer to terminate them.



Thankfully, Massachusetts has no payday lenders, due to laws that cap small loan interest rates at a maximum of 23 percent annual interest rates -this law was enacted in the 19th century to combat loan sharking.

However, companies have tried to circumvent such prohibitions elsewhere. In New York, a business calling itself N.Y. Catalog Sales provided high interest loans and offered customers gift certificates for the difference in interest. In Florida, a company named Florida Internet gave customers $500 in exchange for Internet service they charged $100 a month for - to cancel, subscribers had to pay $600 Both of these companies were prosecuted by regulators for violating state laws. Furthermore, online lenders can operate without restrictions, since they are often based in states with limited regulation or in foreign countries.

Payday lending is a serious risk to consumers, and should not be allowed in any form. The only difference between it and loan-sharking is that the former is legal throughout much of the nation, and Massachusetts is right to outlaw both of them. The proliferation of payday Web sites necessitates regulation, and if that is impossible, then efforts should be undertaken to warn people about these businesses. It is reprehensible to allow the people of this country, particularly the men and women charged with defending it, to be victimized by unscrupulous lenders.

Andrew Freeman is a Collegian Columnist.

What we're fighting for

Mike Sances

As of today, Iraqis are just four days away from voting in their much-hyped elections scheduled for Jan. 30.

Unfortunately, there appears at this point in time little more to say about them: even if I could predict the winners, the identities of many of the candidates, and even their party platforms, are being kept secret for security reasons.

But not to worry, as I've just recently come upon some rather compelling polling data from back in October of 2003, when Gallup asked Baghdad residents why they thought the U.S. invaded Iraq. Out of six possible choices, control of the country's oil won a decisive 43 percent. The only other option that even came close was removing Saddam Hussein from power — but not for the benefit of Iraqis (which received five percent of the vote), and not because he had weapons of mass destruction (four percent).

Since the impending elections in Iraq have inspired a good deal of talk about democracy, moreover, it might be worth pointing out that only one percent of those questioned in the Gallup poll thought that the United States invaded with democracy in mind. Still, we shouldn't let that stop us from recognizing the views expressed by the Iraqis in the Gallup poll from fifteen months ago. Nor should we let the poll's age dissuade us. On the contrary, as it predates the worst atrocities of the war and no doubt the bulk of Iraqi cynicism and anti-U.S. sentiment.

Thus, as any substantive analysis of the Jan. 30 elections would seem impossible, for reasons stated above, those of us who take things like self-determination, human rights, and indeed, democracy seriously would do well to investigate the primary reason that Iraqis themselves believe U.S. forces entered their country to begin with, and why American forces today are still overwhelmingly viewed as "occupiers," according to another Today/CNN/USA Gallup poll from April of last year.

Of course, by that logic, we must conclude that the mainstream American press hates democracy, as they virtually never respond to the views expressed by Iraqis in polls such as those that I cite here.

All of this might come as a shock to anyone who believed the invasion of Iraq was inspired by concerns for national security or, failing that, simple American goodwill.

That aside, let's assume for the sake of argument that the Iraqis themselves are right, and that all the arguments presented by those in favor of the war were wrong. If the United States is truly in Iraq to "rob them of their oil," as the question was so bluntly phrased in the Oct. 2003 poll, how is this theft going to be carried out? Answer: By establishing fourteen military bases in the country that will last anywhere from 2006 to indefinitely, that will house 50,000 American troops altogether, and that will cost American taxpayers five to seven billion dollars a year.

These figures come from the only two news articles I have been able to find on the bases, the first from the Chicago Tribune, who "broke" the story in March of last year, and the second from the Christian Science Monitor, from September of last year. I stand by my accusations of an anti-democratic press: the Tribune story does not mention oil at all, while the Monitor mentions it only in passing, warning that the plan for bases "reinforces Iraqi suspicions that the United States launched the war to get a hand on Iraqi oil, control the region, and wants to maintain a puppet government in Baghdad."

All of this might come as a shock to anyone who believed the invasion of Iraq was inspired by concerns for national security or, failing that, simple American goodwill. Nevertheless, the "suspicions" are well-established, and demand at least a minimal inquiry by people who actually do care about things like democracy. To go one step further, the fact that the press and American politicians have so studiously ignored these issues, with very few exceptions, should also raise some pressing questions.

It has been fairly obvious that the antiwar movement in this country, despite its initial enthusiasm, fizzled out fairly quickly, first because it failed to stop the war from starting, and second because of the diversion of resources toward the presidential campaign. Post-election confusion and fatigue seem to reign on the left, while many others who opposed the war are initially hesitant about an immediate withdrawal. While the manner in which the U.S. military is carrying out the war has been horrible enough to inspire mass protests, the way out of this quagmire appears to me to lie in a rigorous and honest assault on why we are in Iraq at all—the bases—first calling peoples' attention to them, then by opposing them.

As university students, the means for doing so are quite literally all around us.

Mike Sances is a Collegian columnist.

Fross emphasizes Univ. involvement

SENATE from page A2

Outreach program for our university."

According to Fross, public universities are expected to have a close connection with their state and within their communities. She said that means working in a variety of areas and taking University programming to the external population in a way the school has not done before.

Fross explained that this means making programs more accessible by offering accelerated, weekend and online classes.

"When you are looking at non-traditional students, such as adults, they are often trying to manage multiple priorities - and each of those arenas of life take time and effort," she said. "Then they also have an educational goal they want to meet."

"In the course of our lives education is a lifelong process," Fross continued. "In order to remain current, we need to continue to get the education and training we need to be viable in the workplace and have knowledge about the world we live in."

Since universities have content knowledge, research and teaching capabilities that the state needs, Fross said she believes it is important that that expertise be made available to people across the Commonwealth. Therefore, Outreach works closely with academic colleges on how to disseminate those resources to the public.

"That's why external audiences are looking for us to be involved, to bring knowledge content and capabilities that these external groups need," Fross said. "I've been meeting with all the academic deans and the academic departments on trying to determine what

See SENATE on page A11

First Choice Program to benefit students who choose UMass for early decision

By Casey Novak
Collegian Staff

Megan Bronstein/Collegian

Inside Whitmore Administration Building, home of UMass admissions, students who choose UMass early will be able to receive $2,000 in scholarships and other benefits through the First Choice program.

High school students who decide early that they wish to attend the University of Massachusetts will now have an opportunity to benefit from the new First Choice Program, which Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano says will better accommodate those future students' needs.

Students accepted through the First Choice program will receive $2,000 scholarships from the Alumni Association, priority for summer orientation, class registration and housing selection, and the option to enroll in a special online course to earn credits towards their degree.

"We are finding that more and more students are selecting UMass Amherst as their top choice," Gargano said. "And more students are selecting their university of choice much earlier in the admission process."

Gargano said that this program would allow the University to offer the best of both worlds to all students who plan to apply.

"For those students that want to take as many campus visits as possible and want to really think of all the possibilities, we have the traditional registration decision," he said.

In that case, the student applies to the University by the Jan. 15 deadline, and then they would hear back from the University in roughly March. If they were accepted, the University must receive the deposit check by May 1.

"Then for those students that have really made up their minds and there's no reason for them to wait, they can now take advantage of the First Choice Program and apply to the University in November. In that case, they'd get a decision by early December and then send the deposit check by January 15. Then they can go on and plan what they want to do the rest of their senior year," Gargano said.

He added that the program will also include the design of a couple of classes that participating students will be able to take, allowing them to accumulate academic credit, prior to even arriving at the University.

"In a way it helps students get academic credit, get acclimated to a university environment and earn a quicker graduation," Gargano said.

Initially, the program will bring in between 300 and 600 students, he said, beginning in the fall of 2006.

Another aspect of the new strategies in admissions is to spend more time aligning themselves with community colleges, both in the state of Massachusetts as well as in the Northeast, according to Gargano.

"What we want to do is ease the transition from community colleges to the Amherst campus," he explained. "We will visit community colleges and host receptions there and be able to review transcripts of students on the spot, evaluate academic credential, have them fill out an application, and actually, in some cases, admit them on sight."

By becoming more centralized and aligned with community colleges, Gargano said he hopes diversity on the campus will increase. This is why he also said this program should have a dramatic impact on the recruitment of ALANA students.

"Recruitment [from community colleges] is fine, but if

See FIRST CHOICE on page A11

Student saved by choosing not to sleep in beach hut

STUDENT from page A1

"It was the middle of the night in the U.S., so they first heard about the disaster from me and there were no worries," he said.

Although uninjured, Morrison was unable to see much of the city's destruction until the following day — including the massive amount of bodies along the coastline.

"By the time I went to the affected region, they had collected the majority of the bodies, although I'm sure they will find them washing up on the shore for months," he said. "I went to [the] beach along with thousands of other Indians, just to stand on the shore and look out at the ocean."

Morrison said the Indian news channels had no reservations about showing graphic images of the dead, lying unwrapped on their backs in long rows on the Chennai roadside, while crying loved ones huddled over the bodies. He said as far as he knew, the city's death toll is at 250.

"The videos showed the bloated faces of the dead, their mouths full of sand and their color a sickly pale," he said.

Morrison said judging by the condition of the Marina beach, one of the longest in the world, most of the destruction was mainly to the small fishing villages that lined the beach with their huts. A small train had been derailed and fishing boats were smashed into sidewalks. Large anchors were dragged 500 feet from the shore, and nets littered the walkways.

"I met dozens of people during my time on the beach [before the tsunami], children especially ... and the chances are high they didn't survive," he said. "I had some idea of what a tidal wave like that could do to the flimsy shacks I had stayed in, and I shuddered to think of it."

Today, Morrison says the physical concerns for India seem to be taken care of, due to the outpouring of supplies from around the world. But the emotional trauma remains. Frightened fishermen have just recently begun working with what is left of their boats and equipment.

"I heard ... that lifelong fishermen had never heard about the affects of a tsunami and had never seen the ocean recede the way it did," said Morrison. "So they stood there and watched it until it was too late."

His classes resumed on Jan. 3 at IIT, and Morrison is now back in Bombay. He plans to return to the U.S. in May in time for the UMass graduation ceremony. Although life is beginning to return to some semblance of normal in India, Morrison says the relief effort is still very much underway.

For those who are alive, the biggest challenge is still upon them: survival. In many of the isolated villages that line the coast, the lack of immediate emotional support makes life for survivors that much harder.

"Families who lost children, children who lost families, people who lost their better half...they just have to survive, and I can't imagine what that's like," Morrison said.

"Hopefully the global effort and legendary empathy of the Indian community can help to comfort some."

VACATIONING SPRING BREAK?
PLANNING A SEMESTER ABROAD?
NEED A PASSPORT?
AMHERST TOWN CLERK'S OFFICE PROCESSES PASSPORTS
MONDAY THRU FRIDAY 8 AM TO 3 PM
FOR MORE INFO:256-4035
WE'RE ACROSS FROM NEWBURY COMICS

STSTRAVEL.COM
Join America's #1 Student Tour Operator
CANCUN ACAPULCO JAMAICA BAHAMAS FLORIDA
SPRING BREAK 2005
Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Travel Free
1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

GET OFF THE BENCH
SCORE A GREAT JOB AT DICK'S SPORTING GOODS
New Store Opening in Hadley, MA (367 Russell Street)
Apparel Associates
Bike Technicians
Cashiers
Fitness Associates
Footwear Associates
Golf Associates
Lodge Associates (Hunting/Outdoors/Fishing) Operations
Sales Associates
Team Sports Associates
Turn your passion of sports into a great career! With over 235 stores, Dick's offers you plenty of opportunities. If you are at least 18 years old, we want to talk to you!
APPLY TODAY!
• Flexible Full & Part-Time Schedules
• Competitive Compensation & Benefits
• Generous Employee Discount
• Career Advancement Opportunities
• Fun Work Environment
Call today for an interview!
877-350-5627
Media Code: MD0
Or apply online!
www.dickssportinggoods.com
EVERY SEASON STARTS AT DICK'S SPORTING GOODS
Dick's Sporting Goods is an Equal Opportunity Employer

EARRINGS • INCENSE • DRESSES • SKIRTS • RUGS • GIFTS • JOURNALS • CANDLES • BOWLS • CARDS • TOYS • RUG • T-SHIRTS • BEAD CURTAINS • SUNGLASSES • SWEATERS
THE MERCANTILE HAS TAPESTRIES! AND COOL POSTERS!
The Mercantile
NORTHAMPTON 108 Main Street 584-1205
AMHERST Carriage Shops 549-1390
Mon-Sat 10-6 Thur & Fri to 9 Sun 12-6

"HOT" Yoga
BIKRAM YOGA AMHERST
www.bikramyoga.com
665-yoga
The room is heated to open you...
The series is powerful to challenge you...
The yoga is BIKRAM to change you...
Designed for all levels, BIKRAM yoga will challenge you physically...focus you mentally..and allow you to relax on a very deep level.
TRY IT FOR 10 CONSECUTIVE DAYS FOR ONLY $20!!!
On Rt. 116 across from Cliffside Apts.
Open 7 Days with generous student rates.

Ad campaign growing for the Baby Safe Haven Law

By S.J. Port
Collegian Staff

A new slogan for the recently enacted Baby Safe Haven law was announced by Lieutenant Governor Kerry Healey on Jan. 3 of the new year. The slogan, "If you can't keep your baby, you can keep your baby safe," is the basis for television, radio and billboard advertisements as well as signs on subways, buses and trains in the Commonwealth, hit Massachusetts airwaves soon after Healey's announcement. The advertisements are part of an awareness campaign required by lawmakers of the Department of Social Services in the text of the Baby Safe Haven act.

The advertisement campaign is aimed at "young parents" and "pregnant teenagers," according to a press release from the State House.

The Baby Safe Haven law, referred to in the Legislature as "an act relative to the safe placement of newborn infants, was ratified by the legislature and signed by Healey in July of 2004, and went into effect on Oct. 29, 2004. The law stipulates that parents of a newborn child less than a week old may anonymously leave the newborn in the care of a hospital, police department, or manned fire station, referred to as "designated facilities." Massachusetts became the 46th state to pass a safe haven law. The first baby safe haven law was passed by President George W. Bush, then governor of Texas, in 1999. The baby safe haven law first appeared on the legislature's docket in 1999, but was not approved, despite multiple reforms and rewrites of the proposed law, by the legislature until this summer.

The campaign was designed to promote the new safe haven law as well as established teen pregnancy programs and adoption information. There have been at least eight reported cases of child abandonment in Massachusetts since Sept. 1, 2001, including the case of former University of Massachusetts freshman Jennifer Palusco in May 2002.

Designed by students at the Boston Arts Academy, one of the advertisements draws upon two months of research done by the Academy's students on what their peers needed in order to understand the law. The Academy's students volunteered to write and produce one of the public service announcements, according to a press release by the State House.

In addition to the advertisements, DSS has established a statewide hotline (866-814-SAFE) and Web site (www.babysafehaven.com) at which to discover more help and information concerning the law. The hotline will be staffed b the AMT Child of Hope Foundation, proponents of the safe haven legislation nationally. The staff is trained to respond to calls requiring information or referrals for parents who need help with a troubled or secret pregnancy.

"Newborn abandonment is an avoidable tragedy that we are determined to stamp out in Massachusetts," Healey said at an awareness event in Lexington, according to a State House press release. "Working together, we will spread the word that every child, regardless of circumstance, can receive a loving, supportive start to life."

According to the law's text, the department of social services "shall accept for placement into foster care any newborn infant seven days of age or less that is voluntarily places with a [designated facility]." Parents who chose to leave their child in a designated facility do not automatically terminate their parental rights, however the act does authorize the department of social services to "initiate a petition" to terminate the parental rights. For this purpose the act is considered by DSS to be an abandonment of the infant. Before the law went into effect abandoning a baby in Massachusetts carried a sentence of up to five years in prison. Voluntary abandonment, if done under the strict requirements of the Baby Safe Haven law is not considered a criminal act. However if the DSS determines that the newborn was abused prior to its abandonment, criminal charge against the parents will be filed.

"The safe haven committee is working to provide education and options to anyone in need and a safety net for all who experience troubled or secret pregnancies. Our goal is to save lives," said Harry Spence, commissioner of the department of social services in a State House press release.

The law will expire on June 30, 2008 when it will come under review by the Legislature in 2008. At this time the Legislature will examine the report required by the DSS, in conjunction with a designee of the juvenile court, the probate and family court, the center for adoption research at the UMass, Massachusetts Families for Kids, Massachusetts Children's Trust Fund, Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children and several other offices. The report will discuss several issues of the law outlined by legislators within the law's text. These issues include and focus on the effectiveness of the law in "decreasing the number of newborns abandoned in an unsafe manner in the commonwealth."

UMass Dartmouth employee says she was fired due to her handicap

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

When Maeve Hickok was diagnosed with Multiple Sclerosis is 1998, she had no way of knowing life over the next five years would be even more unbearable than imagined.

The University of UMass-Dartmouth fired Hickok, a former spokeswoman for the University in spring of 2003, after tenure of nearly 17 years there. Last April, UMass-Dartmouth claimed that Hickok was being terminated due to budget cuts.

"The University called it a layoff for budget reasons," Hickok said. "But it became clear to me that it wasn't just a layoff and I was being discriminated against."

Hickok, 55 and a mother of four, is not alone in this complaint. Last month, the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission agreed that the University was prejudiced in firing Hickok and a settlement is now being developed. If consent is reached, the settlement would enable Hickok to return to her job as executive director of news and publications at Dartmouth, as well as back pay among other components.

As University attorneys continue to sift through the specifics of this case, they are near the end of a long-winded process that entails several steps. After receiving her notice in April 2003, due to policy, she then was required to work for another 60 days before actually leaving the University.

"When I had to work for those 60 days after knowing I was already fired, it was painful," Hickok said. "It was a very hard time for me."

The office that Hickok worked for prior to being laid off claimed to be uncomfortable in several ways for her, especially due to her handicap. Her complaint of these findings allegedly led to her firing, which has been seen as a violation of the law, according to the EEOC.

The process continued as both sides presented their case to the EEOC and it was then found that there was enough information necessary for a trial to occur. The conclusion that the EEOC stated was that the University violated the Americans With Disabilities Act of 1990. If a resolution is not reached, this case has the potential to move on to federal court. As of now, however, both Hickok and the University wait to hear the results.

"This case originated at a time when the University was in the middle of budget cuts that resulted in one hundred million dollars," said John Hoey, a spokesman for UMass Dartmouth. "At all times, the overriding priority was to maintain the academic core of the University."

Collegian Photo Illustration/Megan Bronstein

UMass Dartmouth employee Maeve Hickok says she was fired due to her MS.

Hoey stressed that the University is focused on improving academic life and understands the difficulty involved around people being laid off during budget cuts. UMass-Dartmouth in particular dealt with $10 million in budget cuts last spring, which resulted in numerous layoffs.

Hickok earned her bachelors degree in English at UMass Amherst and her masters at UMass Dartmouth. A longtime employee at UMass Dartmouth, her first priority has been to get back to work. With the experience and qualifications that she obtains, she hopes that she can continue her career at UMass Dartmouth, and go back to her normal life.

"I had a wonderful career and enjoyed my work enormously," said Hickok. "I was in complete shock when I received the termination notice."

When Hickok started at UMass Dartmouth, she began her career simply as a news writer. Over the next 17 years, she climbed the ranks in the news office, becoming office coordinator, director of News office and eventually executive director of news and publications.

With this case becoming increasingly complicated and extensive, Hickok continues to deal with her ailment as well has her issues with the University. Multiple Sclerosis is a disease that affects the central nervous system and damages body tissue. Over 300,000 Americans have been diagnosed with MS and many of them, like Hickok, wind up in a wheelchair.

UMass to merge with law school favor, it will be effective immediately."

LAW from page A1

A merge between the two schools will not only benefit UMass students, but also SNESL students as well. Benharris said that he is excited about having the 'UMass' name on his diploma, and UMass students will benefit from tuition and stipends that the plan will offer.

"They are going to offer public interest stipends," he said, "50 percent or even more of the tuition will be given back to you if you agree to work for five years of public interest law." Public interest law involves work with the attorney general's office and public defense and typically, according to Benharris, these types of jobs are not high paying, which turns away law school graduates.

"If you have 60 thousand is law school debt and 70 thousand in college debt, you're not going to want to get a job that pays 20 thousand a year."

He added that this will also benefit the state because law school graduates will seek these lower paying jobs so that they can get back part of the tuition.

"This helps the state, you're guaranteed a job for five years and you get to work with lawyers. This is a win-win situation."

The current law school, which is situated in the Fall River area will not move, according to Benharris, but will grow. "Amherst will not play a big factor in this whole thing," he said, "part of the contract said that they will never take it out of the area." He also added that Western Massachusetts is not a region where a law school is needed, but Southern New England is.

SAVE BIG BUCKS!
Sale From 1/26/05-2/5/05
25% OFF ALL SWEATSHIRTS!
25% OFF ALL SHORTSLEEVE T-SHIRTS!
25% OFF ALL HATS!
25% OFF ALL DRINKWARE!
University of Massachusetts AMHERST UNIVERSITY STORE
vollett.com ON CAMPUS.

Library officials say project should be finished by summer

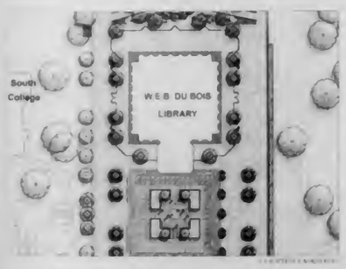
By Dan Erk
Collegian Staff

The W.E.B. DuBois library has been under construction for some time now, but students will soon be able to reap the rewards of the annoying detours, ugly fencing and nauseating smells as the exterior renovations should be completed by the end of the semester and new interior alterations are currently underway.

The deck replacement project had to be put on hold because of the cold weather. Construction should resume in early March. Once done, the plaza surrounding the library will have decorative concrete pathways and gardens facing the student union.

Many people do not realize that when they walk across the library deck they are also walking on top of the roof of the main floor of the library. Since the roof is 50 years old and flat it had begun to leak and this is the reason for the construction. This is contrary to many of the reasons floating around campus like the builders did not take into account the weight of the books or that the library was designed as an office building.

The present revamping of the first and second floors will be followed by a redesign of the main floor. The first floor lobby has already be painted and carpeted; a new information center and cafe featuring Rao's Coffee are also being added. The cafe will be run by Auxiliary Services and will start out as a small kiosk but expand overtime. It is slated to open the first of February.



The W.E.B. DuBois Library has been under construction since summer, creating detours for students and faculty.

The second floor is the new home of the extensive map collection of the W.E.B. DuBois. This location allows for the maps to be more readily available then they were on the twenty-sixth floor. The other half of the second floor is being converted into a new quiet study area, complete with carpet and new comfortable furniture.

Emily Silverman, Director of Library Development and Communication said "this is just the beginning." After the overhaul of the first and second floors the main floor will also be redone. In order to make the main floor more user-friendly the entire area will be converted into "The Learning Commons." This will make quiet study and computer access for students, alone or in groups, much easier.

In addition, to cut down on elevator traffic the computers from the labs on the seventh and tenth floors will be moved to The Learning Commons. The unique shape of the building, tall and slender, makes some of the remodeling difficult, especially in the planning stages.

Silverman notes though that once the renovations are complete UMass library "will be better than our peers if not on par."

The new plan for the W.E.B. DuBois Library has been unveiled to include a courtyard and gardens.

Murray's family still holds hope taking all her pictures off the walls, taking everything out of her bureaus, [and] put them all in boxes [and] left [them] on her bed," Scarinza told WCVB-TV. "[She] left a personal note to her boyfriend on top of the boxes."

MURRAY from page A1

Maura's mother, Laurie Murray, told the Daily Collegian in August the relationship between her daughter and Rausch was a "very, very good relationship."

Raush's mother, Sharon Rausch, reiterated that statement in a recent interview. She said there was a point where the couple's relationship was rocky in the spring of 2002, but they had resolved their problems by summer and had a good relationship since then.

Her son arrived at Maura's dorm room with police just two days after she went missing. He said there was no recent letters to him from Maura that were found.

"There is no note," Sharon Raush said.

Maura's father, Fred Murray, sent a letter to New Hampshire Governor Craig Benson on May 21, 2004 asking him to persuade State Police to receive assistance from the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) in the search for his daughter. Murray never received a response.

Since then, Murray has submitted an application using the Freedom of Information Act in order to receive more information about the investigation.

"After writing to the governor, I appealed again to the attorney general and the district attorney of Grafton County, but I don't expect anything," Murray said.

Murray has been traveling to New Hampshire to search for his daughter almost every weekend since her disappearance.

"This place is like the old west," Murray said as he described the atmosphere of northern New Hampshire.

Murray said part of his search has included hanging out in local bars in hopes to overhear a conversation in which someone mentions something about Maura. Murray said he has been actively investigating his daughter's disappearance himself because he does not trust the police to conduct a proper investigation.

"These guys can't catch a cold," he said.

Murray said his main frustration is that police refuse to investigate "scenario number 4." Lt. Scarniza told the Daily Collegian in August that the police investigation has led them to believe Maura "left on her own volition." This would lead one to believe Maura either ran away, committed suicide or suffered from hypothermia. The Murrays disagreed and believe she was abducted.

Fred Murray believes the police do not want to admit there is a predator in their small, rural community.

"There's a bad guy on their turf in their backyard," Murray said. "The skunk is on their doorstep."

While the Murray family has been disputing facts about the police investigation, yet another troubling piece of information came to light in October 2004 when Sharon Rausch was reviewing Maura's cell phone records. The cell phone was given to Maura by her boyfriend, which was purchased in his mother's name. Rausch came across the last two numbers Maura called three hours before she disappeared.

Rausch decided to call the second number, which was to Dominic and Linda Salamone of Wakefield, Mass. In the course of Raush's conversation with Linda Salamone, she claims that she realized the Salamones own a condominium in Bartlett, NH — the same condo association the Murray family vacationed in years past.

Although the phone call was one of the last Maura made before she went missing, the Salamones said police never once contacted them. The couple did not learn of their part of the story until being contacted by Rausch, eight months after Maura vanished.

"I was speechless," Rausch recalled, "and that doesn't happen to me very often."

Fred Murray explained that this new information is another piece of evidence that points to Maura being abducted.

"She had a destination," Murray said. "She was on route 112, which goes right to Bartlett ... [The police] will do anything to avoid saying 'number 4.'"

This new information does not back up the NH State Police theory that Maura ran away or committed suicide because it would be unlikely for her to rent a condo if she was planning on running away. Before she left UMass, she contacted her professors stating there was a death in the family, when there was no such death...

Many people believe she was taking time off from school to deal with the stress of a recent car crash in which she caused $10,000 worth of damage to her father's vehicle. In addition, Maura's school textbooks were found in the vehicle. Sharon Rausch and Fred Murray have both said they could not be unhappier with the police investigation.

"It's clear they have their own agenda and it has nothing to do with the truth or finding Maura," said Rausch.

More bad news hit the Murray family this past October. Maura's mother, Laurie Murray was diagnosed with throat cancer. According to Rausch, she has already undergone 30 days of chemotherapy and radiation treatment and has been doing better. Rausch said Murray has told people she is going to beat the cancer so she can see Maura come home.

The Daily Collegian has made several attempts to contact New Hampshire State Police for information regarding this article, but calls were not returned.

Rausch asks anyone who would like to help keep hope for Maura to pray, wear a blue ribbon or light an electric- or battery-operated candle until she comes home.

On their official Web site, New Hampshire State Police have asked anyone with information regarding Maura's disappearance to call Sgt. Robert Bruno at 603-846-3333. The Murray family asks those with information to either call police or contact them through their "Maura's Missing" Web site at http://www.maura-murray.com

UMass student Maura Murray smiles with her boyfriend Billy Rausch prior to her disappearance.

Univ. Press finds new home on North Pleasant St.

By Meghan Murphy
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Press, the book-publishing arm of the Ua niversity, recently moved to a new home in the East Experiment Station on North Pleasant St. The Press Office was part of a shuffle of various office locations happening throughout UMass.

"There was a relocation of many offices around campus and the press was a part of that," said Ed Blaguszewski, the director of the UMass News Office. But for the Press, which celebrates its 42nd birthday this year, the move marked the beginning of a new chapter in its history.

"For many years, we relied on University funds to cover the remaining portion of our expenses," said Bruce Wilcox, the director of the University of Massachusetts Press Office. But during the budget cuts last May, "there were severe financial pressures on the University... and we were told that we could no longer depend on funding."

The Press was granted a few years of "bridge funding" with the expectation that it would gain more and more financial independence from the university.

Since its inception in 1963, the Press has sold nearly a million individual volumes and now has more than 900 titles in print.

"Our strength is in American studies, broadly defined," said Wilcox. "We do books on history, African American studies, women's studies, and we have a series of Native Americans of the Northeast."

He added that the Press prints books by UMass faculty members as well as scholars at other universities and around the world. "Our job is to identify really strong works of scholarship, and then publish them effectively and market them vigorously."

In order to extend the reach of its publications, the Press recently joined forces with the Google Print Program, a feature run by the popular search engine.

"When you go to a bookstore, you rarely buy a book without browsing it first, and now you can do that electronically," said Wilcox.

Google digitizes the Press's publications, scans them, indexes the content, and then places them on secure servers. Then, readers can search for a specific part of the book as well as browse two pages forward and back from their starting point.

"In an age in which many students do their research by sitting in front of their computer, it's important that our books are accessible electronically," Wilcox added.

The University Press has relocated to the East Experiment Station on North Pleasant street in Amherst.

The Press also recently became a part of a similar program through Amazon.com, whereby readers can search through an entire book online. According to Wilcox, this will boost the sales and reputation of the Press by helping readers to decide if they want to buy the book online.

"With these huge companies competing to be your gateway to information, we want to work with them ... we want to make our books as successful as possible."

Many of the Press's publications have already celebrated great success, as shown in the "Recent Awards" section of the University Press Web site. Showcased there is a long list of books that have been recognized in the past few years.

The lineup includes "Captors and Captives" by Evan Haefeli and Kevin Sweeney, "Growing Up Abolitionist" by Harriet Hyman Alonso and "White Robe's Dilemma" by Neil Schmitz, which was selected as one of the 32 titles in the American Library Association's "The Best of the Best from the University Presses: Books You Should Know About" in 2002.

"The Press has a long tradition of publishing outstanding works, and as those works are circulating nationwide ... it communicates that UMass is a serious academic institution and that we're doing important work here," Blaguszewski said.

The University Press was also recognized in a recent book exhibit held by the American Historical Association. "We had a booth there right next to Harvard," said Wilcox proudly. "It reflects well on [UMass] that on a national basis, we are competitive in publishing. We carry the name of the university beyond [its] walls."

As far as the Press' financial situation, Wilcox is hopeful about the future. "I think [financial independence] is a very large challenge ... the reason we're here is to publish good books that might not otherwise be published because they're not likely to be profitable."

He explained that there isn't a large demand for scholarly books on history and literature, so those publications might not bring in as much money. Although the Press brings in a million dollars in sales revenues annually, after factoring in staff salaries, production costs, marketing costs, and author royalties, the expenses outweigh the income.

The road to self-sufficiency will be bumpy, but the Press' staff and supporters believe that the difficulty is worth working through to achieve their goals. "It's quite a challenge, but we're certainly doing everything we can to increase revenues and control expenses while still holding true to our fundamental mission... to publish books that enhance the reputation of the University," said Wilcox.

Fross urges focus on community

SENATE from page A8

the needs of the University are and what our academic areas are looking for from the Outreach organization."

She added that in order for University Outreach to really enhance the capabilities of the University it would have to work in close partnership with all aspects of the school.

"So that's where a lot of my focus is in this first year," Fross said. "And as we develop new programs to take to external constituencies it is important that we have research data to confirm that those programs are actually needed and that there are constituencies that want those programs."

According to Fross, Outreach anticipates having market research capabilities in order to market the programs that are developed and they are currently in the process of filling the position of a director of marketing and communications.

"I am very focused on aligning the Outreach organization in what we need to do administratively in order to expand and enhance the programs and to have a more significant presence across the Commonwealth, as well as nationally and internationally," Fross said.

Admissions program announced

FIRST CHOICE from page A8

[Gargano] is doing it basically to get more diversity on campus — recruitment might not have that effect," said Abigail Austrie, a junior ALANA student majoring in political science. "It's all about how you present UMass, so if kids see all the news about the racial issues that went on last semester, then they aren't going to want to come to UMass.

"I have friends in Boston that don't want to come to here. They say if there are so many issues then they don't think they will get the real help they need as a minority so they decide to go to an all-black college."

Leia Hustick is a senior working at the Office of ALANA Affairs, said she does think that the University needs more recruitment from community colleges.

"We especially need more from inner city schools. [UMass] needs to talk to high school students, and even have college students come and talk to minority students and say 'Hey you can get to college – anybody can do it.'

"I also think we need a bus system going from Springfield to Holyoke – that would help a lot," continued the cultural anthropology and STEPEC major. "We need to recruit from those places or else we are going to have one type of student and that's going to be middle to upper class and mostly white. We need more diversity not just racially but also economically."

Endowment created for women

HAYES from page A1

sciences beginning next year.

Although the days since her death continue to grow, Joseph Zak is still reminded of his stepdaughter every day. On the family's kitchen counter sits a plaque engraved with a poem that was given to Hayes after her grandmother passed away last Christmas.

"She loved the saying," he said, looking fondly at it. "She was my life in a way."

Recently, in the checkout line of a local grocery store, Joseph said he was surprised when the clerk recognized him as Hayes' step-father.

"She said Jessica used to sit with her on the bus and talk to her when no one else would," he said. "That's just the kind of person she was."

On Dec. 17, during one of Hayes' final business trips with her step-father, Joesph said the two drove past a cemetery.

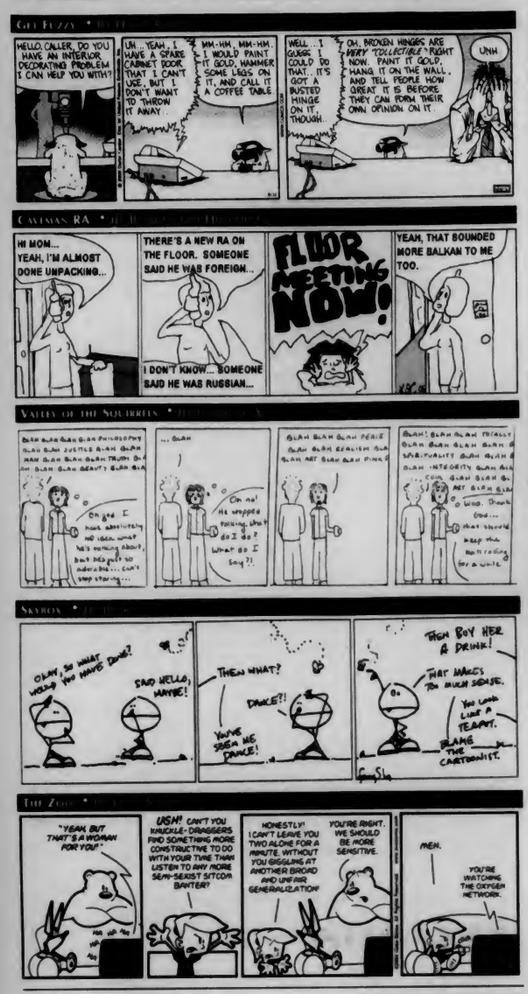
"She turned to me and said 'When I die, I'm going to Heaven,'" said Joesph.

"I joked with her and said that I bet she was."

To donate to the Jessica Hayes Scholarship Fund, contact the University of Massachusetts Biochemistry and Molecular Biology Department, 701 North Pleasant Street, Amherst, MA 01003.

Notes from the Bursar:

Initial bills for each semester are sent to you at your permanent address. [After classes begin] All subsequent bills will be sent to your campus/ local mailing address. No third party will receive duplicate bills. It is your responsibility to forward all bills/ information to your parents if they are paying the bill. Unpaid balances will result in holds on your account and prevent you from signing up for classes.



For your convenience, the Meal Plans Office will have a representative located in the teller area in Whitmore on January 24, 25, 26, 27, and 28 where they will accept meal plan changes. After January 28th meal plan changes must be made at the Meal Plan Office - not the Bursar's Office.

◦Periodically check your OIT email because of important university and billing information. In addition, if you are to receive an excess check you will be notified via your OIT email when it is available.

◦Student Bursar bills may be paid by cash, check, or money order at the teller windows in 225 Whitmore from 9:00 AM - 4:00 PM.

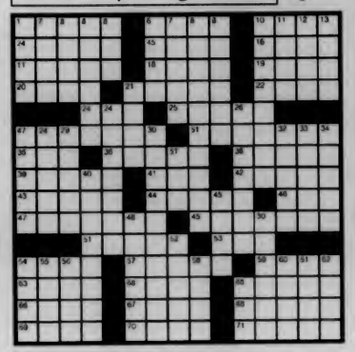
All Health insurance waivers are now done online. For any questions regarding health insurance waivers, contact University Health Services at (413)577-5192.

The main telephone number for the Bursar's Office is (413)545-2368. Check your SPIRE account throughout the semester for changes and balances on your bills. Copies of your bill may be printed from SPIRE.

Quote of the Day

"A wise man will make more opportunities than he finds."

-Sir Francis Bacon



ACROSS
1 Suspension of hostilities
6 Brits' raincoats
10 Captures
14 Five after three
15 Adorned one
16 Continental currency
17 Painful points
18 Go for the gold?
19 Like a dental exam
20 Beautiful bloom
21 Electron tube
22 Summon
23 Pen
25 Cut off
27 Like ubikes
31 Vengeful foes
35 __ Marie Saint
36 Utopias
38 " __ Gay"
39 Fine sprays
41 Average grade
42 Unfamiliar with
43 Two quartets combined
44 Sculled
46 Somme summer
47 Astral
49 Went tobogganing
51 Kind of eagle?
53 Words of commitment
54 Remaining
57 Components of everything
59 Braid or spike
63 Self-defense, e.g.
64 Make weary
65 Desert Storm target
66 Chutzpah
67 Gardener's tools
68 Top story
69 Feed the kitty
70 Dancer Pavlova
71 Make fun of

DOWN
1 Rig
2 Puerto __
3 Grunts
4 Cunit product
5 UFO crew
6 Actress Rogers
7 Gaucho's goodbye
8 Capacitors
9 Pipe fitting
10 Synthetic rubber
11 Nimbus
12 Blow one's own horn
13 Fish choice
21 Soaked in wood
24 Sawhorse
26 Improved by editing
27 Written reminders
28 Dislodge
29 Esthetic judgment
30 Emblem of honor
32 Spread seeds
33 Lift the spirits of 34 Cloyed
37 Learning org.
40 "The __ Heart"
45 Yale alumni
48 Writer Christie
50 Give
52 Actress Sophia
54 Org. of Webb and Sorenstam
55 Spirited self-assurance
56 Spread
58 Tableland
60 Dog star
61 Eye part
62 Tatted material
65 Winged mammal

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

The Moan and Dove
Start your semester off right by getting rid of some of those useless brain cells
themoananddove.com
460 West St. • Rte 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day

Want to Jumpstart your business?
Advertise with the Collegian

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Your friend is very sorry for the trouble he/she got you in to.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Don't blow your bubble gum bubble too big. It might pop in your face.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
It's time for you to unpack your suitcase. Otherwise, you'll never do it.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Try to be considerate of your roommate. It will save you trouble down the road.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
No one else buys two pounds of fudge and eats it all at once.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You never know when you might meet that special person. Today is as good a day as any.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Start thinking of ways to scrounge up money for your books.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Don't ignore the tell-tale signs. They couldn't be more obvious.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Don't switch your major again! It's time to settle on something.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Time to do some spring cleaning. Be prepared to find something shocking under the bed.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
The world shouldn't have anything against puffy down coats.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You are in desperate need of some New Year's resolutions.

YOGA
Starts January 31*
Monday/Wednesday
12:30 – 1:45 pm Power Yoga (1-3)
2:00 – 3:15 pm Restorative (1-2)
Tuesday/Thursday
1:00 – 2:15 pm Yoga Basics (1-2)
2:30 – 3:45 pm Intermediate (2-3)
4:00 – 5:15 pm Yoga Basics (1-2)
TAI CHI
Starts February 8
Tuesdays 7:30 – 8:30 pm
*SAVE $ WITH OUR EARLY BIRD SPECIALS!
TO REGISTER
Campus Recreation, Boyden 215
413-545-0022
www.umass.edu/umim

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

ANNOUNCEMENTS | ANNOUNCEMENTS | ANNOUNCEMENTS | COMPUTERS | EMPLOYMENT | SERVICES | TRAVEL | TRAVEL

Place your classified here!

Relief aid effort scarce

JAPAN from A3

As for the exchange students, many found that living in Japan, a country prone to earthquakes and tsunamis, has been an awakening experience.

Vaida Vaitkude, 27 of Lithuania, thought it has made a difference "because you're closer, not only geographically but to the people."

"In Australia, we have quite a bit of cyclones," Alan Porta, 23, of Australia, said. "But living in Tokyo where there are earthquakes and tsunamis on a regular basis, it puts it in a different perspective."

"In retrospect, we should not look so much at what happened," Porta said. "But what could have happened in Tokyo ... The same one [in Southeast Asia] wouldn't have killed just 200,000. That comes from living in Tokyo."

Smith College helps in aid

TSUNAMI AID from A5

After her home was flooded by the tsunami wave and her country was devastated, Smith College freshman Yasasri Gammampila, 20, says she knew she wanted to help the people of Sri Lanka.

"When [] heard about the tsunami[, I felt like ... it was a time I should have been there," she said. "It's a really bad feeling when you know you can't do anything."

But Gammampila is planning to do more than just "anything." She is planning a charity event with the Student Government Association and Asian Students Association to organize the event, which is set to feature a slide show of before and after pictures of the country's beaches, a documentary, and a donation collection.

Although her parents and family members have been accounted for, Gammampila said there were a few anxious hours on Dec. 26 when she couldn't reach her parents by phone.

"I was immediately worried. My house is 200 feet from the sea," she said. "The phone lines were dead. [But] my parents [are] safe, thank God."

Gammampila says she considers herself lucky — some of her friends were not so fortunate.

"I spoke with a friend who still has an uncle missing. You don't know what to say to something like that," she said.

Gammampila's event is scheduled for Feb. 7, at 12 p.m. in the Neilson Browsing Room on the Smith Campus.

"Whatever money we can raise, even if it's just $500, it helps people," she said.

People looking to donate or aid in Haneef Sahabdeen's tsunami relief fund can mail donations to Sri Lanka Disaster Relief Fund, P.O. Box 3061, Amherst, MA 01004-3061.

UMass employees may donate through the University of Massachusetts Amherst Community Campaign, or UMACC. Checks or cash can be dropped off in the UMACC office in 305 Whitmore or call 545-0209.

Faculty members' study looks at aging

By Hannah Drake
Collegian Staff

Four University of Massachusetts faculty members will commence studies about human aging this February to learn about different aspects of the aging process.

The faculty, which include David Marquez of the exercise science department, and Rebecca Ready, Susan Krauss Whitbourne and Tammy Rahhal of the psychology department created a common interest group after learning about each other's individual projects last semester.

Rahhal's research project concerns how to maximize the memory performance of the elderly. Whitbourne's studies involve "Baby Boomer" midlife self-identification and personality, and personality development after college through midlife.

"There are a lot of negative stereotypes surrounding the aging, and a lot of misunderstandings about the psychology of aging. People generally think of it as a time of decline, and loss ... there are some more positive [aspects] in nature that we don't understand as well," Ready said.

Ready's research project will involve about 80 participants. It has been designed to show how recall of mood and emotions changes as people age.

To conduct the study, Ready plans to have participants record their feelings daily for four weeks. Ready said she would then proceed to test their recollection and ask volunteers how they think they felt over the four-week time span. The younger half of the participants will be between the ages 20 and 40, and the other half ages 65 and older.

"At the end of the four weeks, I might ask somebody how depressed did they feel. They don't look at their journals. They'll see how well they remember, and we'll compare the older age group to the younger age group," Ready said.

Ready said the project might reveal that the elderly have better emotion recall than younger people.

Marquez will be conducting a study that examines the barriers to regular physical activity amongst caretakers of those with dementia, which includes Alzheimer's disease.

"[Caretakers] spend so much of their time caring for somebody else, they often neglect their own physical and mental health. They're more at risk for different diseases because their immune function will be decreased," Marquez said.

Through his research, Marquez hopes to target the main obstacle caregivers see to their ability to exercise.

"The goal of this cross-sectional study is to ... address the factors that overall care-givers have identified as determinants related to their lack of exercise," Marquez said.

Marquez said that participants will be given questionnaires that inquire about the social support they receive to exercise, how much activity they do during a typical day, and what barriers participants find that prevent them from exercising.

To measure the volunteer's activity, Marquez proposed that subjects use accelerometers, which measure any movement the wearer makes, akin to an upgraded pedometer.

Campus Perspectives

What is the coolest thing you did over break?

By Alex Demosthene

"Got lost in the subways of New York City."
Sarah Modr
Junior Theater major

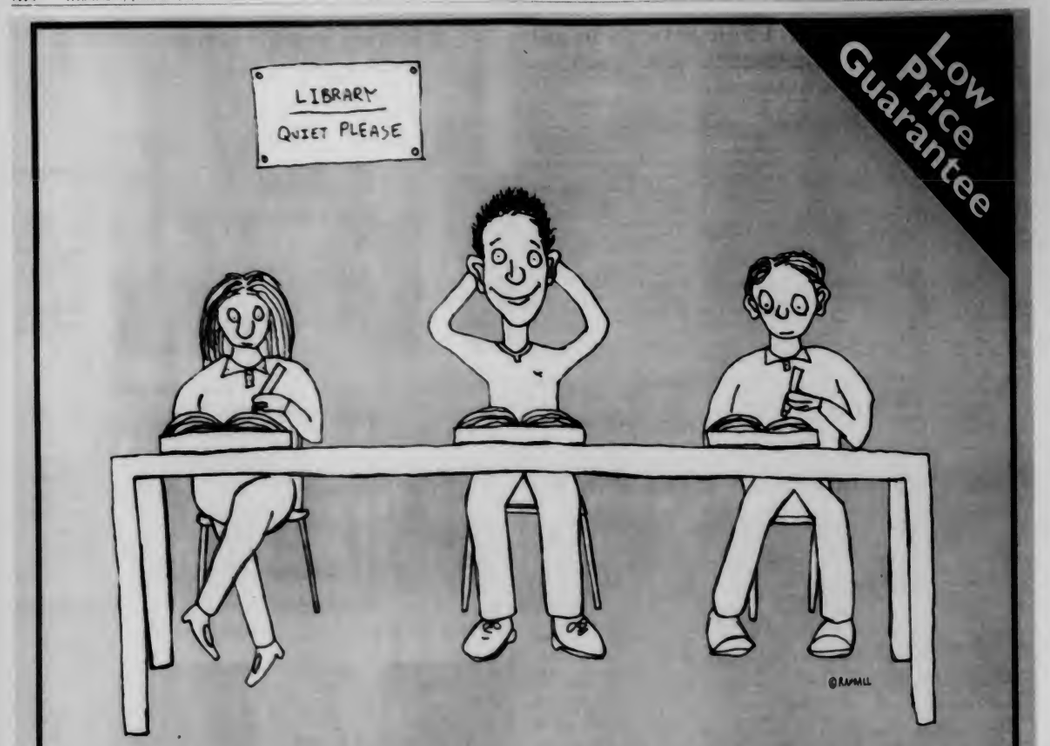
"Ice-skating on the Frog Pond in Boston."
Rebecca Margolin
Junior
Geographyx major

"Attended a wedding for the first time in my life."
Anna Darkua
Senior
Psychology major

"Had people over my apartment on New Year's Eve to hang out and watch the ball drop."
Kristen Bouley
Junior
History major

"Went running in the cold."
Paul Noone
Junior
Legal Studies major



"I worked a lot and golfed five times. It was great."
Lipino Bou
Junior
Communications major

New Wireless Services from The Daily Collegian over 7,000 ringtones – mobile coupons horoscopes – NCAA football and basketball alerts
Go to www.dailycollegian.com and look for the "Wireless Services" link

SLEEPY HOLLOW BED CO.
MATTRESSES • FUTONS • BEDS • ETC.
ADVOCATE ★BEST★ OF THE VALLEY READERS' POLL 2004
Memory Foam
Sealy
328 COLLEGE STREET • RT. 9 AMHERST • 253-2337

MAKING UHS WORK FOR YOU without the wait!
University Health services is pleased to announce our new Open Clinic Process for same day appointments!
SAME DAY AFTERNOON APPOINTMENTS can be made Monday through Friday beginning at 8:00 a.m. on a first come, first serve basis. Call 577-5101 or stop by any clinic area to schedule your appointment.
SICK RIGHT NOW AND CAN'T WAIT FOR AN APPOINTMENT? Urgent Care is open 24 hours a day for unexpected medical problems that cannot wait for an appointment. (Please note that UHS is not an emergency room. If you have a life-threatening emergency, call 911 immediately.)
NEED YOUR BIRTH CONTROL PRESCRIPTION REFILLED? HAVE A SORE THROAT? CALL AHEAD!
413.577.5000 (main number) • 413.577.5101 (appointments) • 413.577.5229 (advice nurse line) •
UMASS AMHERST
University Health Services
150 Infirmary Way
www.umass.edu/uhs

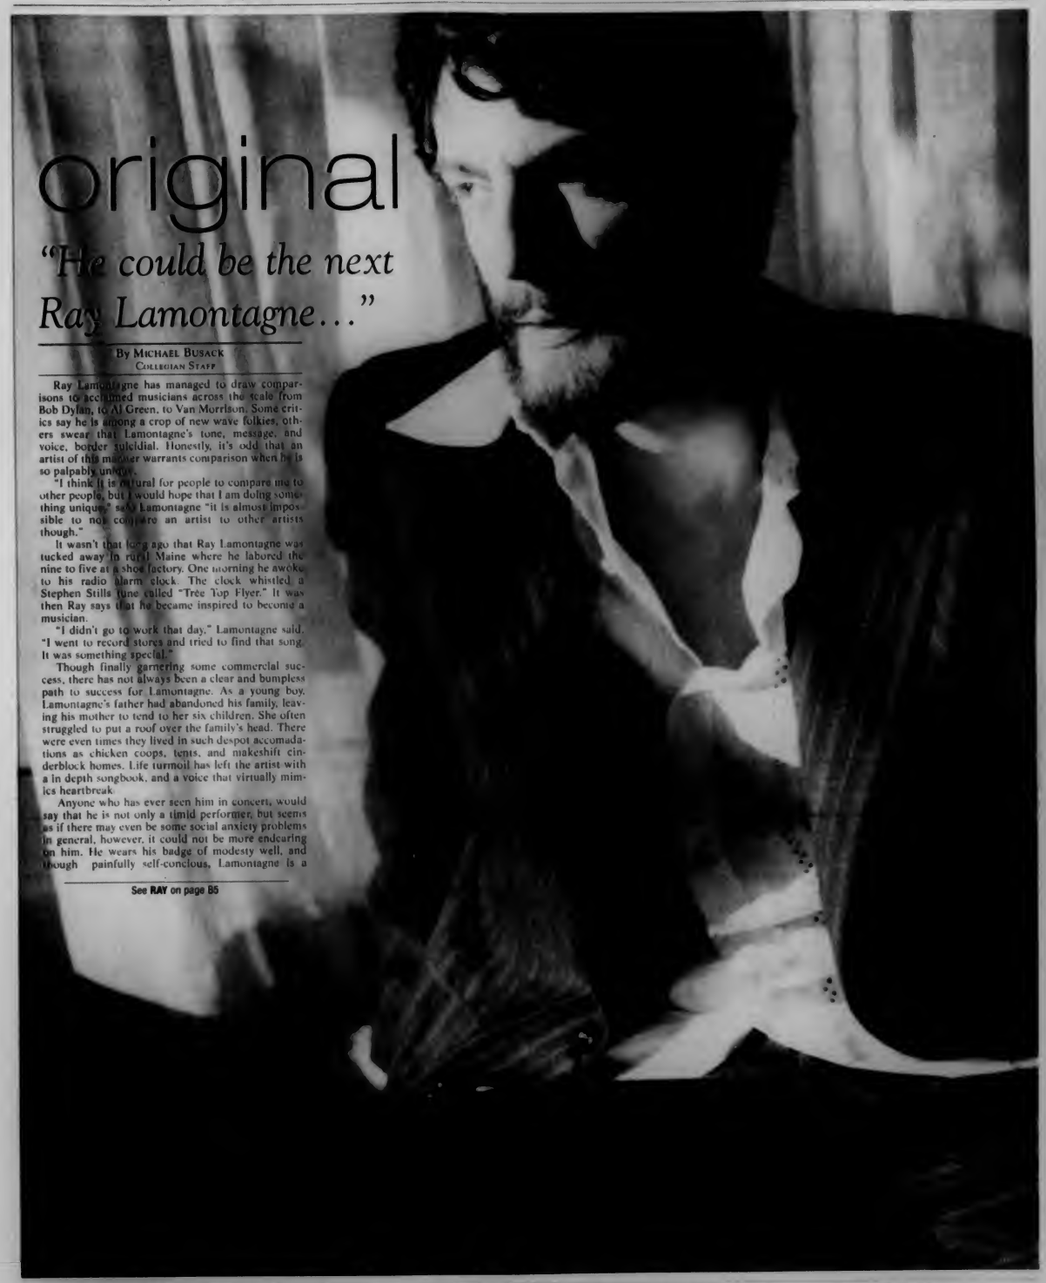
DON'T THINK OF THEM AS USED.
THINK OF THEM AS PRE-HIGHLIGHTED.

Be smart.
Shop the biggest selection of used books and save up to 25%.*

Save all your Textbook Annex receipts and you can earn a 5% Rebate good at the University Store.

Get the card that saves you cash...
Pick up your student saver card today!
See store for details.

UMASS AMHERST
University Store
and Textbook Annex
Phone: (413)545-2619



efollett.com
ONLINE. ON CAMPUS.

* Over the cost of new.
 See store for details.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

Wednesday, January 26, 2005 arts@dailycollegian.com original

"He could be the next Ray Lamontagne..."

By Michael Busack
Collegian Staff

Ray Lamontagne has managed to draw comparisons to acclaimed musicians across the scale from Bob Dylan, to Al Green, to Van Morrison. Some critics say he is among a crop of new wave folkies, others swear that Lamontagne's tone, message, and voice, border soleidial. Honestly, it's odd that an artist of this manner warrants comparison when he is so palpably unique.

"I think it is natural for people to compare me to other people, but I would hope that I am doing something unique," says Lamontagne "it is almost impossible to not compare an artist to other artists though."

It wasn't that long ago that Ray Lamontagne was tucked away in rural Maine where he labored the nine to five at a shoe factory. One morning he awoke to his radio alarm clock. The clock whistled a Stephen Stills tune called "Tree Top Flyer." It was then Ray says that he became inspired to become a musician.

"I didn't go to work that day," Lamontagne said. "I went to record stores and tried to find that song. It was something special."

Though finally garnering some commercial success, there has not always been a clear and bumpless path to success for Lamontagne. As a young boy, Lamontagne's father had abandoned his family, leaving his mother to tend to her six children. She often struggled to put a roof over the family's head. There were even times they lived in such despot accomodations as chicken coops, tents, and makeshift cinderblock homes. Life turmoil has left the artist with a in depth songbook, and a voice that virtually mimics heartbreak.

Anyone who has ever seen him in concert, would say that he is not only a timid performer, but seems as if there may even be some social anxiety problems in general, however, it could not be more endearing on him. He wears his badge of modesty well, and though painfully self-conclous, Lamontagne is a

See RAY on page B5

Laura Bush makes fashion comeback

By Chris Gazzara
Collegian Staff

...dy position is the only post in public office that has no ...ress it have a distinct function. That is, except to wear ...ration gown and a couple fancy designer suits.

...n's inception the First Lady's fashion of choice for ...ring-in has captured the nation's intrigue. It has not ...r what other duties were expected of her.

...es of the First Lady were never less tangible than ...ington took the original position. Knowing she had ...l power, she took on the role of hostess in the ...gnant dignity. Through social interaction she was ... her husband's career and create valuable connections ...while throwing some rocking good parties.

...the second First Lady in American history became ... of her husband John Adams. He considered her a ...d often consulted her for advice throughout his pres-

...ven within our first two presidencies the idea of ...ould be radically different. There has, however, ...dition that has not changed year to year and that is ...king of choosing the inaugural gown.

...en known for her fashion choices. She herself ... "matronly" to describe her sense of style. This ...rly on par with today's more bold and cutting edge ... This year, despite her ignorance to style, she chose a designer that seems to understand her need to be subtle, but pleasing.

While not considered mod by any stretch of the imagination, Oscar de la Renta was, and still is, considered a classic haute couture house of fashion.

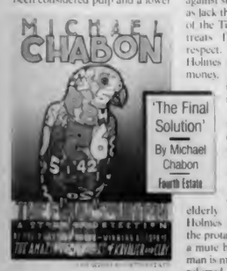
The name de la Renta leaves hope for a continual fashion comeback from Mrs. Bush. Ever classy and dignified, but not exactly up to speed, de la Renta is a perfect match for her.

Embroidered with Austrian crystals and crafted with fine tulle, this ice blue inauguration dress beats its predecessor, a red scoop neck dress of Chantilly lace fitted, once again, with Austrian crystals. The Michael Faircloth gown worn by Mrs. Bush in 2001 seems to have been an idea better left on paper. Faircloth's sensibility has, in the past, been described as being inspired by the feminine form and has a great appreciation for the strength of statuesque beauty. That is all well and good, but looking at photographs taken from the president's first Inauguration, it seems the gown fell short of creating a statuesque shape for Mrs. Bush and just made her look, well, large. With a curvy, size eight figure, she could potentially pull off a very regal design.

Mrs. Bush also wore a Caroline Herrera work to the Black Tie and Boots Ball, hosted by

See DRESS on page B6

A big improvement



Known for her conservative and modest style in the past, First Lady Laura Bush made a conscious effort to improve her style for this year's Inaugural Ball.

Chabon release sure to garner attention

By Spencer Ziegler
Collegian Staff

Pulitzer Prize winning author Michael Chabon continues to blur the lines between high art and low art with his latest novella "The Final Solution." Chabon's 2001 Pulitzer winning novel "The Amazing Adventures of Kavalier and Clay" surprised people when he took up the comic industry as his subject matter. Comics have been considered pulp and a lower form of art, much like the reputation that Arthur Conan Doyle unjustly receives for his Sherlock Holmes stories. In "The Final Solution" Michael Chabon has borrowed the character of Holmes in order to write a fascinating story about seemingly unsolvable mysteries.

Many authors have employed Doyle's character in their writing and most of them cheaply. Stories have been written pitting Holmes against such silly antagonists such as Jack the Ripper and the sinking of the Titanic. However, Chabon treats Doyle's character with respect. He writes a Sherlock Holmes story not just to make money, but to hammer home important themes and ideas.

Sherlock Holmes is reinvented in Chabon's "Final Solution."

The Sherlock Holmes in "The Final Solution" is different from the one seen in Doyle's works. When Holmes hung up his detecting boots he retired to a simple life as a bee-keeper. It is this elderly and less competent Holmes that Chabon chooses as the protagonist in his story. When a mute boy looses a parrot and a man is murdered, Holmes (who is referred to simply as "the old

See SOLUTION on page B7

Punkers shine in sophomore effort

By Craig Leger
Collegian Correspondent

On Tuesday, Feb. 1 the highly anticipated album of Orlando natives, Anberlin, will hit shelves across the country and will likely sweep the rock community by storm.

The catchy riffs of lead guitarist Joseph Milligan, mixed with the bass talents of Deon Rexroat and unimaginable drum patterns of Nathan Young, all topped-off with the talented vocals of Stephen Christian, all combine to make Anberlin. This group hits the ears hard with every beat of every track. Their melodic style, however, remains unabrasive enough for the listener's senses.

In the summer of 2002 the four-piece alternative rock band was signed to Tooth & Nail Records and one year later, they produced their first full length album, "Blueprints for the Black Market." This February, the rockers will release their sophomore effort, a disc critics claim is one of the most anticipated record releases of the year.

The 11-track "Never Take Friendship Personal" does not offer up a single disappointment, despite the fact that it is only 40 minutes long. With brevity as its only drawback, listeners may want to pick up both of Anberlin's prior releases because their popularity and talent seems to be growing larger and larger every day. As the number one band on www.purevolume.com currently, Anberlin has rightfully racked up almost 400,000 total plays.

Anberlin
'Never Take Friendship Personal'
Tooth and Nail

Straight from the get-go, the opening chords to the title track, "Never Take Friendship Personal," warns the listener of what they are getting into. Once that beat gets into the brainwaves, its smooth sailing from there throughout the rest of the album to the last track, "Dance, Dance Christa Patfgen".

On Feb. 15 Stephen, Joey, Deon, and Nate of Anberlin will be teaming up with Head Automatica, Hawthorne Heights, and headliner Sugarcult on the Take Action Tour. Take Action is a non-profit organization that uses its powerful music sense and connection to influence people's awareness of suicide and mental health.

According to the Take Action Tour website, "Since 2001, the Take Action Tour has been teamed up with the National Hopeline Network, 1-800-SUICIDE, and thanks to the petition gathering and fundraising from fans like you, suicide and the mental health challenges leading to suicide have gained national attention in the halls of government."

Like fellow label-mates Further Seems Forever, Anberlin is just one of those bands that people are always waiting for new stuff from. The wait is over, "Never Take Friendship Personal" hits stores on Feb. 1 and Anberlin hits the road two weeks later. The tour stops in Boston at The Roxy on March 8.

Information from takeactiontour.com was used in this report.

COURTESY TOOTH AND NAIL

With the release of their second album, "Never take friendship personal," the band Amberlin is generating much talk with music critics.

Middle East brings less than 'Ordinary' show to Cambridge

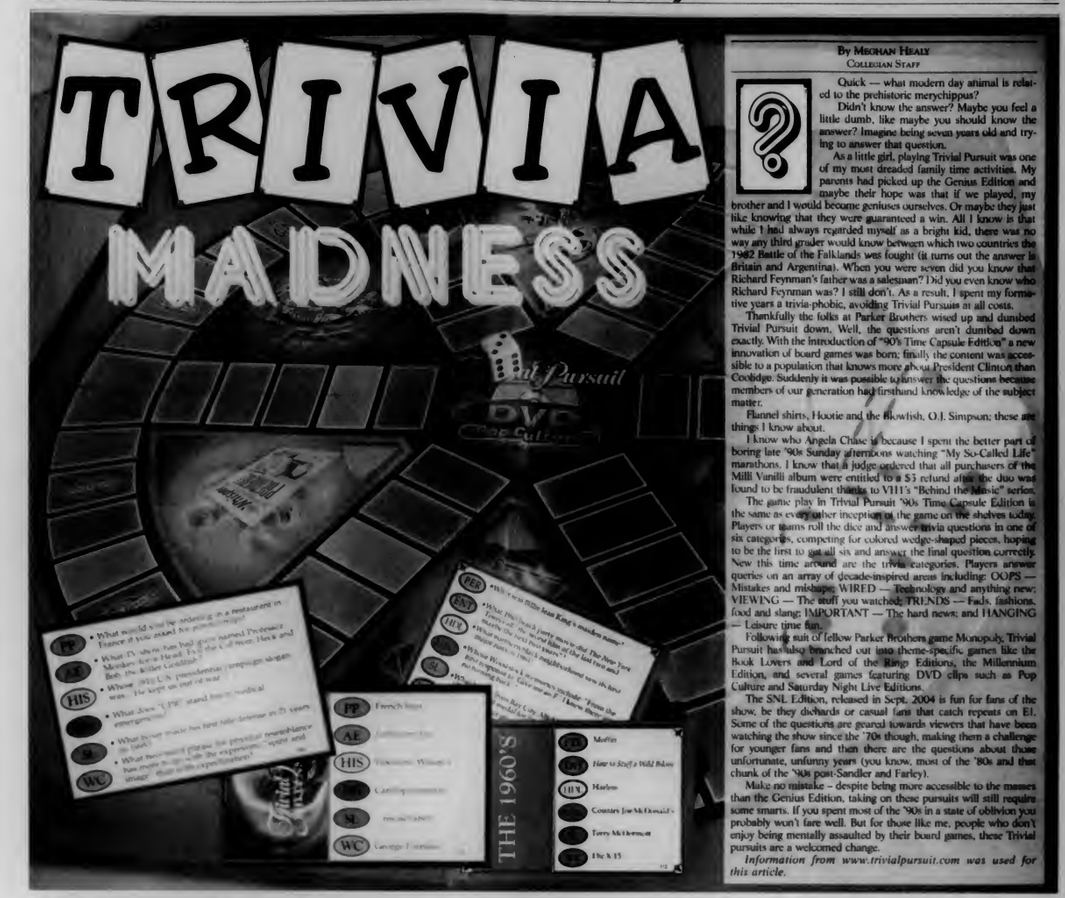
By Matthew M. Burke
Collegian Staff

The world of unsigned bands trying to make a name for themselves is a dazzling realm filled with humorous names an outrageous antics. Instead of stadiums, they play in bars and night clubs. Unsigned bands are accessible to their fans and are generally happy to chat about music and life. They play for the love of it, and for money or fame. Following suit, Ordinary K took an average Wednesday night and made Boston get down and dirty. In their second Boston show in a year, they have improved with the addition of a new guitar player and new songs that compliment their maturity as both musicians and as artists.

On Jan. 12 the stage was set at the Middle East in Cambridge for an amazing night, to say the least. The bill featured former UMass Spring Concert performer and Northampton mainstay, Cold Duck Complex, as well as Frequency 7 featuring Boston's own Amadeus, Electric Donkey, and headliner Ordinary K.

The night started out with Cold Duck Complex taking the stage. Cold Duck won the 2003 UMass Battle of the Bands and hails from Amherst. They blended jazz, funk, and hip-hop splendidly, warming up the crowd as it filtered into the venue from Massachusetts Avenue. Extremely impressive were both lead singer Casey Hayman's lyricism and drummer Makaya McCraven's constant pounding of his three-piece kit that laid down constant earth shattering beats throughout their set. The keyboardist was almost too talented for the band as he played strange melodies and sounds that didn't really fit, but all in all, they were a pleasant experience.

Two less impressive bands took the stage after Cold Duck Complex, the first being Frequency 7. This group featured several rappers and several singers accompanied by funky baselines and soothing beats. The highlight of their set was a cover of "The Seed" by The Roots. A rapper from Boston who goes by the name of Amadeus, however, was a Frequency 7 show stealer. His 2004 release, entitled "Silent Screams and Dry Tears," is a breath of fresh air in today's underground rap scene. Song's like "Boston Boogie," "Get Familiar," and "Rapture"



See ORDINARY on page B4

Ordinary K
Middle East Cambridge
Jan. 12

COURTESY FANARTISTS.COM

The Middle East, home to performances by many "indie" bands, welcomed the popular band Ordinary K to play for a large crowd at the Cambridge venue.

By Meghan Healy
Collegian Staff

Quick — what modern day animal is related to the prehistoric merychippus?

Didn't know the answer? Maybe you feel a little dumb, like maybe you should know the answer? Imagine being seven years old and trying to answer that question.

As a little girl, playing Trivial Pursuit was one of my most dreaded family time activities. My parents had picked up the Genius Edition and maybe their hope was that if we played, my brother and I would become geniuses ourselves. Or maybe they just like knowing that they were guaranteed a win. All I know is that while I had always regarded myself as a bright kid, there was no way any third grader would know between which two countries the 1982 Battle of the Falklands was fought (it turns out the answer is Britain and Argentina). When you were seven did you know that Richard Feynman's father was a salesman? Did you even know who Richard Feynman was? I still don't. As a result, I spent my formative years a trivia-phobic, avoiding Trivial Pursuits at all costs.

Thankfully the folks at Parker Brothers wised up and dumbed Trivial Pursuit down. Well, the questions aren't dumbed down exactly. With the introduction of "90's Time Capsule Edition" a new innovation of board games was born; finally, the content was accessible to a population that knows more about President Clinton than Coolidge. Suddenly it was possible to answer the questions because members of our generation had firsthand knowledge of the subject matter.

Flannel shirts, Hootie and the Blowfish, O.J. Simpson; these are things I know about.

I know who Angela Chase is because I spent the better part of boring late '90s Sunday afternoons watching "My So-Called Life" marathons. I know that a judge ordered that all purchasers of the Milli Vanilli album were entitled to a $5 refund after the duo was found to be fraudulent thanks to VH1's "Behind the Music" series.

The game play in Trivial Pursuit '90s Time Capsule Edition is the same as ever since inception of the game on the shelves today. Players or teams roll the dice and answer trivia questions in one of six categories, competing for colored wedge-shaped pieces, hoping to be the first to get all six and answer the final question correctly. New this time around are the trivia categories. Players answer queries on an array of decade-inspired areas including: OOPS — Mistakes and mishaps; WIRED — Technology and anything new; VIEWING — The stuff you watched; TRENDS — Fads, fashions, food and slang; IMPORTANT — The hard news; and HANGING — Leisure time fun.

Following suit of fellow Parker Brothers game Monopoly, Trivial Pursuit has also branched out into theme-specific games like the Book Lovers and Lord of the Rings Editions, the Millennium Edition, and several games featuring DVD clips such as Pop Culture and Saturday Night Live Editions.

The SNL Edition, released in Sept. 2004 is fun for fans of the show, be they diehards or casual fans that catch repeats on E!. Some of the questions are geared towards viewers that have been watching the show since the '70s though, making them a challenge for younger fans and then there are the questions about those unfortunate, unfunny years (you know, most of the '80s and that chunk of the '90s post-Sandler and Farley).

Make no mistake – despite being more accessible to the masses than the Genius Edition, taking on these pursuits will still require some smarts. If you spent most of the '90s in a state of oblivion you probably won't fare well. But for those like me, people who don't enjoy being mentally assaulted by their board games, these Trivial pursuits are a welcomed change.

Information from www.trivialpursuit.com was used for this article.

Discover Your LOVER
The Collegian Dating Game

Win A Free Date!

3 lucky Men and 3 lucky Women will be selected to go on a blind date.
Collegian readers will select who will date whom!

Sign-ups will be held in the Campus Center Concourse
Monday Jan. 31st through Thursday Feb. 3rd from 11-2

Look in the Arts Section for the final 3 Men on Monday, February 8th
The final 3 women on Tuesday, February 9th
Then start voting online at www.dailycollegian.com!

BUY YOUR TEXTBOOKS AT HALF.COM

AND SAVE UP TO 40% OFF* THE LIST PRICE.

How great is this? Find great savings on new or used textbooks you need this semester. Go to half.com and enter the titles or ISBN numbers. That's it!

Save an additional $5
on a purchase of $50 or more.
Redeem this coupon by entering this code:
AMHERST2005
at half.com
For a limited time, first-time buyers only. See conditions below.

half.com™ by ebay®

*Claim based on comparison of average selling price (excluding shipping and handling) for top 10% of textbooks (by unit volume) sold on Half.com from August 1st-September 11, 2004 and listed as "brand new" by the seller, with list price for same title. Textbooks are defined as undergraduate and graduate textbooks and exclude reference books and novels/literature.

Offer valid for $5 off a purchase of $50 or more at half.com only. Offer valid for first time buyers only. Dollar value must be a minimum of $50.00 before the discount is applied and does not include shipping, handling, taxes or insurance. This coupon cannot be combined with any other coupon, discount, gift certificate or promotion. Any potential refund will not include the coupon or its redemption value. Void where prohibited. Open only to U.S. residents 18 years of age or older. Promotion subject to change without notice. Offer expires on March 31, 2005 at 11:59:59 EST.

© 2004 eBay Inc.

The company you keep

Author Susan Scott discusses the do's and dont's of conversation

By Amy Forni
Collegian Correspondent

"Fierce: robust, intense, strong, powerful, passionate, eager, unbridled." Synonyms for fierce decorate the front cover of "Fierce Conversations," by Susan Scott, the national bestseller that focuses on improving our understanding of one another and the meaning we take from interactions.

Scott offers a guide to good conversation in her new book.

'Fierce Conversations'
By Susan Scott
Berkeley Publishing

The strength, genuineness and energy supporting our words determine how we relate to our colleagues, friends and families. For those of you desiring more evocative, sincere relationships, "Fierce Conversations" will help rescue you from drab diatribes that leave you searching for clarity and truth.

Do you ever find your mind preoccupied with the next two hours, or even two minutes, while someone is talking to you? You see their lips moving, usually in slow motion, and your ears listen to their words from underwater. How about talking to someone and throwing in random, obscene comments to help their distracted eyes focus on you. Although frank comments sometimes hit a sensitive nerve, wouldn't we benefit from always speaking honestly? And wouldn't our words be free without any hidden messages attached?

Susan Scott, founder and Chief Executive Officer of Fierce Incorporated since 1999, wrote "Fierce Conversations" to help people achieve "success at work and in life, one conversation at a time." Her self-improvement guide focuses on seven principles to integrate in our everyday conversations.

To demonstrate the goal of her principles she uses entertaining and relatable narratives, examples, quotes and exercises. Her guideline to enhancing conversations and ultimately improving our lives include: "Master the Courage to Interrogate Reality," "Come Out from Behind Yourself into the Conversation and Make It Real," "Be Here, Prepared to Be Nowhere Else," "Tackle Your Toughest Challenge Today," "Obey Your Instincts," "Take Responsibility for Your Emotional Wake" and "Let Silence Do the Heavy Lifting."

The principles collaboratively discuss the importance of being honest with ourselves and others. Each conversation should have a goal while we speak with clarity and purpose. Scott elaborates on the importance of finding meaning in and touching someone with our words. She emphasizes honesty and truly focusing on what each other has to say. For example, Scott's principle, "Be Here, Prepared to Be Nowhere Else," discusses the importance of committing to a conversation and not becoming distracted with our own thoughts or our

See FIERCE on page B5

Williams' album good, but lacks heart

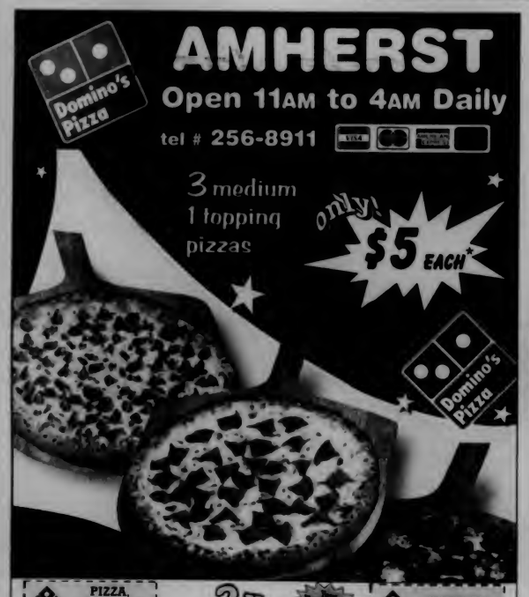
By Chris Gazzara
Collegian Staff

Vanessa Williams is a name that has always been in the background of American pop culture. From her fall from grace in 1984 after becoming the dirtiest Miss America around to her triumph as Ebony Scrooge in "A Diva's Christmas Carol," Williams has always offered up her talent in a way that is accessible and entertaining. She now gives us another album, "Everlasting Love," full of feel good seventies tracks that is mostly enjoyable, but at times lackluster.

Vanessa William's voice is a pure instrument. On tracks like "Never Can Say Goodbye" you can hear the clearness of direction and intonation. Her interpretation of these songs is close to flawless. She possesses a technically impressive voice that rivals some of the best singers in recording history. At times, however, she lacks the complete roundness of emotion that comes from our greater vocalists of the last 20 years, like Whitney Houston, Mariah Carey or Celine Dion.

It is clear in each track that these are some of William's favorite songs to sing, and the concept of the album being exclusively covers of love songs from the 70s' actually seems to work for her. Unfortunately however, on the whole, the album seems to lack the gusto that it takes to create a truly memorable hit record.

In the many articles and interviews published on Vanessa Williams there is the sense that she is more interested in singing as a means to stretch herself across multitudes of genres rather than to express musical passions or creative urges. She herself requested that her new record deal include promotional work that would not interfere with the other facets of her life and career.



The deal created with her best interest in mind, also stated she would record and release an album of Christmas tunes (released in October) as well, not exactly indicative of a desire to make art. Still, not all music is created with the intention of creating a masterpiece. For [illegible] son, despite all of Vanessa's investment, she falls short even of those recently turned out by younger rivals like Jessica Simpson, or Christina Aguilera.

Tracks like "First Time I Ever Saw Your Face" sound like they haven't really been reinvented, nor has there been much effort put into making the song completely her own. However, on "Send One Your Love," Williams lays down her most sincere and flattering vocals. The song is light and up-tempo with a jazzy feel much like the classic "Girl from Ipanema." This is probably the best song on the album.

"With You I'm Born Again," a duet with George Benson, is another beautiful track. Benson is a great guest vocalist and seems to bring out the purity in Vanessa's voice, though the arrangement itself is best suited for "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde." It is no wonder she was so successful on Broadway.

A challenge that faces Ms. Williams is that in this day, age unfortunately matters. Even the majority of adults are either listening to music from their era, or are already right at step beside kids our age listening to more contemporary music. Vanessa certainly has a following, but this isn't 1992. Most people have forgotten "Save the Best for Last," a rank Vanessa doesn't want to place into. She's worth more than that.

The very name Vanessa Williams evokes fond memories of Disney's "Pocahontas." Her intense beauty, [illegible] interpretations on camera and [illegible] house spread have won her the [illegible] lions. Her desire to have a [illegible] denotes a need to make music and [illegible] our hearts. What is lacking [illegible] William's sincerity. Her voice [illegible] which is lacking in [illegible] that doesn't sound the same [illegible] track forward.

Some not-so-'Ordinary' K

ORDINARY from page B2

finally draw a line in the sand with regard to the dominance enjoyed by New York's underground hip-hop scene. However, his role in this side project is very small.

Electric Donkey followed Frequency 7. They took the stage and from the start it was very hard to take them seriously. They carried themselves in a goofy yet laid back fashion that resembled Blink 182 in their early days of performing live. At one point a band member played the spoons with bongo accompaniment. It was a humorous moment, but it pretty much summed up their performance.

The headliner Ordinary K, whose members hail from Colorado to Cape Cod to South Carolina stepped off the street, coming from a friend's house, and watched the other acts over a few house beers. Ordinary K consists of Todd "Woodz" Woodward (mic/vocals), newcomer Mikey B (guitar), James Walton (keyboards), James Bruner (bass), and Jeremy Bretey (drums). After Electric Donkey cleared the stage, Ordinary K front man Woodward demanded that the detached crowd move closer to the stage. The crowd gingerly complied and Ordinary K took control of the room with their extraordinary stage presence.

They started right into their high-energy set of hip-hop/funk/reggae, which infected the crowd, and the dancing started immediately. They played everything from fan favorites like "Hello" and "Honey Sweet" to new material inspired from their tour of Jamaica for last year's Spring Break. At one point Woodz and the rest of Ordinary K raised their beers to the crowd in appreciation, due to the fact that the crowd had done nothing but bob their heads during the other bands, and now were alive. Everyone then continued to get lost in dancing, drinking and song.

Ordinary K has conquered everywhere they have played, from Jamaica to Colorado, from New York City to Vermont, and they have now started playing in Massachusetts on a regular basis.

Back to the beginning: How the Eve column came to life

Eve
Original Sin

They are a typical campus couple. She is bigger than he is and spends most of the day basking in her own glorious t for the most part life together is bliss, comfortable, both of them making tiny adjustments for one another in a single-sized dorm room.

When the lights are on they are inseparable. She hangs on him and he keeps her afloat. In the night they sleep peacefully together on top of, beneath, upside down, neck to neck, always touching each other as if their relationship moved in unison. I guess I could say that until the holidays it was just another relationship without a major ripple. Maybe it was the anxiety of leaving the dorms; the packing, the change in weather, the shift in the camaraderie of college life or the trip home. Maybe their rhythm of a stress-free co-existence got mixed up in the transition from rural life to life in the city. Holidays have a habit of shaking things up and bringing out the worst of our animal instincts, but a massacre on the first day of vacation, a night where they even turned on their best friends, was the last thing I expected.

I believe I can mark the rise and fall of my most painful relationship at UMass by the size of my turtles. It was summer, my 21st birthday, and we were in the middle of a heat wave. As a surprise, my beloved boyfriend snatched me off my towel at the beach on Martha's Vineyard for a New York City shopping spree. There we were on Canal Street in Chinatown, searching for the perfect birthday present — a faux Louis Vuitton hand-bag.

The crowded street was unbearable with the stench of raised armpits, used and reused bargains, not-so-fresh-fish, rotting mangos, pickled cabbage and caged birds about to keel over from sun-stroke. Hundreds of people filled the sidewalks and stores, for there was no escaping the heat. I was suddenly irritated that this is how I might spend my birthday. He held my hand firmly as we pushed past the endless blocks of street hawkers that were desperate enough to sell anything to hungry buyers like ourselves. He was absolutely determined to get me this bag because he wanted to make me happy.

We stopped in front of a suspicious old man who had a full wall of Louis knockoffs behind him. I looked up and studied each one carefully. One was too small, another too brown, some too bulky, none were quite right. I turned around to say the fake was too fake when I caught my boyfriend looking slightly startled and rugged me away.

"Come on, let's go. I am sure they have more around this place."

He almost pushed me off the curb in a failed attempt to sway me away from something. I knew it must be good if he was so persistent so I had no choice but to dodge his grip and see for myself.

There were turtles! Hundreds of them in a bowl, in this heat, on the street! Each one was no bigger than a quarter reminding me of a cracker-jack wind-up toy. I had to have one. I mean two, because every pet should have a friend. He looked at me and sighed,

"How much for two, sir?"

He pulled out his wallet and shook his head as he thumbed the money that should have been for what he wanted me to want.

"Twenty dollar wit cage an food an turtle."

My boyfriend's mouth dropped open, but closed immediately when he saw my expression.

"Thank you," I said with a glow as if I had just given birth to my first child. He rolled his eyes and we made our exit. I gripped the cage tightly, but as I turned to catch up with him on the sidewalk, I felt a sudden ache of truth rush my heart: These turtles will probably outlast our relationship.

I really had no intention of studying at UMass Amherst. I was a happy student living in Israel, a country that never sleeps. I studied at Tel Aviv University for two full years in between Shabbats on the beach, nights at discos, and afternoons stitching up stray dogs and cats at an animal shelter. It was a life of youthful ignorance until the night I was standing in line at the Dolphinarium, a favorite beachside night club, when life changed from happy-go-lucky to a nightmarish game of Russian roulette.

One terrorist bomb can spoil your whole life, twenty in quick succession can turn the world upside down. The Middle East was blowing up, taking with it family, friends and friends of friends. Being an only child, I was not left with the option to tempt fate. With much pressure from my mother to come back to the safety of the States, one near miss explosion at the neighborhood mall helped me make the difficult decision. I was ready. I told her, however, I would only return under one condition, I must find a pre-vet program near Boston and I must be accepted. She must have prayed properly because UMass admissions did everything possible to facilitate my transfer and I was on a plane within a month. Some say that everything happens for a reason. I really don't know if this is true.

He was different. He was cocky, arrogant, and exotic-flavored, with an entourage of card playing friends that stayed up all hours in the international dorm. Hindu, Indian, cocoa brown with a splash of freckles, a year senior to me, with endless energy to match my own. He was absolutely incredible in my eyes. I had never fallen so hard for anyone in my life. I studied his every move, every reaction, his every breath. I knew every nook of is body as if it were my own. I loved him so much it hurt, and I convinced myself that he must feel the same way.

I stayed on this cloud for almost two semesters, and then one morning I heard a knock at my door. It was a she with my he. I was nauseous. I was mortified. I was broken. They had something to tell me. He had cheated on me with his ex. I slapped him so hard the whole dorm probably heard it. Then I left. I did not cry, I did not sleep, and I did not eat. Apologies, recriminations, and eventually a reunion has left me regretting the whole ordeal to this day.

I know for a fact that love blinds. It can also make someone crazy, illogical, and may even eat away at life until there is nothing left. I was trying desperately to keep control, but I lost myself to him. We ended up staying together for six more months, but it was never the same. Our relationship was mostly one-sided because he was lazy and I made it too easy for him. I had never felt so much hate and so much love toward one person. Could I ever trust again? Is the pain of love and fear of loss really worth experiencing again? I was terrified of feeling and I could not help but ask if I had made a huge mistake.

But then my coin-sized turtles started growing into the size of my outstretched hand. And as they grew so did I. Within three months of the break up, they doubled in size, and I tripled my output in university endeavors. I woke up for 8 a.m. classes, I talked to new people, and I strengthened my friendships. I started to draw, paint, dance, study at the library, and most importantly, I started to write into a black, spiraled-bound book my mother had given me a year before.

"You never know when this journal could come in handy," she told me.

First I decided to use the walls of my single dorm room for most of my emotions instead. By the sixth month, I had painted every white inch of my walls into an oil pastel forest of heartbreak. There were overbearing trees, full-bodied leaves, and a large ocean at my

See EVE on page B8

Lamontagne: the next Dylan?

RAY from page B1

breath of fresh air in a market where most performers are teeming with bravado.

"I don't watch television," said Lamontagne about his his thoughts on his recent media exposure. "I've never been comfortable with myself. I lose all confidence when I see a photograph or a television appearance. So, I stay away from it. I use my audiences to gauge how things are going."

If you spoke to Mr. Lamontagne a year ago about his live performance, he most definetely would have said it was his least favorite aspect of the job. Now, today, he modestly admits that there are times that he enjoys performing for others.

"When the mood is right, and you I have a good crowd, it can be fun," Lamontagne said. "I've begun to really start enjoying myself."

Lamontagne recently made a stop at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton for a Sunday night set. The eager crowd, many of them packed in standing room only areas, anxiously awaited the spitfire songwriter, some of them for 3 hours.

The dim auburn house lights of the Iron Horse shuttered through the first few tunes of Lamontagne's set, as the performer managed to energetically pick through some new songs. Between the tunes, however, Lamontagne only muttered a few inaudible words, while staring blankly as if in awe of the large crowd that stood before him.

"I'm finding it a little difficult to concentrate tonight," he said multiple times between songs, each time prompting frenzied middle-aged women to shout things like, "sounds pretty good from here Ray."

Most of the songs Lamontagne performed on the night were from his debute album titled "Trouble." This disc has an array of love songs that can be best deemed personal and embracing. The album was put together with the effort of Ethan Johns, producer, and son of legendary producer Glyn Johns.

"We've become really fast friends over the past year or so," Lamontagne said in reference to his producer. " He is very enthusiastic, and generous with himself. I enjoyed working with him a great deal. I will be sticking with Eth' from now on."

So for now Mr. Lamontagne plans to hit the road to England and Ireland later this winter to play some select dates abroad. What will be in his cd player you might ask.

"Someone gave me a Van Morrisson record called Veedon Fleece a couple of months ago and I just have not been able to put it down ever since," he said. "It's a very complete record. I mean the songs are all different in their own right, but the album has a complete tone, like John Wesley Harding by Bob Dylan."

He also has been working on a great number of tracks that he plans to record for a sophomore effort this summer. Depending on contract negotiations with his label (RCA), we may see a new release within the new year.

Despite the hot selling albums, the successful tour dates, and the comparisons to music legends, Ray Lamontagne has yet to even consider compromising his art. Unique? Yes, but there is plenty of room in the music business for artists with even half of the moxy this man carries.

Lamontagne has reached much success with his first release.

The right way to speak 'Fierce' surroundings. Scott's witty, real, direct advice touches on a goal that most people wish to achieve: to enhance the meaning of our existences by being one-hundred ten percent attentive, interested, and compassionate in ourselves and the people we interact with.

FIERCE from page B4

"Fierce Conversations," embodies fearful realities people keep buried in the back of their minds. For instance, we worry about never finding true love, never finding something we are utterly devoted to and passionate about, and never feeling completely comfortable with our relationships and knowing their true meaning. We yearn to significantly impact some aspect of the world during our lives, yet fear the unknown or a challenge.

Scott writes, "Before we know it, we're off and running, heads down, following a well-trodden path. Perhaps if we looked up and around, we'd become acutely aware of a different reality, an alternate route that would take us someplace more valuable, someplace we've never been before."

Scott challenges readers to make every moment of their lives unique and meaningful. She suggests that feeling fulfilled with ourselves and our relationships, begins with finding the truth, reality, and purpose in every conversation we have, "success occurs one conversation at a time."

Before founding Fierce, Inc. and publishing her book, Scott led think tanks for CEOs and senior executives to help them improve their leadership and ability to promote their ideas to their colleagues.

"Fierce Conversations," is published in four countries and made The Wall Street Journal and USA Today's national bestseller list in 2002.

Regency Hair Stylists
~Full Highlights~
$30 Off
Mention this ad valid Mon Thurs
253.9526
Amherst

Panda East
Fine Chinese & Japanese Cuisine
103 No. Pleasant St., Amherst
256-8923 • 256-8924
Delivery Hotline: 549-0077
www.pandaeastamherst.com
LUNCH SPECIALS
FROM 11:30AM-3:00PM
(Served with Miso Soup)
Egg Roll (1) 1.75
Spring Roll (1) 1.75
Vegetable Roll (1) 1.75
Scallions Pancakes 4.50
Fried Chicken Wings 4.95
Chicken Fingers 5.75
Crab Rangoon (6) 4.75
Fried (or Steamed) Dumplings (6) 4.95
Steamed or Fried Veg Dumplings (6) 5.50
Wonton w. Hot Sesame Sauce 4.75
House Special Dumplings(8) 5.95
B.B.Q. Chicken Sticks(4) 5.95
Beef Sticks (4) 5.95
Cold Noodles w. Sesame Sauce 4.75
Bar-B-Q Spare Ribs 6.95
Boneless Ribs 6.95
Sesame Spare Ribs 6.95
Pu Pu Platter (for 1) 6.95
(for 2) 13.50
Included Bar-B-Q Ribs, Chicken Wings, Egg Roll, Beef Sticks, Crab Rangoons & Chicken Fingers ANY TWO ROLLS CHOICE OF:
1. Tuna
2. California
3. Cucumber
4. Avocado
5. Asparagus
6. Oshinko (Japanese Pickle)
7. Salmon
8. Shrimp & Cucumber
9. Kanikyu (Crab Meat & Cucumber)
10. Alaskan
11. Eel & Cucumber
12. Salmon Skin
APPETIZERS
1. Tempura Don 6.50
(Freshly fried shrimp & vegetable, served on a bed of rice w homemade sauce)
2. Tempura Udon 6.95
(Japanese noodles w. shrimp & vegetable tempura in broth)
3. Katsu Don 6.50
(Choice of chicken or pork cutlets & vegetable w. egg on a bed of rice)
4. Oyako Don 6.50
(Thin sliced chicken cooked w. egg & vegetables, over a bed of hot rich w. oyako sauce)
5. Unagi Don 9.95
(Broiled teriyaki sea eel over bed of rice)
6. Lunch Box 8.95
(Served w. salad. California roll, gyoza & choice of chicken, beef, tofu, salmon or shrimp teriyaki)

THE HARP
Irish Pub
NEW!! Wireless Internet
Do your home-work...surf the net!
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
COME PARTY LIKE YOU'RE IRISH!
Semester Specials
Pabst Bar Bottles..... $1.50 all semester
Molson & Honey Brown..... Pints $2.00 Pitchers $6.50
VOTED BEST NEIGHBORHOOD BAR EAST OF THE RIVER.
MON. - "Bad Karaoke" w/ Steve-o
TUES. - Our Famous Trivia Night
WED. - Reggae Night
THURS. - Live Bands
FRI. - Traditional Irish Seisiun
SAT. - Live Music
Never a cover!
Amherst's last great neighborhood pub!
413-548-6900 • www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst, just north of the apartments

Pioneer Valley comic artist uses the web to reach readers

By Matt O'Rourke
Collegian Staff

Forsaking the more traditional career paths to financial security, Ieph Jacques chose to enter the creative, albeit risky world of web comics. At the age of 24, Jacques emerges as one of the most reviewed and respected artists online, with his web comic "Questionable Content."

In a recent interview, Ieph Jacques commented on his chosen career and the success his inventive strip generates. A graduate of Hampshire College with a degree in music, Jacques expressed weariness about the direction in which his life preceded. "A band that I was in had just broken up, and I was sick and tired of having to rely on others to do something creative. Web comics are the next step in the evolution of humor and more serious, story based comic strips." Ieph began drawing every day. "I started thinking, I like reading web comics, and I've drawn stuff all my life, so why don't I just give it a shot?"

Ieph attributes the biggest influence for his creative inspiration to Bill Waterston's print comic, Calvin and Hobbes.

"Waterston was the perfect newspaper comic artist, who could draw like no one else who does syndicated strips. Second, he was a wonderful writer, making the reader identify with everyone in the strip, and that says a lot. Here I am a 15-year-old kid identifying with Calvin's parents, that's genius!" Jacques also credits the web comic by the name of "Scary-Go-Round" who he says influenced him "not so much in what I had done, but rather, what I could do. I could use the daily lives of people and make it silly and amusing."

Jacques bought a domain name and designated it www.QuestionableContent.net. He said the title is a mere warning that the content of the strip will not always be what he referred to as "PG," Jacques quit his job at the Valley Advocate to become a full-time web comic. Initially posting two strips a week, then after a month, three strips, Ieph now publishes up to five strips a week.

Questionable Content stars a 20-something male named Marten, and his four friends, Pintsize, Faye, Dora and Steve. Marten is a depressed sort of character, usually feeling sorry for him for some reason or another. Nonetheless, his character has a good sense of humor. Faye is sassy and enjoys toying with Marten, keeping her feelings unclear to him. Dora runs a coffee shop, and generally considers Dora and Marten friends, but her romantic feelings are also enigmatic. Steve is Marten's confidante, and his advice usually helps Marten get out of the glum. Pintsize is an "Anthro PC," that is, a talking robot whose childish actions usually provide comic relief.

People find it easy to identify with the strip, Jacques says. "They pick a character they really like, and want to make sure that character is okay in the end. They send me angry emails if something happens they don't like."

Jacques admits to no offense by the emails. "It gives me a chance to giggle," he says, "but on the other hand it makes me think about how much they [the readers] care. I want them to know that I care just as much as they do to make it good!"

ALL PHOTOS COURTESY IEPH JACQUES

Much discussion amongst web comic artists, critics and readers, centers on the issue of whether the daily strip is a viable medium for web comics, or is it too restrictive a format.

At a recent round table sponsored by the Webcomics Examiner, titled "The Future of Webcomics," the moderator, Joe Zabel, posed these and other topics. William G. believes the daily format is imperative if a web comic wants to gain a large following. The downside of this, he warns, however, is he sees this approach as "the fastest route to producing some un-interesting comics."

Neal Von Flue, who recently originated a web comic daily strip to test its viability, says one of the drawbacks is material must be created at least a month ahead at a time. The reward is the instant feedback. Von Flue believes it a "fantastic tool for people who have something specific to say about the world."

Yet another member of this round table group, Alexander Danner, said, "I think there's a lot to be said for working within a restrictive format as a means of breaking new ground. If your goal is to innovate, than the tighter the restrictions you put on yourself, the more you're forced to think creatively about how you're going to make your work stand out."

Ieph Jacques assents as he says, "I benefit from the tight deadline. It helps your brain move up to the next level, and something better will come."

Web comics, according to an introduction by Joe Zabel in T. Campbell's "History of Webcomics," is not a new form of comic, but rather an electronic medium of print comics. However, that is not to say they are not revolutionary.

"They are a revolution in several important ways – they can be published much more cheaply than print comics; they can be distributed much more broadly than print; they can be published much more quickly, allowing artists to comment on news events that occurred only hours ago," he says.

"And as an electronic medium, they open the door to an exciting array of formal innovations – motion, sound, infinite canvases, and the flexibility of hyper linking."

Making web comics good is not easily accomplished, although according to some web comic critics, web comics have definitely improved since their onset, dating back to the early nineties. According to Shannon Garrity, a participant of the roundtable on The Future of Webcomics,

"The first five years were marked by raw, crude cartooning, the establishment of successful formats and genres (so many newspaper-style strips, so many tech-support jokes), and working without an economic or social net. The second five years brought art that is more sophisticated and storytelling, the increased testing and breaking of creative boundaries (Diary strips! Infinite canvas! Flash! Comics that aren't about computer nerds!), and the establishment of organized collectives, aesthetic theories, and money-making schemes."

Asked how a web comic earns a living, Ieph Jacques, while declining to name a specific amount, states he earns money from Questionable Content exclusively from merchandising t-shirts, sweatshirts, etc.

Not only does Jacques' Questionable Content deliver humor, but also provides a place for people of a similar mindset to come together. Jacques provides a column to supplement each new comic, where he comments on something new he has come across for readers to check into, or to clarify something in the comic. He also provides a forum for feedback on the site, as well as a "Recommended Listening" section for music he has recently discovered.

"I always wanted the comic to be a vehicle to get the word out on bands that I like," he said. "I get a lot of e-mail thanking me about a band I've introduced them too."

Asked why he believes his strip marshals such a following, Jacques comments "I don't really know, but I think I have found my niche with the indie-rock/hipster culture. I think it exudes this air of 'coolness' around the comic that some people find attractive."

Ian Jones, a 20-year-old junior English major at UMass, agrees. "I recently started reading Questionable Content, and I discovered The Arcade Fire, a band I really like now. [Ieph] makes jokes about some of the top twenty indie-bands consistently, and I appreciate the humor."

Tim Edwards, a regular reader of the strip says this isn't all that it is interesting about the strip.

"The art, for starters, is wonderful. I loved the style when I first saw it, and, also, I went through the archive and saw how the strip developed," Edwards said in an email interview. A native of Sydney, Australia, Edwards works for the Bureau of Meteorology and is currently residing at Davis Station, Antarctica. Edwards discovered Questionable Content one day while surfing the web.

"I don't really get print media here, so online anything is completely golden. Now I do not mean to say that QC single-handedly pulled me through an Antarctic winter, but to say that it did not play a roll would be a lie. It was a great way to wake up," Edwards said.

Jacques like so many of his colleagues in web comics, repeatedly avows that creative control is the single biggest advantage to web comics. Web comics develop exclusively for websites. Web comic creators, like all artists, possess their own unique illusion, their own artistic goals and agendas for what they want to convey to their audience.

The introduction of the web assists web comics in a way no other medium does. Jacques acknowledges that not all web comics are good, in fact, the quality can still, unfortunately be inferior to its print counterparts. The advantage for these web comics is the lack of control or standards. For Jacques that is not the issue. His explanation, "I'm not interested in having influence on people as I am helping them find things they might not have heard about otherwise."

Ieph Jacques said that if asked to go to major syndication for distribution in newspapers, he would decline the offer.

"I don't feel too well answering to an editor or syndicate. I want to be in charge and you lose a measure of that if you go to a syndicate," he says.

Joe Zabel thinks the vital role of web comics is to be "missionaries for the comic art form." The nineties saw the rise of the comics shops only to than see them go bust. Fans despaired for the future of comics. Zabel attributes the comeback to the web.

Web comic creator Ieph Jacques is determined to make his imprint without the binds and restrictions placed upon print comic strip artists. Dedicated to their art both artists continually strive to make it better, to keep improving. Financial gain is of secondary importance, the reward is that they are pursuing their dream. For those who enjoy the web comic medium, an artist like Jacques is a source of enlightenment.

YANKEE
MATTRESS FACTORY
QUALITY • CRAFTSMANSHIP • COMFORT

"DON'T GO TO SLEEP HUNGRY"

PASTA E BASTA

Now through 2-21-05, buy a mattress or futon from us and receive a Pasta E Basta gift certificate for up to $50.

* Factory Direct - Big Savings
* We make all sizes
* Futon mattresses start at $99
* Twin mattress sets from $179
* Futon sets from $179.95
* Locally owned and operated by Umass Alumni
* Free delivery, set-up, removal

*See store for details

220 N. Pleasant St.
Amherst, MA
(413)-658-0013

104 Damon Rd.
Northampton, MA
(413) 584-5858

THE ROCKY HORROR PICTURE SHOW

Every Saturday at Midnight

Featuring our live cast
The Come Again Players

Stage Show & Preshows change every week,
you never know what you will see.

(In)appropriate attire encouraged!

Admission is still just $5.75, and prop bags to benefit the cast fund are only $2.00!

Reservations Highly Recomended
For more info. call (413) 539-FILM

The Village Commons
In South Hadley MA.

Call 539 FILM to Make Reservations

Reservations Accepted up to 6 days in advance

BEHAVIORAL HEALTH NETWORK
HUMAN SERVICES
RESIDENTIAL STAFF

Direct care staff needed for all shifts, day, evening, weekend, overnight (asleep/awake), full, part time and relief positions available in Hampshire County and surrounding communities. Assist individuals with developmental disabilities in their homes, day/vocational programs, respite sites or residential programs. A High school diploma or equivalent, accesses to reliable transportation preferred. Experience helpful but not mandatory, on-going training available. Generous benefit package at 30 hours. Salary: $9.00- $9.73/hr

Please send cover letter and resume to:
Attn: Program Directors
Behavioral Health Network,
492 Pleasant St.
Northampton, MA 01060
AA/EOE

Dressed and set for the Oval Office

DRESS from page B1

the Texas State Society. The raspberry shirtdress made of silk taffeta combines Western style with elegance, and allowed for Mrs. Bush to appear slimmer due to the flowing bottom of the dress. The color complimented her features nicely.

During the swearing in ceremony she donned a chic white cashmere suit, also designed by de la Renta. It is rather simple, but distinguished.

The Bush twins, Barbara and Jenna chose Badgley Michska, an edgier fashion team, to take on their desire to have a "slinky and sexy" look, complete with decolletage. Jenna's dress was emerald silk crepe with jeweled metallic leather banding. Barbara wore her Badgley Michska to the Black Tie and Boots Ball. Hers was a pale aquamarine chiffon gown with jewels and ruffled seamed skirt. They and their mother will all wear matching coats in order to hop from ball to ball in a unison vogue.

Though certainly no Jackie O., Mrs. Bush did make a large improvement from not only her past Inaugural mishaps but other mishaps in her fashion history. Taking a cue from her forward thinking daughters, she hired a design team that fit her needs while allowing her to dabble in the fashion world. Laura Bush was able to pull of the dignified look she has always shot for, while allowing some of her lighter side to shine through.

Fancy Nail
Walk-ins Welcome
FREE
Special
$2 OFF
full set, fill, manicure, or pedicure with coupon only

POOR ORIGINAL

A look back at the best discs of 2004

Collegian staff member Nick Romanow shares his top picks of the year

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

Local H
"Whatever Happened To P.J. Soles"
Studio E

Local H, by most accounts, hasn't made a bum move in their 10-year career and with "Whatever Happened to P.J. Soles" the intelligent alterna-indie duo continue to push themselves even further, getting great results.

"Everyone Alive" is a shout-along along anthem that is immediately one of Local H's best and the introspective "Halcyon Days" finds singer/guitarist/bassist Scott Lucas bringing his lyrics in a new direction. However, Lucas' sardonic wit proves to be alive and well on "California Songs" one of the bouncier tracks on the album.

Throughout an over 10-year career, Local H has manged to have success with releases.

Elsewhere, Lucas and drummer Brian St. Clair experiment musically more then ever on the epic "Buffalo Trace" and the menacing "That's What They All Say." "Whatever Happened To P.J. Soles" isn't just another outstanding album from Local H — it's also their most experimental to date.

Autolux
"Future Perfect"
DMZ/Columbia

Three years in the making, the full-length debut from Los Angeles art-rockers Autolux is indeed worth the wait. "Future Perfect" does its best to live up to the title as it mixes the best of My Bloody Valentine's blessed-out indie rock, Sonic Youth's noisy art-punk and the pop-rock splendor of Beach Boys and The Beatles.

Eugene Goreshter's androgynous and airy vocals may offput some listeners at first but it soon reveals itself to be one of the band's most distinctive and important assets. Autolux has a truly unique sound; catchy choruses are balanced out by Greg Edwards' subtle guitar freakouts and Goreshter and drummer Carla Azar's harmonies make for some of the album's best moments. It may take a few listens to really get into "Future Perfect" but it is well worth the journey. This is Autolux's world; everyone else is just lucky to be there.

Failure
"Golden"
Independently released through cdbaby.com

"Future Perfect" isn't Greg Edwards' only contribution to 2004. Edwards and his old failure bandmate Ken Andrews released the DVD/CD package "Golden" this year. The DVD portion features a 40-minute documentary following the band from their early, inauspicious inception in Los Angeles to their breakup in 1997, just as their star was rising. The CD is filled with outtakes and unreleased demos from the band's earliest days right up through the sessions of their last, and greatest, album "Fantastic Planet." No surprise to those familiar with the quality of the band's released work, these tracks are among the band's best. "Perfect Prisons," "Wake Up," and "Mange" are easily some of Failure's finest songs.

While underappreciated in their time, Failure are finding themselves more popular then ever, though still criminally unacknowledged by the mainstream. "Golden" will be appreciated by the band's ever-growing cult following and is good enough that it could even serve as an introductory crash course into the world of one of the best bands (no exaggeration) of the '90s.

Nirvana
"With The Lights Out"
Geffen Records

Following Kurt Cobain's tragic suicide Nirvana was launched front one of the most popular and acclaimed bands in the world into a whole new stratosphere. "With The Lights Out" is the box set that Nirvana fans have been anticipatting for essentially ten years, and, for those that love Nirvana, it is absolutely worth the wait. A lot of the material will only be enjoyed by diehards; however fans of all levels will no doubt fall head over heels for unreleased tracks like "Mrs. Butterworth," "Clean Up Before She Comes," and "Do Re Mi" tone of Cobain's last recorded demos). Think "Smells Like Teen Spirit" is played out? One listen to the early rehearsal demo reinvigorates the song and reinforces why it was so important.

Some people think that Cobain's death inspired too much hyperbole, but "With The Lights Out" box set, it's clear that Nirvana deserves every bit of praise they've ever received — and then some.

John Vanderslice
"Cellar Door"
Barsuk

John Vanderslice should, by most accounts, be only a few steps away from being a household name and "Cellar Door" is proof why. Vanderslice's fourth album is his best to date and it comes across as intensely intimate while masterfully layered. Tracks like "They Won't Let Me Run" and "Up Above The Sea" are dreary tales that you can't help but sing along to. "Coming And Going On Easy Terms" is an airy track that is bound to haunt the listener for days.

Truth be told there is not one less-then-stellar track on "Cellar Door," which is an accomplishment in-and-of itself but it's the sheer excitement and audible talent that Vanderslice conveys that makes him an indie-pop hero.

Sonic Youth
"Sonic Nurse"
Geffen

When a band has been active for over 20 years and released a countless array of LPs, EPs, singles and other assorted sonic freak-outs they have only a few options in front of them: rest on their laurels or continue to forge a path in the music wild. Lucky for art-rockers worldwide Sonic Youth chose the latter. Their latest release "Sonic Nurse," is one of their best in recent years and while the art-punks have simmered down musically a bit, they still know how to agitate and push the boundaries.

"Sonic Nurse" is a largely political album with tracks like "Peace Attack" that take aim at the higher-ups. In addition to the effortless cool and guitar anti-heroics that have been the band's trademark, Sonic Youth has become even more adept at writing full songs. "Sonic Nurse" proves that, even so far into their careers the Youth is just as exciting and relevant as ever.

Incubus
"A Crow Left Of The Murder"
Epic Records/Immortal

Coming into "A Crow Left Of The Murder" Incubus was in a very peculiar position. They were eclectic, experimental and not really ready for the mainstream. Except for one thing: they were one of the biggest bands in the country and working on the follow-up to their most commercial record to-date. Luckily, Incubus decided to revert back to their roots and expanding their horizons.

"A Crow..." is rock, funk, punk, jazz, and pop fused together, a triumphant return to form for Incubus. "Megalomanic" and "Talk Shows on Mute" are harsh political indictments coated

See REVIEW on page B8

Chabon gives twist to classic character

SOLUTION from page B2

man") decides he will take on the case.

There are a couple of cases for Holmes to choose from in this story. The murder of a boarder where the boy lives would seem to be the obvious crime for Holmes to solve. However, he instead chooses to spend his time finding and returning the young boy's parrot.

In searching for the parrot — an interesting bird who sings songs about trains and shouts out seemingly random German numbers — Holmes stumbles upon a greater mystery: The actual 'Final Solution." This phrase is one that Hitler used in referring to his plan to systematically exterminate Jews and other undesirables to the Aryan race. The young boy in Chabon's story is a German Jew who escapes the Nazi's clutches but whose parents did not.

Much like Chabon's Pulitzer winning "The Amazing Adventures of Kavalier and Clay" it is the impact of World War II that really drives the novel.

Holmes would like to "solve one more crime," but how can anyone "solve" the mystery that is the holocaust? How can Holmes — who can detect rationale and reason behind the tiniest morsel of information — find the meaning and justification behind the events of World War II? If the greatest detective to ever live can't, then can anyone? Perhaps. Chabon seems to be saying, there are some mysteries that are inexplicable and unsolvable. It is this mystery of the Holocaust that Chabon's story is truly about, and it is Michael Chabon's skillful handling of this perplexing theme that makes "The Final Solution" such a great read.

UMASS STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE

Helping students protect their rights for over 30 years

Free Legal Advice,
Referrals, Representation and Counseling for UMASS Students

Landlord/Tenant & Consumer Disputes
Student & Worker Rights, Family & Criminal Law

Call 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

Interfraternity Council • Panhellenic Council • Multicultural Greek Council • National Pan-Hellenic Council

GO GREEK!

The University of Massachusetts - Amherst

Fraternities and Sororities • Building better leaders since 1869

LEADERSHIP SCHOLARSHIP FRIENDSHIP
COMMUNITY SERVICE NETWORK/SUPPORT UNIVERSITY INVOLVEMENT

SPRING RECRUITMENT STARTS NOW!

For more information, call 545-2727
or visit 308 Student Union Building

WITH OVER 25 CHAPTERS, THERE IS A CHAPTER FOR EVERYONE!

Interfraternity Council • Panhellenic Council • Multicultural Greek Council • National Pan-Hellenic Council

ΖΔΓΦΑΔΣΤΗΠΧΟΦ ΤΙΦΥΝΨΞΟΡΨΙΣΘ

What was hot in the indie music world throughout 2004

REVIEW from page B7

in layers that make it both radio-ready and uniquely free-spirited. "Sick Sad Little World" is an epic, and one of Incubus' best songs, that gives Mike Einziger the opportunity to show off his amazing guitar chops. In fact "A Crow..." is stolen by Einziger's work which is constantly on display, though never over-shadowing the songs themselves. This album is perhaps doomed to be underappreciated by the mainstream that accepted Incubus just a few years ago but judging by the finely-crafted experimental alterna-pop on the disc, they don't care.

The Cooper Temple Clause

"Kick Up The Fire & Let The Flames Break Loose" RCA

Every year brings a new batch of "next big things," and while they can be occasionally unique, they usually have a shelf life shorter then boy bands. Thus while it is somewhat inexplicable, though predictable, that American press looked over the U.S. debut by The Cooper Temple Clause that is probably for the best for the U.K. band. In reality they are the most exciting and innovative new band of 2004.

Taking from the electronic experimentation of Radiohead, the hard-rocking choruses of Stone Temple Pilots and expanding upon The Pixies and Nirvana's soft/loud dynamic. The Cooper Temple Clause create something wholly original. There's definitely no confusing the band with anyone else and they are definitely the band to watch. "Kick Up The Fire..." is something extraordinary and The Coopers are definitely not just a band-of-the-moment.

The Cure

"The Cure"
Geffen Records

A funny thing happened in the past few years — the '80s became cool. Bands from Interpol to Hot Hot Heat to The Strokes are taking bits and pieces (some more then others) from the template that The Cure had such a large part in creating. But beneath all the hype for "The Cure" (the band's 13th album) it seemed that hipsters and critics forgot one thing — The Cure never really went away; the listeners and the hype did.

The Cure returned in 2004 with a successful self-titled effort.

Granted, it has been four years since "Bloodflowers," and the band did threaten retirement, but one listen to that album proves that the band never really lost their way. That being said "The Cure" is superior to "Bloodflowers" and one of their best albums — but it's not really that surprising. What is surprising is the layers upon layers of feedback and raw darkness that preside over the band's ever gloomy songs. "Labyrinth" lives up to its name and the final track "Promise" goes out in a wash of sound. Elsewhere, "End Of The World" is one of The Cure's best pop songs to date and "Us Or Them" is a fierce, raging tirade against the way George Bush and Tony Blair handle the war on terror. The fact that The Cure is still making music today is great, but the fact that "The Cure" is so damn good is even better.

David Cross

"It's Not Funny"
Sub Pop

The fact that this is the only non-music album on this list should speak volumes for how funny it really is. Cross' follow up to his Grammy-nominated "Shut Up You Fucking Baby!" is only about half as long, but is equally funny. Cross' style of part-rants, part-stories, part-jokes makes for a very unique comic experience. Not only does Cross' loose style make him very entertaining, but the content itself is top of the line.

His political humor is intelligent and witty and he has no fear in voicing his views on issues like religion, abortio and the war on terror. While some (mostly those with strong religious or right-wing ties) will be offended, most people will find Cross edgy, bold, smart and — of course — very, very funny.

UMASS Campus Recreation
STILL TIME TO ENTER:
Basketball (M/W/C).....A.S.A.P
GET THOSE FORMS IN BY:
Wallyball (M/W/C).....1/31
Sports Trivia (M/W).....2/7
SPORTS Trivia
More infor 215 Boyden, 5-2693
On The Web: www.umass.edu/umim
LATE ENTRANTS SHOULD CHECK FOR EXTENSIONS IN BOYDEN 215

Eve's fond UMass beginning

EVE from page B5

bedside. The turtles had a light-blue waterfall that matched perfectly with their aquarium tank. Night after night, I painted. I wept as each memory escaped me onto those walls. When my arm began to feel pain from its emotionally intesive work load I stopped and noticed I still missed him.

A few days later I found myself sitting in the dining room with one of my closest friends. He had a girl problem, and like so many others, he came to me for advice.

"All you have to do is ask her out, I mean, what's the worst that can happen? If she says no, at least you know now and you're not waiting around guessing," I said.

He looked at me if I had just cracked the human genome and replied, "Why are you always right? I should listen to you more often, thanks!"

It then dawned on me. Maybe I have been right all along. I looked at him and smiled with an epiphany of enlightenment. He looked confused as I dropped my fork and stood up quickly from the table.

"Hey, do you know where the Collegian is?" I asked.

I was unprepared yet determined. I was going to be the newspaper's relationship advice columnist.

I ran back to my dorm room, gathered a few abstract drawings and an old journal into my bag, and raced back across campus until I found my way down the stairs into the basement of the Campus Center.

The Collegian office was a mess, a disorganized array of newspapers, loose ends, and over-extended deadlines. I walked into the front office and asked who I could talk to about a new idea.

"For what section?" someone asked, barely raising an eyebrow.

"Relationship Advice," I announced.

They pointed to the back room. Embarrassed, yet undeterred, I elbowed my way down a nonexistent path between a crush of a dozen busy people crammed desk to desk, knocking into chairs, jostling arms, tripping over book satchels and pushed through a closed row of folding chairs to reach my goal.

The editor's back was facing me. He was typing away at a 1980's era computer, oblivious to the commotion. When he finally looked over his shoulder, I stuttered out a few crucial sentences to explain myself.

"I don't really write. I'm actually a pre-vet student, but I think I know why people have problems with relationships," I told him in one long run-on sentence.

"I can help them; you need me to write a relationship column for the Collegian. You really do!"

He looked at me skeptically through his over-sized glasses. I opened my journal for him to admire my psycho-babble scribbled around various illustrated figures that were supposed to represent myself or maybe inserted to distract readers from the endless amount of white pages.

"Sure, why not? Submit a column by next Tuesday, and if it works, we'll run it."

He turned back to his computer and continued on with his work. I couldn't believe how easy it was.

"Thank you so much! You won't regret it!"

I left the office that day and immediately ran back to my dorm room to write.

Everyone always tells me to write what I know best. Isn't that the trick? So began Eve, and the column Original Sin. Even though I've got a lot to say I don't know if it's legitimate, or if anyone really cares, but that didn't stop me. For some reason, drama follows me wherever I go. I always have a story, and relationship stories are my specialty. I've been lucky enough to be able to put them to use.

I would be a fool to say being single is easy, especially if there is an ex-factor. I was now single for the first time since I knew what a buy was, and I had no idea what to do with myself. I had spent seven years falling into new relationships before the old-ones had lost their flavor. I never had the chance to be independent, selfish, and completely on my own.

I have encountered many others though. They have ranged from erratic bartenders, to uneducated frat boys, to out-of-shape sports lovers, to overly-muscular egoists, to bastlers and mafia members, to nerdy journalists, to euro-clubbers, to Puma-loving' dj's, to Harvard braggarts, to yoga meditation gurus and green tea users, to Army and Navy Seals recruits, to inexperienced lower classmen, to commitment-obsessed nice-guys, to overly sensitive mean guys, to stingy rich guys. I've dated fat, thin, almost-perfect, tall, short, white, black, brown, red, and sometimes green, and I am still going.

I believe I have adapted quite well to the single world. The only difference is that I am not expecting or looking for anyone to keep me company. I realized that being single does not mean being alone. It is a chance for personal growth, and in the present, I am happier and more accomplished than I have ever been while I was hanging on someone else's elbow.

The ex who created this whirlwind of change called me recently. I felt as though he had clocked the month I would be over him. I hoped I was done with him until I heard his voice. "Damn it!" I thought. We met up for coffee and I shed a few tears. We spoke of everything and accomplished nothing. Why is he doing this? Could this be the closure I so desperately needed? I begged him to come and see our turtles before he left.

"Yuck, they're huge! They are so creepy! I hate reptiles." He shook his head and left the room. Yes, that closing line put my heart back in its place. Imagine not loving your own children.

Whether the father brings home the bacon or not, a good mother feeds her offspring. When my turtles were fist-size, I made it a point to buy guppy-feeders as a tasty treat to increase their appetite. As the turtles grew, their interest in hunting prey rapidly diminished. I decided to take advantage of their laziness and added a few goldfish as an experiment. Months had gone by and the new goldfish managed to survive. Since I am generally an optimist, I couldn't help but think that maybe they have all learned to co-exist with one another. I bought more tropical fish, beautifully-colored, larger, and more expensive and added them to the mix. Weeks later the fish were still swimming with the turtles peacefully. I decided to name each fish, knowing that this was risky, and someone could likely get hurt.

By winter break it was time to empty out the dorm room and head home for the holidays. Running late, I quickly piled the three guppy feeder fish, seven full-bodied tropical-banded goldfish along with the almost-in-hibernation turtles (now as big as size ten shoes) into a size 8 Tupperware container with a wrong-sized plastic lid and slid the container into my unheated car on a frigid December afternoon. This life swap might have been enough to make any menagerie edgy. The move home took longer than I had anticipated. Three hours on the Mass Pike in a snow storm, and I nearly brought home frozen sushi.

Exhausted after unloading four duffle bags of dirty laundry, I wouldn't say I rushed the turtles back into the safety of their tank either. I took time to eat dinner with my mom, soak in a hot bath and chat on the phone. You know how it is when you get home. Time enough for the fish to thaw out. And by now, I could see the thrashing turtles were desperate for freedom.

"Watch how much the turtles and the fish love each other." I boasted to my mother as I set up the 32-gallon glass tank in my room."Peaceful co-existence right here on earth."

I dumped the ten fish and two water-deprived turtles together into the freshly filled tank of warm water and watched as everyone raced to their sub-aquatic stations. I waved goodbye to my little family and left to see a few friends downtown.

The murders were brutal. My shock was complete. How could this have happened? Two hours ago there were ten, now there were two. It was a complete fish massacre. Was it a crime of passion? Insanity? Cold-blooded murder? Were my Chinatown orphaned children natural-born killers or just hungry? I could only see missing pieces, scattered about in a gut-soaked tank, and two very full turtles staring contently at me through the glass. Lost heads to bodies, missing fins and eyes. The turtles had gone mad, turned against their fish-mates, and made sure that each fish had a fair chunk taken out of them. All I could do was stare through the tank glass at the underwater crime scene.

I admit I cried as I witnessed this loss even though the truth was obvious; what did I expect? They were guppy feeders' after-all.

So, four months to my graduation, I am waking up to reality. I find it painful to finally see the world as it really is. Whether I am looking through a glass of innocence or denial, the time has come to accept these memorable experiences and keep writing. One can never know what the next story may bring.

MAXIMUM Capacity SPORTS BAR
. Chicopee, MA * www.maximumsportsbar.com * 413.536.8494
Best Nightclub for live bands - everything from country and hard rock to reggae and funk!
Huge Dance Floor with area's best DJ's
College Nights Mondays, Tuesdays, & Thursdays!
*Hottest Wings in Valley!
*11 Beers on tap
*Full food menu.
Saturday Jan 29th - Featuring Fear Nuttin' Band
Sunday Feb 6th - Watch the Superbowl with us. Free burgers, hot dogs, & buffet!
Now booking Free Private Parties for Sororities, Fraternities, Athletic Groups & any other Social Organization
MAXIMUM Capacity SPORTS BAR

UMASS CLASS RINGS

On Display and available for sale at the UMASS Bookstore in the Campus Center jostens™
Order online at www.jostens.com • 1-800-854-7464

DiCaprio stuns audiences in critically acclaimed 'Aviator'

By Spencer Ziegler
Collegian Staff

Martin Scorsese's latest film, "The Aviator," tells that fascinating story of real-life millionaire Howard Hughes' life by depicting Hughes' wildly ambitious and successful business life with his failings and self-destructive behaviors.

"The Aviator" opens on the filming of Hughes' 1930 epic "Hell's Angels." From here the movie takes off, exploring the triumphs of the young business tycoon's business and movie endeavors, but also shows his gradually deteriorating mental health.

By looking at the movie posters someone might come to the mistaken conclusion that this is an ensemble piece. Yet, "The Aviator" is truly a character study of the intriguing life and mind of Howard Hughes, as played brilliantly by Leonardo DiCaprio. The movie is jam packed with stars from movies and music alike such as Cate Blanchett, Kate Beckinsale, Alec Baldwin, Jude Law, Rufus Wainwright and even Gwen Stefani. But with the exception of Blanchett's Katharine Hepburn, each character and actor's respective roles are nothing more than a cameo — both in the movie and it seems in Hughes' actual life. It is Katharine Hepburn's presence in Hughes' life that keeps him from falling apart and when they break up his life and mind both begin to rapidly collapse.

'The Aviator'
Directed by Martin Scorsese
Starring Leonardo DiCaprio, Cate Blanchett, Alec Baldwin
Warner Brothers
Rated PG-13
164 mins.
Grade A

Historical movies often fail because lives are not structured as orderly as fans expect movies to be. A director then has the choice to fabricate history in order to fit it into a tidy plot or to be honest with the material and deal with the possible consequences — a poorly structured confusing movie (like "Alexander") or a film which simply lacks characters that are all that interesting. Luckily, Scorsese stays true to Hughes' life in "The Aviator" and avoids potential pitfalls while doing so.

As the movie progresses, Scorsese writer John Logan carefully aligns Hughes' ascending fame and fortune with his descending mental health. Scorsese ties the movie together through the motif of flying. The film is full of take-offs and the potential greatness that may arise, all followed directly by crashes. This idea of alternating highs and lows shows what Hughes' life was truly like. He flew higher and faster than any man in his generation, but he also crashed harder and more often as well. It is Scorsese's ability to capture this essence of Howard Hughes' life that makes "The Aviator" succeed where other historical epics have failed.

Leonardo DiCaprio was chosen to play the role of eccentric millionaire tycoon Howard Hughes in the film "The Aviator."

Bacon triumphs in 'Woodsman'

By Jill Weinstein
Collegian Correspondent

Kevin Bacon and wife Kyra Sedgwick star in this unique portrait of a convicted child molester just released from prison after a fifteen-year sentence. Walter (Bacon) returns to his dreary hometown to rebuild his life, and is met with predictable resistance from every angle.

A bearded Benjamin Bratt plays Carlos, Walter's brother-in-law and the only family member who will speak to him. Even his tolerance dissipates when one of Walter's comments crosses the line. Walter keeps to himself at his monotonous job at a sawmill until he witnesses a co-worker sexually harass Vickie, the only female laborer at the mill (Sedgwick). He makes sure she is okay, which prompts her to offer him a ride home, quipping: "I won't bite."

Although Vickie knows something isn't right with Walter, she doesn't find out what it is before sleeping with him. As their relationship unfolds, it is mind-boggling and shamefully honest. Despite the immediate feelings of repulsion we have for Walter's crimes, Vickie reveals his tender, human side and tells him she sees something good in him even if he doesn't – which just might be what keeps him from crumbling under the pressure.

'The Woodsman'
Directed by Nicole Cassell
Starring Kevin Bacon, Eve, Newmarket Films
Rated R
83 mins.
Grade B

Walter's shabby apartment, located across the street from an elementary school, raises questions about his rehabilitation. As he watches children at the playground outside his window, he notices a man giving candy to young boys, which makes him question his own feelings. Bacon's solid acting is brutally honest and deserving of praise.

Singer Eve has a small role as a secretary who discovers Walter's secret and does everything she can to get him to work elsewhere. Rapper Mos Def's performance as an unforgiving police officer is sharp and notable. A frequent visitor to Walter's apartment, he's watching Walter's every move and just waiting for him to mess up.

Walter's sessions with a so-so psychiatrist give us a slice of his inner torment. The film puts a sympathetic spin on perverse addiction, giving it a sense of personal, painful struggle. Walter's desire to be "normal" haunts him, and we wonder what will happen to this disturbed, fragile man.

As Walter tires to resist his every instinct, his unusual relationship with Vicky reminds us of his human side. When he begins to follow a young girl (Hannah Pilkes) he sees on the bus, empathy for an addict turns to disgust. The interaction between pedophile and child that follows is enough to keep you on the edge of your seat.

Director Nicole Kassell's bold portrayal of a man apart features poignant, poetic shots and powerful scenes that push our limits of acceptance of a man we want to hate, but somehow feel sympathetic towards. This rare, compelling look at the struggle to escape one's past and attain redemption is definitely worth seeing.

Bacon plays a recovering child molester in "The Woodsman."

Natural, Healthy, and Smart!
Dr. Lee Kane
Chiropractic Physician
Participating provider for student insurance, GIC, automobile insurance & most others
Amherst Family Chiropractic
Center for Natural Health
228 Triangle St • Amherst (next to Bertucci's)
549-1500

THE BARN, Discount Groceries
Spend less, eat more! Check it out!

Lenders Bagels (6 ct bag)	50c bag
Popsicle Novelties (12 ct box)	50c box
Potato Chips (5.5 oz bag) or Tortilla Chips	50c bag
Raisins (12 oz box)	50c each
Shrimp Bisque Instant Soups	50c each
Cheese or Pepperoni Pizzas (7" size)	50c each
Creamy Peanut Butter (12 oz)	79c each
Armour Beef Stew lunch cups	75c each
Cheddar Cheese Noodle Cups	3 for $1.00
Solid White Tuna Fish	$1.00 can
Single Yogurts (Columbo, Dannon, etc.)	3 for $1.00
Healthy Handfuls Pretzels & Cookies	50c each
M&Ms (14 oz bag) & bagged candy bars	$1.00 bag
Back to Nature Sesame or Butter Crackers	$1.00 box
Good Health Vegetable Chips (10 oz)	$1.59 bag
Frosted Shredded Wheat (& other cereals)	$1.75 box

...and more bargains throughout the store!!
95 River Street, Greenfield ~ 413-774-5599 ~ 8 AM to 10 PM Daily
From UMass, take Route 116 to Deerfield, then 91 North to Exit 26
~ Credit cards, debit cards, cash & food stamps accepted! ~

They're Coming!
The [illegible] are only a [illegible] weeks away...
General Campus-Wide Career Fair - Wednesday, Feb 16
Life Sciences & Environmental Careers Fair - Wednesday, Feb 16
ALANA Job Fair - Wednesday, Feb 16
Summer, Co-op & Internship Opportunities Fair - Thursday, Feb 17
Career Services can help you get ready!
Come to 511 Goodell for...
Walk-in Career Counseling
Access to job posting databases
Workshops on Career Fair Success, Cover Letters, Resume Writing, Interviewing... and more!
CareerServices
For more information, contact 413-545-2224 or go to www.umass.edu/careers

a Star is born

America's favorite reality show begins a fourth season

By Chris Gazzara
Collegian Staff

American Idol is back in action with a fourth season that promises to be it's best. A television promotional for the nationwide talent search testifies that we haven't seen anything yet.

The much anticipated season premiered Jan. 18 and 19 with its requisite audition special. Over 100,000 hopefuls waited in line in seven cities across America, a number that breaks last year's record.

Three prior seasons have set some standards for how the premiere shows run. The auditions are cut into snippets that allow us to see both the talent of the performers and the ruthlessness of the process itself. While some talented auditionees receive a glowing "Welcome to Hollywood" stamp of approval, other less fortunate souls are chided by the shows very own record executive, the infamous Simon Cowell. Those found to be in the middle range are often hotly debated between Cowell and his two colleagues, entertainer Paula Abdul and A&R specialist Randy Jackson. Radio and TV personality Ryan Seacrest will also return to cover the auditions and host the performance shows.

The rest of the series, however, holds a twist for its viewers. Instead of the expected 36 finalists, this season the slots will be given to 12 male and 12 female singers. Once in the semi-final round one group will perform during the Monday show, the other on Tuesday with voting scheduled for both nights. This revision, the producers say, will allow for some variety while keeping the shows successful format intact. Grouping by gender was tried successfully in foreign versions of the show and made sense in the US because the auditions were more evenly split between the sexes this season.

Last year's winner, Fantasia Barrino, rose from the crowd to defeat her three rivals, dubbed the "Divas" by the Idol judges. Many felt that each of them were so strongly fit for the title that it would be nearly impossible to predict which girl the audience would choose. In the end the raw, untrained yet incredible voice of Fantasia won America and left the young, but skilful Diana Degarmo in the runner-up slot.

The first season heralded the arrival of a new reality trend in television. The wildly popular show was a new venture for American broadcasting and found a way to pick a pop star for the people, by the people. Kelly Clarkson won the first competition, snagging the popular vote after a successful performance during Big Band Night. From there on she picked up speed and finished first after a neck-and-neck race with big haired crooner, Justin Guarini. Both sang stirring renditions of "A Moment like This," were signed to record labels and released singles.

Although they seem similar, don't be fooled. Clarkson sold 297,000 copies in it's first week, and debuted at number one. Guarini was dropped from his record label without being told. He found out by watching a tabloid entertainment show.

The second season definitely upped the stakes. There were the two Kimberly's — Caldwell and Locke — each completely different from the other. Locke, of course, busted out this year with the song "Eighth World Wonder" that went number one.

After another ridiculously close race, Ruben Studdard beat out the bashful underdog, Clay Aiken, but not in record sales. With a well-received first album, "Measure of a Man," and a successful Christmas album, Clay Aiken has seen the most success of any American Idol contestant to date.

Will this year's "Idol" come out on top? It's hard to say. Though some winners like Clarkson, Aiken and Locke have beaten the "American Idol" brand name and risen to success, there has been reported resistance from some disc jockeys when it comes to playing their singles on the radio. This could spell 'bad news' for the aspiring pop stars, but there's no doubt "Idol" will find another way to break through.

ALL PHOTOS COURTESY OF FOX

Murray gets his feet wet in 'Life Aquatic'

Director Wes Anderson attracks an all-star cast for his new comedy

By Spencer Ziegler
Collegian Correspondent

If nautical nonsense is something you crave and you're not terribly fond of talking sponges, then Wes Anderson's latest film "The Life Aquatic with Steve Zissou" may be the film for you.

"The Life Aquatic" is a filmmaker's analysis of another filmmaker. Steve Zissou, whose deadpan personality is captured perfectly by Bill Murray, is an aquatic documenter a la lacque Cousteau.

Each movie Zissou has made has done a little bit worse than his last and he is on a quest for relevancy and revenge. He wants to make another hit and he plans to do so by filming his vengeance against the mythical laguar Shark who allegedly ate his former assistant and best friend. In filming his documentary (a word used in its koosest sense since his films mainly just exhibit Zissou's feigned brilliance).

Along the way Zissou's path crosses with his potential son (Owen Wilson), a pesky journalist (Cate Blanchett) and a pack of ferocious pirates thrown in for good measure.

Bill Murray is great in the lead role, but like Anderson's 2001 release "The Royal Tenenbaums," this movie works best as an ensemble piece. The supporting cast is superb. Jeff Goldblum is fantastic as Zissou's arch nemesis Alistair Hennessey.

Owen Wilson tones down his usual silly humor and gives a great performance as Ned Plimpton (or Kingsly Zissou as Bill Murray's character prefers to call him). Bud Cort (who is known for his leading role in "Harold and Maude") is perfect as the loyal bond company stooge, and who knew that Willem Dafoe could be so funny? However, the role that best describes Anderson's quirky style is Seu Jorge's character Pele.

One of the aspects of Anderson's films that is so appealing to audiences is his wonderful use of music. Anderson tries something different in "The Life Aquatic" as he asked Seu Jorge (who played Knockout-Ned in "City of God") to rework old David Bowie songs in Portuguese. These Brazilian Bowie ballads (such as "Rebel Rebel," "Life on Mars" and "Ground Control to Major Tom") exemplify Anderson's quirky style and wonderful use of music in his movies.

As with the work of all established directors, there is also another way to review this movie and that is to compare it to Anderson's previous works ("Bottle Rocket," "Rushmore" and "The Royal Tenenbaums"). Anderson's style (which is more evident in "Rushmore" and "The Royal Tenenbaums) is still present in "The Life Aquatic." Characters are all still perfectly framed in the middle of the screen. The movie is still broken down into chapters like a kid's story-book. The set designs (especially that of Zissou's boat "The Belafonte") are still incredibly creative.

However, the writing is a bit different in "The Life Aquatic." The reason for this change is that Owen Wilson is no longer the co-writer as he was in all of Anderson's previous films. Instead, Anderson wrote "The Life Aquatic" along with author Noah Baumbach. The logical result is that the movie is not as funny as Anderson's previous films, but it is a better story with more developed characters.

"The Life Aquatic with Steve Zissou" falls in line with Anderson's other films in that it is a quirky, clever little movie with some great writing. Those that appreciated Anderson's work for his characters and stories will gladly accept this tale of life at sea. Those that enjoyed Anderson's movies for the silly and subtle humor may prefer his previous works.

Wes Anderson's next film appears to be a break from the progression that led to "The Life Aquatic" as he is said to be directing a stop-motion animated version of Ronald Dahl's book "The Fantastic Mr. Fox."

COURTESY TOUCHSTONE

Bill Murray has embarked on a set of more introspective roles in his last two films, his newest is titled "The Life Aquatic with Steve Zissou"

'Toy Story 2' hits the ice at the Civic Center

ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 6

THURSDAY	FRIDAY	SATURDAY
• High 16° • Low 2°	• High 31° • Low 9°	• High 31° • Low 11°

DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

Peter Trovato launches a Legacy

SPORTS, PAGE 12

The Daily Collegian

THURSDAY, JANUARY 27, 2005 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXV ISSUE 67

UMass Police Department to purchase Tasers

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Police Department has announced it will soon be purchasing Tasers, a non-lethal weapon used to incapacitate targets.

UMass Police Chief Barbra O'Connor told the Springfield Republican in an article on Jan. 23 she wants to purchase the weapons because she believes in "giving officers as many possible options."

"I think any option that is not lethal or is considered less lethal is the better option," O'Connor said.

Governor Mitt Romney legalized Tasers and other electric weapons for police use six months ago.

Four UMPD officers began training with Arizona-based Taser International to become certified trainers of the weapon. The officers must complete four additional hours of training before UMPD can submit its training approval to the state. The police department plans to order the Tasers soon after.

Some student leaders are less than comfortable with the possibility of police using a stun-gun device on students during unruly confrontations. Student Government Association

Trustee Matt Murphy said he is not sure if the public is aware of complications that can arise when a person is struck by the non-lethal weapon.

"If somebody gets 'Tasered,' the procedure to rejuvenate them means that nobody can touch them [The victim] has to be taken to the hospital almost immediately to check for any heart conditions," Murphy said.

The Taser is used to fire two dart-like wires at a target up to 21 feet away. The wires deliver a 50,000-volt charge at 1.36 joules. By comparison, a heart defibrillator is 300 joules UMPD Detective Lt. Robert A. Thrasher was among the officers trained in the use of the Taser. He experienced the effects of the weapon first-hand.

"I could not light it. It's painful. It basically overrides the muscular system. You lose all your muscular control," Thrasher said to the Republican. "It works. At the same time, there were no ill-effects."

UMPD plans to order three of the stun-guns for their arsenal. Currently, the department is armed with pistols, batons, pepper spray, handcuffs and Pepper Ball guns. The Pepper Ball is an air gun that shoots pepper pellets and is used by the department for crowd control. UMPD said their Pepper Ball guns are not as powerful as the Pepper Ball guns used by Boston Police In the October 2004 death of Victoria Snelgrove, an Emerson College student who was killed after police shot her in the eye with the weapon after a Red Sox playoff victory.

With recent disturbances in the Southwest Residential Area after Red Sox and Patriots' victories, UMPD has said they will do more to crack down on riotous behavior by students. Murphy said he questioned the timing of the UMPD's future purchase of the weapons with the Patriots heading to the Superbowl in two weeks.

"I am setting up a meeting with the UMass Police to talk about the issue," Murphy said. "The timing does bother me."

The state's Executive Office of Public Safety has not received any training proposals from other police departments interested in adding the weapons. According to spokeswoman Katie Ford, the Executive Office of Public Safety must first approve all training programs before departments can start training of the weapons.

She said police can order the weapons, but cannot arm officers with them until they have been trained by a program approved by the Office of Public Safety.

Greenfield's police department has already purchased several Tasers, but has not yet instituted their use. Other departments researching the weapon are Springfield, Holyoke, Belchertown and Monson.

Each Taser costs about $800.

PHIL FANTHAM/KRT

Santa Barbara County Senior Deputy Blair Spaulding displays one of the department's Tasers. Tasers are a non-lethal weapons that stun with an electrical current.

Man pleads innocent to murder

By Matt Egger
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — A Westfield man accused of gunning down a University of Massachusetts student pled innocent in Hampshire District Court to several charges stemming from a Dec. 6, 2004 incident which led to the student's death yesterday.

Bryan Johnston, 22 is accused of shooting David Sullivan, a friend and high school classmate. Sullivan, 22, lived on 105 Meadow St. in Amherst and was a senior at the University of Massachusetts.

Johnston pled innocent to charges of murder, armed burglary and two counts of possession of a large capacity firearm in connection with the incident.

Prosecutor Renee Steese told judge Mary-Lou Rup that her office has "quite strong evidence" that Johnston fired six rounds from a .223-caliber rifle into Sullivan's side. Steese said that Johnston called Sullivan at about 10:30 p.m. that night, adding that Sullivan's girlfriend said that he was agitated by the call.

According to Steese, after the shooting, Johnston's 2001 Lincoln Continental got hung up on railroad tie around the boundaries of the parking lot behind the Aqua Vitae restaurant on Route 9 in Hadley.

Steese said that police came to assist Johnston, before he was identified as a suspect in the shooting. Steese added that police let Johnston

See MURDER on page 3

Program can transcribe handwritten documents

By David Fonseca
Collegian Correspondent

A UMass Amherst computer science professor has developed an automated keyword-retrieval program that could make searching handwritten documents easier for researchers and students.

Raghavan Manmatha, a research assistant professor in the Center for Intelligent Information Retrieval, along with help from research assistant Victor Lavrenko, and graduate students Toni Rath and Jamie Rothfeder, has developed a first-of-its-kind program that can perform keyword searches on digitized versions of handwritten documents.

"The outside is like Google, the inside is very different," said Manmatha about the program. The program's interface is very similar to the popular web-based search engine, but is driven by unique programming algorithms.

"All a computer sees when you scan in a document is black and white dots," Manmatha said. He says what makes this program unique is it's ability to make associations between these shapes, and actual English words.

Until now, researchers had to manually annotate each word in a document in order to search that document for keywords. Manmatha's program differs in its ability to learn associations between the digitized image of the word, and the American Standard Code for Information and Interchange text that it represents, without the need for time-consuming manual annotation.

"It takes in a small set of documents, and learns the association between the handwritten words and connects them with actual words," said Manmatha.

"Our program is automatic. You can always hire a bunch of people to transcribe every page [of a handwritten document]. Once you do that it can be searched like a regular page or web-page in the computer. This is very tedious and expensive to do."

"There are certainly programs out there that allow searching of scanned printed documents at sophisticated levels, but this is the first one I can think of that allows searching of handwritten manuscripts," said Len Adams, a research librarian at W.E.B Dubois Library.

A demonstration offered on CIIR's homepage allows users to conduct keyword searches on 1,000 pages of George Washington's handwritten documents. After a user enters a keyword and then clicks on the search function, the user is then linked to a page that shows all of the results in order of the page in which they appeared.

The system makes use of probabilistic annotation, in which a digitized image could have any ASCII association. The system assigns probabilities to each digitized image for every ASCII annotation. For example, for the handwritten word "Washington" the probability attached to the ASCII form of "Washington" would be near 100 percent, and the probability attached to ASCII form of the word "General" is around 10 percent.

A keyword search of the word "Cumberland," returned 30 results, a majority of which matched the word exactly. The program also returned a few matches that came close to matching the keywords shape, such as "Endeavor" and "Constitution."

According to Manmatha, the program is only able to recognize four or five handwriting styles in a single document. Getting the program to a point where it can work with a greater number of handwriting styles is something they're working on, said Manmatha.

While the program has certainly developed since The National Library Foundation and the National Science Foundation awarded Manmatha a $450,000 endowment in 1999, he said the day when students can actually make use of this program is still some time off in the future.

One factor that may prevent the widespread use of 2005 spring semester begins despite relentless New England winter storms

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

Just as University of Massachusetts students and faculty thought life was getting back to normal after Sunday's blizzard, the region was sideswiped with another storm, leaving even more snow in its wake. However, snow removal crews had no problems clearing the roads and sidewalks around campus, allowing the University to remain open as scheduled through the stormy weather.

The Blizzard of 2005 posed a significant problem for students who planned to return to campus on Sunday for the University's move in day, the day that students move back into the dormitories after winter break. The dangerous weather conditions prompted Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano to issue an e-mail to all students on Saturday afternoon urging them to wait until Monday to move back.

Dorms and dining facilities did open as scheduled for students who had to move in on Sunday, but most students appeared to take Gargano's advice, as the campus appeared empty on Sunday afternoon.

Travel around Massachusetts was truly difficult all day. Roads just off campus had not been completely cleared Sunday evening and PVTA bus service was suspended for the day.

TOM WILLIAMS/CQ-RS

A view of North Pleasant Street leading into campus last Sunday shows a winter wonderland that wreaked havoc on students trying to return in time for the start of spring semester classes.

The storm was far worse in eastern Massachusetts, where more than half the student population calls home. Most communities in Greater Boston received at least two feet of snow. A weather station located in Boston Common reported 25 inches.

Governor Mitt Romney and Rhode Island Governor Don Carcieri declared states of emergency. Romney also announced that state employees in all eastern Massachusetts counties should stay home from work on Monday. Several schools in eastern Massachusetts were closed Monday and again on Wednesday.

Coastal communities got the worst of the storm. Plymouth received 32 inches of snow, while Salem received 38 inches. These and other coastal communities also had to deal with high winds, flooding and white-out conditions. Many roads near the coast were closed for hours, including Route 3, the main highway between Boston and

See STORM on page 2

Sophomore student's i2hub downloading technology sounds sweet to UMass music fans

By Juliana Leal
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — The i2hub, an online collaboration software developed by UMass sophomore Wayne Chang, is all the rage among students on campus.

Publicized primarily through word of mouth, the hub has become the venue for students to share and download files.

Launched in March of 2004, the hub has expanded to over 400 universities in approximately 20 different countries. At any given time during the school year, up to 6,500 users may be logged on concurrently.

"That number grows every month," said Chang, the 21-year-old Chief Executive Officer of the i2hub and former employee of Napster, Microsoft and Apple.

The i2hub operates on Internet 2, a fast internet connection used on college campuses across the country. This high-speed connection is the reason students are able to download small files, such as seven megabytes, in an average of five seconds.

Three development teams under the supervision of Chang work for free to keep the hub going. Though there is no monetary compensation, Chang said he receives applications every day from people who want to work for the hub.

"We're not in this to make a profit," said Chang. "We hope the students will like it and support us

See I2HUB on page 2

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR-IN-CHIEF Peter Foundas
MANAGING EDITOR Andrew Merritt
BUSINESS MANAGER Rich Pacheco
PRODUCTION MANAGER Cory Rosenberg
NEWS EDITOR Cameron Woods
ADMINISTRATIVE MANAGER Tiffany Sugalski
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Samantha Nielsen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Meghan Healy
CAMPUS EDITOR Alyson Zillmann
EDITORIAL EDITOR Paige Crum
NEWS EDITOR Erika Lovley
PHOTO EDITOR Matthew Reid
SPORTS EDITOR Mike Marzelli
CIRCULATION MANAGER Kristen Weiss
CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING Marty Pappas
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Josh Kiggins
FINANCIAL MANAGER Hirak Shah
ACCOUNTING CLERK Virginie Prevaut
MAIN PICTURIST Sandra Marquet
ACADEMY OUTREACH Linda Wallack
ACADEMY ADVERTISING Josh Greenberg
ACADEMY BUSINESS Jachyn Sorenson
ACADEMY FINANCE Thomas Hecht
ADMINISTRATIVE PRODUCTION Rachael Bruno
GRAPHICS ADVISOR Charlie Higgins
ASST ARTS & LIVING Mike Busack
ASST ARTS & LIVING Monique Jeanmott
ADMINISTRATIVE EDITORIAL Yousef Munayyer
ASSOCIATE EDITORIAL Allison Edles
ASSISTANT NEWS Julie O'Donnell
ASSISTANT NEWS Dan O'Brien
ASSOCIATE SPORTS Robert McGovern
ASSISTANT SPORTS Jeff Howe

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS ACADEMIC YEAR EXCEPTIONS DURING VACATIONS AND EXAMINATION PERIODS. THE COLLEGIAN IS ENTERED AT THE POST OFFICE IN SPRINGFIELD, MASS. UNDER THE ACT OF MARCH 3, 1879. THE DAILY BEGAN AS ASSET LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE NEWS IN 1903, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TWO WEEKLY COLLEGIANS IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS NOT BEEN HELD SPACE SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR REPRINTS OR BACK ISSUES AND INFORMATION, CALL 545-3500 MONDAY 8:30 A.M. AND 2:30 P.M.

UMass officials urged students to delay return to campus after blizzard

DAN ROSNA/COLLEGIAN

An apartment remains buried under tall snow drifts Sunday morning after a major blizzard pounded Hampshire Country. The University requested students not return to campus until Monday due to poor roads.

STORM from page 1

Cape Cod. Massachusetts State Police reported several abandoned cars on the on-ramps of the highway Sunday.

Wind gusts reached as high as 55 miles per hour in Boston and 84 MPH on Nantucket during the height of the storm. The storm caused several communities to lose electricity. The entire island of Nantucket fell into darkness Sunday afternoon and evening. 13,000 people on Cape Cod and another 5,000 people along the south shore lost power. Officials on Nantucket who feared what might happen without heat and electricity brought most residents to shelters at the high school and island hospital.

Reports of damage along the South Shore were still coming in Sunday night. WHDH-TV reported that a Scituate man lost everything from his beachfront home when waves crashed the over the sea wall and smashed through the windows of the house.

Flooding was a problem throughout beachfront neighborhoods in Scituate, which is located 20 miles south of Boston. The National Guard had to evacuate residents in that community, according to Massachusetts Emergency Management Agency spokesperson Peter Judge.

"It's not like we're going to put ourselves on the back and go home," he said to the Associated Press. "Until it's over and folks have a chance to evaluate it, we're going to be hanging in there."

National Weather Service meteorologist Bob Thompson told the Associated Press that the storm did not accumulate as much snow as the infamous Blizzard of '78, but it did fall faster and in a shorter amount of time.

Creator to make software quicker and make sure I don't starve." The team is currently looking for a web developer in the Amherst area.

I2HUB from page 1

Chang said he and his team hope to launch new software this week that is expected to make the engine faster and more efficient. The i2hub has created a partnership with ConnectU, an online social network, to allow users to share personal online profiles that may be accessed through the i2hub. Students will be allowed to use their existing profiles from sites such as ConnectU, TheFacebook, and Friendster, and import them to the hub.

In the midst of all the anti-piracy lawsuits and protests, the i2hub has been pointed out by the Recording Industry Association of America as a means to "hijack" Internet 2, and facilitate the illegal exchange of copyrighted materials.

Chang said he disagrees.

"This is a student collaboration service, we have no control over what students use it for," he said.

The i2hub can be used for educational purposes with students sharing work and academic information over the network, but the bulk of files being shared is copyrighted material such as movies, songs, and even full music albums containing the cover art.

"I can see the idea of sharing ideas and individual work, but realistically, no one is going to use it for that," said Seth Berkowitz, UMass senior and Electrical Engineering major.

The FBI has not expressed any interest in the i2hub, and monitoring file sharing activity from outside the campus network is impossible. Chang worries about the university attempting to shut down the hub.

"I like to think of us as a grassroots organization. It wouldn't be nice of UMass to shut down one of their own," he said.

Edward Blaguszewski, director of the Office of News and Information, says no outside organization has contacted UMass in regards to the i2hub. The only time the school intervened in Chang's operation was in February of 2003, when he first began to run the hub on the UMass server. Office of Information Technology network monitors picked up on heavy network traffic coming from the i2hub. This activity was slowing down the campus internet connection, so OIT asked Chang to move his project off campus, which he did. A year later, the project was running again and remains to this day.

The University has not made any public statements on its connection with student Wayne Chang and his operation.

"UMass has over 24,000 students. We expect students to abide by the student code of conduct and respect the law. If they don't, their cases may be reviewed and they may face a sanction. But I have not heard of Wayne being involved in that category," said Blaguszewski.

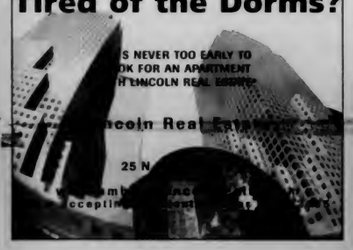
Calif. train wreck kills at least nine

By Tim Molloy
Associated Press

GLENDALE, Calif. — A suicidal man parked his SUV on the railroad tracks and set off a crash of two commuter trains Wednesday that hurled passengers down the aisles and turned rail cars into smoking, twisted heaps of steel, authorities said. At least 10 people were killed and more than 180 injured.

The collision took place just before daybreak on the outskirts of Los Angeles, creating a scene of carnage. Employees at a Costco store rushed to the scene and pulled riders from the tipped-over double-deck cars before the flames reached them. Dazed passengers staggered from the wreckage, some limping. One elderly man on the train was covered in blood and soot, his legs and arms apparently broken.

"I heard a noise. It got louder and louder," said passenger Diane



See TRAIN on page 3

SCARLET CAIN/COLLEGIAN

A suicidal man who parked his car on train cracks caused two commuter trains to collide in Glendal, Calif. yesterday, killing at least nine.

Tired of the Dorms?

UMASS Campus Recreation

STILL TIME TO ENTER:
Basketball (M/W/C).....A.S.A.P

GET THOSE FORMS IN BY:
Wallyball (M/W/C).....1/31
Sports Trivia (M/W).....2/7

SPORTS trivia

More info: 215 Boyden, 5-2693
On The Web: www.umass.edu/umim
LATE ENTRANTS SHOULD CHECK FOR EXTENSIONS IN BOYDEN 215

ALUMNI ASSOCIATION UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST

"Leaders in the Making" Scholarship

SOPHOMORE & JUNIOR STUDENTS

The "Leaders in the Making" Scholarship Program was created by the Alumni Association to support the academic and career pursuits of promising sophomores and juniors. Students from diverse campus populations whose records suggest that they will develop into alumni with admirable leadership qualities upon graduation are encouraged to apply.

Four recipients will be selected by the Alumni Association Student Affairs and Scholarships Committee based on their application and will be awarded $2,000 towards their Fall 2005 tuition bill and fees.

This multi-part application must be completed in its entireity and returned to the Alumni Association no later than 5 p.m. on Friday, February 11, 2005 for consideration. No exceptions will be allowed.

Don't pass up this great opportunity. Pick up an application today!

EXTROVERTS WANTED UMASS AMHERST IS IN SEARCH OF TOUR GUIDES

1. Lead campus tours for students and families interested in the UMass Amherst Campus.
2. Paid hourly position with a minimum commitment of 5 hours a week including some weekends.
3. Serve as panel speakers, hosts, and tour leaders at on and off campus yield activities such as Open Houses and College Fairs.
4. Conduct informational interviews with prospective students and their families.

UMASS AMHERST
To find out more about the position or to pick up an application visit us at the Campus Center Concourse from January 31st-February 4th. Applications are also available at the Visitors Center. Application deadline is February 4th, 2005

police log

Enraged individual drives car off tow truck bed by Morrill

Tuesday January18

3 p.m. A party stated a subject's finger was cut and bleeding in Prince Hall.

Wednesday January19

5:19 p.m. A party stated that they were unsure if their license plate was stolen or lost after noticing one of the bolts, attaching the plate, was missing and a second bolt was loose outside of Tobin Hall.

5:55 p.m. A person reported a stolen camera valued at $325 in the Morrill Science Center.

Friday January21st

12:57 a.m. A person stated that someone grabbed their arm and told them to leave Hampshire House. The person did not need medical attention.

Saturday January22nd

12:06 p.m. A person reported that their bike was stolen from Lincoln Apartments on Lincoln Avenue. The bike was valued at $350.

Sunday January23rd

1:02 a.m. A party reported a vehicle driving erratically and not slowing down for pedestrians in the parking lot across the street from the Hagis Mall.

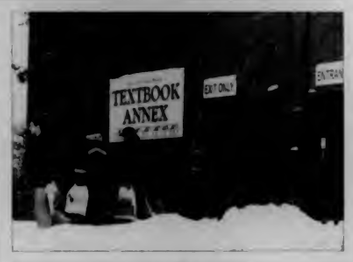
1:54 a.m. A person stated that subjects in the Campus Center Hotel refused to quiet down and were throwing objects at Campus Center security guards. A verbal warning was issued to the subjects.

Monday January24th

2:12 p.m. A party stated that they attempted to tow a vehicle parked outside of Morrill Science Center on Stockbridge Road. The owner of the vehicle became enraged and drove the vehicle off of the tow truck.

7:02 p.m. A person reported to be stuck in an elevator in Kennedy Hall.

11:42 p.m. An officer investigated a suspicious vehicle in the parking lot behind Sylvan. The officer seized a paint ball gun.



MEGAN BRINTON/COLLEGIAN

Back to books

Above, a sign outside the Campus Center welcomes students back to campus after a long winter's break yesterday.

Right, students cringe against the cold after stocking up at the Textbook Annex.

Over 120 injured in train crash

TRAIN from page 2

Brady, 56. "Next thing I knew the train tilted, everyone was screaming and I held onto a pole for dear life. I held on for what seemed like a week and a half it seemed. It was a complete nightmare."

Dozens of the injured were in critical condition, and more than 120 people were sent to hospitals.

The wreck set in motion a huge rescue operation involving more than 300 firefighters, some of whom climbed ladders to reach the windows of the battered train cars. A triage center was set up in a parking lot, where the injured lay sprawled on color-colded mat — red for those with severe injuries, green for those less seriously hurt.

According to authorities, the man who parked his SUV on the tracks changed his mind and got out of the vehicle before a Metrolink train smashed into it.

The train then derailed and collided with another train going in the opposite direction. That train also jumped the tracks.

Processor could save time on historical reference research

MANTHA from page 1

Manmatha's program for some time is the slow processor speed of most personal computers. These processors aren't capable of loading large documents in a reasonable amount of time, which would deter some users.

"The processors just aren't fast enough," said Manmatha.

Although the program may not be available to the public for some time, it's raised optimism from the library's Adams.

"It would certainly seem to be a great timesaver when doing historical research if one could immediately find all references to a person or event that was referred to in someone's papers, letters or diaries," said Adams.

Prosecutor Reese says evidence that Johnston fired gun is strong make a phone call from the cruiser.

MURDER from page 1

Using his cell phone, Johnston called a friend at the Baystate Medical Center in Springfield. The friend, who was not identified, drove him back to Westfield.

"Thank god they didn't search me," Johnston allegedly said to his friend. Steese said that Johnston then showed his friend a semi-automatic handgun.

Two days after the incident, state police found a .223-caliber Colt rifle and a magazine with 19 rounds near the Connecticut River in Hadley.

Steese added that an additional round was found on a tree stump. The bullets matched the shell casings taken out of Sullivan's house.

According to Steese, Johnston has a history of mental illness and drug use, including steroids.

Steese described a "trail of blood" that Johnston left behind that night. Blood was found in Johnston's car, the Hadley police cruiser that he sat in, and the car of the friend who gave him a ride.

Court documents said that Johnston's parents called the Westfield police to report that their son was acting erratically. The same documents said that Johnston admitted to his parents that he shot someone.

He was taken to Noble Hospital in Westfield, where Judge Robert F. Kumor, Jr. later arraigned him at his bedside.

Johnston was found competent to stand trial after a court-appointed examination last month. He was sent to Bridgewater State Hospital briefly because he was considered to be suicidal.

Steese asked Rup to hold Johnston without bail.

Johnston's attorney, Alexander Z. Nappan, did not object to this request, but he asked that he be able to review this matter at a different time.

Rup granted Steese's request. Johnston has another pretrial hearing scheduled this spring for April 6.

ALUMNI ASSOCIATION

ATTENTION FACULTY AND STAFF

Do you know a Senior that is deserving of the Alumni Association Senior Leadership Award? Please help us identify deserving students by nominating them today!

The Senior Leadership Award was established by the UMass Amherst Alumni Association to recognize graduating seniors at UMass Amherst who have demonstrated outstanding leadership and service to the campus. Seniors who have made major contributions in areas such as academic excellence, student organizations, athletics, campus jobs, or community and volunteer services are eligible. In addition to active involvement in the life of the campus, eligible candidates must demonstrate a serious commitment to their academic pursuit.

Nomination forms are available online at UMassAlumni.com/students. For any additional information, contact Melanie Corbeil in the Alumni Association at 545-2317.

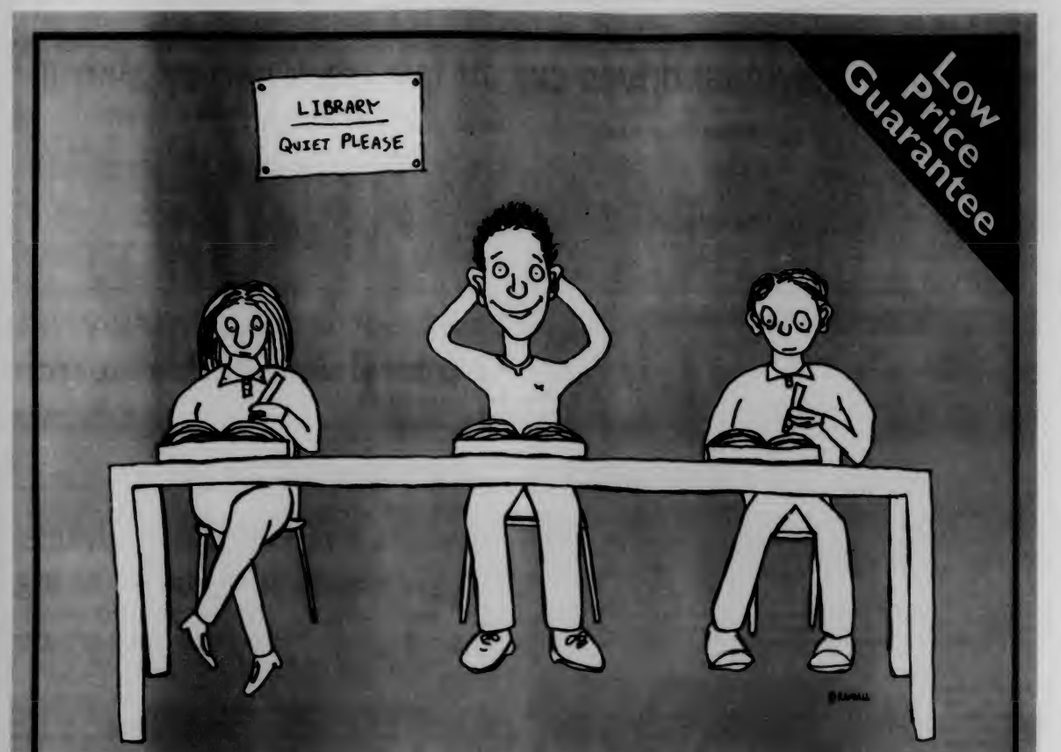
Deadline: Wednesday, February 9, 2005 - 5 p.m.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
NOW HIRING
FOR
Special Issues Coordinator & Promotions Manager

Boost your resume,get real business experience, earn cash, and have some fun!

Possibility of receiving internship credits

Now accepting applications. Come to the Campus Center Basement Rm 113 or call 545.3500 and ask for Tiffany.



SPRING 2005
To the World's Best Customers

At UMass Dining Services, we are always cookin' up something. Here is what we are planning to bring you during the Spring Semester 2005:

- EXTENDED HOURS OF OPERATION including weekends, at all DCs
- NEW MENUS featuring many more fresh items and healthy choices
- MORE DISPLAY COOKING daily at all meals
- MORE THEME SPECIALS that you desire
- MORE VEGETARIAN FOOD options to chose from
- TASTE OF UMASS in April at the Mullin's Center

DINING SERVICES UMassAmherst
YCMP

DON'T THINK OF THEM AS USED.
THINK OF THEM AS PRE-HIGHLIGHTED.

Be smart.
Shop the biggest selection of used books and save up to 25%.*

Save all your Textbook Annex receipts and you can earn a 5% Rebate good at the University Store.

LIMITED TIME OFFER
MAKE A $100 or more purchase and receive a coupon for 20% OFF on imprinted clothing, gifts and accessories.*
GET 20% OFF
YOU NEED THIS COUPON!

GUARANTEED BUYBACK
If I'm on the book you get the cash.
50% of purchase price at buyback.
Available on select titles only.

STUDENT SAVER CARD
$5
Get the card that saves you cash...
Pick up your student saver card today!
(See store for details)

UMASS AMHERST
University Store
and Textbook Annex
Phone: (413)545-2619

egfollett.com
ONLINE. ON CAMPUS.

* Over the cost of rent.
 See store for details.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, JANUARY 27, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

No news is good news

Thomas Naughton

I was sure that the American people would some day wake up and realize that the proctors of our major corporate news sources were pulling the collective wool over our eyes. I just figured Fox News and its obvious bias and general right-wing intimidation strategy would catalyze this massive awakening.

As a member of the media on a thankfully minute scale, I was so embarrassed, incensed, enraged, and completely bewildered by the events surrounding The CBS News scandal surrounding George W. Bush's military records, but not for reasons that conservatives would like me to be.

Conservatives salivated over this flub like bloodthirsty lions over a rotting carcass, and the brand burnt into the skin of that carcass reads "American Public." Don't you feel the bites taken out of your sides? Can't you smell the breath of blood and ripped flesh looming over you? Of course you can't, because you're dead. We're all dead or dying and no one's getting fat except dirty political beasts like George W. Bush and all who advise or support him. This was the media's September 11 and just like the 9/11 of our reality, conservatives are now able to fully clasp their strangle hold on the establishment. Now they can fully exact control over the media in an overt manner, where before they acted as though diamonds in the rough like Fox News and Talk Radio were the only voices of conservatism in the media.

Fox seamlessly moves between fact-based news reporting and opinion shows. Sometimes Fox News shows even basically include opinions from reporters directly following reports.

The American public looked on at their screens with wide eyes at the revelation that the CBS News report on George W. Bush's military record was based on fake documents. We were left with the obvious questions. "Is Dan Rather a liar?"

Waiting in the wings for the Red Riding Hood populace who looked for some semblance of truth in the face of a messy scandal was Fox News, a real, feral beast dressed as Grandma. That's right kids; Grandma sure does have a big mouth to relay the conservative agenda of racism, classism, sexism and homophobia, 24 hours a day. All the better to eat you with my dear.

However, that's the beauty and extreme genius of Fox News. They label themselves as "Fair and Balanced" and "America's Newsroom" in all of their commercials. The temptation in the wake of such an embarrassing scandal as that of CBS News is to look towards a news source that has the appearance of being truthful, real journalism (as Fox also likes to think of themselves), and all-American.

Fox News hopes to welcome you with open arms, with the promise that they will report on issues and you will decide what is right. It's funny, however, that the only real issues and messages that are explained clearly are the ones that paint the conservatives and the Bush administration in the best light. You have no choice; you have to decide that Bush and all who support him are correct.

Let's really examine this CBS News scandal. What happened was pretty dirty, pretty unfair to George W. Bush. No one deserves to have an story aired on national television about their past, especially if the main source of the report cannot be confirmed as true. Should Dan Rather step down because of this? Yes, probably. This mistake helped to re-elect George W. Bush, which is not the outcome the report intended at all and not an outcome that much of the country desired.

Rather was stepping down anyway, but now he has been said to be planning on hosting other news shows. If I was Rather, I'd take this debacle as a clear sign that it's time to retire. Should the other producers involved leave as well? If they can't find better jobs, no. What is the point of ruining their careers over a mistaken report that was immediately refuted and resulted in an election vindication for the report's subject? If this report was about Bill Clinton and it was found to be fake, would we even still be talking about it? I doubt it.

Where was the fallout when Fox News wrongfully called the election in Bush's favor in 2000? I only recently saw any of the Fox News executives testify concerning that mess in a documentary. Why weren't there a million stories on every channel saying that Fox News is only "Fair and Balanced" if you're George W. Bush?

I don't remember any of the other news channels running that story day in and day out the way Fox News has been parading this Dan Rather scandal.

And now let's compare this scandal to the running composition of Fox News. What is worse? To find out that a report that aired was false or to blur the lines between what is fact and what is opinion? Fox seamlessly moves between fact-based news reporting and opinion shows. Sometimes Fox News shows even basically include opinions from reporters directly following reports. And what about the sins of omission? Fox has repeatedly not included pieces of news when it was literally breaking down their studio door. What did Fox say on the days that there were thousands upon thousands of protesters in the streets standing up against the Republican National Convention? Nothing.

They acted like nothing was happening, when all accounts of downtown New York City described it as war zone.

What will be the outcome of this entire mess? I'm sure everyone will forget about it. Perhaps they will already have forgotten about it by the time this column comes out. This is unfortunately one more skirmish in our new cultural war, a war where the divisions are not clear, where the good guys are not necessarily good, and the bad guys run the country.

Thomas Naughton is a Collegian Columnist.

Gender myths in education

Amelia Sabadini

Imagine. Someone is standing in front of you, and saying that they believe there exists a definite reason that would justify their treating you and everyone who is similar to you, like dirt. What do you think you would do?

Imagine that this person had already shown a penchant for refusing to hire people like you. Imagine this person just nonchalantly tells you that they think it's OK to issue an ultimatum about how you and your child are going to live. What do you think you would do? Be honest. You'd probably have an incredibly strong urge to either confront this person or get the hell away from them. It's maddeningly frustrating, and also pretty scary, when someone not only behaves in the same manner as the previously described hypothetical person did, but also happens to hold a position of extreme influence. I'm talking about a person who is so powerful, that they can do more than just put you and your kind down by themselves. Their mere words can convince and encourage an enormous number of people all over the world to do the same, or worse. I'm talking about Harvard's President Lawrence Summers.

On Jan. 14, while speaking at a conference that was ostensibly focused on diversifying the fields of science and engineering, Summers allegedly voiced support for the notion that women lack the "innate ability" (his alleged words which he doesn't deny, but as of January 25th, he has yet to release the recording of his speech) to excel in the fields of math and science. Defenders of Summers' questionable remarks are claiming that he's being unjustly lambasted for advocating a comprehensive investigation into the possible reasons for why females are a minority in many of the math and science related careers.

However, the public's current perspective on female mathematical aptitude seems to be skewed in favor of the "innate" differences ideology. This line of thought is in no danger of being abandoned or excluded from scientific discourse. The innate biological differences hypotheses that Summers was pushing have only correlational and observational data behind them and yet they're assumed to be true by many people. In fact they're generally referred to as theories, which denotes a level of certainty grossly in excess of what the results from the corresponding studies merit.

On the other hand, theories that explain sex-based differences in math performance as a result of social factors have very strong evidence to support them. This evidence comes from consistently replicable experiments that show clear cause-and-effect relationships between social factors and performance. Yet these social factor theories are repeatedly dismissed in the public forum, and the experiments that support them receive little if any mention outside the field of social science. Anyone who claims to be concerned about a free exchange of ideas should be endeavoring to right this imbalance in publicly perceived validity rather than seeking to perpetuate it.

The idea that women are born with predetermined cognitive deficiencies is not simply an abstract scientific hypothesis. It's also a political belief that harms women by stigmatizing them.

Many of the studies that show strong evidence for the ability of social factors to effect women's performances in math involve examination of a phenomenon called stereotype threat. Stereotype threat refers to a person's fears that their actions may confirm a negative stereotype about the group to which they belong. Social scientists Spencer, Steele and Quinn found that when a group of male and female college students, equally matched in ability, were given a math test that they had been told men tended to do better on, the females scored significantly worse than the males. Conversely when they gave the same test to another group with the same characteristics and told them that women and men tended to do equally well the women scored as well as the men. The results of this experiment have been replicated many times since. Other experiments have shown that just exposing females to stereotypes about women through Television, commercials prior to a math test will also result in decreased performance. There have also been experiments showing that white males can fall prey to stereotype threat, when tested against Asians after being told that Asians tend to do better on the test.

Experiments such as these don't just cast a great deal of doubt on innate differences hypothesis; they also conclusively prove the harmful effects of invoking stereotypes. This in turn, demonstrates the need for a more comprehensive view of the innate differences hypothesis. The idea that women are born with predetermined cognitive deficiencies is not simply an abstract scientific hypothesis. It's also a political belief that harms women by stigmatizing them. This stigmatization and its effects on women (diminished performance) are taken by certain people as license to discriminate against women.

Stereotypes are in essence biohazards. They can harm people. They can ruin lives. Just because the world is already teaming with a toxic level of stereotypes about women, doesn't mean it's OK to go carelessly splashing more of them about. The problem isn't that innate ability stereotype is being investigated by people who are biased toward believing it's true. Everyone has their biases. The problem is that far too many of the people conducting and supporting this research are being incredibly irresponsible about it. I'd hardly call Summers a champion of scientific inquiry. I'd call him a serious threat to the practice of safe, responsible science.

Amelia Sabadini is a Collegian columnist.

Tunes of another time

Mike Anmuth

Whenever I drive around the country, one of my favorite things to do is listen to radio stations in different areas and in different markets. Even just between here and Philadelphia, when I drive home, I can hear Springfield, Hartford, New York, and many areas in between while flipping through the stations. On my last drive from home back to school, however, I began to realize something while listening between the long sets of commercials: certain songs reminded me of people, places and events in the past.

This shouldn't come as a shock to you, and I cannot claim credit for inventing this obvious theory, but isn't it fun to hear a song you haven't heard for quite some time and for it to take you back in your memory? After all, who doesn't remember their favorite jams from middle school or the song that reminds them of their first love? Even if the memories are not exactly favorable, certain songs place us right back where we first heard them, whether we mean for them to do that or not.

It happens to me all the time, whether I am listening to the radio while driving through distant places, or I rediscover an old CD or song in my collection. It blindsides me and I'll start singing along, even if I figured that I forgot the lyrics long ago. The point isn't so much the music or the lyrics, but images from our past that these songs conjur. It's how we link them in our minds to the objects we touch, the situations in which we are placed, and the feelings we have.

How often have you heard a song and thought "this would make a great soundtrack to my life"? I know that I have done this many times. Often times, it seems ironic that a happy song will be playing when we are down, or a sad song playing when we are uplifted. We often find ourselves switching radio stations in order to get music to match our moods, and when we hear these songs again, possibly years later, the same moods come back to revisit us. Perhaps, as people, we attach songs to these memories so that we don't lose them and are pleasantly surprised when they return.

Being on the road for a great many hours allows someone to think of these things that may not come to you if you're not sleep deprived and tired of seeing highway in states where it seems like corn is the main export.

I won't tell you that all song associations are good, but I think the band Maroon 5 actually puts it best when they sing, "Trying to recreate images life gives us from our past / And sometimes it's a sad song."

It's true that sometimes the song is sad, but sometimes it's uplifting and sometimes it's just plain neutral. Whatever the case, songs with memories are memories worth keeping.

We forget many instances and situations in life over time. We have all lived at least 18 years, many of us more than that. Being able to remember random and various things is kind of neat and sort of exciting. I realize that this phenomenon is not spectacular, but being on the road for many hours allows someone to think of these things that may not come to you if you're not sleep deprived and tired of seeing highways in states where it seems like corn is the main export.

The main export of our minds is our experiences, experiences which grow weary over time and happen to fade away. Your passengers may put their hands over their ears in mock horror as you sing bars of songs that you thought had disappeared long ago, but locked inside your head are the feelings of yesterday.

One day, we will be old and gray, and the songs that dazzle us today on the radio will be replaced by something completely different. Perhaps we'll associate our days at UMass with songs, or perhaps we will not. We make that decision rather subconsciously. Overall, listening to the radio while driving has taught me many things, but the best lesson of all is that songs come and songs go, but memories can be resurrected at the drop of a hat.

Michael Anmuth is a Collegian columnist.

America needs teachers

Growing up in the public schools of El Paso, Texas, Aurora Lora experienced first-hand the educational disparities that persist in our country. The daughter of a Mexican immigrant, Lora encountered the reality that the United States' education system, like those in most of the wealthiest nations, often provides the least resources and opportunities to the students who need extra help the most.

Lora's next first-hand encounter with these disparities came just a few years later, but this time she had the opportunity to do something about them. After a phenomenal four-year academic and leadership record at the University of Texas, which honored Lora at graduation for her contributions to student life, she joined Teach For America. At the age of twenty three, "Ms. Lora" stood before a room of fourth-graders in inner-city Houston—most of whom could read and write only on a first or second grade level. As their teacher and leader, she showed her students that she believed in their potential and that they could succeed if they worked hard. Although others scoffed, she and her students set ambitious goals for their progress.

Armed with little experience, but with the focus and determination that idealistic leaders bring to great causes, Ms. Lora went to work. She convinced her principal to let her run classes into the evenings two days a week, and then expanded those classes to five days a week. She held Saturday classes. Following her lead, the students—and their families—worked, and worked, and worked. They began to believe that they could in fact "catch up" academically, with Ms. Lora's help.

Just eight months later, when the test scores came back, Ms. Lora's students—ALL of them—had passed the state exam. Even Adrian, the student who had been handed over to Ms. Lora by another teacher with the admonition that he's "too dumb" for fourth-grade, passed the test. In fact, more students had passed the test in Ms. Lora's class than had previously done so in the entire school. Ms. Lora had literally closed the achievement gap for her students. The next year, the principal doubled the number of students in Ms. Lora's classroom.

After teaching at the Houston school for four years, Ms. Lora decided that she owed it to herself and her students to work to strengthen the educational system on an even larger scale. Today, she is earning her Ph.D. from Harvard University's selective, four-student Urban Superintendent Program. "Ms. Lora" will soon be "Dr. Lora," and will be acting on the insights and sense of outrage she earned in her classroom to improve the academic achievement of students in one of America's largest urban school districts.

Lora's story is a testament to the power and impact that committed recent college graduates can have, even immediately, on the educational disparities that are our nation's most serious domestic challenge.

In our country that aspires so admirably to be the Land of Opportunity and a model for the rest of the world, the sad, persistent reality is that by the time they are just nine years old, students who live in low-income communities are an average of three grade levels behind students who live in high-income communities. This gap only becomes worse over time, and students born in low-income communities are ultimately seven times less likely to graduate from college than students born in high-income communities.

What Lora and others have shown us, however, is that these disparities don't need to exist. When children growing up in economically-marginalized communities are given the opportunities they deserve, they can and do excel on an absolute scale. Yes, the gap in educational outcomes is an extraordinarily entrenched social problem – but a true movement of our generation's future leadership can tackle it.

Educational inequity must be our generation's civil rights issue. It needs the unrelenting commitment of the most talented and determined among you.

Wendy Kopp is the founder and president of Teach For America.

Have an opinion? Write for Ed/Op!

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, JANUARY 27, 2004 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

'Toy Story 2' takes cool new stage

ALL PHOTOS COURTESY DISNEY

By Chris Gazzara
Collegian Staff

They're toys, they talk... and they can skate.

Disney On Ice is back with another fantastic ice show, "Disney/Pixar's Toy Story 2." For years Disney On Ice has been known for bringing its full length animated feature films to life with stunning special effects and intricate skate dancing. This season, Disney brings the magic of Buzz and Woody back in a sequel to its successful blockbuster about a toy cowboy and a space-age action figure.

"Toy Story 2" on Ice
Springfield Civic Center
Springfield
Jan. 28-30

The show begins with Disney favorites Mickey, Minnie, Donald and Goofy dressed as astronauts. After introducing the story, they depart leaving the ice open for Buzz to battle his arch nemesis, Evil Emperor Zurg. At this point the audience will encounter a comical traffic cone sequence culminating with a 16-car-pile-up. This sequence is one of the shows most elaborate, incorporating the landing of a giant airplane wheel and the toppling of a full scale semi truck filled with toothpaste.

In this scene, each character is fitted with its own uniquely designed traffic cone. For example, Mr. Potato Head's eyes and ears are placed on the outside of his cone, a comical detail that symbolizes the care taken in outfitting the show. Everything is specifically tailored in order to make the show as funny and easy to relate to as possible.

After many action-packed scenes and complex skate routines, the show climaxes with toe-tapping energy. All of the toys get together and rejoice at the safe return home of the friendly sheriff, Woody.

Figure skating itself is a difficult and at times dangerous sport. After adding the expressiveness of acting, you have an athletically and aesthetically pleasing show. To create this unique balance experienced choreographer Barry Lather signed on and helped skaters play these classic roles. Lather has some credits under his belt after having worked with the likes of Britney Spears, Paula Abdul and Sting. He has trained with Olympic skating stars such as Kristi Yamaguchi and Nancy Kerrigan. He has also choreographed with Disney On Ice in the past.

In a press release announcing the event, Lather talked about his job and the challenges he faced with this program. He wanted to replicate the range of styles, from comedy to heartfelt drama, that were explored in the movie.

"We strive to accurately emulate this diversity in the choreography," said Lather.

While working with his cast, he sought to imbibe in them a sense of the emotion they would need to actualize the show's more poignant moments. Throughout the story, Woody and Jessie experience struggle as they learn about themselves and where they belong. Lather attempted to bring these lyrical and galvanizing moments to life on the ice.

"It's about making a connection," Lather said.

For the better part of the last century Disney has brought joy and entertainment to people all over the world. The ice shows are another spectacular creation that can be added to the list of Disney accomplishments. From incredible producers, directors and choreographers, to World class figure skaters and innovative set design, there is something for everyone at "Disney/Pixar's Toy Story 2."

Dating troubles answered in tell-all book

By Amy Forni
Collegian Staff

"He's afraid to get hurt again. Maybe he doesn't want to ruin the friendship. Maybe he's intimidated by me. He just got out of a relationship."

'He's Just Not That Into YOu'
By Greg Behrendt & Liz Tuccillo
Simon Spotlight Entertainment

Do you and your confidants recycle these excuses as often as you worry about a future of bags and cats? If you do not already know, you are beautiful. Simply put, you are fantastic, smart, fun, unique, and even though you may not believe the age-old words of our mothers, you are too good to settle for someone who does not love you the way you deserve to be loved. Greg Behrendt and Liz Tuccillo, authors of "He's Just Not That Into You", wrote the witty, direct, "no-excuse truth to understanding guys" manual that will leave you with a smile on your face, opened eyes, and confidence in your heart.

Behrendt and Tuccillo, respectively a consultant and writer of "Sex and the City," encourage women to end incessant analysis of their relationships. Behrendt, a past playboy, now devotedly wed, knows the truth underlining every excuse our male counterparts conjure up. Tuccillo, a successful and independent single New Yorker, analyzes her friends' and her own relationships from her enlightened no-excuse-is-a-good-excuse standpoint. Collaboratively, the writers humorously answer candid letters from women who have heard every defense in the book, literally. The authors suggest that women should forget justifying men's actions and stop analyzing their behaviors. They say to quit stressing out over the meaning of every word that escapes from his mouth and realize that if he were really into you, you would know it.

"He's Just Not That Into You" is organized into 16 chapters such as "He's Just Not That Into You If He's Not Calling You," "Because If He Likes You, Trust Me, He Will Ask You Out," "He's Just Not That Into You If He's Having Sex With Someone Else," and "There's Never Going To Be A Good Excuse For Cheating."

Each chapter offers advice and Tuccillo's, "This is What's Hard About This One" counterarguments against Behrendt's sometimes abrasive, yet honest truths. Also included in each chapter is a "This is What it Should Look Like," section where they discuss success stories based on teachings from the book. Also, each chapter includes hilarious "Super-Good Really Helpful" workbook questions.

You will not be able to put down this provocative and savvy book. Behrendt and Tuccillo help empower women everywhere and relay the simple idea that if you or your significant other are making excuses as to why the relationship is not working, or why you are not satisfied with the situation, it simply means he's just not that into you.

The authors also suggest that women need to honor the fact that they are fabulous and that there is someone out there (there really is), who will love you and all your incredible qualities. So go ahead, be prepared to laugh, learn, and spark a reason to stand up straighter, as you read, "He's Just Not That Into You."

COURTESY SIMON SPOTLIGHT ENTERTAINMENT

'Sex and the City' staffers Behrendt and Tuccillo claim they will solve all your boy troubles in their new book titled "He's Just Not That Into You."

Dressing up down: No longer is goose the Michelin Man

By Lisa Jones Townsel
St. Louis Post-Dispatch

When you think of a down coat, what's the first thing that comes to mind? Warmth? Coziness? A profile resembling the Michelin Man?

Yeah, I thought so.

But by far, this synthetic mix of nylon, polyester and, sometimes, down feathers is among the best barriers against winter's fury. The challenge is making it look less, well, inflated.

Let's face it. The coats are big. Bodacious. Even the titles of a few, which refer to "puff" in the name, point to their mammoth size.

"With the older down coats, it was like you were carrying around an extra sleeping bag on top of you," suggests Maeghan O'Hagan, co-owner of Clayton-based Lusso. "Now, they've gone to great lengths to make it more wearable and less like camping gear."

Nowadays, you can dress-up down.

"The right pieces together can make a great outfit, like a great pair of cropped pants and a short-waisted down jacket," notes Jacob Laws, visual merchandiser for Splash. To illustrate his point, he paired a tangerine shrunken jacket and cropped pants with lame banding.

People might be surprised to learn that even coats that say down aren't always filled exclusively with feathers.

"There's a lot of simulated down. It has the look and same effect: warmth," Laws says, adding, "The addition of other materials helps to keep your coat's shape."

Coats typically have somewhere between 20 to 80 percent down feathers combined with fillers.

Want something more than the basic blanket form? Laws says check for designers with "a cool edge."

Embellishments also help. Regular white coats with brassy gold detailing can't help but stand out. And coats in robust hues, including cotton candy pink and sky blue, look good enough to be plucked.

We caught up with Monroe G. Milstein, chief executive officer of Burlington Coat Factory recently. During a phone interview, Milstein called the down coat the year's No. 1 fashion, at least in the coat market.

"More than any other coat this year, it's selling," he says. "It's selling this year was far superior to any other year. Ordinarily, they stop buying coats right before Thanksgiving, but this year's going so strong that we put in additional orders for January."

But the coat mogul acknowledges that color variety and easy maintenance are only a part of the appeal. The puff is a must.

"The truth is, the flatter ones aren't as warm," he says. "It's from the depth of the pile; that's where you get the insulation. It's not like the old Michelin Man, but the puffier ones are warmer."

Does he deny that that depth results in a puffier profile?

"No, it doesn't make you look fat, but it doesn't make you look anorexic either," Milstein says before asking, "Do fur coats make people look fat?"

COURTESY KEVIN MANNING

A model sports a white down vest with furlined hood and a polar box hat for warmth and style in the harsh winter weather.

COURTESY KEVIN MANNING

A warm down jacket with a belted wasit for shape and a Siberian Racoon fur hat are the perfect accessories for winter 2005.

THE BARN, Discount Groceries

Spend less, eat more! Check it out!

Lenders Bagels (6 ct bag)	50¢ bag
Popsicle Novelties (12 ct box)	50¢ box
Potato Chips (5.5 oz bag) or Tortilla Chips	50¢ bag
Raisins (12 oz box)	50¢ each
Shrimp Bisque Instant Soups	50¢ each
Cheese or Pepperoni Pizzas (7" size)	50¢ each
Creamy Peanut Butter (12 oz)	79¢ each
Armour Beef Stew lunch cups	75¢ each
Cheddar Cheese Noodle Cups	3 for $1.00
Solid White Tuna Fish	$1.00 can
Single Yogurts (Columbo, Dannon, etc.)	3 for $1.00
Healthy Handfuls Pretzels & Cookies	50¢ each
M&Ms (14 oz bag) & bagged candy bars	$1.00 bag
Back to Nature Sesame or Butter Crackers	$1.00 box
Good Health Vegetable Chips (10 oz)	$1.59 bag
Frosted Shredded Wheat (& other cereals)	$1.75 box

...and more bargains throughout the store!!

95 River Street, Greenfield ~ 413-774-5599 ~ 8 AM to 10 PM Daily
From UMass, take Route 116 to Deerfield, then 91 North to Exit 26
~ Credit cards, debit cards, cash & food stamps accepted! ~

Comedic legends say farewell

By Chris T. Nguyen
Associated Press

BURBANK, Calif. — Johnny Carson was remembered Monday on "The Tonight Show" with an affectionate lookback at his nearly 30 years as host, including tributes by comedians and former guests that left many in the audience teary-eyed.

"As a performer, I never wanted to impress anyone more than Johnny Carson," said Jay Leno, the show's current host. "Johnny had that special quality of grace, charm and dignity in the public arena. He was an incredibly polite man and when you were invited into his house, this show, you knew you were an honored guest."

Carson died Sunday at 79 after nearly 13 years in retirement. NBC said he died of emphysema _ a respiratory disease that can be attributed to smoking.

Leno's guests Monday included Carson favorites Bob Newhart and Don Rickles, as well as comedian Drew Carey, singer k.d. lang and Carson's former sidekick, Ed McMahon.

McMahon told Leno that on their first "Tonight Show" together, he asked Carson what his own role should be. McMahon said Carson replied, "Ed, I don't know how I see my own role. Let's just go down and entertain the hell out of them."

McMahon also recounted the entertainer's strong sense of privacy.

"He was great with 10 million people, lousy with 10," McMahon said.

The tribute show contained an abundance of archival clips, including one of a dark-haired young Leno making his first appearance as a guest on the "Tonight Show." He would take over as host when Carson retired in 1992.

Others included Carson in one of his signature bits, the mind-reading "Carnac the Magnificent," a routine that David Letterman's band leader Paul Shaffer occasionally still borrows for the "Late Show."

Comedians Jerry Seinfeld and Roseanne Barr, who made their starts on the show, also appeared in clips.

Missing from the show was Carson's longtime bandleader Doc Severinsen, but he made an appearance on CNN's "Larry King Live," where he told King he was still grieving.

"I'm still having a problem with it, you know," he said. "I think 'I'm OK, now. OK, I've got everything under control,' and then bam, it hits again."

While the mood on the "Tonight Show" set was often celebratory, there was quiet reflection outside NBC's Burbank studios.

At Johnny Carson Park, adjacent to the studio, a vase of red roses and other flowers had been left at a plaque of the late-night host along with notes that said, "Goodnight Johnny, we'll miss you" and "Nobody did it better than Carson."

"He will be missed by a lot of people, especially his sidekick Ed McMahon," said Basha Kerbel, 73, of Toronto, who came with her husband and received standby tickets for the show. "It's a sad day for everybody. He was liked by so many people."

Debby Kulber, 50, of Cleveland, remembered Carson for his self-deprecating style.

"He was able to laugh at himself. And he made all the guests seem interesting," she said. "He was just very funny."

In Los Angeles, meanwhile, flowers were placed on Carson's star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame.

"This is a very sad day in Hollywood and I could tell you that Hollywood hasn't been this shocked since the news flash of Marilyn Monroe's demise," said Johnny Grant, the honorary mayor of Hollywood. "I think we all figured that Johnny Carson would just live on forever."

COURTESY LEONARD S. GOLDBERG

Admirable and comical former 'Tonight Show' host Johnny Carson was remebered by friends and colleagues Monday night.

THE BOLTWOOD PROJECT™
(35 years of service—and counting!)
A STUDENT / COMMUNITY SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAM
(an RSO and Dept. of Landscape Architecture & Regional Planning sponsored prog.)

REACH OUT—AND BECOME A SPECIAL FRIEND TO PEOPLE WITH SPECIAL NEEDS
Your life will NEVER be the same!
••EARN 1-2 CREDITS ••GAIN VALUABLE EXPERIENCE ••REWARDING, CHALLENGING, and FUN
Spring Semester 2005 — Recruitment Nights
You must attend ONE of these meetings. No exceptions. even if you have participated before!
6:00-8:00 PM (Note: Prompt starting time!!!)
Room 163C of the Campus Center for all meetings •Jan 31 (Mon) •Feb 1 (Tues) and Feb 2 (Wed)
•Assignment notification ONLY Thurs. Feb. 3rd @ Boltwood table CC Concourse.
No telephone inquiries; YOU (or a friend) must pickup the notification letter!!!
Volunteer, while earning credit!

Discover Your LOVER
The Collegian Dating Game

Win A Free Date!

3 lucky Men and 3 lucky Women will be selected to go on a blind date. Collegian readers will vote online to select who will date whom!

Sign-ups will be held in the Campus Center Concourse Monday Jan. 31st through Thursday Feb. 3rd from 11-2

Look in the Arts Section for the final 3 Men on Tuesday, February 8th
The final 3 women on Wednesday, February 9th
Start voting online Wednesday, February 9th
www.dailycollegian.com

Scorsese's `The Aviator' to square off against Eastwood's `Million Dollar Baby' in 2005 Academy Awards showdown

By David Germain
Associated Press

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. — Martin Scorsese may finally be positioned for Academy Awards glory, but his Howard Hughes epic "The Aviator" will have to duke it out with Clint Eastwood's boxing drama.

The best-picture and director honors are shaping up as a two-film race between Scorsese's and Eastwood's flicks, with "The Aviator" having the inside track as front-runner by leading the pack with 11 nominations Tuesday.

The other best-picture contenders were "Finding Neverland," a whimsical portrait of the creation of J.M. Barrie's "Peter Pan"; "Ray," a fiery film biography of Ray Charles; and "Sideways," a quirky romance about the misadventures of two buddies on a wine-tasting road trip.

Scorsese could be the story come Oscar night Feb. 27. The filmmaker behind such modern classics as "Raging Bull," "Taxi Driver" and "GoodFellas" has never delivered a best-picture winner, and Scorsese has never won a directing Oscar despite four previous nominations.

"We don't want to jinx anything, but ultimately there is no one more deserving, absolutely," said Leonardo DiCaprio, a best-actor nominee as Hughes in "The Aviator" and the star of Scorsese's 2002 film "Gangs of New York," which had 10 Oscar nominations but lost in every category.

"I have the ultimate respect for him as a director and as a person. What he has contributed to the world of cinema is phenomenal and unprecedented. All I can say is, I'm voting for him."

Along with his directing slot, Eastwood was nominated for best actor as a cantankerous boxing trainer in "Million Dollar Baby." Eastwood previously had acting and directing nominations with 1992's "Unforgiven," which won the best-picture and directing Oscars.

His acting nomination this time was a slight surprise given that most previous Hollywood honors had singled out Eastwood for his direction on "Million Dollar Baby," not his performance.

"I heard his name and I screamed. I'm so happy," said Hilary Swank, a best-actress nominee for "Million Dollar Baby," in which she plays a fearless boxer struck by tragedy. "In my humble opinion, it's his best work to date."

Jamie Foxx landed dual nominations. Foxx is considered the favorite in the best-actor race for his dazzling emulation of Charles in "Ray," and he also was picked in the supporting category for "Collateral," in which he plays a cabdriver forced to drive a hitman on a killing spree.

"It's mind-blowing. It's a celebration right now. It is happiness right now," Foxx said. "If we win, it's going to be more happiness, but right now, it's simply time to be happy and reflect on what a fantastic year it's been for me."

Joining DiCaprio, Eastwood and Foxx in the best-actor race were Johnny Depp as playwright Barrie in "Finding Neverland" and Don Cheadle in "Hotel Rwanda," starring as hotel manager Paul Rusesabagina, who sheltered refugees from the Rwandan genocide.

The best-actress category presents a rematch of the 1999 showdown, when underdog Swank won the Oscar for "Boys Don't Cry" over Annette Bening, who had been the front-runner for "American Beauty."

Along with Swank in "Million Dollar Baby," Bening was nominated for "Being Julia," in which she plays an aging 1930s stage diva exacting wickedly comic revenge on the men in her life and a young rival.

Both actresses won Golden Globes, Swank for best dramatic actress, Bening for actress in a musical or comedy.

Also nominated for the best-actress Oscar: Catalina Sandino Moreno as a Colombian woman imperiled when she signs on to smuggle heroin in "Maria Full of Grace"; Imelda Staunton as a saintly housekeeper in 1950s Britain who performs illegal abortions on the side in "Vera Drake"; and Kate Winslet as a woman who has had memories of her ex-boyfriend erased in "Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind."

Staunton, a veteran British actress not widely known to American audiences, said she hoped the Oscar attention would draw more viewers to "Vera Drake," which so far has been in only narrow U.S. release.

"I am completely over the moon that I have got this far, because I am the unknown. This is a very difficult subject matter, this film, and that it's got this far is a miracle," Staunton said.

Besides Eastwood and Scorsese, directing nominees were Taylor Hackford for "Ray," Mike Leigh for "Vera Drake" and Alexander Payne for "Sideways."

Along with Foxx in "Collateral," supporting-actor nominees were Alan Alda was nominated for supporting actor as a senator tussling with Hughes in "The Aviator"; Morgan Freeman as a worldly-wise ex-boxer in "Million Dollar Baby"; Thomas Haden Church as a bridegroom out for a final fling in "Sideways"; and Clive Owen as a coarse lover in the sex drama "Closer."

An old hand at the Oscar race with three previous nominations, Freeman said he would rather have slept another hour than be awakened by his publicist with word that he was in the running.

"I wouldn't use the term excited," Freeman said. "I think probably the best term would be disappointed if I didn't get one."

For supporting actress, academy voters picked Cate Blanchett, who plays Katharine Hepburn in "The Aviator"; Laura Linney as sex researcher Alfred Kinsey's carnally adventurous wife in "Kinsey"; Virginia Madsen as a deceived lover in "Sideways"; Sophie Okonedo as innkeeper Rusesabagina's wife in "Hotel Rwanda"; and Natalie Portman as a gutsy stripper in "Closer."

Scorsese's 'The Aviator,' a new film about Howard Hughes, rivals Eastwood's 'Million Dollar Baby,' a film centered around a female boxer starring both Eastwood and young actress Hillary Swank.

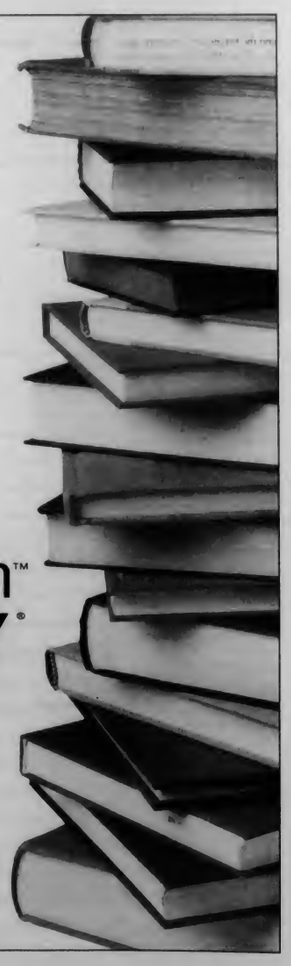
"This is one of the shocks of my life. It's an incredible, astounding, heart-stopping moment," Madsen said. "This always seemed really unattainable, because it's the Academy Awards. It's the gold man, the gold statue."

It was the best year ever for black performers, who had five of the 20 acting nominations. The most previously was three, including the 2001 Oscars when Halle Berry and Denzel Washington won the lead-acting prizes.

Mel Gibson's blockbuster "The Passion of the Christ" was shut out in major categories but received Oscar nominations for original score, cinematography and makeup.

Michael Moore, a 2002 documentary winner for "Bowling for Columbine," missed out on nominations this time with his hit "Fahrenheit 9/11." Moore decided against entering "Fahrenheit 9/11" in the documentary category to boost its prospects for best-picture and other categories, but the film failed to earn any nominations.

"Sideways" star Paul Giamatti was the most notable absentee from the Oscar nix. The film was a darling among critics and brought Giamatti heaps of praise in earlier film honors.



Co-star and nominee Church, who plays Giamatti's traveling pal, said he and Madsen would not have been in the running were it not for Giamatti.

"I wanted to believe that three performances (from "Sideways") could get nominated, but I dreaded that somebody was going to get clipped," Church said. "My performance and I'm sure Virginia's do not exist without Paul's. One performance does not exist without the other."

BUY YOUR TEXTBOOKS AT HALF.COM

AND SAVE UP TO 40% OFF* THE LIST PRICE.

How great is this? Find great savings on new or used textbooks you need this semester. Go to half.com and enter the titles or ISBN numbers. That's it!

Save an additional $5 on a purchase of $50 or more.
Redeem this coupon by entering this code:
AMHERST2005
at half.com
For a limited time, first-time buyers only. See conditions below.

half.com™ by ebay

*Claim based on comparison of average selling price (excluding shipping and handling) for top 10% of textbooks (by unit volume) sold on Half.com from August 1st-September 11, 2004 and listed as "brand new" by the seller, with list price for same title. Textbooks are defined as undergraduate and graduate textbooks and exclude reference books and novels/literature.

Offer valid for $5 off a purchase of $50 or more at half.com only. Offer valid for first time buyers only. Order value must be a minimum of $50.00 before the discount is applied and does not include shipping, handling, taxes or insurance. This coupon cannot be combined with any other coupon, discount, gift certificate, or promotion. Any potential refund will not include the coupon or its redemption value. Void where prohibited. Open only to U.S. residents 18 years of age or older. Promotion subject to change without notice. Offer expires on March 31, 2005 at 11:59:59 EST.

© 2004 eBay Inc.

Owens doesn't plan to listen to doctors

By Rob Maaddi
Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — Terrell Owens might try to play in the Super Bowl, ignoring his doctor's orders.

Philadelphia Eagles head trainer Rick Burkholder said Wednesday that Owens plans to continue rehabbing his injured ankle in an attempt to suit up against the New England Patriots on Feb. 6.

Dr. Mark Myerson, the surgeon who operated on the All-Pro receiver in December, said Tuesday he would not clear Owens to play in the Super Bowl.

"We understand Dr. Myerson's point of view. It's just that our risk-reward is different than his risk-reward," Burkholder said. "He has great risk in clearing Terrell to play and no reward. We think there's some risk and we think there's great reward, so right now we're going to progress with his rehab."

Owens was at the Eagles' practice facility for rehab work Wednesday, but the team said he wouldn't be made available to reporters.

On Monday, before hearing Myerson's bad news, Owens said: "Spiritually I've been healed and I believe that I'll be out there on that field Sunday, regardless of what anybody says."

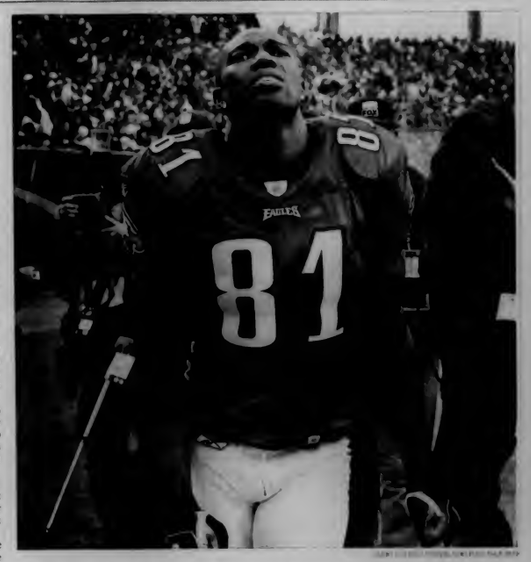
Myerson inserted two screws in Owens' right ankle and a plate on the outside of the ankle three days after he was injured against Dallas on Dec. 19. By not clearing Owens to play, Myerson should be absolved of any blame if Owens goes against his wishes and winds up re-injuring the ankle.

Owens was told after surgery that he had only an outside chance of returning for the Super Bowl, which was 6 1/2 weeks away at the time. But he rehabbed vigorously, hoping to help Philadelphia win its first NFL championship since 1960.

But after a checkup Tuesday in Baltimore, Myerson said that while he's pleased with Owens' recuperation, the operation requires a recovery period of eight to 10 weeks. Myerson added that any attempt to accelerate the rehabilitation process poses the same risk for injury.

Burkholder said Owens worked out on a treadmill when he returned to Philadelphia on Tuesday.

"We will continue to see whether he can jog and see how he does day in and day out, see if he can change direction," Burkholder said Wednesday.



"If he passes all those tests, then we'll start talking about practice time. Right now, the game isn't even in our vision right now. If he has any setbacks in his rehab, then the whole idea of playing in the Super Bowl is probably off."

In his first season with the Eagles after eight years in San Francisco, Owens led Philadelphia with 77 catches for 1,200 yards and 14 TDs.

Quarterback Donovan McNabb and other Eagles have said they don't need Owens to beat the defending champion Patriots, who are 7-point favorites.

"We can win it without T.O. But, if he is there, we can win it with him, and we are definitely going to try to win it without him," McNabb said Monday.

"I think he will be back," he added. "But, if he can't be back, we have to continue this ship home."

Terrell Owens heads to the locker room after injuring his ankle on Dec. 19 against the Dallas Cowboys. Team doctors haven't cleared Owens to play in the Super Bowl on Feb. 6, but he plans to play.

Businesses around hockey towns among those that suffer from NHL lockout

(AP) A sampling of effects on retailers and other business from the NHL lockout:

Mark Pasquale, owner of Halftime Pizza across the street from the FleetCenter, home of the Boston Bruinssaid business has been down about 35 percent during the lockout. He still gets business from Boston Celtics basketball games, but said they aren't as free-spending as the more blue collar hockey crowd.

"Business from the Bruins games is always a lot of better because this is more of a hockey town," Pasquale said. "The Celtics fans are more suit-and-tie types, and the Bruins fans are more casual. ... When the Bruins are in town, I get like two days of business out of one day."

Other businesses that cater to FleetCenter crowds also are hurting. Pasquale said a TGI Friday's restaurant near the arena closed recently.

The past year "has been the worst since I've been down here, and I've been here 25 years," Pasquale said.

— Mark Jewell, Associated Press

(AP) In Philadelphia, bars and restaurants are enjoying the success of the Super Bowl-bound Eagles and the Allen Iverson-led 76ers. Flyers fans aren't out looking for hockey jerseys, said Joe Tarantino, a manager at The Sports Authority in King of Prussia, Pa.

"I bet we haven't sold a hockey shirt in two months," Tarantino said. "They're not playing. Why are you going to buy a shirt and wear it for nothing?"

Even during regular NHL seasons, hockey merchandise still doesn't sell as well as gear featuring Philadelphia's pro football, basketball and baseball teams, he said.

"They like their Birds, they like their Sixers," Tarantino said.

— Jennifer Kay, Associated Press

(AP) MC Sports, a sporting goods chain based in Grand Rapids, Mich., with 68 stores in seven Midwestern states, is carrying almost no NHL merchandise during the lockout, said Rob Henderhan, men's apparel and licensed products buyer for the company.

"With the exception of some hats, I don't have any NHL product that's not on clearance," he said. "I didn't buy anything new for this year."

Of its 28 Michigan stores, eight to 10 are in the Detroit area. They usually carry a line of Red Wings jerseys, hooded sweat shirts and other items. Asked if any customers were upset about the lack of NHL merchandise, Hanrahan said: "No, none at all."

"I haven't had a single store call and complain because people were in looking for product," he said. "When this happens, people just get upset."

Bob Phillips, a salesman for East Side Sporting Goods in Warren, said sales of hockey apparel has been "dead."

"I talked to a competitor and it's the same thing," Phillips said. "Obviously, if they're not playing, they're not selling."

The suburban Detroit company sells some Red Wings jerseys and varsity jackets but specializes in providing uniforms to teams. Phillips said said East Side didn't expect to see a jump in sales of Red Wings apparel even if the season is saved.

— James Prichard, Associated Press

(AP) Anthony Wolfe, vice president of e-commerce and marketing for Montreal-based Icejerseys.com, an Internet company that sells NHL apparel, said sales have dropped in the 30 percent range since the lockout began.

He also said many U.S. retailers did not stock a lot of NHL merchandise in anticipation of the lockout.

"The NHL was a fringe product to start with. Now, with this going on they've just decided, 'OK, clear out what we've got. We're not ordering any more,'" he said.

Icejerseys.com does about 90 percent of its business in the United States, Wolfe said.

"Certainly, we felt a big drop in interest," he said. "I think our potential loss in sales has been buoyed by the fact that other guys are pulling everything off the shelves and it's really not available elsewhere."

— Sandy Shore, Associated Press

(AP) St. Paul, Minn., officials estimate the city will lose nearly $369,000 in sales taxe income during the months the Minnesota Wild would have been playing.

Joe Kasel, who owns the Eagle Street Grille across the street from the Xcel Energy Center arena, said he has laid off 28 employees since the lockout began. Kasel and his partner are working 80 hours a week to avoid losing more money.

"We do what we can to get through it. It's all we can do," Kasel said between waiting and bussing tables, serving drinks and handling checks.

Down the street, signs in the windows of Tom Reid's Hockey City Pub beckon customers attending professional lacrosse games. Crowds for the Swarm don't compare to the sold-out Wild games business owners are used to.

"It's been a tough go," said Reid, who also works as a radio broadcaster on Wild game days. "This is a hockey bar with true hockey fans ... with the lockout we lose that clientele."

Dean Trongaard, who is helping 242's owners sell or lease the space, said Wild clientele were crucial: "Someone might have to put in a business there that is not so reliant on hockey games."

— Elizabeth Dunbar, Associated Press

Write for Sports.

UMASS Campus Recreation

Paid Officials Needed for Basketball

Basketball Jan 26 @ 7 p.m. (Totman Gym)
Jan 27 @ 7 p.m. (Totman Gym)

[Please call the office for clinic attendance requirements.]

Still Time To Enter: Basketball
More Info: 215 Boyden, 5-2694
On The Web: http://www.umass.edu/umim

Fit Males Needed For Nutrition Research Study

A research study is being conducted by the US Army Research Institute of Environmental Medicine (USARIEM), Natick, MA, to evaluate the effect of fitness level on protein requirements during an increase in exercise. The 13 day study involves consuming a specialized diet and following a specific workout routine for 11 days. All food will be provided to participants during the study. Data collection will include questionnaires, blood, urine, stool samples, and hi-tech measures of fitness, energy expenditure, and body composition. All data are coded and strictly confidential.

To participate, interested persons must meet screening criteria. If you are very fit and between the ages of 18 and 35 years please email Usariem.proteinstudy@na.amedd.army.mil or call (508) 233-5140 for more information.

BEHAVIORAL HEALTH NETWORK
HUMAN SERVICES
RESIDENTIAL STAFF

Direct care staff needed for all shifts, day, evening, weekend, overnight (asleep/awake), full, part time and relief positions available in Hampshire County and surrounding communities. Assist individuals with developmental disabilities in their homes, day/vocational programs, respite sites or residential programs. A High school diploma or equivalent, accesses to reliable transportation preferred. Experience helpful but not mandatory, on-going training available. Generous benefit package at 30 hours. Salary: $9.00- $9.73/hr

Please send cover letter and resume to:
Attn: Program Directors
Behavioral Health Network,
492 Pleasant St.
Northampton, MA 01060
AA/EOE

ALL FIRED UP! creative FOOD & BEVERAGE

GRAND OPENING MONGOLIAN BARBEQUE ALL YOU CAN EAT BUFFETS

With Countless combinations of vegetables, poultry, fish, meats and sauces.

Great Live Entertainment on Weekends!

Friday 1/28: Silver and Gold Blues Duo
Saturday 1/29: Stand up Comedy with Joke Mountain

A FANTASTIC FULL BAR!

OPEN 7 DAYS A WEEK FOR LUNCH AND DINNER
SUNDAY BREAKFAST
DESIGN YOUR OWN OMELETS AND PANCAKES

413-584-5155 • WWW.ALLFIREDUPHADLEY.COM • 48 Russell Street, Route 9, Hadley

No Cals No Carbs
Last Call™
anti-hangover & nutritional drink
Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more information
Distributed By Baystate Beverage Distributors, Westfield, MA 413-642-0150

Patriots continue winning ways no matter who plays

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBORO — Players come and go, and the New England Patriots keep reaching the Super Bowl. Even the coaching staff is headed for a shake-up.

No need for Patriots fans to worry, though. The most important part of the NFL's pre-eminent franchise couldn't be happier right where he is.

"I like my job. I'm excited to come to work every day," coach Bill Belichick said. "I'm not looking to go anywhere."

Belichick has led the Patriots to consecutive 14-2 seasons and a chance to become only the second team in NFL history to win three Super Bowls in four years. For some coaches all that success would be enough to send them into a proud retirement.

But Belichick won't turn 53 until April 16, seven days before the NFL draft, and loves challenges. He has a big one coming up.

Offensive coordinator Charlie Weis has already been hired to coach Notre Dame. The Super Bowl will be his last game with New England. Next out could very well be defensive coordinator Romeo Crennel, who is expected to become the Cleveland Browns head coach.

Crennel and Weis have been vital in designing schemes that help the Patriots baffle and overpower opponents, as they did last Sunday in a 41-27 victory over Pittsburgh in the AFC championship game.

"You know, it kind of hit me after the game," the normally serious Belichick said wistfully about his coordinators. "We pretty much all are coming from the same place. We have put a lot into this. We are in it together. We are going to work hard to finish what we started."

If Belichick replaces coordinators as well as he has replaced players, the Patriots should be just fine.

"There are going to be some decisions Bill is going to have to make and some of our assistants have to step up," linebacker Tedy Bruschi said. "How it's going to affect us, I don't know."

None of that matters now with just one game against Philadelphia on Feb. 6 in Jacksonville, Fla., standing between Belichick and a fifth Super Bowl ring, two of them as an assistant with the New York Giants.

A victory over the Eagles would give him the best postseason record as a head coach at 10-1, breaking a tie with Vince Lombardi.

Only nine of the 22 Patriots who started in their Super Bowl win over St. Louis on Feb. 3, 2002, are still with the team. And only 15 starters from last year's championship victory over Carolina still wear Patriots uniforms.

"It is something that we are proud of," Belichick said of the success, despite the turnover, "but right now that's not really the focus. It is not to reflect back, on what did or didn't happen."

The only remaining Patriots from the team that lost the 1997 Super Bowl to Green Bay are Bruschi, Willie McGinest, Ted Johnson, Troy Brown, Adam Vinatieri and Ty Law. Bruschi was a rookie then and Law is on injured reserve now.

Even coach Bill Parcells left that team, departing from New Orleans the day after the game without his players and becoming coach of the New York Jets the next season.

Belichick won't be making any such exit from a team in which the players change but the unselfish attitude doesn't.

"There are two main constants," Bruschi said. "One constant is the coaches. Our coaches have remained consistent. And the other constant is the core group of players who have been there through thick and thin."

The Patriots missed the playoffs in 1999 and 2000, then won the Super Bowl the following season.

Like Belichick, the players want more even though they're already the most successful team of the decade.

"This is a special group of guys," he said. "It is a real credit to them that they work that hard, that they are that enthusiastic and they put that much into it."

Quarterback Tom Brady is just one of the many replacements who have thrived for the Patriots over their historic four-year run.

Trovato's Legacy Fund a hit

TROVATO from page 12

process. If your father gave his life in the war, you qualify. We're not even telling you that you have to go to UMass. You can go to Dean Junior College or Harvard."

Originally, Trovato, who has been named a finalist for the Humanitarian Award, given to college hockey's finest citizen, wanted to have all of his power play goals and blocked shots serve as a monetary donation to the fund, but the NCAA put a halt on that, too.

But through the few small problems he has encountered, he has still gotten complete support from his teammates, who have collected money in jars from their dorm rooms and are trying to set up a fundraiser later on in the semester.

"I thought it was an awesome idea. My dad went to Vietnam so I have respect for people who sacrifice themselves for something like that," senior defenseman Jeff Lang said. Lang's cousin and best friend have also just returned home from Iraq.

Trovato has also gotten support from places outside of his locker room, noting a specific incident after a bitter 4-3 loss to Lowell on Jan. 7 at the Tsongas Arena.

"I'm shaking hands in the line, and [Lowell coach] Blaise McDonald comes up to me while I'm in line and says, 'Hey, I just want to tell you that I think that fund is a great idea, and I really appreciate what you're doing, and it's a wonderful thing.'"

It's amazing to see what can emerge from a little patriotism.

For more information about the Legacy Fund visit www.mslfund.org.

KAREN ROGERS-ULLMAN

Peter Trovato has been named a finalist for the Humanitarian Award, given to college hockey's finest citizen. Trovato established a scholarship fund for the children of fallen soldiers from Massachusetts.

Sox working on trade

NEW YORK — Doug Mientkiewicz was on the verge of bringing his good glove to the New York Mets. The ball is another story.

The Mets were awaiting medical records Wednesday and hoped to finalize a trade to acquire the former Gold Glove first baseman from the Boston Red Sox for a minor leaguer who played Class-A ball last year.

New York made the decision to obtain Mientkiewicz after Carlos Delgado accepted the Florida Marlins' $52 million, four-year offer Tuesday, spurning a $52 million proposal from New York.

"You can't win them all," Mets general manager Omar Minaya said. "You don't like losing, but those things happen."

Mientkiewicz, 30, won the 2001 AL Gold Glove with Minnesota and caught the final out of Boston's World Series sweep of St. Louis last October. He kept the ball, which the Red Sox want back.

"I would like to keep the ball, too," former Boston and current Mets pitcher Pedro Martinez said Tuesday. "I think everyone on the team should have gotten a little piece of the ball. He's the only one who noticed to keep the ball. Not even Keith Foulke thought to."

Mientkiewicz came up to the major leagues with Minnesota in 1998 and was dealt to the Red Sox last July 31. A career .272 hitter, he slumped to a combined .238 with six homers and 35 RBIs last year for Minnesota and Boston.

He agreed last February to a $7 million, two-year contract that calls for a $3.75 million salary this year. The deal includes a $3.75 million team option for 2006 with a $450,000 buyout.

To provide the power they had hoped to obtain in Delgado, the Mets might try to sign Magglio Ordonez.

— Associated Press

Want to Save Money on Textbooks?

We want that too! That's why we work with faculty to find the best values for your textbooks, offer many titles at discounted prices, and offer as many used books as we can. Check us out before spending your money somewhere else.

JEFFERY AMHERST COLLEGE STORE
Downtown Amherst
Behind the Jeffery Amherst Bookshop
253.7816
textbooks@jeftbooks.com

JAN 22-FEB 6
8:30-8 MON-SAT
12-5 SUN

SLEEPY HOLLOW BED CO.
MATTRESSES • FUTONS • BEDS • ETC.
ADVOCATE ★BEST★ OF THE VALLEY READERS POLL 2004

FOUR Seasons
WINE • LIQUOR • CIGARS
333 Russell St., Rt. 9
Hadley, MA 01035
584-8174
Sale date 1/27 - 2/02
responsible for typographical errors.

Beer

Wine	Liquor
January Wine Sale Ends Monday Jan.31 Don't Miss Out	Stolichnaya Vodka 1.75 lt	$28.99
	Johnnie Walker Black 750 ml	$26.99
	Crown Royal Wiskey 750 ml	$20.99
	Bailey's Irish Cream 750 ml	$18.99
	Romana Sambuca 750 ml	$18.99
	Stoli Flavored Vodka all flavors 750 ml	$17.99
	Jose Cuervo Tequila 750 ml	$16.99
	Tangueray Gin 750 ml	$16.99
	Malibu Rum all flavors 750 ml	$11.99

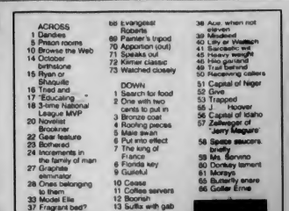
Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 11pm, Sunday 12pm - 11pm

THE WHITE LIGHTNING MASTERS (OF LOVE) • By Steve Woodward and Dennis Hodgkins

JEFF, GOTE, & GOAT • By Grant Gregory

PAUL • By Billy O'Keefe

CAVEMAN RA • By Brandeis and Heppenheimer



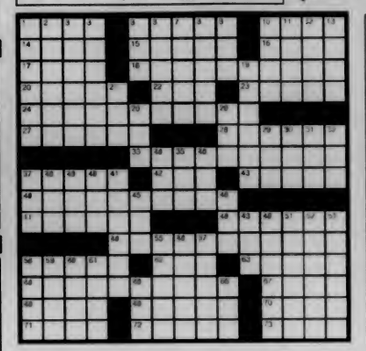
THE ZOO • By Gabe Strine

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"Two things are infinite: the universe and human stupidity; and I'm not sure about the universe."

-Albert Einstein

Find today's answers online



www.dailycollegian.com

The Moan and Dove

Attention all you dorks, misfits, losers, and need-mongers

The Moan & Dove is open everyday of the year just for people like you.

themoananddove.com
460 West St. • Rte. 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day

Want to Jumpstart your business?
Advertise with the Collegian

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You should really invest in a planner this year. Your other system isn't working.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
That funny feeling in your stomach is going to go away halfway through the day.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Your alarm clock may be dying. You should consider putting it to rest.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
It's time for you to take things into your own hands.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
You should rethink that spiky hair. It won't work with a hat.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Some people are more likely to make a scene than others, people like you.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Keep your connections open. You might need some help in the future.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Wear those dorky boots your mom gave you two years ago.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Your textbook purchases will give you a spontaneous bicep workout.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Maybe the absence of a sign is a sign.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
The secret code word is cheesecake. Use it as often as you can.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Today you will pay for the whole lot of nothing you did yesterday.

Get your horoscope on your cell phone!
with our new wireless service
Go to www.dailycollegian.com and look for the "Wireless Services" link

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

WORLD'S BEST COLLEGE POKER PLAYER' Register FREE at www.collegepokerchampion.com Use Rep Code DMK777 We're giving away $100,000 10 Cancun Vacations

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms; hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

AUTO FOR SALE

1998 Pontiac Grand Prix 68,000K New Tires Excellent Condition $5000.00 256-3756

CHILDCARE

Early Riser Needed 7:00am to 8:15pm 2 to 4 days a week. Occasional afternoon and Evenings. For 8yr old girl. $10.00 an hr. Please call 584-8312 maria.gallo@umassmed.edu

COMPUTERS

Pentium Laptop $99- Pentium III Desktop $99- 413-584-8857

EMPLOYMENT

FUN IN THE SUN! Lifeguards wanted in North Myrtle Beach, "Will Train", no experience. Apply www.nsbslifeguards.com

BE YOUR OWN BOSS! Learn how YOU can earn $150K-$350K+/yr. Training Provided. Not MLM. 1-800-539-1088

Drivers & Kitchen Help Wanted. Must be able to work 20hrs A week. Apply at DP Dough, Amherst.

EMPLOYMENT

Excellent Income National Capital Funding Group Now Hiring Courthouse Researchers Will Train to work from home on your computer. No experience necessary. Call 1-800-440-7234

Flexible Job/Put up Posters Towns & Colleges up to $80.00+ a week. Must commit to end of May, be responsible, like the outdoors & be extremely detail oriented. Need car, email, references + 15 hrs M-W 413-259-1227 Mail box 3 or postering@artspromo.org

EMPLOYMENT

"Bartending" $300/Day Potential. No Experience Nesc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

ENTERTAINMENT

DJ for Hire Mission 101 Ent. Contact Fredy at 413-687-3849

ROOMMATE WANTED

Roommate Wanted Preferrably Girl Brandywine Apts. 495.00 a month + utilities Heat & Hotwater included Call Jess at 413-281-8097

Female Puffton 1 Room 340.00 Nego. 617-921-7740

SERVICES

Need Just Evacuation and Repatriation Coverage? Check out BETA! $250,000 Evacuation, $25,000 Repatriation COST is $18 for 6 MONTHS! Online enrollment, emailed verification of coverage www.betins.com

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

SERVICES

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house Certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

TRAVEL

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $499! Award Winning Company! SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

SPRING BREAK '05
SAVE $100 PER ROOM
Clip & Send or Use Code: PRVMG Online
1 800 426 7710

TRAVEL

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, & Florida Best Parties, Best Hotels, Best Prices! Limited Space! 1-800-234-7007 www.endlesssummertours.com

WANTED

Snowboard events intern $50/day stipend. For job description email jfriends@leerfield.edu

HAPPY 21ST BIRTHDAY ERIKA!
"There is no Love in Lovley!" I love you sooo much hunny! <3 Us

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, JANUARY 27, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Building a Legacy

Peter Trovato sets up a scholarship fund for children of fallen soldiers

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

The war in Iraq has caused more civil turmoil in America over the past year than this country has seen in three decades.

United States citizens have divided themselves by political affiliation as much as ever, and the words "Democrat" and "Republican" were used as measures of verbal combat in the months leading to the last presidential election.

People were no longer people; they were labels, perhaps more so than ever.

These labels weren't just for friendly competition like the more simplistic, classifications of "Red Sox fan" or "Yankees fan," which solely determine livelihoods, not lives.

But these were the same American citizens who rallied around one another after the horrific tragedy on Sept. 11, 2001, so they could definitely do it again just a few years later.

They didn't begin to rally around the idea of the war, or who started it and for whatever reason, they rallied around the troops who were sacrificing their lives to fight it.

Some people began slapping the "Support Our Troops" bumper stickers all over their cars and gleaming with a self-assured sense of patriotism.

But one Massachusetts hockey player has taken it upon himself to make a bigger difference.

Peter Trovato, a senior forward, has set up the Massachusetts Soldiers Legacy Fund, a charity dedicated to helping the children of fallen soldiers from Massachusetts by giving them college scholarships.

Trovato has gone beyond looking at this situation as a war of Democrats against Republicans, America against Iraq or the world against terrorism.

He is looking ahead, not just to the point when the government pulls out of Iraq, but as far as he can see, calling the fund a lifelong commitment.

This is a responsibility not many college seniors would want to have, as most really shift their focus towards graduation.

But last summer, when he continued to read article upon article of soldiers dying in Iraq, he felt an urge to honor the men and women who have made the ultimate sacrifice for their country.

He wanted to help, and he felt the most appropriate way to do so would be to set up a scholarship fund for the children of those fallen soldiers.

As a member of the hockey team, he had been used to volunteering for community service, but to take it to this next step, he started speaking to some local lawyers and accountants to better understand the ins and outs of setting up a fund.

He later pitched the idea to his former boss, Rob Hale of Granite Telecommunications in Quincy, and Hale said he would be the first one to donate if the fund got off the ground.

Getting off the ground was an understatement. After officially launching the Legacy Fund on Dec. 1, Trovato had raised nearly $50,000 during the first month of operation.

"We've been pretty successful in the first month, a lot better than I thought we would have been," Trovato said. "It really makes you feel good because you have this cause that you feel strongly about and the war was a divisive issue with people."

And he wants to make sure that everyone knows that the driving force of this fund has nothing to do with political issues individually.

"This isn't a political thing at all," Trovato said. "It's a charity, and I'm really excited about that because if there are any political barriers, this looks past that and just looks at this issue as a whole. There are these soldiers going over and risking their lives, and we want to honor them and their families."

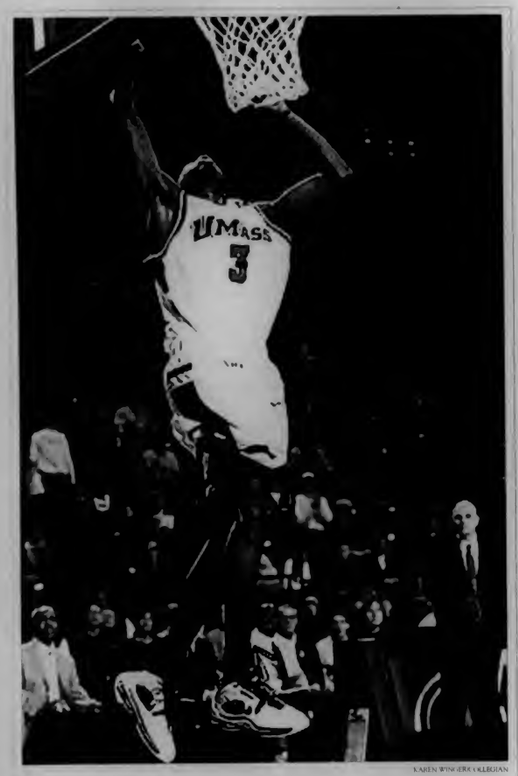
Since the fund is still in its infancy, Trovato hasn't had the chance to meet any of the families personally, but on Jan. 15, he said that about 30 Massachusetts soldiers had died in Iraq, directly affecting about 18 children.

"One of the tough parts about doing this is that you are dealing with a tragedy," he said. "I mailed out to a family in Milford, and their son is six months old. He's very far away from college. Who even knows if he's going to go to college? It's just a tough, tough time. I wanted to make them aware of what I was doing, but thinking about college right now is kind of difficult for them."

More challenges are the strict regulations that are set by the NCAA, which won't allow the team to promote the fund at the Mullins Center during home games because a scholarship could be given to a child who may turn out to be a UMass recruit several years down the road.

"This isn't a slush fund for recruits," Trovato said. "This is specifically for the children who qualify. It's not a selection

See TROVATO on page 10



KAREN WINGERUK/COLLEGIAN

Senior forward Peter Trovato began the Massachusetts Soldiers Legacy Fund on Dec. 1. He has raised nearly $50,000 since the scholarship fund began.

KAREN WINGERUK/COLLEGIAN

Peter Trovato has tallied 10 assists in 25 games during his senior campaign with the Minutemen, and he is also a finalist for college hockey's Humanitarian Award.

KAREN WINGERUK/COLLEGIAN

Working overtime

Maurice Maxwell led the way for the Minutemen last night as they knocked off St. Bonaventure 82-78 in double overtime. Maxwell scored 18 points, grabbed five rebounds and dished out six assists. The Minutemen overcame a 10-point halftime deficit, their biggest halftime comeback since Jan. 6, 2001.

Top-ranked Eagles set for two with UM

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

It might be a good thing that the Massachusetts hockey team had an abbreviated practice schedule this week. It was better that the Minutemen not have time to dwell on what happened the last time they were on the ice.

After all, in their last game they were blown out 6-1 by UMass Lowell, on the strength of a Ben Walter hat trick. UMass looked out of sync, out of touch, and soon enough, out of a three-way tie for fifth place, as the River Hawks briefly took sole possession.

So it's probably for the best that the Minutemen only had four days to think about the loss, because their next opponent, Boston College, isn't likely to be in the mood for sympathy.

The Eagles (15-3-4, 9-1-4 Hockey East) come into the Mullins Center tonight (7 p.m.) as the freshly-minted No. 1 team in the nation in both the USA Today/ American Hockey Association and U.S. College Hockey Online polls.

BC also holds a two-point edge over New Hampshire for the top spot in the Hockey East standings.

The Minutemen, meanwhile, have found themselves in a bit of a freefall as of late, dropping all the way to seventh place in the conference after Northeastern regained a tie with Lowell after its 4-3 win over Merrimack on Monday.

The loss to the River Hawks was the second straight home defeat for the Minutemen, who were nearly perfect at the Mullins Center before the winter break.

"We talked a lot about it, sometimes it's difficult to just get by games like that," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "You can't ignore it, but you have to hope it's not a classic representation of what you're all about.

"I'm really happy with the effort this group of people have made, especially under adverse circumstances, losing a lot of key people with injuries and everything."

The Minutemen's losses to injuries have been prolific at best, and debilitating at worst. First, junior forward Matt Anderson suffered a leg injury at New Hampshire on Dec. 9, and hasn't been seen since with no indication of a return soon.

Then, sophomore Garret Summerfield was injured in late December, and hasn't been heard from since the Minutemen's 4-0 win over Princeton on Dec. 29.

As a result, Cahoon has been forced to make some interesting line combinations, which have included such oddities as defensemen such as Sean Regan playing on forward lines, and rookies like P.J. Fenton seeing solid minutes on the first unit.

It's not trickery, but rather a new version of the team, now playing without some of its most important assets.

The improvised roster will face a real test tonight. The perennially high-powered Eagles are averaging three goals per game, have held opponents to fewer than two, and have not lost in their last 11 contests. No surprise, junior Pat Eaves leads the Eagles with 11 goals and 19 assists, and senior Ryan Shannon comes in with eight goals and another 19 helpers.

For a team missing much of its offensive power, the prospect of the big-scoring Eagles coming to town isn't exactly pretty.

"We're not going to try to play them that way," Cahoon said. "The intent isn't go in and just open it up and run and gun. But we've got to play with an offensive side to us. We're not trying to play not to lose, we're playing to win, so we've got to go after them to a fair extent."

The Minutemen will travel to Chestnut Hill to play the Eagles at Conte Forum tomorrow night, and the two-game set effectively kicks off the "iron" of the schedule, with just one non-conference game remaining.

KAREN WINGERUK/COLLEGIAN

Freshman Dan Gordon and the Minutemen will have a tough task at hand as they are set to play the No. 1 Eagles twice this weekend.

Examine the anatomy of making out

ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 5

FRIDAY	SATURDAY	SUNDAY
High: 22 Low: 4	High: 33 Low: 10	High: 35 Low: 11

DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

Boston College too much for Minutemen

SPORTS, PAGE 10

The Daily Collegian

FRIDAY, JANUARY 28, 2005 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXV ISSUE 68

UMass researchers get new technology grant

By Juliana Leal
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts researchers received a grant from the National Science Foundation (NSF) to fund research for an effective model of online dispute resolution that may be used by several federal agencies.

The UMass research team received a three-year $700,000 grants from NSF and will work together with the National Mediation Board (NMB), an independent federal agency that manages labor disputes in the airline and railroad industries. The money is expected to fund research and create an online process that will be trusted by employees and companies to resolve labor dispute.

Leon Osterweil, computer scientist and co-director of the campus Electronic Enterprise Institute (EEI) heads the research team. His colleagues are Legal Studies professor Ethan Katsch and School of Management's Norman Sondheimer, who is also co-director of EEI.

The research team chose a partnership with the National Mediation Board because the organization offers an interesting opportunity to demonstrate the concept of online dispute resolution. Osterweil says the project will build on NMB's record as an honest mediator in the transportation industry and the agency's consistently proven methods for handling labor disputes.

The goal of the project is to improve online dispute resolution technology by increasing security, privacy, accuracy, and trust, Osterweil said.

According to Katsch, who helped develop an online dispute resolution process for EBay, there is a need for an online system that users from both parties feel comfortable with and trust. Oftentimes, confidential information has to be shared over the Internet and if users are uncomfortable or unsure of how to use the system, then they will not participate.

The research team hopes to use the processes already employed by the NMB as a centerpiece for discussion among all NMB shareholders. According to Osterweil, their input "should [help the team] reach an agreement on a process that is acceptable to everyone and ultimately, automated systems that help everyone."

The initial phase of the project is focused on identifying the needs of the NMB and the participating unions and companies, said Sondheimer.

"We want to give the potential user community voice and choice in negotiating a system. Too many government systems are unsuccessful," he said. "We believe that by expanding the participation in development of the system, we can overcome some of the inherent barriers to change."

According to Katsch, every issue of labor dispute involves three parties: labor, management, and the government. The research team would like to make technology the fourth party.

"If we can really make it work and verify that such systems work for the people in government who will have to use them," said Sondheimer, "then it opens the door for other federal agencies to adopt online dispute resolution."

ODR technology is not meant to replace face-to-face dispute resolution, said Katsch. But the implementation of the system may produce faster results, greater accuracy, reduce travel costs and ultimately enhance face-to-face sessions.

Harry R. Hoglander, chairman of the National Mediation Board, said he believes strongly that the application of technology to dispute resolution will bring significant advantages to the agency, the mediators, and the parties.

"Years from now, the work we do under the NSF grant will be used as a roadmap for the development and application of ODR technology," Hoglander said.

The National Mediation Board helps the airline and railroad industries deal with labor unions and uphold the rights of both parties in events such as collective bargaining, while ensuring that these industries provide uninterrupted services to the population. Other such federal agencies that require labor dispute methods that could be enhanced by the result of the research are Equal Employment Opportunity and the Internal Revenue Service.

New England digs out... again

A woman trugges through a narrow path shoveled through deep snow banks on Main St. in Hyannis, Mass. The Cape Cod area was the hardest hit by the winter weather. Many Cape Cod communities received over three feet of snow since Sunday.

By Theo Emery
Associated Press

BOSTON — Sal Bartolo shed his jacket and slipped into Richie Firicano's red leather barber's chair on Thursday morning – no waiting. The barber's pole was turning outside the door, but the shop was empty and quiet.

Bartolo, 55, usually had to wait for Firicano to finish with other customers, but the weather had kept everyone else away, and Bartolo's salt-and-pepper hair was falling to the floor within minutes of his arrival. Outside, record-breaking snowfall formed towering mounds on the streets of Boston's North End.

"The old-timers, they aren't going to walk up the street in this snow and ice," Firicano said.

After a weekend blizzard dropped more than three feet in some places, up to 11 inches of new snow fell Wednesday and Thursday, forcing New Englanders to make adjustments large and small in a snowbound environment that is unlikely to change anytime soon.

"This is bad," Firicano said. "I lose some of the working people. They take the day off, or it's hard for them to get in here."

The storms pushed the January total in Boston to 43.1 inches, more snow than in any month since the National Weather Service began keeping records in 1892. The previous record of 41.6 inches was set in February 2003.

In Providence, R.I., the snowfall totals for January stood at 36.7 inches, approaching the 1966 record of 37.4 inches, according to the National Weather Service.

With temperatures expected to remain below freezing through the weekend, all that snow figures to stick around for a while.

The snow delayed trains, slowed traffic to a crawl and turned streets into obstacle courses. Towing companies have been busy pulling snowbound cars from streets, and some gas stations have had to close because shipments of gasoline couldn't get through.

Denise Murphy, a 46-year-old employment lawyer, walked through downtown Boston in chunky boots and a fur-trimmed parka. She said her usual hour-and-20-minute commute by car and train from her East Bridgewater home to downtown took 2 1/2 hours on Wednesday morning. It took three hours to get home that evening.

She wryly called the weather "character-building."

"It's exhausting," she said. "After driving, waiting for trains, getting crammed on them, freezing while I'm doing it, and then walk ... I'm so cold, and I'm so tired. I feel like I've put in a full day already."

Boston schools reopened on Wednesday after closing Monday and Tuesday. But parents complained that it

See SNOW on page 2

Center for e-Design gets $76K for software

By Megan Evans
Collegian Staff

Ball Aerospace and Technologies Corporation donated a gift of software valued at more than $76,800 to the University of Massachusetts. The gift, Knowledge Kinetics (K2) Software License, was given to the Center for e-Design and Realization of Engineered Products and Systems in the mechanical and industrial engineering department.

The center for e-Design is one of two funded by the National Science Foundation at the UMass College of Engineering. The center's research focuses on new product designs in cyberspace through technology that allows multiple users to collaborate and software tools to inter-operate flawlessly.

K2 can be used by the Center to track ongoing changes on cooperative designs throughout their production and life cycles. This collaborative engineering software tool is a big help to engineers, said Ian Grosse, co-director of the Center for e-Design.

"This software can help several different groups in geographically separate locations on a design they are working on as a team."

The K2 software offers collaborating team members to access and share computer-based engineering tools, models, simulations, knowledge bases and other special facilities.

Gary A. Whitted, a program manager at Ball, worked closely with Grosse to license the software for educational purposes. The software was originally designed for the Air Force Research Laboratory (AFRL) Information Directorate's Information Systems Division at the Wright-Patterson Air Force Base under its Dual Use Science and Technology program.

K2 was used by the Air Force in one instance as the interaction backbone for a test best known as the Joint Synthetic Battlespace. This was an

See GIFT on page 3

12 killed in Iraq with elections near

By Robert H. Reid
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — Insurgents stepped up attacks Thursday against polling centers across Iraq, killing at least a dozen people, including a U.S. Marine, in the rebel campaign to frighten Iraqis away from participating in this weekend's election.

As part of an intensifying campaign of intimidation, an al-Qaida affiliate led by Jordanian terror mastermind Abu Musab al-Zarqawi posted a videotape on the Internet showing the murder of a candidate from the parts of interim Prime Minister Ayad Allawi.

The tape included a warning to Allawi personally: "You traitor, wait for the angel of death."

To protect voters on Sunday, hundreds of American soldiers began moving out of their massive garrison on the western edge of Baghdad to take up positions at smaller bases throughout the city to respond more quickly to any election day attacks.

Sunni Muslim insurgents have threatened to disrupt the balloting, when Iraqis choose a 275-member National Assembly and governing councils in the country's 18 provinces. Voters in the Kurdish self-governing area of the north will select a new regional parliament.

In the former rebel stronghold of Fallujah, where opposition to the balloting is strong, U.S. Marines drove through the city Thursday, urging people through loudspeakers to turn out Sunday. Spokesman 1st Lt. Lyle Gilbert Iraqi police officers secure a polling area on Thursday. Violence has increased around polling stations as the Jan. 30 election draws near.

See IRAQ on page 2

Alleged victim testifies in sexual abuse trial of former priest

COURTESY THE BOSTON CHANNEL.COM

Former Catholic priest Paul Shanley stands during his trial for child sex abuse yesterday in Cambridge.

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — The lawyer for defrocked priest Paul Shanley sought to undermine the credibility of his accuser Thursday, grilling the man about his troubled childhood, his abuse of alcohol and steroids, and his gambling habit.

The man, now a 27-year-old firefighter says, Shanley raped and molested him at a Newton parish over a period of six years, beginning when he was 6. He didn't recover memories of the abuse until early 2002, when he heard a friend's account of being abused as a boy by Shanley, one of the central figures in the Boston Archdiocese's clergy sex abuse scandal.

When defense lawyer Frank Mondano began asking detailed and graphic questions about the abuse, Shanley's accuser broke down. Clasping his hands behind his head and pressing his forehead against the rail of the witness stand, he began loudly sobbing. The judge called a recess.

Earlier, Mondano implied that the man's account was tailored to conform to those of three other alleged victims who were dropped from the case by prosecutors.

The man, now the lone accuser remaining in the case, testified for a second day of Shanley's rape trial, one of the few cases in which prosecutors have been able to bring charges against priests accused of molesting boys decades ago.

The man said his mother left him when he was 3 years old, and his father beat him. Under a barrage of questions from Mondano, he also acknowledged that he drank heavily and abused steroids for 8 years starting when he was 16, at times taking the maximum dosage. He also said he gambled away hundreds of dollars at a time.

He blamed his steroid use on Shanley, saying the sexual abuse caused him to develop a "poor self image."

"It just made me feel better about myself," said the accuser, who said he once smuggled

See TRIAL on page 2

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Peter Foundas
MANAGING EDITOR Mike Marzelli
BUSINESS MANAGER Rich Pacheco
PRODUCTION MANAGER Cory Rosenberg
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Healy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Tiffany Sugalski
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Samantha M. Nielsen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Michael Busack
COMICS EDITOR Alyson Zillmann
EDITORIAL EDITOR Yousef Munayyer
NEWS EDITOR Erika Lovley
PHOTO EDITOR Alex Demosthene
SPORTS EDITOR Bob McGovern
CIRCULATION MANAGER Kristen Weiss
CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING Marty Pappo
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Josh Kuggins
FINANCE MANAGER Hirak Shah
ACCOUNTING CLERK Virginie Frecaut
HUMAN RESOURCE Sandra Marquez
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Josh Greenberg
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASSISTANT FINANCE Thomas Hecht
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Rachael Bruno
GRAPHICS ADVISER Charlie Higgins
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Matthew O'Rourke
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Chris Gazzara
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Allison Elkes
ASSISTANT NEWS Julie O'Donnell
ASSISTANT NEWS Dan O'Brien
ASSISTANT PHOTO Megan Bernster
ASSISTANT SPORTS Jeff Howe

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS ACADEMIC SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ACORN. LATER, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIDEWALK IN 1903. THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE DAILY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL 545-3500 DAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 5:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Matt Elder
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Matthew Read
COPY EDITOR
Monique Jemmott
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Alyson Zillmann
PRODUCTION STAFF
Amanda Allen, Tom Heslin

Shanley accuser testifies in sex trial

TRIAL from page 1

steroids across the border from Mexico. "I just thought I looked better."

Plaintiffs in the hundreds of lawsuits filed over the clergy sex abuse scandal have made similar claims that they spiraled into lives of drug abuse and depression after being molested by Catholic priests.

Mondano challenged claims the man made his lawsuit, which he settled with the archdiocese last year for $300,000. In it, the man blamed Shanley for his difficulty maintaining relationships and for his failure to realize his dream of playing Major League baseball.

"This too you blame on Paul Shanley?" Mondano asked.

"Absolutely," the accuser said.

Mondano has said the man made up his story to cash in on the multimillion-dollar settlements paid to victims of the Boston scandal.

He also sought to portray Shanley's accuser as a homophobe, questioning the man about entries in his journal in which he refers to the former priest using a derogatory term for homosexuals.

The two sparred when Mondano asked about press interviews the man did in 2002, suggested he was seeking publicity.

"Oh, yeah, this is exciting for me," the accuser shot back.

New England digs out again after second major storm was unsafe because the sidewalks and streets were too icy and cramped by enormous snow piles. The city responded by canceling classes for the rest of the week and many other districts made the same decision.

SNOW from page 1

The cancellations have raised the specter of the school year extending into the summer. Schools must go 180 days, but can go less if they receive a waiver from state education Commissioner David Driscoll. Schools can also shorten vacations or extend school hours to make up the difference.

Gov. Mitt Romney said Thursday he'd like to avoid keeping students in classrooms until July.

"Let's see how bad the rest of the winter is. If it continues to be awful, we're going to have to find some way, I hope, of keep that from occurring," he said.

COURTESY THEBOSTONCHANNEL.COM

This snowblower blows away 2 feet of snow in Hingham, Mass. on Sunday. The town received another 10 inches of snow Wednesday.

Violence near voting stations

IRAQ from page 1

said the Marines were "encouraging people to capitalize on this opportunity to exercise their voice by voting in the upcoming free elections."

Iraqi newspapers also published for the first time the names of some 7,000 National Assembly candidates, many of whose identities had been kept secret to protect them from assassination.

The interim government will deploy an additional 2,500 troops to help guard the elections, the Defense Ministry said. A total of 300,000 Iraqi and multinational troops will provide security, with Iraq's U.S.-trained forces taking the lead role.

About 9,000 Iraqi troops also are being dispatched to guard oil pipelines, which insurgents repeatedly have targeted.

Iraq's national security adviser, Qassim Dawoud, acknowledged that security remains shaky in four provinces but expressed optimism that extensive security measures would protect voters and encourage turnout.

However, attacks were reported Thursday in at least seven provinces, including relatively peaceful Basra in the south, where militants fired mortar shells at four schools designated as polling stations.

U.S. troops and rebels also exchanged fire Thursday on Haifa Street in central Baghdad, witnesses said.

One Marine was killed and five others were wounded when insurgents fired mortars at their base near Iskandariyah, about 30 miles south of Baghdad in tense Babil province.

Another three Iraqis were killed and seven injured when a roadside bomb missed a U.S. convoy in Mahmoudiya, a religiously mixed area of Babil province, hospital officials said.

U.S. troops examine the wreckage after an insurgent attack in Iraq yesterday. At least 12 were killed in the violence on Thursday.

Tortilla chips that are good for you?

By Mark Jewell
Associated Press

WALTHAM, Mass. — Tortilla chips might not be health food anytime soon, but science may have found a way to make them lower your cholesterol.

Researchers are frying chips in oil spiked with an ingredient from plants called phytosterols, which can soak up cholesterol without harming taste.

K.C. Hayes, one of the Brandeis University scientists working on the method, acknowledges fried chips, doughnuts and the like may forever remain the stuff of nutritionists' nightmares.

But he's realistic. Most people are unlikely to give up fried snacks entirely, so why not improve the munchies a tad to partly offset the fat and preservatives?

"I'm not trying to advocate eating chips," Hayes told The Associated Press. "They have their place, and let's make them better, that's all."

Consumer reaction has been mixed on the scores of often taste-challenged foods that are lower in fat, carbs or sugar. Food industry analysts believe sterol-enriched snacks may get just as tough a reception from the medical community and from consumers wishing to reduce cholesterol _ even if the new treat tastes the same as regular snacks.

"I think you're going to have a real uphill battle on that one," said Bob Goldin, a food industry researcher with Technomic Inc. "Consumers will have a big problem linking fried foods or snack foods with 'better for you.' I think there's so much skepticism.

"It sounds sort of like oat bran revisited," he said.

Alice Lichtenstein, a professor at Tufts University's Friedman School of Nutrition, said sterol-enriched, cholesterol-reducing snacks fail to address the larger U.S. public health problem of obesity. But she said the science behind the enriched snacks appears sound, and the cholesterol reduction measured in human testing was in line with benefits seen from other sterol-enriched foods such as some margarines and salad dressings that have been marketed for years.

The Brandeis team's research, recently published in the journal of Nutrition, described LDL cholesterol reductions averaging 15 percent among 10 people. LDL is the "bad" cholesterol. Participants ate two 1-ounce servings of phytosterol-enriched tortilla chips daily for four weeks.

The researchers reported no changes in the test participants' HDL, or "good" cholesterol, and a 10 percent drop in total cholesterol.

The sterol-enriched chips worked by blocking the body's absorption of LDL as other foods were eaten along with the chips.

Hayes, of Brandeis, said the volunteers couldn't tell the difference between the special chips and those without the additive _ and neither could an Associated Press reporter when he sampled a few.

Phytosters, which can be extracted from plants such as soybeans, have long been used as a cholesterol-lowering additive in some margarines and the American Heart Association and National Cholesterol Education Program recommend their use in food to help reduce cholesterol.

SLEEPY HOLLOW BED CO.
MATTRESSES • FUTONS • BEDS • ETC.
ADVOCATE ★BEST★ OF THE VALLEY READERS' POLL 2004
Memory Foam
Sealy.
328 COLLEGE STREET • RT. 9 AMHERST • 253-7371

DWIGHT CHAPEL
Need a Ride to Church?
Just be at UMASS Haigis Mall at 10 AM
For the Free Sunday Shuttle to Dwight Chapel
Only 12 minutes away!
FREE Bible with your first ride!
See you there!
885 Federal Street
Belchertown, MA 01007
413 256 8059
www.dwightchapel.org

Remembering Auschwitz

Holocaust victims and world leaders come together

By Vanessa Gera
Associated Press

BRZEZINKA, Poland — As candles flickered in the snowy, winter gloom, world leaders and Auschwitz survivors Thursday remembered victims of the Holocaust on the 60th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi death camp.

The ceremony, which opened with the recorded rumble of an approaching train, was held on the spot where new arrivals were brought in by rail to the vast camp and put through "selection" — meaning those few who were deemed able to work were separated from the rest who were taken immediately to the gas chambers.

"It seems if you listen hard enough, you can still hear the outcry of horror of the murdered people," Israeli President Moshe Katsav said. "When I walk the ground of the concentration camps, I fear that I am walking on the ashes of the victims."

Joining in the commemoration were Vice President Dick Cheney, and presidents Aleksander Kwasniewski of Poland, Vladimir Putin of Russia, and Jacques Chirac of France. German President Horst Koehler sat on the platform without speaking in recognition of his country's responsibility for the Holocaust, in which 6 million Jews died during World War II.

Barbed wire and brick barracks stretched as far as the eye could see. The ruined crematoriums loomed nearby, all covered with a layer of fresh snow.

Girl Scouts brought blankets to elderly survivors sitting in the freezing cold.

"For a former inmate of Auschwitz, it is an unimaginable and overwhelming emotion to be able to speak in this cemetery without graves, the largest one in the history of Europe," said Wladyslaw Bartoszewski, a survivor who later became Poland's foreign minister.

When he arrived in 1940, he recalled, "I never imagined I would outlive Hitler or survive World War II."

Soviet troops liberated Auschwitz and the neighboring camp at Birkenau, or Brzezinka in Polish, on Jan. 27, 1945. Some 1.5 million people, most of them Jews, had died at the two camps from gassing, starvation, exhaustion, beatings and disease.

Other victims included Soviet prisoners of war, Poles, Gypsies, homosexuals and political opponents of the Nazis.

"We think of the suffering of our brothers, of the special ties that link us, Poles, with the Jewish nation," Kwasniewski said.

Putin compared the Nazis with the terrorists of today.

"Today we shall not only remember the past but also be aware of all the threats of the modern world," he said. "Terrorism is among them, and it is no less dangerous and cunning than fascism."

COURTESY ASSOCIATED PRESS

Victims of the Holocaust remember the liberation of Auschwitz concentration camp at a ceremony in Germany yesterday.

Indonesia offers rebels amnesty

By Irwan Firdaus
Associated Press

BANDA ACEH, Indonesia — Indonesia's president Thursday offered rebels in tsunami-hit Aceh province autonomy and an amnesty in exchange for a cease-fire, the brightest hope in years of ending a three-decade separatist conflict that more recently has threatened to disrupt massive relief efforts.

Moves were also under way in Sri Lanka to ease tension between Tamil Tiger rebels and the government. The two sides agreed to meet to resolve disagreements over the distribution of aid to rebuild tsunami-damaged areas under guerrilla control.

Japan, meanwhile, kicked off its largest ever relief effort as two of its military's hovercraft arrived in Aceh, bringing a water purification unit and medical supplies.

The Japanese troops will try to fill the gap left when U.S. forces scale back their relief operations. Indonesia was hardest hit by the tsunami with close to 100,000 killed followed by Sri Lanka where more than 30,000 died.

In Jakarta, Indonesia President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono told reporters the government has offered Aceh rebel leaders a chance to "terminate the conflict peacefully, of course in the framework of the unity of the Republic of Indonesia and by adopting the special autonomy status."

The rebels have long demanded full independence.

The warring sides are expected to start peace talks in Helsinki, Finland, probably on Friday, to try to hammer out a formal cease-fire.

Aceh rebels have been fighting since 1976 for independence for the province of 4.1 million people on the northern tip of Sumatra island, a conflict that has killed 13,000 people. A previous truce collapsed in 2003 when the Indonesian military launched a new offensive.

Yudhoyono offered concessions to the guerrillas ahead of the Helsinki meeting, including an amnesty, if they agree to the cease-fire. He said there was "a great momentum for us to really end the conflict, unite with our brothers and to rebuild Aceh."

Despite an informal cease-fire declared after the tsunami, sporadic fighting between rebels and government forces has at times threatened to disrupt the relief efforts by foreign armies and aid groups.

A rebel leader in Aceh said insurgents would respect whatever deal is reached in the talks, but added he did not expect much.

"It is Indonesia which has to get out from our country, Aceh. Indonesia is the colonizer," Tengku Mackalinna told The Associated Press by telephone from his mountain hideout.

e-Design gets $76K for new software environment where war fighters could train and exercise on real-world equipment while embedded in a realistic wartime cyberspace. The software has since been commercialized by Ball Systems Engineering Operations.

GIFT from page 1

William K. McQuay, former program manager for the AFRL Information Directorate, explained how K2 makes it easier to make technological decisions.

"K2 leverages information and simulation technology to enhance decision support by linking information and software tools together to get critical information to decision-makers when and where they need it," McQuay said.

The Center for e-Design is a design facilitator. It uses the Internet and special software platforms that allow multiple partners to manipulate a common design in cyberspace and in unison. This collaborative work is critical in reducing development time.

Contemporary development often involves long-term partnerships and tricky design stages. However, the Center for e-Design and software such as K2 hope to alleviate this problem.

The new center is supported by a combination of NSF funding and membership fees from industry members. The estimated total funding level is $3 million. Ball Aerospace's donation began the membership process. Their donation gained the company access to all research being done at the center, including royalty-free license rights to intellectual property.

There are about 15 projects going on at the center now, so members have access to the knowledge generated by them. The current academic partners in the e-Design are the University of Massachusetts Amherst, the University of Central Florida and the University of Pittsburgh. Next year Virginia Tech and Carnegie Mellon University are scheduled to join.

Grosse said, "The goal of the Center is collaboration across the Web."

He explained that they hope to use various technologies to achieve this collaboration and also look for ways to make the tools more effective.

"This timely gift from Ball is basically a takeoff point," Grosse said.

THE BARN, Discount Groceries
Spend less, eat more! Check it out!

Lenders Bagels (6 ct bag)	50¢ bag
Popsicle Novelties (12 ct box)	50¢ box
Potato Chips (5.5 oz bag) or Tortilla Chips	50¢ bag
Raisins (12 oz box)	50¢ each
Shrimp Bisque Instant Soups	50¢ each
Cheese or Pepperoni Pizzas (7" size)	50¢ each
Creamy Peanut Butter (12 oz)	79¢ each
Armour Beef Stew lunch cups	75¢ each
Cheddar Cheese Noodle Cups	3 for $1.00
Solid White Tuna Fish	$1.00 can
Single Yogurts (Columbo, Dannon, etc.)	3 for $1.00
Healthy Handfuls Pretzels & Cookies	50¢ each
M&Ms (14 oz bag) & bagged candy bars	$1.00 bag
Back to Nature Sesame or Butter Crackers	$1.00 box
Good Health Vegetable Chips (10 oz)	$1.59 bag
Frosted Shredded Wheat (& other cereals)	$1.75 box

...and more bargains throughout the store!!
95 River Street, Greenfield ~ 413-774-5599 ~ 8 AM to 10 PM Daily
From UMass, take Route 116 to Deerfield, then 91 North to Exit 26
~ Credit cards, debit cards, cash & food stamps accepted! ~

No Carbs No Cals
Last Call
anti-hangover & nutritional drink
Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more Information
Distributed By Boyajian Beverage Distributors, Westfield, MA 413-642-0180

BOSTON BARTENDERS SCHOOL of AMERICA
WANT A HOT JOB?
Learn to be a Professional Bartender!
Classes Starting Now!
Boston Bartenders School
218 Memorial Avenue • West Springfield
1-800-357-3210
www.bostonbartender.com

New WORLD Theater
Meditations With The Goddess
by Rha Goddess a work-in-progress
February 3, 2005 • 8 pm
Northampton Center for the Arts
In Which Language: A Song Cycle of Lives in Transit by Vijay Iyer/Mike Ladd - Co-presented with Magic Triangle Series
March 24, 2005 • 8 pm FAC Concert Hall
Project 2050 Showcase
April 7 & 8, 2005 • 8 pm
Bowker Auditorium
Students $5
Call FAC Box Office 545-2511
www.newworldtheater.org
Ford Foundation

Fit Males Needed For Nutrition Research Study
A research study is being conducted by the US Army Research Institute of Environmental Medicine (USARIEM), Natick, MA, to evaluate the effect of fitness level on protein requirements during an increase in exercise. The 13 day study involves consuming a specialized diet and following a specific workout routine for 11 days. All food will be provided to participants during the study. Data collection will include questionnaires, blood, urine, stool samples, and hi-tech measures of fitness, energy expenditure, and body composition. All data are coded and strictly confidential.
To participate, interested persons must meet screening criteria. If you are very fit and between the ages of 18 and 35 years please email Usariem.proteinstudy@na.amedd.army.mil or call (508) 233-5140 for more information.

EXTROVERTS WANTED UMASS AMHERST IS IN SEARCH OF
TOUR GUIDES
1 Lead campus tours for students and families interested in the UMass Amherst Campus.
2 Paid hourly position with a minimum commitment of 5 hours a week including some weekends.
3 Serve as panel speakers, hosts, and tour leaders at on and off campus yield activities such as Open Houses and College Fairs.
4 Conduct informational interviews with prospective students and their families.
UMASS AMHERST
To find out more about the position or to pick up an application visit us at the Campus Center Concourse from January 31st-February 4th. Applications are also available at the Visitors Center. Application deadline is February 4th, 2005

ALL FIRED UP! creative FOOD & BEVERAGE
GRAND OPENING
MONGOLIAN BARBEQUE
ALL YOU CAN EAT BUFFETS
WITH COUNTLESS COMBINATIONS OF VEGETABLES, POULTRY, FISH, MEATS AND SAUCES.
Great Live Entertainment on Weekends!
Friday 1/28: Silver and Gold Blues Duo
Saturday 1/29: Stand up Comedy with Joke Mountain
A FANTASTIC FULL BAR!
OPEN 7 DAYS A WEEK FOR LUNCH AND DINNER
SUNDAY BREAKFAST
DESIGN YOUR OWN OMELETS AND PANCAKES
413-584-5155 • WWW.ALLFIREDUPHADLEY.COM • 48 RUSSELL STREET, ROUTE 9, HADLEY

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
NOW HIRING
FOR
Special Issues Coordinator & Promotions Manager
Boost your resume, get real business experience, earn cash, and have some fun!
Possibility of receiving internship credits
Now accepting applications. Come to the Campus Center Basement Rm 113 or call 545.3500 and ask for Tiffany.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, JANUARY 28, 2005 EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Medical malpractice crack-down long overdue

In an effort to start his second term off on a good note, President Bush and his administration have begun an attempt at cracking down on an issue that has grossly affected millions of Americans: medical malpractice. President Bush is looking to crack down and enforce limits on malpractice lawsuits, according to a recent New York Times article. In doing so, this will hopefully redirect the administration's attention to those doctors that are repeat offenders of medical malpractice. While it seems that the administration's current goal is focused on ensuring global freedom for all people, this seems a little more realistic and is very encouraging to hear on behalf of the American people.

According to the article, the onus will be placed on individual state boards of medical examiners to better discipline those doctors that have a large amount of malpractice suits filed against them. This is a necessary step in helping to prevent medical malpractice. Also, taking into consideration the amount of money American citizens pay in order to receive health insurance, it is a wonder that certain measures were not taken earlier.

Because of the amount of doctors, it is very difficult for the state boards to keep track of, let alone take action against, any and all malpractice suits that occur in their state each year. Having taken this situation into account, Massachusetts has set up a standard that the Bush administration is hoping other states can adhere to in the future. According to the New York Times article, "without waiting for a complaint to be filed, the Massachusetts Board of Registration in Medicine conducts a clinical review of any doctor who has made three or more malpractice payments to patients as a result of jury verdicts or settlements." Following the example set by the Massachusetts Medical Board is a step in the right direction, one that the Bush administration is smart for endorsing.

The main issue that is at the root of all these malpractice suits is the fact that doctors are even administering substandard or marginal care in this country such a thought is very disheartening. American citizens should expect the very best from their doctors, regardless of what insurance plans they have or what their financial situations are. There are standards that should be met at all times. Going along with the Massachusetts Medical Board, if we hold our politicians and public figures to such high standards, our doctors should receive no different treatment.

The Bush Administration has a lot on its plate this term, and now that all the inauguration festivities are over, they can finally look to get back into the swing of things. There's a lot of pressure on President Bush to perform well this term. Cracking down on medical malpractice is certainly a step in the right direction.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

Bush's new address?

Ramzi Kanazi

Well we're back for the spring semester, a new year and a second sentence to four additional years of Bushisms and blather. The President recently began his new term with an inaugural address lauded by U.S. cable and network news channels, revering it among those made by Franklin D. Roosevelt and John F. Kennedy. William Safire, an op-ed columnist for the New York Times, rated it "among the top 5 of the 20 second-inaugurals in our history." The rest of the world was more skeptical of Bush's speech.

What was in Bush's address? It was not very specific and extremely idealistic. He spoke of the dichotomy between tyranny and freedom, diluting nuances of the world's political makeup. As usual, Bush separated governments into a pair of distinct groups. As in the past, having spoken of good vs. evil or "with us or against us," Bush divided nations into those that choose either freedom or oppression.

He explained that freedom and liberty throughout the world, while in the interests of America, should be shared globally. He stressed that American liberty, "depends on the success of liberty in other lands," that freedom should expand across the globe. Though this idea is noble in rhetoric, we must question which actions he is willing to take to reach global democratization, an irony in itself. The Associated Press quoted the President's father and former commander-in-chief, George H.W. Bush, as saying, "people want to read a lot into it – that this means new aggression or newly assertive military forces ... that's not what that speech is about. It's about freedom."

Most of the world press however, disagrees that this speech is simply about freedom. The greatest concerns for Bush's address come from overseas. From Europe to Africa, Asia, and the Middle East, many are worried about Bush's language concerning his desires to spread democracy. They see a continuance of interventionist policy that would lead to further aggression against states that do not serve American economic, resource and security interests. Instead, they propose that Bush is anathema to the freedoms and liberties he speaks of, using instances like Abu Ghraib and Guantanamo for illustration.

[Bush] stressed that American liberty 'depends on the success of liberty in other lands,' that freedom should expand across the globe. Though this idea is noble in rhetoric, we must question which actions he is willing to take to reach global democratization, an irony in itself.

Other nations recognize his efforts as far less than the altruistic vision, which he evokes. Indeed, Rami G. Khouri of the Daily Star in Lebanon explains, "'pro-mot[ing] freedom and democracy' in the Middle East ... are seen as self-serving instruments of America's own defense." Such assertions are also widely held in the European and Asian media. The BBC reviewed numerous publications around the globe including China's People's Daily which suggests that it would be "wishful thinking" to believe that Bush would act anyway but unilaterally. Similar sentiments were expressed in Malaysian, Russian, German and Italian papers.

While Bush's statements may be newly worded, the underlying ideas that he conveyed are just as familiar as many of the criticisms made against him. This recalcitrant dialogue is hardly a surprise. New York Times op-ed columnist Thomas Friedman, while writing from Paris recently explained, "Europe is the world's biggest 'blue state'." Even the conservatives in Europe would be Democrats in the U.S. Still, Europe's clamor is not a result of partisan divide; it has seen Bush's policy in action over the course of a preceding term.

Europeans are less concerned with opposing abortion rights and gay marriage. They believe in Kyoto and strong national healthcare. They also wished to act more diplomatically in Iraq than the current administration. Our allies across the Atlantic have observed Bush's actions for four cantankerous years and, frankly, are dismayed over what his future may bring.

We too, should express our concern over Bush's initiatives. He will likely choose to act according to his "messianic" principles. He has already greeted an anti-abortion rally, and Condoleezza Rice, Bush's foreign policy tutor, is the newly confirmed Secretary of State. Bush further surrounds himself with sycophants who endure an abysmal propensity towards groupthink, and he seems dedicated to structuring the world in a similarly servile manner.

Sure, this sounds a little dramatic, but one can't really say "it's not like he's killing people." He is. And under his leadership our forces will continue to die in service of what this administration believes are America's evangelical interests under God and green.

Ramzi Kanazi is a Collegian columnist.

Money versus happiness

Becky Martins

When asked which is better, "to be happy yet poor" or "rich and miserable," the humble answer is obvious. But why, then, do many seek satisfaction through monetary gains instead of simply living a life with fewer frills?

Honestly, the answer is not always simple.

I am the type of student who feels connected to almost every major at his or her university. Reason being that I practically have tried them all at some point during my college career. But my indecisiveness does not stem from a lack of concern for my future. Instead, my continuous major changes are due to internal turmoil. Do I choose a field I know will be personally satisfying, yet unable to pay well? Or should I settle for a career that is less rewarding but more capable of securing my financial independence? I realize money does not equal happiness, but I also know a life of struggle is not easy. Money is not everything, but without it our lives and those of our future families are greatly affected.

Nothing can be worse than having to stay with someone just so the bills can get paid. For these reasons, I look for financial security in myself. A comfortable life has its benefits. But independence is more worthwhile in the end.

One of my true passions has always been writing. Though I never considered it as a career option until the end of high school, it had always been a hobby. Upon coming to The University of Massachusetts, I shocked my parents by dropping my biology major. After trying out a few other fields, I decided on journalism. For the first time, I felt like my future had direction, but this did not last long. After doing some research on careers in journalism, I discovered the area I was interested in was both overstocked with people and underpaid. I felt as though I would be paying for college, but getting little out of my education. While my peers move up in the world after graduation, I will be struggling to support myself. For this reason, I decided to join the School of Management, which I felt would provide more financial security for me in the future. Writing would always be in my life. It would simply remain a hobby or freelance opportunity that I pursue at my own leisure.

As I write this, I am aboard a plane to Pittsburgh, PA to visit an old friend. Beside me sits a middle-aged businessman dressed in an expensive suit and accompanied only by his briefcase and paperwork. When I was younger and traveling through airports, I always admired his type —professional, stylishly dressed, and always on the move with a flight to catch and somewhere to go. I would imagine myself as an adult with a similar career and nothing sounded more appealing.

But as I sit next to this stranger I wonder how fulfilling his life is. Is he comfortable in his suit and tie or would he prefer my choice of jeans and sneakers? Is he satisfied eating, sleeping and traveling alone when he should be at home with his family? Does he ever regret the path his life has taken, yet understand his options to change it are now limited? Suddenly his lifestyle is much less attractive than it had appeared in the past. I wonder if I am only setting myself up to be like him in the years to come.

We have all dreamt about how lavish life will be "when we're successful." Everyone has big ideas as to what cars, elaborate homes and other frivolous items they wish to one-day purchase. But more importantly, many count on success as a way to provide for themselves and their loved ones, without having to depend on others for security. It is hard to deny those closest to us the things we wish to give them. Nothing can be worse than having to stay with someone just so the bills can get paid. For these reasons, I look for financial security in myself. A comfortable life has its benefits. But independence is more worthwhile in the end.

Some may regard me as selfish since it appears I am settling for materialism. Others may think I cannot accept the fact that not everyone lives life fruitfully. But I do not believe I am wrong nor am I alone in thinking as I do. People should pursue what makes them happy. They should not give up their dreams either. I simply feel it is necessary to look at the world realistically and understand how it really works. Hopefully my decisions will provide a worthwhile future, but by being dependant only on myself, I am sure happiness and success will surely come.

Becky Martins is a Collegian columnist.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

TSUNAMI COVERAGE RETHOUGHT

"UMass student survives tsunami ... Lazarus M. Morrison, 23, his decision not to spend Christmas night camped on an indian beach probably saved his life." At first I thought the article was a satire, but as I read further, the wrenching disgust in my bowels only intensified. In no way am I trying to take away from the joy of Morrison's escape from death, nor his sincere and insightful words at the end of the article, however Morrison is a Massachusetts resident. He is a resident of the United States of America, and is in a privileged enough position in life that he can study at a state university. Although he may be temporarily living in India right now, Morrison will be returning back to his home in a few months where he has relatively clean water, plentiful food and order on the streets. In essence, he shall be resurrected from his current living environments.

Now then, we are all well aware that the number of deaths has grown well past 200,000 and that the numbers are still growing as each day passes. A lost life is always a tragedy, regardless of nationality, socioeconomic class or race. However, the far greater tragedy perhaps, is inflicted on those natives and residents of South East Asia and North Eastern Africa that must now actually fight for survival.

Literally, as you read these words, there are hundreds of thousands, if not millions of people whose lives have been completely destroyed. Their homes are gone. Their farms are gone. Their places of work are gone. Their ability to provide for their families and even themselves is gone. Unlike the European and American vacationers who survived, whether by the skin of their teeth or because they happened to stay away from the coast, these people must now linger in a massive wasteland and claw and scrape in obscurity for a very, very long time. This happened in their backyard. They have no summer homes to return to; no yachts to cruise on the marina; not even economy flight tickets back to Logan Airport. They have been forced against their will and on the very soil that they consider home to become dependent on the generosity of others and what infinitesimally small resources remain.

Clearly you were already aware of all of these horrible things and perhaps you were even motivated enough to donate some of your small wealth so that those unfortunate souls may be able to survive just that much more. I will now be blunt and direct this toward the editor: why was this American student given priority over those millions of people? Why? Because you feel a closer affinity for him than those people because you are also part of the UMass community? I will be the first to admit that I have no faculty whatsoever to even imagine being in their situation, nor Morrison's however, this is not his time.

When people are still dying in the streets because the very substance that they need to survive is killing them, it is completely inappropriate and utterly disrespectful to them to simply mention their plight at the end of Morrison's spotlight. Twenty-seven sentences were dedicated to Morrison's survival story, and as I said before, I am very glad to hear that he was able to survive. Only 12 sentences, less than half of those given to Morrison (surmounted by the heading, "Student saved by choosing not to sleep in beach hut"), were given to the people who still must find incredible strength on a daily basis simply to continue breathing.

I am not an editor, or a journalist. However, it would have been much more prudent to post this article, whether on the front page and in color or not, closer to graduation time in my humble opinion, when we can only hope that this tragedy will be on its way to becoming history.

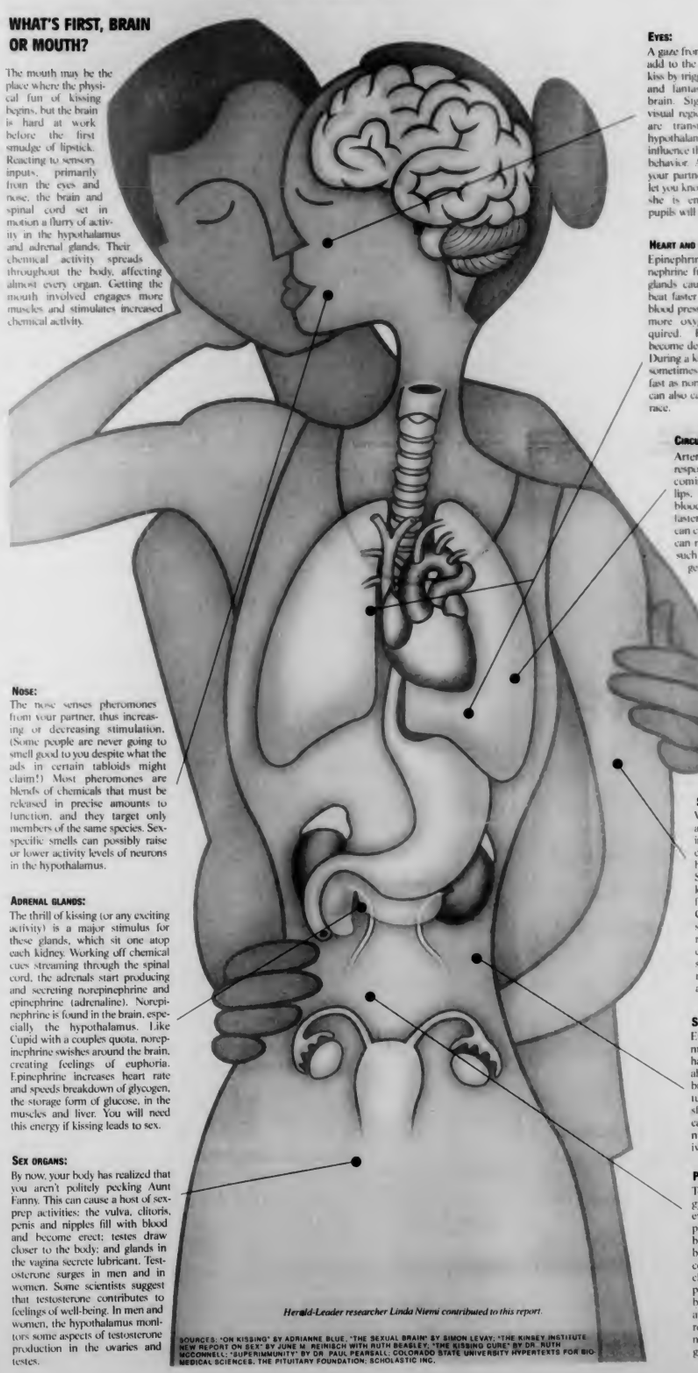
Alexander DeSerpa
UMass student

Stop by the Collegian office and pick up an application!
(In the basement of the Campus Center)

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

FRIDAY, JANUARY 28, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM



A kiss isn't just a kiss

RESEARCHED AND COMPILED BY MEREDITH POLDRACK, LEXINGTON HERALD-LEADER

ILLUSTRATIONS BY CRAIG JOHNSON/AP

Smooch. Snog. Tongue hockey. Lip lock.

Whatever you call it, two lips touching with a bit of pressure and tongue-wiggling have inspired myriad songs, poems and, ahem, newspaper articles. Most of us picked up the basics of kissing in junior high, but our knowledge of the mechanics of this most enjoyable activity hasn't moved beyond first base. We've provided a primer to get you up to speed on this amazing confluence of hormonal, circulatory and muscular activity.

WHAT'S FIRST, BRAIN OR MOUTH?

The mouth may be the place where the physical fun of kissing begins, but the brain is hard at work before the first smudge of lipstick. Reacting to sensory inputs, primarily from the eyes and nose, the brain and spinal cord set in motion a flurry of activity in the hypothalamus and adrenal glands. Their chemical activity spreads throughout the body, affecting almost every organ. Getting the mouth involved engages more muscles and stimulates increased chemical activity.

NOSE:
The nose senses pheromones from your partner, thus increasing or decreasing stimulation. (Some people are never going to smell good to you despite what the ads in certain tabloids might claim!) Most pheromones are blends of chemicals that must be released in precise amounts to function, and they target only members of the same species. Sex-specific smells can possibly raise or lower activity levels of neurons in the hypothalamus.

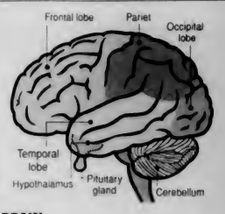
ADRENAL GLANDS:
The thrill of kissing (or any exciting activity) is a major stimulus for these glands, which sit one atop each kidney. Working off chemical cues streaming through the spinal cord, the adrenals start producing and secreting norepinephrine and epinephrine (adrenaline). Norepinephrine is found in the brain, especially the hypothalamus. Like Cupid with a couples quota, norepinephrine swishes around the brain, creating feelings of euphoria. Epinephrine increases heart rate and speeds breakdown of glycogen, the storage form of glucose, in the muscles and liver. You will need this energy if kissing leads to sex.

SEX ORGANS:
By now, your body has realized that you aren't politely pecking Aunt Fanny. This can cause a host of sex-prep activities: the vulva, clitoris, penis and nipples fill with blood and become erect; testes draw closer to the body; and glands in the vagina secrete lubricant. Testosterone surges in men and in women. Some scientists suggest that testosterone contributes to feelings of well-being. In men and women, the hypothalamus monitors some aspects of testosterone production in the ovaries and testes.

EYES:
A gaze from your lover can add to the excitement of a kiss by triggering memories and fantasies within the brain. Signals from the visual regions of the brain are transmitted to the hypothalamus, where they influence the start of sexual behavior. A quick peek at your partner's peepers will let you know whether he or she is enjoying it. The pupils will dilate.

HEART AND LUNGS:
Epinephrine and norepinephrine from the adrenal glands cause the heart to beat faster and elevate the blood pressure. This allows more oxygen to be acquired. Breathing may become deep and irregular. During a kiss, the heart can sometimes beat twice as fast as normal. Endorphins can also cause the pulse to race.

CIRCULATORY SYSTEM:
Arteries and veins respond to the signals coming from your lips. Arteries convey blood into organs faster than the veins can carry it away. This can result in swelling, such as in the lips and genitalia.



SKIN:
With the heart and lungs working hard, the skin can redden and become clammy. Sweating helps keep your system from overheating. Chemical messages and increased touching can alter skin sensitivity, which can result in tingling and tickling.

STOMACH:
Endorphins might make your brain happy, but they can also set loose big butterflies in your tummy. Digestion is slowed so the body can focus on, uh, more pressing activities.

PANCREAS:
To keep your energy from fading, extra sugar is being pumped into the blood from the breakdown of glycogen in the muscles and liver. The pancreas keeps blood sugars in balance through secretion of the hormones insulin and glucagon.

Herald-Leader researcher Linda Niemi contributed to this report.

SOURCES: "ON KISSING" BY ADRIANNE BLUE; "THE SEXUAL BRAIN" BY SIMON LEVAY; "THE KINSEY INSTITUTE NEW REPORT ON SEX" BY JUNE M. REINISCH WITH RUTH BEASLEY; "THE KISSING CURE" BY DR. RUTH MCCONNELL; "SUPERIMMUNITY" BY DR. PAUL PEARSALL; COLORADO STATE UNIVERSITY HYPERTEXTS FOR BIO MEDICAL SCIENCES; THE PITUITARY FOUNDATION; SCHOLASTIC INC.

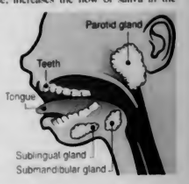
BRAIN

As a kiss grows in intensity, neural signals speed from the brain and along the spinal cord, spurring glands and organs into action. Inputs from the cerebral cortex, especially the section called the amygdala, very likely mediate other sensory influences on sexual arousal.

HYPOTHALAMUS:
The hypothalamus receives inputs from the cerebral cortex, nose, genitalia and sex hormones in the blood and then sets the level of its neurons' activity accordingly. These neurons then send signals back to areas of the brain that influence sexual behaviors and thoughts. During a kiss, the hypothalamus produces gonadotropin-releasing hormone into the pituitary gland.

PITUITARY:
The pituitary gland secretes hormones that influence all cells and virtually all physiologic processes. The pituitary is stimulated to secrete adrenocorticotropic hormone, which targets the cortex of the adrenal gland, as well as a follicle-stimulating hormone and a luteinizing hormone, both of which target the ovaries and testes.

NEUROTRANSMITTERS:
During pleasurable or exciting activities, the brain experiences a surge in dopamine, endorphins and phenylethylamine. These neurotransmitters attach to pleasure receptors in the brain, and they create feelings of giddiness and euphoria.



ENDORPHINS:
These neurotransmitters are released when a stressful or painful situation arises. There are three major types of endorphins, but beta endorphins, found primarily in the hypothalamus, give the most euphoric effect to the brain and are the most effective. Besides behaving as a pain regulator, endorphins are thought to be connected to physiological processes including euphoric feelings, appetite modulation and the release of sex hormones.

PHENYLETHYLAMINE:
This chemical is also found in chocolate, which could explain why chocolate is so good as a pick-me-up.

DOPAMINE:
When kissing, dopamine rushes around the brain. It is released by certain neurons in the brain when pleasure or desire is experienced. It is not a common neurotransmitter: Less than 0.3 percent of the neurons in the brain produce it.

ORAL CAVITY

SALIVARY GLANDS:
The presence of a foreign object, such as a partner's tongue, increases the flow of saliva in the mouth. Salivary glands produce saliva, which is used to moisten your mouth, initiate digestion and help protect your teeth from decay. Saliva secretion is controlled by the autonomic nervous system, which monitors both the volume and type of saliva secreted. Parasympathetic stimulation from the brain, such as simply imagining a kiss, can result in heightened secretion, as well as increased blood flow to the salivary glands. There are three major pairs of salivary glands: the parotid, submandibular and sublingual. Several minor salivary glands are in the lips, inner cheek and linings of the mouth and throat.

MOUTH:
The lips are loaded with nerve endings. Once stimulated, these nerves send signals to the brain and spinal cord. Five of the 12 cranial nerves that affect brain function are involved in a kiss. This aids in kissing, but ultimately this dedication makes possible the line lip and tongue movements used in speech.

MUSCLES

A kiss begins with only a few muscles engaged. As the kiss intensifies, chemical messages stimulate more into action. A simple pucker uses only two muscles, the upper and lower orbicularis oris, but a passionate kiss uses all 34 facial muscles. A serious make-out session engages every muscle and tendon in the body.

FUN FACT

• Some anthropologists think that kissing began when cavemen and women licked each other on hot days to obtain salt to balance their electrolyte levels.

Young artists out on top at the 2005 Grammy Awards

By Jim Farber
New York Daily News

COURTESY OF C.B.G.B.-O.M.

Chart-topping rapper and producer Kanye West is among the most-nominated artists at the this year's Grammy Awards.

This year's list of big Grammy nominees did little for those who like surprises.

Kanye West, Usher, Alicia Keys and Ray Charles were about as hard to predict as rain in Seattle. But such choices reveal as much about the increasing relevance of the awards as they do about their continued blind spots.

First, the good news: Grammy voters now seem certifiably hip to the fact that hip hop and R&B define the music of this era.

Last year, they gave the Album of the Year award to OutKast's double CD, "Speakerboxxx/The Love Below." This time they did the right thing by burying Kanye West in an avalanche of Grammy nominations.

Not only was his "The College Dropout" the best hip-hop album of the year, it was one of the most politically astute, broad-minded and personally revealing releases in memory.

Its bold array of roiling beats didn't hurt, either.

Voters showed equally good taste by singling out Alicia Keys. Her sophomore CD, "The Diary Of Alicia Keys," sounds even more stirring than her first, with melodies and performances that do her '70s soul mentors proud.

It's cool, too, that Prince got five nominations from the very industry he works so hard to subvert.

Probably the most unexpected, and welcome, angle to this year's nominations is the prominence of Green Day's "American Idiot." Though yours truly picked it in an article predicting the nominations, I didn't think the band would mount up a full six nods. Given the CD's anti-Bush stance, the nominations could well be read as a blue-state backlash.

Speaking of backlashes: Grammy's large voting body must still contain plenty of old guard sentimentalists, because the nominations are hardly without some stumbles into sap. The "Song" category features the Tim McGraw hit "Live Like You Were Dying," which sounds like the theme song for a made-for-TV movie about surviving cancer. Hoobastank's "The Reason" has equally little reason to be here, except for a crassly commercial one.

And how in heaven's name did John Mayer's icky "Daughters" ever sneak in? It's one of those disingenuous odes-to-womenkind that young men write when they want to score.

Of course, the most undeserved nomination of the year was, unfortunately, the most inevitable one.

God bless Ray Charles, but his "Genius Loves Company" hardly showcases his genuine depth. Recorded in the year before his death, it's a compromised effort, filled with indifferent duets, like "Here We Go Again" with Norah Jones. If nothing else, its inclusion proves that no matter how hip the Grammys become, no award ceremony can ever avoid the lure of giving those who've passed on one more honor.

Hawke and Fishburne save 'Precinct 13' from disaster

By Joe Piedrafite
Collegian Staff

'Assault on Precinct 13'
Directed by Jean-Francois Richet
Starring Ethan Hawke Lawrence Fishburne
Rogue Pictures
Rated R
109 mins.
Grade C+

COURTESY OF C.B.G.B.-O.M.

Hawke and Fishburne prove to be a positive aspect in Jean-Francois Richet's less-than-par "Assault on Precinct 13."

You can tell that it's January at the multiplex. The average moviegoer has one of two types of movies to choose from in the early winter. First, there is the flashy, epic Oscar-bait type film, this year the likes of "The Aviator," "Million Dollar Baby" or "Finding Neverland." The other is often a ridiculous, trashy movie that the studios usually roll out at this time of the year because they're too busy pushing their would-be awards contenders. These would include "Are We There Yet?," "Electra" and "White Noise." Sadly, "Assault on Precinct 13" falls into the ladder category, not the former.

Richet's "Assault on Precinct 13" is an updated version of John Carpenters 1976 cult-classic of the same name. The basic storyline follows a washed up cop, Jake (Hawke), who is commander of precinct 13 in Detroit, set to close closing on New Years Eve. During a terrible snowstorm, a bus transporting one of the cities most famous criminals, Marion Bishop (Fishburne), is forced to spend New Years Eve in 13. Shooters surround the decrepit building, apparently wanting to kill Bishop— or do they? Gunshots ring out, and a mediocre cop thriller ensues.

Hawke and Fishburne anchor the film and are two attractive leads, but they unfortunately don't have a whole lot to work with. Hawke, who was Oscar-nominated for another cop role in "Training Day," plays the haggard Jake the best he can, given his material. He has a fantastic opening monologue which makes the film look extremely promising, but sadly, it's all downhill from there.

Laurence Fishburne is a Hollywood celebrity who can truly lay claim to the term badass. In "Assault," he is the epitome of cool, and no one else in can wear a purple suit quite like he can. Unfortunately, Fishburne suffers the same fate that Hawke does— an extremely talented actor with a sub-par script and is often found in ridiculous situations.

The supporting characters are a rag-tag group as well. Maria Bello plays the obsessive compulsive shrink, and John Leguizamo and Ja-Rule put in great supporting turns as criminals who are more concerned with escaping rather than sticking around and helping out. Seasoned theater veteran Brian Dennehy plays the aging cop on the verge of retirement and Gabriel Byrne looks as though he is simply going through the motions as a vengeful detective out to get Bishop. Drea de Matteo is cast as the sexed up secretary of the precinct, but she could have easily been mistaken for her character Adriana on "The Sopranos."

James DeMonaco's script left a lot to be desired, and a lot of the situations that the characters find themselves in that seem implausible. Case and point, towards the end of the film just, before the climactic shoot out, Hawke, Fishburne and Bryne end up in the woods. Whenever there were aerial or outside shots of the station, there were trees nowhere to be seen, but suddenly, they're tracking each other down through the dense forest. Incorsistencies such as this make the film harder to believe, and there are a few plot twists that are ridiculous. Movie goers are often looking for an escape when they go to the movies, but they don't intend to have their intelligence insulted, much like "Assault" explicitly does on occasion.

Much of "Assault" was shot using hand held cameras, a technique that when used properly can be a welcome addition to a film, but here it was over used and often made the viewer feel sick. The director was probably going for that "realistic, in your face" type of camera work, and if such was the case, he severely misjudged. The end result is a jumbled mess of scenes, with the audience often not knowing where the characters are, and who is shooting at whom.

It's a shame that a movie with such a talented and diverse cast can be so run of the mill. The premise is quite appealing and the first half hour of the film looked extremely promising. Ultimately, "Assault on Precinct 13" spiraled into a cliche-ridden cop movie, leaves you with a feeling of being cheated out of something that could have been excellent. The potential was there, but it felt like the director only went half way. His cast gave engaging performances, which saved the entire movie from being a complete mess, but Richet didn't hold up his end of the bargain. Too bad, "Assault on Precinct 13" could have been one hell of a way to start 2005.

THE
BOLTWOOD
PROJECT™
(35 years of service—and counting!)
A STUDENT / COMMUNITY SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAM
(an RSO and Dept. of Landscape Architecture & Regional Planning sponsored prog.)

REACH OUT—AND BECOME A SPECIAL FRIEND TO PEOPLE WITH SPECIAL NEEDS
Your life will NEVER be the same!
••EARN 1-2 CREDITS ••GAIN VALUABLE EXPERIENCE ••REWARDING, CHALLENGING, and FUN
Spring Semester 2005 — Recruitment Nights
You must attend ONE of these meetings. No exceptions, even if you have participated before!
6:00-8:00 PM (Note: Prompt starting time!!!)
Room 163C of the Campus Center for all meetings •Jan 31 (Mon) •Feb 1 (Tues) and Feb 2 (Wed)
•Assignment notification ONLY Thurs. Feb 3rd @ Boltwood table CC Concourse.
No telephone inquiries. YOU(or a friend) must pickup the notification letter!!!
Volunteer, while earning credit!

UM teams take to the track

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

Looking to build off the success from its first meet of the year, the Massachusetts men's track and field team will travel to the Reggie Lewis Track and Athletic Center in Boston to participate in the Husky Invitational today.

There will be 12 teams competing at the meet, and coach Ken O'Brien expects that his team will raise its performance against the strong competition at a first-class facility.

"The Reggie Lewis Center has really become the hub of track and field in New England," O'Brien said. "It's an exciting place to go. It's almost like if you're a basketball player what it would be like going to the old Boston Garden."

In the season opener at the New Hampshire Invitational, the Minutemen finished in second place. UMass won seven of 17 events and got strong efforts from two of its premier runners.

Seniors Jon Korhonen and Joe McCormack each turned in times that qualified them for the New England Championships, which takes place on Feb. 25 and 26. Korhonen won the 1,500 meters in a time of 4:01.05 and McCormack took the 55-meter dash with a time of 6.50 seconds.

"Anytime someone reaches a higher level of competition in the first meet, it indicates that they've kept themselves in good shape during the off season," O'Brien said. "It's not a real surprise for us because both Jon and Joseph have been two of the key competitors for our team for the past couple of years."

UMass also received first place efforts from junior James Godinho, senior John Jacobson, freshman Matt Klypka and senior Henry Smith.

Godinho won the 500 meters (1:06.81) and set a personal best in the long jump with a mark of 20-feet-11.75 inches. Jacobson won the 1,000 meter race in 2:37.03.

In his first collegiate race, Klypka took the 3,000 meters (8:50.81). Smith finished first in the triple jump with a mark of 44-feet-1.25 inches. Smith was followed in the triple-jump by fellow All-Atlantic 10 performer Derek Swart. Swart took second with a leap of 40-feet, 7.75 inches.

Freshman Nathan Barksdale did not record a win but was impressive enough, finishing second in both the 200 meters (25.40 seconds) and 400 meters (52.18 seconds) to be named the A-10 Rookie of the Week.

"That's a great honor in his first college meet to end up as the conference rookie of the week," O'Brien said. "He's done a great job getting ready for the season. It was a just reward for all that work he put in."

Barksdale's performance capped off a good outing for many athletes competing in their first collegiate meet. O'Brien said before the meet that he was looking forward to seeing the younger members of the team in action, and he was impressed after the first meet.

"In the first meet I look for the people who are in their first college meet. I focused on those guys and I think we had some nice performances from that group."

The Massachusetts women's track and field team will also head to Boston today to compete in the Northeastern Invitational at the Reggie Lewis Center.

Today's meet will be the fifth of the season for the Minutewomen, and coach Julie LaFreniere expects to see some tough competition from the 12-15 teams that will be participating.

"This meet will be tough," LaFreniere said. "Some of the top athletes from all over the east coast will be there. Every event is going to be extremely competitive."

A few athletes have stood out so far this season for UMass but none more than freshman pole-vaulter Kristen Bakanowski.

In the past week, Bakanowski has been named the Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week, the UMass Athletics/Dinn Brothers Co-Athlete of the Week, and the ECAC Division 1 Field Event Athlete of the Week.

The honors came following a week in which Bakanowski tied the school-record set in 2003 by Brandy Green in the pole vault with a leap of 12 feet. Bakanowski has already qualified for the ECAC Championships, which will be held March 4-6 at the Reggie Lewis Center.

"That's a very prestigious honor," LaFreniere said of Bakanowski receiving the ECAC Field Event Athlete of the Week. "We're just happy to have recruited her and have her competing for us."

After tying the school record last Tuesday, Bakanowski went on to record her third straight win in Friday's "Go Rhody" Classic. In Friday's meet, Bakanowski didn't come close to challenging the record, but her 11-feet-3.75-inch mark was still good enough for the win. With the win, Bakanowski remained undefeated in her collegiate career.

Minutemen escape SBU with victory

MEN'S HOOPS from page 10

want to run and not fall victim to a situation."

Despite receiving a team-high 18 points apiece from Maurice Maxwell, Rashaun Freeman and Stephane Lasme, it was clearly the latter who made the most significant contributions on Wednesday night.

After leading scorer Rashaun Freeman was held to no points and one attempt in the first half, Lasme proceeded to score 14 of his 18 points in regulation to set a new career high in that category, while recording the third double-double of his career by also grabbing 10 rebounds.

The native of Gabon was most helpful to the Minutemen's cause in the first overtime period, however, as Lasme calmly sank two free throws with under a minute to play to tie the game and eventually send it into a second extra frame.

"I think it was the best game I've played," Lasme said after the game. "I just wanted to go out and help my teammates and do what my team needed me to do, and I did that."

Now, Massachusetts must turn its attention to the Spiders (8-9 3-3 A-10), who, after qualifying for the NCAA Tournament last season in their first year under new coach Jerry Wainwright, have bottomed out this year with big losses to Fordham and Xavier before surprising George Washington at home on Jan. 22.

Gone is slick-shooting forward Mike Skrocki and defensive whiz Tony Dobbins, but Richmond has made up for the losses with solid balance in the scoring department.

Point guard Daon Merritt shares the team lead in scoring with 6-foot-11 junior center Kevin Steenberge at 11.9 points per game.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
NOW HIRING
WebMaster
The Collegian is looking for someone to maintain its website. If you have any experience with HTML, online advertising or web design apply now!
Freshman and sophomores strongly encouraged to apply
All applicants should call:
(413)-545-3500
Ask For Rich

Nelson looking to lead UMass tonight

WOMEN'S HOOPS from page 10

two to secure the come-from-behind win and season sweep of the Hawks since entering the A-10 in 83-84.

However, the Bonnies have never had a winning season with Collins at point. The Minutewomen, if they continue at their current pace, are on track to have their first with Nelson in the roster—and also their first under third-year head coach Dacko.

Although the two won't be facing each other—Campbell will be guarding the 5-foot-6 junior out of Montour Falls, N.Y.—Collins is still the x-factor in St. Bonaventure's offense.

And shutting her down will be vital.

"We've got to find an answer to Collins," coach Marnie Dacko said.

But with all emphasis on the backcourt aside, the performance of the frontcourt will need to continue its dominance. Currently, the paint patrol of Campbell, Tamara Tatham, Patrycja Gulak and Edris Bailey are out-rebounding their opponents at an average of 4.8 boards per game, while the Bonnies are getting outboarded at a rate of 2.7 per game.

Rebounding surely helped UMass cruise to a 65-54 win over Fordham a week and a half ago. Brooke Campbell's career-high seven steals allowed the Minutewomen to run the transition game with ease, highlighted by an 11-1 run in which the senior forward racked four of her steals over the run.

Campbell also tallied 16 points and eight rebounds in that affair, while the freshman Rosanio led all scorers with a then-career high 19. She broke her career total a week later at home against the Hawks, this time on the efforts of a 24-point affair.

Now with the Maroon and White heading to face the Rams on their home court in the Bronx on Sunday, the big question will be: can the defense have a repeat performance? If so, the Minute-women would pull off their first season sweep of Fordham since the 1999-2000 season.

If the Minutewomen can play good defense without making careless fouls, they'll surely be that much closer to the achievement.

"I think we're all going to need to play team basketball," Dacko said. "We can't afford to make the mistakes we've been making."

Katie Nelson will have to be a key factor for the Minutewomen tonight as Stefanie Collins poses as a tough task for the Bonnies.

Temple is making a surprise surge in the Atlantic 10

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Move over, Richmond and George Washington—Temple is in the driver's seat.

After running rampant on the 25th-ranked Richmond Spiders (14-3, 5-2 A-10) in Richmond, Va., last Monday, the Lady Owls have finally garnered some national respect, breaking into the polls this week for the first time in school history.

Following the 82-62 thrashing of the Kate Flavin-led Spiders—in which junior Candice Dupree threw down a career-high 31 points, including 18 in the first half—the Owls earned a No. 24 spot in this week's Associated Press poll, and a No. 25 ranking in this week's USA Today/ESPN poll.

The University of Richmond is the latest victim along TU's 12-game win streak, currently the fourth longest among active winning streaks in the nation. The streak ties a school record dating back to the 1923-24 season, when the Lady Owls went a perfect 12-0 on the season.

Surely, head coach Dawn Staley has got to be a favorite for A-10 Coach of the Year following the thumping. A two-time gold medalist (1988 and 1996), former USA Today National High School Player of the year, three-time All-American and an All-Star guard for the WNBA's Charlotte Sting, the Philadelphia native came into the program four years ago and has turned them from middle-of-the pack contenders to national prominence.

Prior to Staley's hiring in 2000, the Owls had gone just 10-18, including a 5-11 record in the A-10. With Staley on board, the Owls have taken a commanding lead of the A-10 East division with a 7-0 record through January 27—and 15-3 overall—surging ahead of Massachusetts (4-3 A-10) and Rhode Island (3-4 A-10).

Record-Breaking Day for GW

January 23rd's showdown in Washington, D.C. between the George Washington Colonials and St. Bonaventure Bonnies was more than just a blowout win.

The Colonials dished out an A-10 record 34 assists Monday night as they went on to drub the Bonnies 97-42.

As usual, All-America candidate Anna Montanana led the charge, most significantly fronting the assist parade with a career-high ten dishes. Freshman sensation Kimberly Beck also chipped in with nine.

Despite forcing four turnovers and achieving two blocks to go along with the career-high day, Montanana was unable to achieve a double-double. Of the five Colonials that reached double figures that night, Montanana was surprisingly not among any of them—she only scored nine—but perhaps that comes with the territory of tallying so many assists.

In making mincemeat of the Bonnies, GW broke the conference record of 32 assists, set by none other than the Colonials on December 30, 1999 against Seton Hall.

Moreover, the high assist count is a testimony to the team's maturation.

Thomason doesn't plan on waking up from this dream

By Steve Wilstein
Associated Press

Jeff Thomason awoke and shook his wife.

"Hon," he said. "I had an incredible dream last night."

"You're not dreaming," his wife, Blake, said. "It's really happening."

Most days, Thomason worked 7:30 a.m. to 6 p.m., sitting at his desk, talking on the phone, meeting with subcontractors, going over the thousands of details involved in building and marketing a community of homes.

No one cheered him, but then again no one tackled him and he didn't have to throw any blocks. He had settled into a quieter life than he had known as a tight end in the NFL. He was learning, he said, "How hard it is to earn a buck in the real world."

On Wednesday, a day when dreams and reality merged, Thomason donned a helmet in his first practice for the Super Bowl-bound Philadelphia Eagles — 11 days before the game.

He wore No. 85 and took the roster spot of his good friend and former Eagles teammate Chad Lewis, who hurt his foot on his second touchdown catch in Philadelphia's 27-10 victory Sunday over Atlanta in the NFC title game.

Lewis called on Monday, saying he wanted Thomason to play for him in the Super Bowl. After calls from other coaches and a quick workout, Thomason was an Eagle again.

He studied films Wednesday morning, ran drills in the afternoon, did interviews in between as photographers captured his incessant smile and the stars in his eyes, two years after he had played the last of his 10 NFL seasons.

He was suddenly cast in a Hollywood ending for a solid, if unspectacular career he thought was over. Against all odds, a second Super Bowl ring was in his grasp. He couldn't stop beaming. His wife, his 9-year-old daughter Taylor, his co-workers, everyone he knew was "going crazy," he said, at this unexpected chance of a lifetime.

Stories said Thomason had a construction job, but he wasn't doing any heavy lifting. He didn't hammer nails, lay bricks or run a backhoe. He used his brain more than his considerable brawn. As a project manager in training for the housing developer Toll Brothers, he was a deskman who donned a hard hat only when he walked the building site.

He could've gone soft doing that kind of work, but he chose instead to stay super fit training for triathlons — for the sake of his health, his competitive juices and just in case one day a team called out of nowhere and said, "Hey, we need a little help."

If that call came, he was ready, having competed in a half-dozen Olympic-sized triathlons — shorter than the Ironman versions but still grueling with 1.5-kilometer swims, 40-kilometer bike rides and 10-kilometer runs.

But one season went by, and then another, and he turned 35 on Dec. 30. By then, he and Blake had three children: Taylor, 3-year-old Lily, and 1-year-old Beau. Thomason had committed himself fully to a career as a real estate developer.

His office in Chesterfield, N.J., is unadorned by memorabilia from his NFL days — three years at the end with Philadelphia, five with Green Bay before that, and two at the start with Cincinnati in 1992. There are no photos on the walls of his two Super Bowl games with the Packers.

"Unless you know him well, you don't know that he played football," Toll Brothers project manager Michael Assofsky says. "It's the last thing to come out of his mouth unless he's asked about it."

"He's just a humble guy, a team player. His work ethic and discipline are outstanding. Those are definitely traits that are common to his prior profession and his new one."

As badly as Thomason felt about the injury to Lewis, he leapt at the chance to make a one-game comeback in the Super Bowl. He loved his new day job, but he could hardly resist suiting up one more time.

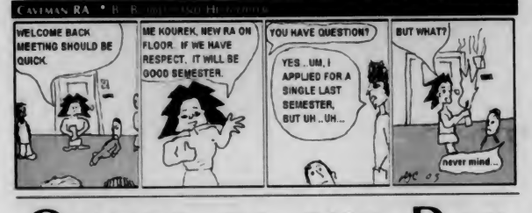
"I think I'm still floating," Thomason said before the first practice.

BEHAVIORAL HEALTH NETWORK
HUMAN SERVICES RESIDENTIAL STAFF

Direct care staff needed for all shifts, day, evening, weekend, overnight (asleep/awake), full, part time and relief positions available in Hampshire County and surrounding communities. Assist individuals with developmental disabilities in their homes, day/vocational programs, respite sites or residential programs. A High school diploma or equivalent, accesses to reliable transportation preferred. Experience helpful but not mandatory, on-going training available. Generous benefit package at 30 hours. Salary: $9.00- $9.73/hr

Please send cover letter and resume to:
Attn: Program Directors
Behavioral Health Network,
492 Pleasant St.
Northampton, MA 01060
AA/EOE

HAMPSHIRE FITNESS club
JOIN NOW!
WINTER SPECIAL
15 Week Student Special $179
What do you get?
*New Indoor Cycling
*Full sized indoor pool
*Aqua aerobics
*Cybex Nautilus circuit
*Cybex free weights
*Full court Basketball
*Volleyball
*Indoor Tennis
*Cardio
*Saunas
*Jacuzzi
*Yoga/Pilates
*Aerobics/Step/Bosu
COMPETITIVE BASKETBALL
MON. & THURS. EVENINGS
COMPETITIVE VOLLEYBALL
WED. & SAT.
ON THE BUS ROUTE



Want to Save Money on Textbooks?
best values used books
JEFFERY AMHERST COLLEGE STORE
Downtown Amherst
Behind the Jeffery Amherst Bookshop
253.7816
textbooks@jeffbooks.com
SERVING THESE UMASS DEPARTMENTS accounting
afro-american studies animal science anthropology arabic art
art history astronomy bio-chemistry biology civil engineering chemistry chinese classics computer science community health communication disorders communications comparative literature
dance
electrical engineering economics education engineering english entomology exercise science forest management
french geology german history
hotel & restaurant administration human development
italian journalism landscape architecture
legal studies linguistics mathematics management marketing microbiology mechanical engineering music
nursing nutrition philosophy physics plant & soil science political science psychology
public policy regional planning resource economics sociology spanish statistics theater university without walls wildlife and fisheries conservation

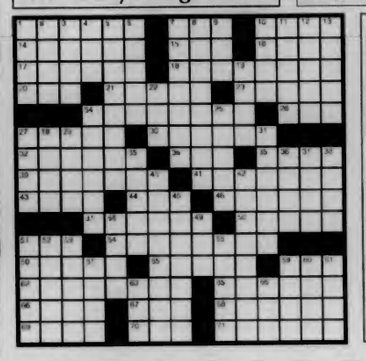
Quote of the Day

"Affluence separates people. Poverty knits 'em together. You got some sugar and I don't; I borrow some of yours. Next month you might not have any flour; well, I'll give you some of mine."



-Ray Charles

ACROSS
1 Act your age
7 Audit pro
10 Actor Lugosi
14 Water element
15 Civil War soldier briefly
16 Fiery gemstone
17 Fast contrite
18 In single file
20 Language suffix
21 Opening night
23 Stallone movie
24 Birthright
26 Strike
27 Map dot
30 "The African Queen" star
32 Balloons up
34 "To be or ___ to be"
35 Impetuous
39 Seasonal farm worker
41 New thing
43 Catch sight of
44 "___ the ramparts ..."
46 Hired temporarily
47 Very dull performance
50 Range
51 CSI site
54 Canines
56 Panama pal
58 Clones
59 Cry of amazement
62 Sewer
64 Rwanda's neighbor
66 BPOE members
67 Traveler's stop
68 One in the red
69 Breather
70 UFO passengers
71 Accompany

DOWN
1 Doll
2 Former partners
3 Surfeit of publicity
4 Ripen
5 Blood feud
6 Go in
7 Toasted garnish
8 Five-sided figure
9 Writer Burrows
10 Beach or Beastie follower
11 Geological division
12 Hawaiian veranda
13 On one's toes
19 Dutch South African
22 Highchair apron
24 Robust
25 Croc's cousin
27 Some PC's
28 Error
29 Film image
31 Deep furrow
33 Type of owl
36 Palo ___ CA
37 Tread
38 Jekyll's alter ego
40 Apartment building
42 Traces
45 Tax mainings
48 Very long time
49 Library sec.
51 Surgical tool
52 Plenty
53 Rips off
55 Piano study
57 Main point
58 Conscious of 60 Bouquet
61 Male red deer
63 Equal score
65 "Lost" network

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

These people are saying "Please make us laugh with your witty humor"
Make the whole world happy.
Submit a Comic
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Want to increase the size of your Piggy bank?
Advertise with The Daily Collegian
and watch your profits grow
Contact our advertising dept. 545-3500

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You're so special, someone just might pay you a surprise visit.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
A song on the radio applies directly to your life at this moment.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Don't go sledding on the red sled of doom. Chances are, you will end up in pain.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
The more you drink, the more trips to the bathroom you'll have to make.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Don't tell your mom anything you think could turn out to be embarassing at a later date.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Today is crazy Friday. You are not allowed to sit on the couch.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
All of your conversations today will revolve around the same topic.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
If the saying "you are what you eat" is true, you are a plantain.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
One era of your life is over, and today a new begins.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You need to be more aware of your financial situation, starting now.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
That odd attraction you feel for the scruffy one will take over your mind.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You probably still want that two dollars, but it will never be yours.

Get your horoscope on your cell phone!
with our new wireless service
Go to www.dailycollegian.com and look for the "Wireless Services" link

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

ANNOUNCEMENTS

WORLD'S BEST COLLEGE POKER PLAYER? Register FREE at www.college-pokerchampion.com Use Rep Code DMK777 We're giving away $100,000 10 Cancun Vacations

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Amherst two bedroom condo on busline 875+, Call Paul 413-687-1416

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms, hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

AUTO FOR SALE

1998 Pontiac Grand Prix 68,000K New Tires Excellent Condition $5000.00 256-3756

CHILDCARE

Early Riser Needed 7:00am to 8:15pm 2 to 4 days a week. Occasional afternoon and Evenings. For 8yr old girl. $10.00 an hr. Please call 584-8312 maria.gallo@umass.med.edu

EMPLOYMENT

MAKE EXTRA CASH!!! MAKE YOUR OWN HOURS! Sell T-Shirts to Sororities, Clubs & Groups & Make a Commission on Every Sale. Guaranteed!!! Very Easy. Bonus's Too! 413-586-7133 OR print@sunraiseinc.com

Flexible Job/Put up Posters Towns & Colleges up to $80.00+ a week. Must commit to end of May, be responsible, like the outdoors & be extremely detail oriented. Need car, email, references + 15 hrs M-W 413-259-1227 Mail Box 3 or postering@artspromo.org

EMPLOYMENT

FUN IN THE SUN! Lifeguards wanted in North Myrtle Beach, "Will Train", no experience. Apply www.nsbslifeguards.com

BE YOUR OWN BOSS! Learn how YOU can earn $150K-$350K+/yr. Training Provided. Not MLM. 1-800-539-1088

Drivers & Kitchen Help Wanted. Must be able to work 20hrs A week. Apply at DP Dough, Amherst.

"Bartending" $300/Day Potential. No Experience Nesc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

EMPLOYMENT

Excellent Income National Capital Funding Group Now Hiring Courthouse Researchers Will Train to work from home on your computer. No experience necessary. Call 1-800-440-7234

ENTERTAINMENT

DJ for Hire Mission 101 Ent. Contact Fredy at 413-687-3849

ROOMMATE WANTED

Roommate Wanted Preferrably Girl Brandywine Apts. 495.00 a month + utilities Heat & Hotwater included Call Jess at 413-281-8097

ROOMMATE WANTED

Female Fulton 1 Room 340.00 Nego. 617-921-7740

SERVICES

Need Just Evacuation and Repatriation Coverage? Check out BETA! $250,000 Evacuation, $25,000 Repatriation COST is $18 for 6 MONTHS! Online enrollment, emailed verification of coverage www.betins.com

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

SERVICES

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house Certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

TRAVEL

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $499! Award Winning Company! SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Spring Break 2005 Only 6 weeks left... Lowest Prices Biggest Parties Earn 2 Free Trips Exclusive with Sun Splash Tours www.sunsplashtours.com 1800-426-7710

TRAVEL

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, & Florida! Best Parties, Best Hotels, Best Prices! Limited Space! 1-800-234-7007 www.endlesssummertours.com

SPRING BREAK '05
SAVE $100 PER ROOM
Clip & Send or Use Code: PRMAG Online
1 800.426.7710

WANTED

Snowboard events intern $50/day stipend. For job description email jfriends@deerfield.edu

Place a classified ad 545-3500

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEEKEND

FRIDAY, JANUARY 28, 2005

SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Eagles too much for UMass

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

If last night's game had been a dance, the Massachusetts hockey team would have found itself backed into a corner by the end of the night.

BC	5
UMass	2

That's because it was a classic one step forward, two steps back night for the Minutemen, who fell 5-2 to Boston College.

Although they managed to hang with the No. 1-ranked Eagles (16-3-4, 10-1-4 Hockey East), the Minutemen (10-14-2, 4-9-2 Hockey East) couldn't keep up with BC on the scoreboard. A goal from Kevin Jarman in the second period seemed destined to swing the momentum by cutting the Eagle lead to one, but the guests fired right back with a goal late in the middle frame to lock up the victory.

"In the second half of the game, we went from making good decisions and advancing the puck well to making poor decisions and playing some pretty sloppy hockey," UMass coach Don Cahoon said.

The Eagles, who came in averaging three goals per game, only needed to make that number to win, and added two more for good measure, while locking down the Minuteman attack in the third.

The Minutemen responded quickly to an early BC goal and looked like they might trip up the vaunted Eagle attack. That all changed in the second period when BC bookended Jarman's goal with a pair to take a 4-2 lead.

Brian O'Hanley tipped Greg Lauze's shot from the point, slipping it past Winer with 2:18 remaining for his first collegiate goal. O'Hanley played on the Eagles fourth line with Brian Boyle and Joe Rooney, and with third-line center Matt Greene scoring a goal at the 17-minute mark of the third, the Eagles saw all four of their forward lines get on the scoring sheet.

"We really need that as top-line guys," BC junior Patrick Eaves said. "It really lifts us up."

The Eagles opened the scoring early, when Ryan Murphy found Chris Collins in the slot for a one-timer into a gaping net at 4:19. The Minutemen responded, though, just over two minutes later.

With Stephen Jacobs providing an effective screen in front of Schneider, freshman David Leaderer zipped a hard wrist shot that beat the goaltender over his stick side shoulder to tie it.

BC regained the lead with 5:47 to go, as Taylor Leahy circled Winer's net and found Eaves up high. Eaves took the feed and wristed it off the crossbar and in to send the teams into the first intermission with the Eagles up 2-1.

BC also came up with two goals in the second period, starting with Ryan Boyle's game-winning tally at the 4:46 mark. Off a feed from Spina down low, Boyle fired a hard one-timer from the high slot and beat Winer, making it 3-1.

With 8:24 to go, the Minutemen got their second power play goal of the night and sent the 6,432 in attendance into a frenzy. Taking a pass from Zach Klann, Jarman skated in from just outside the right wing faceoff dot and threw a wrister at Schneider, banking it off his left leg and in to cut the lead to one.

O'Hanley's goal six minutes later reversed all of the momentum, though, and the Eagles cruised to their 11th victory in 12 games.

KAREN WINGERT/COLLEGIAN

UMass freshman Matt Burto and the rest of the Minutemen had a tough time stopping the relentless Boston College attack last night.

Minutemen need a supportive fan base

Bob McGovern

As St. Bonaventure's junior point guard Ahmtad Smith brought the ball down the Reilly Center hardwood on Wednesday night against the Minutemen, you could literally feel the school's pulse.

A sea of gold and brown lined the side of the court, and with every possession there was excitement. When Rashaun Freeman,UMass' premier big man, would turn the ball over, slow, monotonous shouts of "Rashaun" would ring well into the next possession. Anytime head coach Steve Lappas would step on the floor, hands would go up in unison, grasping for a technical foul.

The Minutemen looked frazzled. The students sitting closest to the UMass bench started yelling, "Big Dell? Big Smelly!" towards freshman center Jeff Salovski. Salovski looked over to teammate Stephane Lasme, mouthed, "Big Smelly?" and shook his head.

The home team was feeding off it. They were overmatched and undermanned against this team from Massachusetts, yet were able to keep it close. The Bonnies brought the Minutemen to two overtimes, but eventually folded, sucking the life out of the 3,581 Reilly Rowdies who had been relentless for almost three hours.

I was stunned to hear St. Bonaventure head coach Anthony Solomon say that he gave the crowd a "B" after the game. It was the most intense college crowd I had seen outside of Amherst, yet he was upset that there were empty seats.

Walking into this environment, very few would guess that this crowd was pulling for a team that was merely 1-15. Even as their team walked off the court, the students lined the exit and clapped for the effort. Then they all filed out and started talking about the next game.

In college athletics, I think that's something called loyalty.

On Dec. 9, the Minutemen reaped the benefits of this passion. UMass played UConn in front of a rowdy 9,037 people at the Mullins Center and fed of their energy to pull off one of the largest upsets in college basketball this season.

The center of the court was flooded, and for the first time in years, it looked like UMass was truly a basketball school.

Yet, only a few weeks later, the Mullins Center was silent. The hangover from the UConn win slowly started to subside, and winter session took a large bite out of the student section. The crowds began to mirror those of the past few years, when this team was trying to rebuild.

Now the Minutemen are 10-7, tied for third place in the Atlantic 10 and are poised for its first postseason run in recent memory. This, plus the fact that school is back in session, makes tomorrow's game against A-10 rival Richmond very interesting.

At St. Bonaventure, a 10-7 team would mean a sold out crowd every night, especially for conference games. There would be talk of the NIT and the distant possibility of the coveted NCAA tournament. It would look like a real college basketball environment; there would be that special energy in the air that is the very essence of home court advantage.

But what could happen tomorrow?

It seems people have gotten too caught up in the lore of UMass basketball and don't want to care if it's bad. There is the thought that the mid-90s are the benchmark, and any middle ground isn't worth watching.

This ideal is puzzling to me because, as I've watched sports fans interact around this school for four years, the one thing I've noticed is the degree of passion.

This university is flooded with Boston and New York fans who know what it's like to watch a team suffer. Yet, as they come into UMass, they lose interest in their college's team before they can even get interested.

Now, the Minutemen have 10 games left, five of which are at home, and they are pushing hard to take this team to the next level.

Maybe it's time to check them out.

Bob McGovern is a Collegian Columnist.

UMass escapes with win against St. Bonaventure

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

After narrowly escaping the frigid depths of Western New York with a hard-fought, double-overtime victory over Atlantic 10 punching bag St. Bonaventure on Wednesday night, coach Steve Lappas and the Massachusetts men's basketball team will return to the William Mullins Center tomorrow having won three of their last four games, and looking to improve on that success when they take on Richmond at noon.

UMass (10-7 4-3 A-10) currently sits in third place in the A-10 East Division, tied with Fordham and two games behind both Temple and Saint Joseph's.

Having skipped out of Olean on the first available flight after 1-16 SBU gave UMass every ounce of light the tiny Franciscan campus could muster, the Minutemen now appear to be in as good a position as any for a late-season run in the A-10.

UMass' remaining schedule features only three teams with winning records, and the Minutemen will play three separate teams in Rhode Island, La Salle and Duquesne, that have a mere five conferences wins between them.

However, Wednesday night's game served as a stark reminder that the Maroon and White will receive no freebies from here on out and must continue to execute if it hopes to find success.

"I tell the guys that we have to play our game from the minute we step on the court, or teams are going to get us," Lappas said. "We came out against [SBU] and let ourselves get taken out of the game. We have to be able to play our style and run what we

See MEN'S HOOPS on page 7

KAREN WINGERT/COLLEGIAN

Art Bowers and the Minutemen are set to do battle with the Richmond Spiders tomorrow at noon.

UMass Weekend Schedule

Friday, Jan. 28

Sport	Opp./Event	Time
Women's Basketball	at St. Bonaventure	12:00 p.m.
Men's Track	at Reggie Lewis Center	4:00 p.m.
Women's Track	at Northeastern	4:00 p.m.
Hockey	at Boston College	7:00 p.m

Saturday, Jan. 29

Sport	Opp./Event	Time
Men's Basketball	vs. Richmond	12:00 p.m.
Men's Swimming	at Fordham	1:00 p.m.
Women's Swimming	at Fordham	1:00 p.m.

Sunday, Jan. 30

Sport	Opp./Event	Time
Women's Basketball	at Fordham	2:00 p.m.

Pair of dazzling guards should highlight today's matchup

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Guards Katie Nelson and Stefanie Collins have more in common than you think.

Not only are they two of the Atlantic 10's elite players, excellent three-point shooters, and dead-on from the free throw line, but there's something else similar between the two that makes this afternoon's matchup between the Massachusetts Minutewomen (11-7, 4-3 Atlantic 10) and the St. Bonaventure Bonnies (6-12, 1-6 A-10) all the more intriguing.

It has to do with that all-important Anterior Cruciate Ligament.

Early in October of 2002, Collins was going through practice in the preseason for the Bonnies when she tore the ACL in her left knee. This, coming on the heels of an A-10 Rookie of the Year campaign in the 2001-2002 season, left the team devastated, as the Bonnies struggled to make ends meet with the redshirted Collins inactive for the entire season.

Three months later, in a crucial conference matchup against Dayton and leading 12-2, Nelson sent UMass into panic mode when she succumbed to a knee injury of her own, this time a tear in the ACL on her right knee.

The Minutewomen were 11-6 at the time of the injury, but without Nelson at the point the Flyers bounced back from the deficit and won that game. And despite having All-America center and WNBA star Jen Butler in the post, they were lost without Nelson, going 3-8 over the remainder of the season to finish 02-03 at exactly .500.

Without Collins in 02-03, the Bonnies went 6-22. Without Nelson in 03-04, the Minutewomen went 6-22. Eerie, isn't it?

Collins' comeback campaign was a remarkable one, earning second team All-A-10 honors after ranking 14th in the conference in scoring (16 points per game), and third nationally in three-point percentage (46.6%).

The redshirt-junior Nelson has been looking close to the Nelson of old—the awe-inspiring pre-injury frosh sensation lately, dishing out a team-high 74 assists and shooting nearly 30% from beyond the arc. More importantly, it has been the leadership of the 5-7 guard out of Ellicott City, Md., that is keeping the Minutewomen from faltering in close games.

Trailing by four with under two minutes to go last Monday against St. Joseph's, for instance, Nelson went on a fast break, setting up forward Brooke Campbell for an easy lay-up to close the gap to two. She then went to the line for two with 22 seconds to go, and made one of

See WOMEN'S HOOPS on page 8

KAREN WINGERT/COLLEGIAN

The Minutewomen travel to Olean, NY today to take on the St. Bonaventure Bonnies in search of their 12th win of the season.

'Women in Jazz' grace Bezanson stage

ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 5

TODAY: High: 12° Low: 7°
TUESDAY: High: 15° Low: 9°
WEDNESDAY: High: 15° Low: 18°

DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

Minutemen fall to Richmond

SPORTS, PAGE 10

The Daily Collegian

MONDAY, JANUARY 31, 2005 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXV ISSUE 69

UMass Police Department maintains that Tasers are safe

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

Despite criticism by student leaders that Tasers — a non-lethal type of weapon to be purchased by the University of Massachusetts Police Department — are unsafe, Det. Lt. Robert Thrasher of the UMass Police Department maintains the weapons are not dangerous and will help keep police officers safe during potentially life-threatening situations.

Thrasher described the Tasers as a "very humane tool."

"The Tasers give us a tool to add to [our arsenal] that's much more humane," Thrasher said.

A Taser, also known as a "stun-gun" is a weapon that shoots small electrical currents at a person, which incapacitates him or her for a few seconds.

Thrasher said those few seconds allow officers an appropriate amount of time to take a suspect into custody in most cases.

UMPD has not yet purchased the Tasers, but officials have indicated the department intends to purchase them in the near future. Four officers, including Thrasher, have gone through training to become certified instructors of Taser training.

Recent media reports have said the four officers must receive four more hours of training before the department can purchase them. However, UMPD Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald said state officials might make the officers train an additional eight hours before the department's purchase.

"The company that provides the training is offering 12 hours of instructor training, while Massachusetts law mandates 16 hours of training," Archbald said. "We're trying to reconcile the situation with the company and the state."

Thrasher explained that a Taser has two needles, which are deployed when the trigger is pulled. He said the needles — described as filament wire — can penetrate the skin and get tied up in someone's clothing. But he explained the shock from the device only lasts about five seconds.

According to a Web site by a Taser manufacturer, Taser International said the weapon can fire at a target between 16 and 21 feet away. The wires deliver a 50,000-volt charge at 1.36 joules of electricity. By comparison, a heart defibrillator is 300 joules, Thrasher said.

Thrasher experienced the effects of the Taser firsthand while he was in training. He described the pain as being immediate and intense.

"Someone pulls the trigger and your body immediately tenses," he said. "You're in pain for about five seconds and it's over... That's all the time we need to put handcuffs on someone."

Student leaders, including Student Government Association President Eduardo Bustamante, trustee Matt Murphy and SGA Attorney General Craig Goldsmith have all expressed strong opposition to the idea of Tasers on campus. Murphy expressed concern over the safety of the devices, while Bustamante expressed fear of civil rights violations.

"If somebody gets 'tasered' the procedure to rejuvenate them means that nobody can touch them," Murphy said adding that in the confusion of the situation someone who might be trying to help the person who was struck by the weapon could accidentally get shocked.

"This isn't a city, it's a university and we're all here to study," Bustamante said while questioning the need for such weapons.

When asked why the university needs Tasers, Thrasher responded by saying he understands Bustmante's point, but points out the number of people who converge onto campus from other areas.

"With the number of violent altercations my officers deal with in a year, it's not an uncommon to address seriously violent subjects," he said. "The other option is to seriously beat them with a baton."

Thrasher also said commonly used "pepper spray" does not work on all subjects.

UMass Police Chief Barbara O'Connor said she wants her officers to have all the best tools for their disposal.

"I believe in giving my officers as many possible options," O'Connor said to the Springfield Republican in a Jan. 23 article.

Murphy expressed concern that medical conditions, such as heart conditions could arise if someone is shocked by a Taser.

"If somebody gets 'tased'... they have to be taken to the hospital almost immediately," Murphy said.

Thrasher said Murphy's statement is not accurate. He said a paramedic might be called if the needles become stuck in the skin, but in that case the electric shock should have ceased.

The Tasers will not be in the hands of the UMPD in time for the Superbowl football game on Sunday, but Murphy questioned the timing the department decided to announce their plans for purchasing the weapons.

UMPD is the only police department in the state that has submitted a Taser training proposal to the Executive Office of Public Safety, the state organization that authorizes the use of Tasers for police departments.

Greenfield's police department has already purchased Tasers, but has not trained officers to use them. Other departments looking into the use of the weapon are Springfield, Holyoke, Monson and Belchertown.

Each Taser costs about $800. UMPD plans on purchasing three.

National Chapter shuts down Delta Zeta Sorority residence

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

Leaders of the national chapter of the Delta Zeta sorority are scheduled to meet with sorority members of the University of Massachusetts chapter today after their house was closed down by the national chapter due to an unspecified drug violation.

The meeting is expected to take place behind closed doors to discuss the future of the sorority located at 11 Phillips St. Details surrounding the alleged violations have been unclear, but one published report said the sorority was shut down after a maintenance worker took a photograph of what he believed to have been a marijuana pipe. The worker then allegedly sent the picture to the national chapter in Ohio.

Amherst Police Det. Ronald Young said his department is in no way involved in the investigation of the sorority. However, national chapter members gave what was described as a "courtesy call" to APD, informing them of the situation.

The closing of the chapter forced 15 students who live at the house to move out by yesterday.

A security guard was seen on patrol outside the house Sunday. The women who lived in the house also reported their phone was disconnected and they had no access to the Internet since late last week.

COURTESY DZ

Delta Zeta's Greek letters

Sorority members say they are afraid of the scar the sorority may have to bare now that news of the closure has spread around campus.

"I was always proud to wear my letters around campus, but now I'm afraid to," Lea Marshiano, a Delta Zeta member told the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

Michael Wiseman, director of the Office of Fraternities and Sororities said it's too early to say whether any charges will be filed against the students under the university's Code of Student Conduct. He also said the university is working to help the students find other housing.

Wiseman explained to the Hampshire Gazette that sororities often have stricter standards than fraternities.

"All of the sorority houses are supposed to be substance free, and a lot of them don't allow men in the sleeping quarters," he said. "The sororities tend to be more structured and more closely monitored. They're more quick to take action if there are violations."

Delta Zeta members pay $500 a year in dues, on top of paying $4,500 to live in the house.

According to Wiseman, the closure of Delta Zeta is the first time a UMass sorority has been shut down for violations of the national organization's policies in his 12 years as director of the Office of Fraternities and Sororities.

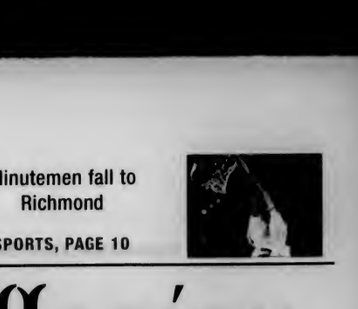
Iraqis embrace elections despite heavy turmoil and violence

By Sally Buzbee
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraqis embraced democracy in large numbers Sunday, standing in long lines to vote in defiance of mortar attacks, suicide bombers and boycott calls. Pushed in wheelchairs or carts if they couldn't walk, the elderly, the young and women in veils cast ballots in Iraq's first free election in a half-century.

"We broke a barrier of fear," said Mijm Towirish, an election official said.

Uncertain Sunni turnout, a string of insurgent attacks that killed 44 and the crash of a British military plane drove home that chaos in Iraq isn't over yet.



Yet the mere fact the vote went off seemed to ricochet instantly around a world hoping for Arab democracy and fearing Islamic extremism.

"I am doing this because I love my country, and I love the sons of my nation," said Shamal Hekeib, 53, who walked with his wife 20 minutes to a polling station near his Baghdad home.

"We are Arabs, we are not scared and we are not cowards," Hekeib said.

With helicopters flying low and gunfire close by, at least 200 voters stood calmly in line at midday outside one polling station in the heart of Baghdad. Inside, the tight security included at least four body searches, and a ban on lighters, cell phone batteries, cigarette packs and even pens.

The feeling was sometimes festive. One election volunteer escorted a blind man back to his home after he cast his vote. A woman too frail to walk by herself arrived on a cart pushed by a young relative. Entire families showed up in their finest clothes.

COURTESY CNN

Thousands of ballots were cast yesterday during Iraq elections

But for the country's minority Sunni Arabs, who held a privileged position under Saddam Hussein, the day was not as welcome.

No more than 400 people voted in Saddam's hometown of Tikrit, and in the heavily Sunni northern Baghdad neighborhood of Azamiyah, where Saddam made his last known public appearance in early April 2003, the four polling places never even opened.

Iraqi election officials said it might take 10 days to determine the vote's winner and said they had no firm estimate of turnout among the 14 million eligible voters. The ticket endorsed by the Shiite Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani was the pre-voting favorite. Interim Prime Minister Ayad Allawi's slate was also considered strong.

"The world is hearing the voice of freedom from the center of the Middle East," said President Bush, who called the election a success. He promised the United States would continue training Iraqi soldiers, hoping they can soon secure a country America invaded nearly two years ago to topple Saddam.

Iraqis, the U.S. president said, had "firmly rejected the anti-democratic ideology" of terrorists.

The vote to elect a 275-National Assembly and 18 provincial legislatures was only the first step on Iraq's road to self-rule and stability. Once results are in, it could take weeks of backroom deals before a prime minister and government are picked by the new assembly.

If that government proves successful by drawing in the minority Sunni Arabs who partly shunned the election, the country could stabilize, hastening the day when 150,000 U.S. troops can go home.

See IRAQ on page 2

UMass aiding young students

By Matthew Reid
Collegian Staff

The School Psychology Program at the University of Massachusetts, a part of the university's School of Education, is working with elementary school teachers and administrators across the state to improve reading levels for early elementary school students.

The program, which has been running for nearly ten years, seeks to increase early literacy among children from kindergarten through third grade by constantly monitoring reading abilities.

Professors in the School Psychology Program work closely with the schools to ensure the needs of students are being met and that each student is given what he or she needs to improve in terms of reading ability and comprehension.

The UMass professors involved in the program are chairman Gary Stoner, William J. Matthews and John M. Hintze. Several graduate students are also involved in the program.

The School Psychology Program works in conjunction with Reading First, a federal initiative that aims to improve reading scores of students at underperforming schools.

According to the United States Department of Education Website, Reading First, which was established as a part of President Bush's No Child Left Behind Act of 2002, "provides funds to help underperforming school districts eliminate the reading deficit by establishing high-quality, comprehensive reading."

Once a school is deemed "underperforming" based on MCAS results, they are eligible to submit a grant proposal for Reading First funds.

The School Psychology Program has teamed up with their colleagues from IDEAL Consulting Services to help in the assessment process. Data will be collected on the schools and interventions to address problems in early literacy development will be designed.

The literacy assessments judge the reading proficiency of students, from letter recognition, sound blending and wording decoding (for kindergarten students) and reading fluency (for students in grades one through three).

The data is then presented to the schools, and teachers and administrators will work with members of the School Psychology Program to monitor and improve the reading proficiency of the school's students.

The program stretches from cities as far west as North Adams to as far east as New Bedford.

Matthews acknowledges that it's important to improve the classroom management and behavior of children, but it is equally as important to improve a student's academic performance.

"As psychologists, we deal with behaviors," says Matthews, "and we look at reading as a behavior. We help children improve their reading behaviors based on the specific weaknesses we find from the assessments."

The key, according to Matthews, is getting to children as early as possible. The program stresses that assessing potential reading problems early on is an important step to ensuring strong future reading ability.

See MCAS on page 2

UMass Professor developing polymer material for cell research

COURTESY UMASS EDU

Professor Surita Bhatia

By Jonathan Vega
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts researchers are once again on the cutting edge of polymer research.

Professor Surita Bhatia's research team is developing new polymer materials that can encapsulate and deliver various types of organ cells and tissues for transfer into the human body.

The process, which may provide people with alternatives to risky organ transplants such as liver thyroid, pancreas and cartilage procedures, is well underway at the University of Massachusetts. Today, many people wait for a disproportionately low number of organs and many risk not surviving to receive an organ transplant.

Bhatia, who is the recent winner of the National Science Foundation's prestigious Career Award, is quick to point out that.

"The project is really collaborative, while we all are working on different aspects of it what we are really trying to do is address the field of tissue engineering," she said.

For the past four years, Bhatia has been collaborating with Susan Roberts of the Chemical Engineering department and Gregory Tew of the Polymer Science and Engineering department. Traditionally, tissue engineering has been in the realm of medical and biological science however the strength of polymer research at UMass has brought innovative and original ideas to medical science.

"What we are trying to do that is a little different is to focus on materials where we can control structure and mechanical properties," Bhatia said.

Professor Bhatia said she hopes the resources of the Chemical Engineering department can be applied to tissue engineering. The challenge for Bhatia is providing the encapsulated cells or tissues with the oxygen necessary for cell survival and replication. Bhatia explained that other researchers have engineered materials that encourage blood vessel growth, which in turn provides the encapsulated cell with the oxygen necessary for survival.

However, Bhatia and her colleagues are approaching the problem of oxygen transport a different way.

"What we wanted to do is use a material that has a high solubility for oxygen," Bhatia said. "Just like we have liquids that can dissolve carbon dioxide, like soda, we have liquids that can dissolve oxygen."

Though water has relatively low oxygen solubility some liquids, like those

See POLYMER on page 2

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Marzelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Meghan Healy
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sagalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Bosack
Copy Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Yousef Munayyer
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Kuppins
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Frecaut
Human Resources Sandra Marquez
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Artists Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst. Arts & Living Chris Gazzara
Assistant Editors Allison Edles
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brunner
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts academic semester. The Collegian is independently owned, operated, and supported by its advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aegis Lite, became the College News in 1901, the Record-Collegian in 1904, and the Massachusetts Daily Collegian in 1936. Publication ceased 1967. The Collegian was born when Aegis and Index merged. For questions, notices, and information, call 545-3500 between 9 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

Night Editor
Mike Marzelli
Photo Technician
Alex Demosthene
Copy Editor
Matt Elder
Production Supervisor
Matthew Reed
Production Staff
Jamieson Melbourne, Kait Rowe

www.dailycollegian.com

School Psychology program helps kids

MCAS from page 1

"The older a child gets, the harder it is to correct improper reading habits," said Matthews.

While the program does not specifically prepare students to perform on the MCAS exams, Matthews believes that the preventative approach taken by school psychology professors will accurately predict a student's likelihood of passing the literary portion of the statewide examination.

"We can tell how close a student is to 'high risk levels for reading failure,' and we can then determine how to best correct their academic disadvantages."

Frequent monitoring is a key to the program's success. By constantly keeping an eye on the performance (and ideally the improvement) of the students, the professors are better able to assess the effectiveness of their methods.

Matthews compared the frequent monitoring of the program to the stock market, in that constant updates are crucial to success. "Stock market tickers need to show minute-to-minute updates, or else the information is useless. we prefer week-to-week updates on how the students are doing. It would do us no good to test children in September, and not test them again until June, as it would be to late to make improvements for that child."

Bhatia working on cutting-edge polymer research project used for cell encapsulation, have an incredibly high ability to hold oxygen.

POLYMER from page 1

When properly engineered, the gel will protect the developing cell but more importantly it will provide the cell with the oxygen necessary for life.

"Liver and pancreatic tissues in particular have a high demand for oxygen," Bhatia said. "If you don't supply enough oxygen, like the body would do with its blood supply, the organ cells might either die or not function properly."

It is vital that the polymers, which Bhatia's team has developed, are accepted by the human body. Therefore, Bhatia's team used polymers that have been approved by the FDA.

"Most of the materials that we are looking at are bio-degradable," she said.

Cartilage replacement and production has proven to be a challenge and Bhatia's research has attracted the attention of companies looking for the patents.

Cartilage replacement could help victims of car accidents or fires who have been left disfigured. Bhatia is focused on customizing gels that mimic the elastic or shock absorbing characteristics of cartilage in knees, elbows, shoulders and various other joints where cartilage may be damaged or nissing.

Arthritis and spinal disc complications are the leading cause of disability in the United States and treatment costs exceed $65 billion. Each year in the United States 1 million people undergo cartilage reconstructive surgery.

"What we want to do is develop general delivery devices that you could use with multiple kinds of cells," Bhatia said.

"Problems like this are never solved by one research team, usually you have one small piece of the puzzle," she said.

Professor Bhatia has recently applied for a NIH grant to continue her polymer research for an additional five years and is optimistic of the potential cell encapsulation applications and treatments.

Thousands of Iraqis vote

IRAQ from page 1

Many Iraqis appear emotional as they vote in their first ever free election. Many waited in long lines for several hours to vote.

On Sunday, coalition soldiers raced through Baghdad's streets in Humvees and tried to coax people to vote with loudspeakers in Ramadi, a Sunni city where anti-U.S. attacks are frequent. Iraqi police served as guards at most polling stations and U.S. troops had strict orders to stay away unless Iraqi security forces called for help.

At the Louisiana National Guard headquarters near Baghdad, nervous U.S. officers paced the halls, muttering, "So far, so good," after the first 30 minutes of polling passed without attacks.

But the violence soon broke out.

While a driving ban seemed to discourage car bombs, the insurgents improvised, strapping on belts of explosives to launch their suicide missions.

At least 44 died in the suicide and mortar attacks on polling stations, including nine suicide bombers. The al-Qaida affiliate led by Jordanian terror mastermind Abu Musab al-Zarqawi claimed responsibility for at least four attacks.

Most attacks were in Baghdad, but one of the deadliest came in Hillah to the south, when a bomber got onto a minibus carrying voters and detonated his explosives, killing himself and at least four others.

In another reminder of the dangers that persist in Iraq, a British C-130 Hercules transport plane crashed north of Baghdad. The wreckage was strewn over a large area. British Prime Minister Tony Blair said there were British deaths but did not give the number or the cause. Elsewhere, one U.S. serviceman died in fighting in the Sunni stronghold of Anbar province west of Baghdad.

Despite the string of attacks and mortars that boomed first in the morning and then after dark, a people steeled to violence by years of war, sanctions, the brutality of Saddam's regime and U.S. military occupation were not deterred from the polls.

Deadly bus crash under investigation

By John Wawrow
Associated Press

WINDSOR, Ontario — Investigators on Sunday sought to determine why a bus chartered for a Canadian hockey team swerved and rammed a parked tractor-trailer so hard that the bus split in half lengthwise, killing four people and injuring 19.

Visibility at the time of the Saturday afternoon wreck in western New York was good, and the highway was dry and clear, state police Maj. Steven White said.

White said the bus driver, Ryan Comfort of Ontario, told police that he hit something in the road before the crash, but investigators had not yet verified that.

White said Comfort, being treated at a hospital in Rochester, N.Y., was being watched by a state trooper to ensure that he does not leave the United States.

No charges had been filed. "However, that doesn't mean (the driver) is not a person of interest," Livingston County District Attorney Thomas Moran told the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle.

The National Transportation Safety Board sent a three-member team to investigate, NTSB spokesman Paul Schlamm said.

The Coach Canada bus was chartered by the Windsor Wildcats, a club hockey team of women ages 18 to 21. After a morning game in Rochester, it was taking some of the players, as well as family members and coaches, to a ski center when it struck the truck on Interstate 390, 27 miles south of Rochester.

The driver of the tractor-trailer, owned by Xtra Lease Inc. of Mechanicsburg, Pa., had parked it on the shoulder and was outside the cab when the bus rear-ended the rig, police said.

The truck driver, Ernest Dale Zeiset, 42, of Womelsdorf, Pa., and three bus passengers were killed. The bus passengers were identified as the team's coach Richard Edwards, 46, and his 13-year-old son Brian, from LaSalle, Ontario, and Catherine Roach, 50, of Windsor, Ontario, the mother of a player.

Friends described Edwards as a well-known figure in the community who loved coaching hockey and baseball. His wife, Sheila, was the team trainer and manager. His 21-year-old daughter, Kelly, was the goalie on the team. Both survived the crash.

Where Does Your Money Go?

Your money matters.
A dollar spent here, stays here.
shop your local textbook store.
Better for your wallet.
Better for your community.

JAN 22-FEB 6
8:30-8 MON-SAT
12-5 SUN

JEFFERY AMHERST
COLLEGE STORE
Downtown Amherst
Behind the Jeffery Amherst Bookshop
253.7816
textbooks@jeffbooks.com

A Member of the National Association of College Stores

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
NOW HIRING
WebMaster
The Collegian is looking for someone to maintain its website. If you have any experience with HTML, online advertising or web design apply now!
Freshman and sophomores strongly encouraged to apply
All applicants should call:
(413)-545-3500
Ask For Rich

THE BOLTWOOD
PROJECT™
(35 years of service—and counting!)
A STUDENT / COMMUNITY SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAM
(an RSO and Dept. of Landscape Architecture & Regional Planning sponsored prog.)

REACH OUT—AND BECOME A SPECIAL FRIEND TO PEOPLE WITH SPECIAL NEEDS
Your life will NEVER be the same!
••EARN 1-2 CREDITS ••GAIN VALUABLE EXPERIENCE ••REWARDING, CHALLENGING, and FUN
Spring Semester 2005 — Recruitment Nights
You must attend ONE of these meetings. No exceptions, even if you have participated before!
6:00-8:00 PM (Note: Prompt starting time!!!)
Room 163C of the Campus Center for all meetings •Jan 31 (Mon) •Feb 1 (Tues) and Feb 2 (Wed)
•Assignment notification ONLY Thurs, Feb. 3rd @ Boltwood table CC Concourse
No telephone inquiries. YOU (or a friend) must pickup the notification letter!!!
Volunteer, while earning credit!

Sergeant and Mass. native dies in Iraq

WEYMOUTH, Mass. (AP) — Marine Sgt. Andrew K. Farrar Jr., who re-enlisted after the 9-11 terrorist attacks, died Friday on his 31st birthday while on patrol in Iraq, his father said Sunday.

The Weymouth native, scheduled to return home to his wife and two young sons in three weeks, was electrocuted when he ran into a high-voltage wire on patrol in Anbar province in western Iraq, said Andrew Farrar Sr. Farrar nearly returned to civilian life in 2001 and took the police civil service exam to prepare for a career in law enforcement.

Then came Sept. 11.

"He was scheduled to discharge a month later," his father said. "He re-enlisted after 9-11 to serve because he knew others wouldn't be able to serve. His whole approach was selfless."

The family planned to travel to Camp Lejeune in North Carolina on Monday for a military funeral. A service in Weymouth was being planned for later this week.

Farrar's wife, Melissa, was his high school sweetheart at Weymouth High School. They married in 1996 and he joined the Marines a year later. They have two sons, Tyler, 6, and Liam, 2.

Farrar was on his second tour of duty in Iraq. He led his squad of young Marines during fierce fighting in Fallujah last year.

"He was profoundly patriotic," his father said. "We're proud of him and we're proud of all service men and women."

Farrar, who was the oldest of four children, is the third Massachusetts native killed in Iraq this month, and at least the 26th overall since April 2003.

Last week, Marine 1st Lt. Travis J. Fuller, 26, of Granville, was among 30 Marines and a Navy sailor killed when the helicopter they were riding in crashed in Iraq.

-Associated Press

Officials agree on security plan in West Bank

By Mohammed Daraghmeh
Associated Press

RAMALLAH, West Bank — Palestinian police commanders began preparations Sunday to take control of four West Bank towns by midweek, after top Israeli and Palestinian officials agreed on a security plan for the West Bank.

Transfer of the towns' control would be the first large-scale Israeli move on the ground to acknowledge that violence has decreased significantly since Palestinians elected Mahmoud Abbas to replace the late Yasser Arafat as their leader Jan. 9.

If the calm holds, Israel promises to move all its troops back to positions they held before the latest Palestinian uprising began in September 2000, turning the populated areas of the West Bank back to Palestinian control and making a major step toward resuming peace talks.

In another significant move, an Israeli official said amnesty would be granted for fugitive Palestinians in the West Bank, ending Israel's relentless search for dozens of extremists suspected in attacks on Israelis. In more than four years of conflict, dozens of militants have been killed in Israeli raids and many more have been arrested.

The amnesty would allow Abbas to fulfill a key campaign pledge that fugitives would be allowed to reintegrate into Palestinian society with no fear of Israeli reprisal.

Meanwhile, more than 100,000 Jewish settlers and their backers demonstrated Sunday night in Jerusalem against Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan to evacuate all 21 Gaza settlements and four West Bank outposts this summer.

The protesters demanded a referendum on the plan, but Sharon has rejected that as a delaying tactic, and he appears to have the political muscle to push the plan through. In all, 8,500 settlers stand to be displaced.

"Ariel Sharon, you have no mandate to expel Jews," said Effie Eitam, a pro-settler lawmaker who spoke to the crowd. The demonstrators pledged to go to Gaza to block the pullout.

Palestinian leader since 2000, when Arafat sat down with then-Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

Officials say that Palestinian's are making preparations to take over four new areas in the West Bank.

Jury selection begins today for Jackson molestation trial

By Linda Deutsch
Associated Press

SANTA MARIA, Calif. — The child molestation case against Michael Jackson is finally ready for a trial that promises to be like no other.

Jury selection begins Monday, with Jackson expected to appear, in a case that has become a symbol of the American obsession with celebrity.

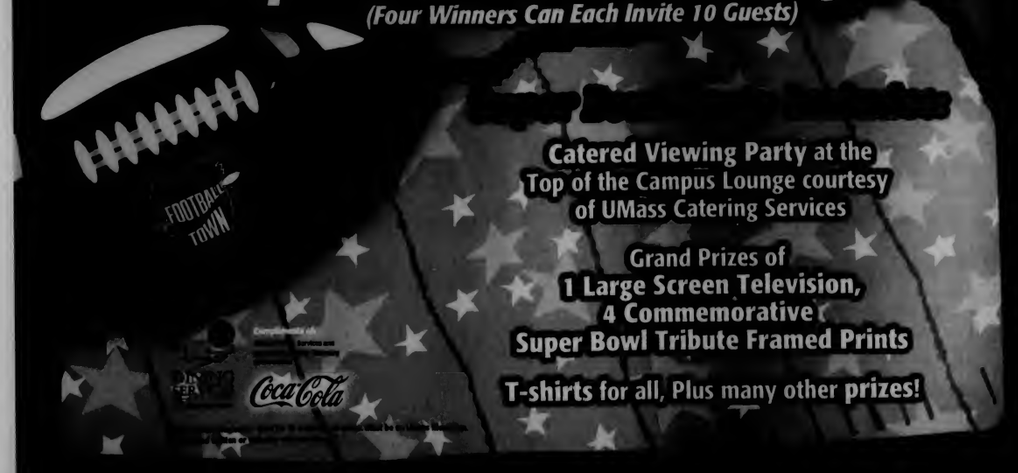
Early Sunday, Jackson issued a court-approved video statement on his Web site, calling recent media leaks in the case "disgusting and false" and predicting he would be acquitted.

"Please keep an open mind and let me have my day in court," Jackson said, looking directly into the camera. "I deserve a fair trial like every other American citizen. I will be acquitted and vindicated when the truth is told."

The uphill task of finding jurors who haven't prejudged the case is a mere prelude to a courtroom contest that will include testimony from the boy who accuses the pop icon of molesting him.

On the defense side of court sits a glittering superstar who appears in makeup and theatrical outfits and has millions of fans worldwide who don't believe he could be a pedophile. Jackson, 46, is charged with molesting the cancer patient - then age 13, now 15 - after plying him with alcohol.

On the prosecution side is Jackson's longtime nemesis, a balding, mustachioed Santa Barbara County district attorney. For more than a decade Tom Sneddon has pursued Jackson and what happens at his Neverland Ranch. Jackson has derided him in song as a "cold man" with a vendetta and likened the case to persecution.



Sneddon, 61, recently asked the judge to stop attacks on his motives. If the defense continues to call the case a crude attempt to "take down a major celebrity," the prosecution wrote, Sneddon will reveal "everything he knows about this defendant."

Prosecutors have complained that defense lawyer Thomas Mesereau Jr. uses courtroom invective not only to hammer his opponents but also to brand the child witnesses - the accuser and his brother - as liars manipulated by their greedy mother. Mesereau is a tall, imposing man with a mane of white hair, known for winning seemingly hopeless death penalty cases in the South.

The referee is Superior Court Judge Rodney Melville, 63, a veteran of the bench who has refused to tolerate tardiness or even, in one case, a bathroom break for the defendant.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
NOW HIRING
FOR
Special Issues Coordinator & Promotions Manager
Boost your resume,get real business experience, earn cash, and have some fun!
Possibility of receiving internship credits
Now accepting applications. Come to the Campus Center Basement Rm 113 or call 545.3500 and ask for Tiffany.

UMass Dining Services and Coca-Cola Invite you To Enjoy
"The Big Game"
on Sunday, February 6th and the Chance To
Co-host Your Own Super Bowl Party!
(Four Winners Can Each Invite 10 Guests)

Catered Viewing Party at the Top of the Campus Lounge courtesy of UMass Catering Services
Grand Prizes of 1 Large Screen Television,
4 Commemorative
Super Bowl Tribute Framed Prints
T-shirts for all, Plus many other prizes!

Enter Today! Drawing to be held on February 3rd at 6pm
Simply Fill Out an Entry Ballot at the Football Town USA Display at Any one of the University Dining Commons or go Online at www.umass.edu/diningservices

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, JANUARY 31, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Absolute proof needed

Chris Eckel

Mitt Romney, the governor of Massachusetts, lives down the street from me. We are both proud Belmontians. Thus, whenever he does something unpopular, I suffer by association, with friends busting my chops over it. This, of course, has happened more often than I would like in his brief gubernatorial career. Romney has not always come across as the most even-minded leader. Some accuse him of the George W. Bush syndrome: taking one side and ignoring the other viewpoint. Now that he has chosen to tackle one of this country's hottest potatoes, the death penalty, with new proposed legislation, I'm surely headed for more jokes and snide comments, right?

I am not an advocate for capital punishment, but I am willing to accept the democratic ideal. If a majority of Americans are in favor of such a system, then it should be used. However, even the most enthusiastic supporters of the death penalty must concede that the system, as currently implemented, is tremendously flawed. It takes little effort to find evidence of this disturbing reality. Almost monthly, it seems, people are released from death row because they were wrongly convicted. More rarely, people have been exonerated after their deaths because of new evidence.

It is commonly estimated that the odds of two people having the same 'genetic fingerprints' is 1 in 1,000,000,000. The odds are better that one could sit down at the World Series of Poker and throw down a Royal Flush twice in a row.

In most cases, the change in finding is due to DNA testing of evidence collected at the crime scene. New technology is leading to more accurate trials, but too often it is not utilized until it is too late. This has led to tremendous skepticism about the true fairness of the death penalty when absolute proof cannot be gathered. The wave of uncertainty has impacted Illinois governor George Ryan, who proclaimed a temporary moratorium on executions in his state in January 2000. Ryan supports the death penalty, but became distressed when during his tenure as governor, more than half of the death row inmates were found to be innocent. Ryan later emptied death row by commuting all the death sentences to a term of life without parole. Ryan stated, "I cannot support a system which, in its administration, has proven so fraught with error and has come so close to the ultimate nightmare, the state's taking of innocent life."

The taking of innocent life is where Mitt Romney's plan comes into play. The proposed legislation essentially has two goals. The first is to up the standard for how severe a crime must be to warrant consideration of capital punishment. Only terrorists, cop killers, murderers who used torture and those who killed witnesses to other crimes would be considered for capital punishment.

The second goal of Romney's plan is to upgrade the burden of proof on the state in order to get a death penalty ruling. In the past, anybody who was convicted of a serious enough crime, regardless of the circumstances, was eligible for the death penalty. Romney's plan "suggests doing away with the legal standard of guilt 'beyond a reasonable doubt' in a death penalty case, and replacing it with a finding of 'no doubt'."

The only way to prove beyond any doubt that a hypothetical scenario actually took place is DNA testing. This is because DNA is so unique. It is commonly estimated that the odds of two people having the same 'genetic fingerprint' is 1 in 1,000,000,000. The odds are better that one could sit down at the World Series of Poker and throw down a Royal Flush twice in a row. If one's DNA is found at the scene of a crime, such overwhelming odds are the next best thing to absolute certainty that the person in question was involved in the incident being investigated. False positives simply are an almost impossible occurrence.

Setting such a high standard for burden of proof is the best possible move Romney can make. Proponents of the death penalty can take comfort in the fact that the system is no longer as arbitrary. Those who rally against the death penalty being enacted in their state can take some solace in the fact that innocent people are not being sentenced to execution. There will never be a satisfactory solution to the death penalty debate. With that being said, it seems that Romney's plan, which was formed around feedback from a panel he appointed to comprehensively study the death penalty, is fundamentally solid. In Massachusetts, of course, the death penalty is not currently used. In the most recent vote for it in the House, it failed 80-73. However, such a narrow margin clearly indicates it is a subject that will be revisited by the state government in the near future. How Romney's plan plays out will make for fascinating theater. Let's just hope my friends don't force me to play the role of the beleaguered sidekick to the governor from Belmont.

Chris Eckel is a Collegian columnist.

This space for sale

Allison Edles

There's nothing quite like buying into American propaganda. After all, why else would we feel the need to buy eight different bags of various shapes and sizes that all serve the same exact function if we didn't honestly believe in the bottom of our hearts, even just a little bit, that buying those eight bags would make us exactly like the people in the commercials and, therefore, better than those around us?

It's a fact well acknowledged that advertisers are way too good at what they do. And they know it. Who else can make us want to buy something that gives us nothing in return, like paying $4.00 for a cup of coffee that contains very little actual coffee? I mean really, you're paying more for the Sweet 'N Low than you are for the coffee. Regardless, just when we couldn't think advertisers could do their job any better, they one-up us once again.

Rather than solely utilizing billboards, commercials and magazines, now those savvy slick-talkers have found a new outlet for their clients' messages: the human body. Thirty-one year-old Joe Tamargo, who runs a website called LivingAdSpace.com, is offering his body as available ad space. That's right; clients are now free to venture into previously unexplored territory by permanently tattooing their products and businesses on Tamargo's body.

Now, to the cynical reader, this may seem like nothing new. After all, how much of a difference is there from wearing a Tommy Hilfiger logo tattooed on your arm as opposed to wearing one of his t-shirts? Let's face it, you can't even buy a standard black t-shirt without having the designer's name stapled to it somewhere. Perhaps Tamargo is just giving in to the inevitable.

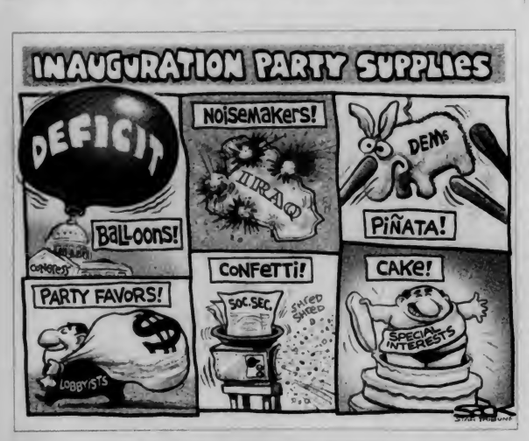
However, what I find eerily disturbing, more so than the obvious, is the fact that tattooing an ad on your arm pays less than if you were to advertise in a professional magazine or on a billboard. For having two ads tattooed on his right arm, Tamargo earned a little over

We have become a nation that relies and fuctions, not only on the products being advertised, but on the ads themselves.

$1,000. Leave it to advertisers to price out the worth of permanently disfiguring human flesh at around $500. And, sad to say, I have a sneaking suspicion that the unsuspecting Tamargo set the price a lot higher and was talked down by the piranhas of the ad world. Such is the way of things.

Having gotten past the initial shock of it all, we can now move on to the specific ads that have been permanently affixed on Tamargo's right arm. Now, taking into consideration the everlasting factor of these ads, it leaves one to question, what it is exactly that he is now an advertisement for.

The answer: websites. Tamargo has two ads on his arm, one for a pharmaceutical company in California called pilldaddy.com and the other is SaveMartha.com, a site launched in lieu of Martha Stewart's recent imprisonment. So, in exchange for $1,000, Tamargo has become what we all hate. That's right, he's now a walking pop-up.



But where does it go from here? In a recent cnn.com article, the Madison Avenue advertising guru Jerry DellaFemina commented on Tamargo's situation, saying, "I don't even want to ask where he might want to place an ad for Viagra." While it's easy to jest at the situation, the underlying threat is much more serious.

We have become a nation that relies and functions, not only on the products being advertised, but on the ads themselves. Take, for example, the upcoming Super Bowl. While the actual game is very exciting (and because a good portion of those viewing don't watch football games otherwise), it is not solely the game that is the reason for its entertainment and appeal. Those who don't normally watch football watch the Super Bowl for two reasons. First, because it is just another reason to throw a party and second, the advertisements are impeccable.

Rarely is there another occasion where you can sit back with your bowl of chips and cold beer in hand and realize that the 30 seconds of commercial you're watching just cost that particular company $2 million. That's right, while both your brain and arteries are functioning at decreased levels, you can still count on that comfort of knowing that Budweiser will always be $2 million dollars poorer for making you laugh so hard you spill your beer.

I fear that what we have to look forward to are days when magazines will be filled with articles and not ads; days where the only things that constitute commercials are public services announcements and local broadcasting network tests. But, we can continue to rest easy knowing that in the future, there will be a group of people who will not be afraid to finally tattoo things on their bodies like "Eat at Hooters!" and "Atlantic City is your calling!"

Allison Edles is a Collegian editor.

Relief imbalanced

Matthew Reid

The tsunami crisis that has affected Southeast Asia is a great tragedy. The death and destruction that it caused certainly makes it one of the deadliest natural disasters in centuries.

The relief efforts have been staggering, and the outpouring of sentiment has been remarkable, reminiscent of the all-too-unnatural disaster that took place on American soil over three years ago.

There are two main sources of relief. First, you have the actual aid itself, in the form of food, medical supplies, and equipment to help rebuild the areas hit by the disaster (including water purification tools). These supplies will certainly not go to waste.

Then, there's the financial aid that is being provided, which in total has will surpass 10 billion U.S. dollars worldwide. The United States has given $350 million in relief funds so far, not including the millions of private donations. While one should never criticize the act of giving to those less fortunate, one must question the motives behind the generosity.

While one should never criticize the act of giving to those less fortunate, one must question the motives behind the generosity.

The United States government never fails to come to the rescue of the latest nation or nations hit by tragedy, and the same can be said for many other governments around the world. Coming to the aid of a country that has suddenly been thrown into tragedy makes America look good (President Bush even said it will "improve our image").

While it may be insensitive to say that the tsunami relief is a political "flavor of the month," when there are so many countries around the world being decimated by war and poverty that receive little-to-no aid whatsoever, it does seems that way.

Take, for example, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, where the current crisis is viewed as being as grim as any other place on Earth. A recent study by the International Rescue Committee (based in New York) says that 3.8 million people in eastern Congo have died since 1998, which is an average of almost 15,000 people a day.

So how much aid has been given to the Congo? The IRC report claims that $188 million was given in "worldwide humanitarian aid" to the African nation in 2004. That figure, which represents all of the aid given to the Congo by the entire rest of the world over a period of an entire year, is just over half of what the United States alone has given to tsunami relief so far.

And that $188 million figure is dwarfed by what Japan has pledged in tsunami relief, which totals over half a billion U.S. dollars.

Some would argue that the Congo comparison is unfair, as weakened governments in several African nations make it impossible for aid to reach the proper authorities. This provides a good excuse not to send aid their way. In reality, the government of Indonesia, the nation most affected by the tragedy and the nation receiving the most aid, is not much better.

Indonesia has been a nation torn by political and financial corruption for years. The president, Abdullah Puteh, told the AFP news agency that the indecency of the Indonesian economy makes it the "laughing stock of the Asian market."

In a nation where governors are routinely jailed for embezzlement schemes, former general and president Mohamed Suharto stands alone. According to World Bank estimates, during Suharto reign (from 1967 to 1998), twenty to thirty percent of Indonesia's development budget was embezzled.

Then there's India, another nation affected by the tsunami. India has the second highest population in the world, and only a fraction of their population percentage was immediately harmed in the disaster. Still, millions of dollars in aid has been pledged. It is questioned whether or not private American donations, made out to "Eastern Asian countries affected by the tsunami," will in fact go to India.

The stance of the Indian government is that all of this aid is not necessary. The country's Finance Minister, Palanniappan Chidambaram, has said that India should not try to prove its might and resilience by refusing aid, but that attempting to rebuild internally will be best for the country in the long run.

"India has been accused of adopting an isolationist stand by not accepting foreign aid, but this is not true," Chidambaram told reporters last week. "We simply believe we are a large enough country to provide relief to our country."

India has also provided aid to smaller countries in Southwest Asia that are incapable of rebuilding on their own, such as like Sri Lanka and the Maldives.

It's true that in the long run, the efforts to rebuild certain parts of Southeast Asia are going to be enormous undertakings, and the United States should help out.

But are we sending this aid because we suddenly feel sorry for a country and want to use the tragedy to our advantage? Consider one last figure ... $40 million. That's how much the Republican Party spent on festivities during President Bush's upcoming inauguration party.

This money will be privately raised, but regardless, the money is there. Millions more in government funds will be spent constructing the "set" for the inauguration at the Capital, paying police for overtime, and ensuring the highest degree of military security.

If we can spend $40 million making us "look good" at home, it makes sense that we would spend $350 million making us "look good" internationally. At least the tsunami aid is for a good cause... too bad the same can't be said for the inauguration.

Matthew Reid is a Collegian columnist.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

TOO MUCH FREE SPEECH?

In our world a festering belief that all people are entitled to a viewpoint, regardless of how it contradicts to our own, makes it difficult to candidly declare an argument to be wrong. Elizabeth Carter and her editorial that ran in Wednesday's edition of "The Daily Collegian," has helped to allay this problem. Because she is expressing her individual opinion, I would be remiss in criticizing her hackneyed libels of the Bush administration, her pleas for bilateralism sopping with unilateral bias. I cannot, nor should I, mock her sophomoric attempt at the grand pursuit of journalism. However, in literature exists a great equalizer, a magnificent invention forged in the fires of the ages. Prince or pauper, republican or democrat, or, borrowing from Ms. Carter's words, "good" or "less good," everyone who enters the fray of the written language is bound by the educations of this sovereign deity.

"A Grammatical Institute of the English Language" is an innovation detailing the proper use of the great language of this great nation, written in 1783 by Noah Webster. This revolutionary book, used even by Benjamin Franklin to educate his granddaughter, was eclipsed by Webster's magnum opus "A Compendious Dictionary of the English Language." From these splendid texts emerged countless others, each one a comprehensive guide to properly spelling and utilizing the words that shape our language. It took Mr. Webster 27 years to record over 70,000 words in his dictionary. In the 5 minutes it took Elizabeth Carter to excrete her sloppy bastardization of our language, I suppose it never occurred to her to reference any one of the countless embodiments of Mr. Webster's legacy.

In her ranting Ms. Carter asks, "how ironic is telling the free that they are enemies of freedom by exercising their right to be free? Now if that sentence didn't sound like a paradox to you, then what does?" After piecing together what she is trying to say, the answer comes quickly to mind. A paradox, Ms. Carter, is the very last sentence printed in the article: "Elizabeth Carter is a Collegian columnist". For you are hardly an individual worthy of being called a collegian, and quite frankly do not deserve to be a columnist for a newspaper of such a name.

Brian Gesiak
UMass student

www.dailycollegian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, JANUARY 31, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

By Chris Gazzara
Collegian Staff

Jazz is often overlooked as a modern music form. Even more frequently, it is thought of by many as a male-dominated genre. Thanks to UMass graduate students Dominique Gagne and Dia Silverstein, a University concert venue will focus on jazz as written and performed by women.

According to Silverstein, as cited in a press release about the event, the two women saw their experience as students in an advanced music degree program focusing on jazz as a way to realize their goal to bring attention to women in jazz.

"We have stepped out of our roles as students to oversee nearly all of the parts of this event. We have booked the soloists, arranged for use of Bezanson Recital Hall, rounded up the female performers in our Department, attracted support and started to promote the concert," Silverstein said in the press release.

The hard work of Gagne and Silverstein won them extra funding, and they found themselves able to feature not only local talent, as originally planned, but three talented guest performers as well.

Allison Miller, a New York City based jazz drummer and composer signed on to the project first. An instrumentalist from the age of ten, she moved on to graduate Summa Cum Laude from West Virginia University where she began her career as a freelance drummer.

Miller's style has been described by the Los Angeles Times as "brawny and swinging where high-voltage propulsion was the appropriate choice, infinitely subtle with accents and timbres where sound and texture were demanded."

Jazz Vocalist Anita Wardell, one of Britain's finest vocalists and friend of UMass professor Catherine Jensen-Hole will be in the area for another Jazz festival in Washington, DC. Due to this lucky coincidence, she will be able to perform in the Women in Jazz Festival as well.

Boston-based singer/songwriter Manisha Shahane will join the festival as well. A good friend of Gagne's, the two worked together on Shanane's debut album, "Peace in Progress" is an eclectic album incorporating many different traditions like folk, jazz and Indian traditions. Northeast Performer Magazine said that her songs contain "complex rythms and well constructed melody lines...with unexpected harmonic twists...and [a] flair for meaningful lyrics."

These three diverse and interesting artists will share the stage with other local talents Thursday, February 10 at 8 p.m. in Bezanson. In attendance will be Vocal Jazz Professor Catherine Jenson-Hole. Dia Silverstein (alto and soprano saxes, flute) and Dominique Gagne (piano, flute) will also perform.

Fellow graduate Students Lena Bloch (tenor and soprano saxes, flute) and Carol Daggs (piano, voice) will also play. Alumni performers include Genevieve Rose (bass) and Melissa Motew (trumpet).

An idea born here on campus and brought to life by UMass' very own students, the Women in Jazz Festival is a concept both simple and important at the same time. Gagne and Silverstein are going to bring their small idea to a reality on stage at UMass.

The UMass Amherst Department of Music & Dance, the Fine Arts Center and the Women's Studies Program have stepped up to sponsor the festival.

'Hide and Seek' another in line of child thrillers

By Jeffrey Horowitz
Collegian Staff

Creepy children are a good basis for horror movies. Some of the best horror movies of all time use adorable faces and innocent little tots as their pathway to horror.

Children represent innocence, and even a sense of harmlessness. For a child to incarnate evil is not only frightening, it's dehumanizing. "The Exorcist" and "The Omen" exceed marvelously on such levels. Hide and Seek, however, falls more in the category of the film "The Good Son." It has the kind of material that could construct a fearsome psychology study, but instead of going for the mature route though, it turns into a typical horror movie. Little girls wander into dark caves, ominous signs appear at the most convenient times, and the whodunit mystery overwhelms an audience fascinated more by the case study than the killer.

Dr. David Callaway (Robert De Niro), a renowned psychologist is trapped in a miserable marriage. His wife (Amy Irving), although close with their daughter, despises her life. Early on, David discovers her suicide late at night in front of their daughter, Emily (Dakotah Fanning). Emily is traumatized and David decides to move them away, to a dark, isolated, wooded area, because it would deprive her of the dark memories. Perhaps he thought the emptiness would cheer her up.

As all horror movie characters must, she strays into the wrong places, always unsupervised. Silences linger for far too long, and the little girl walks around gazing blankly at absolutely nothing. Somebody keeps breaking into their house and leaving messages on their shower curtain complete with candles and bubbles. Cliché?

The only mildly interesting scenes occur with troubling realism when Emily displays some seriously disturbing behavior. She draws grotesque and violent pictures. She disappears and reappears. She makes ambiguous threats and violently dismembers her dolls.

Emily's clothes are too black and her skin is too white. Most curious is her friendship with an absent character who calls himself Charlie. The movie completely abandons the girl and starts concerning itself with Charlie. Who is he? Where is he? Does he even exist? He lingers above the moods of each scene suggesting different notions and endings and so the movie traps itself in a corner.

Dakotah Fanning glides through this material with ingenious presence. She is truly eerie. This is a masterful performance. She will be a name to look for in the future.

De Niro is pretty good as well, as the concerned father, unwisely acting as her psychiatrist. As she strays into deeper levels of psychosis, he's helpless

See HIDE on page 7

'Hide and Seek'
Directed by John Polson
Starring Dakota Fanning, Robert Deniro Twentieth Century Fox
Rated R
100 mins.
Grade C

While the acting in "Hide in Seek" was applauded by critics, many have said that the film had a thinly veiled plot that did not leave much for the viewer to guess.

Singer-songwriter L.P. envisions long-playing career in her near future

By Chuck Myers
Knight Ridder

ARLINGTON, Va. — The artist known as L.P. has an off-the-hook singing voice.

She can also wield a Telecaster guitar pretty well, too.

Pretense and flash are decidedly not in L.P.'s character. Whether you catch her at a live performance or perhaps bump into her after a show, her down-to-earth temperament and disarmingly good nature belie the sense of alienation, despondency and loss she conveys on her latest album, 2004's "Suburban Sprawl and Alcohol" (Light Switch).

L.P. has already tracked a musical course correction in the space of her two albums, from a Southern flavor on her debut record, 2001's "Heart Shaped Scar," to a solid pop-rock charge on her recent sophomore effort.

"I think this record ('Suburban Sprawl and Alcohol') is much more poppy," explained the 28-year-old artist. "I write with outside writers and myself, and we're just starting to, like, write together. We're more into the pop thing. 'Heart Shaped Scar' had more of a Southern thing to it. I felt like my first band was more of an acoustic kind of thing."

While she won't reveal what L.P. stands for, there's no mystery about her music. "Suburban Sprawl and Alcohol" sizzles with melodic vehemence. On the album's title track, L.P. flexes her vocal dexterity with aria-style lift, while on "Nowhere," she shifts to a more vulnerable tone, waxing about reaching a crossroads moment. The strongest link to her previous album lies with the country accent on the final track, "Cadillac."

"There will always be a little bit of that (country) in there," noted L.P. "People will say you sound bluesy and have like a little bit of a country twang in your voice. I guess I do. I feel sometimes you get into your environment. ... It depends on what's going down around you."

Some observers draw parallels between L.P.'s voice and that of other strong pop vocalists, such as Pat Benatar and Cyndi Lauper. She's even been compared to Janis Joplin, although that may more to do with the energy she brings on stage. L.P. doesn't mind the comparisons, just as long as Gwen Stefani is left out of the mix.

"It's been like comparison central," she said. "I mean, I feel everybody gets compared ... My one thing, my one problem with it is, I hate the Gwen Stefani comparison."

Raised outside New York City, L.P. caught the rock music bug in high school. She studied with an opera voice specialist, which helped her develop a strong vocal range. But to become a durable pop-rock singer, she knew she'd need something more – namely stamina. For that, she turned to a rock coach.

"I want to sing a certain way," she said. "I didn't take them to get better. I took them because I'm so loud and I push so hard ... Blowing out, it's so easy to do."

When out on tour, L.P. takes great care to keep her voice fresh and conditioned. Before hitting the stage, she spends 30-35 minutes warming up with meticulous voice exercises. After the gig, she practices a similar routine with a sequence of cool downs.

Where the lesson, dedicated prep and talent will take L.P. remains an open question. But she stays sanguine about her course and future.

"I don't know how big or how underground I'm going to be. But I feel like I'll be somewhere. I want to be that person that you come see because their voice just keeps getting sicker and sicker. That's like my goal, sort of, for myself."

Though recording artist, LP has drawn many comparisons to like artists, she claims that she indeed is very original and that her style is quite eclectic, drawing from country and rock and roll roots.

What is real this week on the Tube

Reality Craze

Mike Busack

I didn't want to do this, but I no longer have a choice. Reality television is here to stay.

When the whole trend of real people watching real people became the television standard, I was the first to say that this was just a fad, a short-lasting glimpse into a slowly degenerating American sophistication. Today, I have been slowly convinced by trends, as well as my peers, that reality television, though at times disgusting, isn't going anywhere. It shows striking similarities with a car accident. You know it is there, and though you know it might hurt if you look, but you have to anyways. It's bordering phenomena.

It is with this in mind that I am excercising what I believe is my obligation as an Arts Editor to cover the events that are relevant to contemporary pop culture. I will, for the upcoming semester, be writing a weekly column about the current status of the reality TV world and it's cheers, jeers, trends, and flat out naughty bits. With that being said, here is what is going on this week in the world of reality on the picture box.

What many consider to be one of the founding programs of modern American reality television, The Real World, a creation of the Late Mary-Ellis Bunim of Bunim-Murray fame, has given keys to their newest residents. Yes, they are back again, and this time ready to throwdown, hook-up, and get crunked in Austin, Texas. The 16th season is sure to spark some talk around campus about who is hooking up with who, who is gay or straight, and of course, why can't I have an apartment like that?

As many of you also may have learned already in the past couple of weeks, American Idol is back for a fourth season. Many critics have claimed, and the hosts have boasted that this shall prove to be the best season yet. Honestly, the American people are intelligent enough to know that this is a marketing ploy, but then again, will we tune in? I'm sure the answer for many of you is yes.

In the past, American Idol has been no stranger to controversial subjects. Contestant Frenchie Davis was kicked out last season after it was exposed that she had done pornography, and many have said in the past that idol voting has been squewed due to racism.

Today, we see a new kind of controversy. A contestant who was showcased on an audition episode last week, has now been arrested and jailed. Although Leroy Wells did not get pass the judges, he was given his own lengthy segment that made a mockery of his audition tape, showing him dancing for the judges and mumbling incoherently. It appears that today, Mr. Wells is being jailed in an Alabama detention center for allegedly shooting a man in the hip following an arguement. Did the judges get this one wrong? Maybe he could have been America's next sweetheart, the next Justin Guarini. Hah!

Finally, topping this weeks reality buzz, is the return to Paris... Hilton that is. Yes, the Simple Life divas are back with a third season, and they are now interns.

The first episode of the Simple Life Interns premiered this past Wednesday to an audience of 13.3 million viewers. This season the girls attack many different positions in various arenas including airlines, plastic surgery rooms, and as we saw in the first episode, local auto mechanic shops. Paris Hilton will also be hosting Saturday Night Life in promotion of the new season this Saturday.

Well that is the biggest news in the "real" world this week. Stay tuned.

Michael Busack is a Collegian Editor.

Discover Your LOVER
The Collegian Dating Game
Win A Free Date!
Sign Up Now!
Sign-ups will be held in the Campus Center Concourse TODAY through Thursday Feb. 3rd from 11-2
3 lucky Men and 3 lucky Women will be selected to go on a blind date.
Collegian readers will vote online to select who will date whom!
Look in the Arts Section for:
The final 3 Men on Tuesday, February 8th
The final 3 women on Wednesday, February 9th
Start voting online Wednesday, February 9th
www.dailycollegian.com

THE BIGGEST BACK TO SCHOOL
POSTER SALE
1000's of Choices
Where: Student Union Ballroom
When: Mon. Jan 31 thru Fri. Feb. 4
Time: 9 A.M. - 4:30 P.M.
Sponsor: WMUA 91.1 FM
Incredible Selection
CHECK OUT OUR GREAT POSTERS AND PRICES!!!
MOST IMAGES ONLY $6, $7 AND $8

Men catching up in age gap

By Robert S. Boyd
Knight Ridder Newspapers

WASHINGTON — Women, take care: After more than a century of living longer than men, your advantage is starting to shrink. Men are gaining on you.

That's the conclusion of scientists who study the puzzling question of why females generally outlive males in the United States and other advanced nations.

"Women live longer than men for reasons that are still not completely understood," said Richard Hodes, director of the National Institute on Aging in Washington.

But it's certainly changing: A female born in 1975 could expect to live 7.8 years longer than a male. Now the gender gap is down to 5.4 years, smaller than at any time since 1950.

The main reason is that women are "smoking more and dying earlier as a result," said Fred Pampel, a demographer at the University of Colorado in Boulder. Until the 1960s, far more men than women smoked.

There also are other causes – biological, social and behavioral – for the difference in male and female life spans, experts say.

For example, women have two X chromosomes in their DNA, while men have one X and one Y. If one of a woman's X chromosomes is damaged by radiation or toxic chemicals, the other one can take its place. Men have no such safety net and thus are more susceptible to certain diseases.

Men tend to collect fat around their bellies, increasing the danger of a heart attack. Women put their extra pounds on their thighs, which distresses but doesn't kill them.

The female hormone estrogen also may reduce the risk of heart disease in women, said Robert Hummer, the director of the Population Research Center at the University of Texas in Austin.

The male hormone testosterone drives boys and men to "higher rates of vigorous physical activity and physical aggressiveness, which contribute to their higher rates of injury mortality," said Ingrid Waldron, a biologist at the University of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia.

"The gender gap in mortality is probably due more to behavioral and social factors than to strictly biological factors," Hummer said in an e-mail.

"Women tend to behave in more healthy ways than men," he said. "Women tend to smoke less, drink less, use fewer dangerous drugs, use their seat belts more often, drive less recklessly and use less violence than men."

Statistics show that men are more likely than women to be employed in dangerous occupations, such as construction and mining, Waldron said. Gun use is more common among males, leading to higher mortality for gun accidents, suicide and homicide.

"Men die more often from destroying themselves with cigarettes, drugs, alcohol, driving fast," said Royda Crose, the author of a 1997 book titled "Why Women Live Longer Than Men."

"We teach our boys to be strong, independent, never admit you need help, and then they suffer throughout life," Crose, a retired psychologist at Ball State University in Muncie, Ind., said in a telephone interview.

As a result, men are almost five times as likely as women to commit suicide. "Women attempt suicide more often," she said, "but it's usually a cry for help and not lethal. Men just decide to end their life."

Crose said women generally take better care of their health than men, who often put off going to doctors or hospitals when they're sick or depressed.

Men often go downhill when they retire and lose their positions of power, Crose said. "Also, when they lose a spouse, they're really lost. They don't have the same social skills as women or a circle of intimate friends."

Nevertheless, "the single most important behavioral cause of men's higher mortality has been men's higher rates of cigarette smoking," Waldron said.

As a result, the average boy born in 2002, the latest year for which statistics are available, will live for 74.5 years, but the average girl for 79.9 years, according to the National Center for Health Statistics in Hyattsville, Md.

A typical 65-year-old man can expect another 16.4 years of life – a woman 19.4 more years. "The number of elderly women is 50 percent larger than the number of elderly men," Waldron said.

In recent decades, the gender gap has been shrinking. "After widening for nearly 100 years, the sex differential in mortality has over the last decade or two begun to narrow," Pampel said.

"In the 1960s, men's smoking started to fall and women's to increase – they kind of converged," Pampel said. The effects started to show up in the 1980s, when lung cancer started killing women nearly as often as men.

Pampel cautioned, however, that women's advantage in longevity may expand again soon because more women are quitting smoking or never starting.

"The likely decline of smoking among women in the future implies that the recent narrowing of the differential will reverse," he said.

The gender gap used to be much smaller. In 1900, life expectancy at birth was only two years longer for females – who frequently died in childbirth – than for males: 48.3 years versus 46.3 years. Women's lead peaked at almost eight years in the 1970s.

Fancy Nail
Walk ins Welcome
FREE
Special $2 OFF full set, fill, manicure, or pedicure with coupon only

STSTRAVEL.COM
Join America's #1 Student Tour Operator
CANCUN ACAPULCO JAMAICA BAHAMAS FLORIDA
SPRING BREAK 2005
Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Travel Free
1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

BEHAVIORAL HEALTH NETWORK
HUMAN SERVICES RESIDENTIAL STAFF
Direct care staff needed for all shifts, day, evening, weekend, overnight (asleep/awake), full, part time and relief positions available in Hampshire County and surrounding communities. Assist individuals with developmental disabilities in their homes, day/vocational programs, respite sites or residential programs. A High school diploma or equivalent, accesses to reliable transportation preferred. Experience helpful but not mandatory, on-going training available. Generous benefit package at 30 hours. Salary: $9.00- $9.73/hr
Please send cover letter and resume to:
Attn: Program Directors
Behavioral Health Network,
492 Pleasant St.
Northampton, MA 01060
AA/EOE

Few scares in Deniro film

HIDE from page 5

and frustrated. He wants to find Charlie and he's getting increasingly worried that he may be more then an imaginary friend.

As the movie progresses it has in its possession fascinating characters and pondering through our minds is Charlie and which character the script will choose for him.

Since they're in a wooded area and there are five characters in the whole movie with any significance, it doesn't take long to figure out. When all is said and done, it's a cheap horror movie that takes a turn for the worst and then depends on a shocker ending for redemption. Redemption that turns out to be your first guess.s

Young actress Dakota Fanning is a shining light in the the film "Hide and Seek." Many critics say Fanning is sure to be a future star.

NEW Click and Waive!
Beginning this year, students can waive the Student Health Insurance Plan (SHIP) Online.
All undergraduate and graduate students taking 5 or more credits are automatically enrolled in the University of Massachusetts Amherst Student Health Insurance Plan, in compliance with Massachusetts State Law. This charge appears on your tuition bill.
You may waive participation in the Student Health Insurance Plan if you have comparable insurance coverage. Visit the Chickering web site at www.chickering.com for detailed plan information. If you are eligible, you must submit a waiver request each academic year.*
The deadline to waive the Student Health Insurance Plan is February 28, 2005 (the last day of the add/drop period).
TO NAVIGATE AND SUBMIT YOUR WAIVER REQUEST:
1. Go to www.spire.edu
2. Select the online waiver request link
3. Click on "2004-2005 waiver request"
4. Complete and submit the online waiver request form
OR
1. Go to www.chickering.com
2. Click on "Student Connection"
3. Under "Find Your School" enter 100106 as your Policy Number
4. Once at the UMass Amherst web page, click on the tab "Waive"
PLEASE NOTE: Part-time students as defined by the university may voluntarily enroll themselves through UHS. Enrollment is not automatic. Newly registered part-time students must take action to enroll themselves by the published deadline.
*If you waived the Student Health Insurance Plan in the Fall, your plan will automatically be waived for the Spring 2005 semester. You do not need to submit a new waiver request.
UNIVERSITY HEALTH SERVICES
ENROLLMENT DEPARTMENT • 413.577.5192
No Stamps! No Envelopes! Online completion of requests at other sources of completion.

EXTROVERTS WANTED UMASS AMHERST IS IN SEARCH OF
TOUR GUIDES
1 Lead campus tours for students and families interested in the UMass Amherst Campus.
2 Paid hourly position with a minimum commitment of 5 hours a week including some weekends.
3 Serve as panel speakers, hosts, and tour leaders at on and off campus yield activities such as Open Houses and College Fairs.
4 Conduct informational interviews with prospective students and their families.
UMASS AMHERST
To find out more about the position or to pick up an application visit us at the Campus Center Concourse from January 31st-February 4th. Applications are also available at the Visitors Center. Application deadline is February 4th, 2005

Anderson out for the season

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

Tough times have fallen upon the Massachusetts hockey team of late. The Minutemen haven't won a game in over a month, and haven't won a Hockey East contest in nearly two.

And now it looks like they have lost Matt Anderson for the remainder of the season.

Anderson, who was the team's leading point-scorer before breaking his right ankle against New Hampshire on Dec. 9, said after UMass' 6-0 loss to Boston College on Friday night that the broken bone hasn't recovered according to plan.

"I'll be getting my cast off sometime this week, hopefully, depending on how my bone is healing," Anderson said. "It's not healing properly at the time. I'll be in an air cast for another two weeks after [getting my hard cast off], and I'm going to be starting my rehab in about another three weeks.

"It doesn't look like I'll return at the end of the season. It looks like it's going to be a long shot at this point in time. There's not much I can really do about it. I drank my milk and tried my hardest, but it's just not coming along as expected."

Originally, the best-case scenario for his recovery time was eight weeks, which would have brought him back on Feb. 11, fittingly enough, at the Whittemore Center in Durham.

But with only about five weeks left in the regular season, time isn't on Anderson's side, especially with the setback.

Anderson was an integral part of the Mass Attack's offense, scoring seven goals and dishing out 13 assists, during his return to the lineup after missing all of last year with a shoulder injury.

Courtesy UMass Media Relations

Sophomore foward Matt Anderson has seven goals and 13 assists on the season. Anderson will miss the rest of the season with a leg injury.

Fresh Faces

The freshman class hasn't disappointed this season. Coming off their best postseason run since joining Hockey East, the Minutemen were going to really need contributions from their newcomers after losing Thomas Pock, Nick Kuiper and Greg Mauldin to the NHL.

Forwards P.J. Fenton (10 goals-nine assists-19 points), Matt Burto (5-3-8) and Dan Gordon (0-4-4) along with defenseman David Leaderer (4-7-11) have all shown great potential as the future of Minuteman hockey, and there is another one waiting in the wings.

Goaltender Jamie Gilbert made his second career appearance in net against Boston College on Friday night at Kelley Rink.

He relieved Tim Warner at the start of the third period and made four saves while letting up one goal.

"Other than the first goal, I thought he hung in there and battled and made a couple of good saves," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "I think that is a good baptism for him."

Gilbert's collegiate debut came on Nov. 5 during UMass' 8-2 victory over Merrimack at the Mullins Center. He made two saves in 4:47 of work that night.

First Line of Defense

Marvin Degon is having another stellar year as UMass' top defenseman.

The All-America and Hockey East Defenseman of the Year candidate is near the top of a couple national statistical categories.

His eight goals and six power play goals rank him second in the nation among defensemen.

It's Miller time against UMass

With the game well in hand for the Eagles on Friday night, the Conte Forum crowd began chanting for no apparent cause.

It was 6-0 halfway through the third period, and nothing unusual seemed to be happening, making the crowd chants completely impossible to understand.

But during a timeout to prepare for a faceoff, senior goalie Robbie Miller skated onto the ice to replace Matti Kaltiainen, and the crowd erupted with a clearer chant of "Robbie!"

Miller has been on the roster for four years, but he has never started a game. In fact, Friday night's 6:54 cameo marked just his third career appearance, and ironically, they have all come at Conte Forum during BC victories over the Minutemen.

He made four saves on Jan. 31, 2003, one save on Feb. 14, 2004, and three saves on Friday night.

Miller has never given up a goal in his collegiate career, but his playing days might be over, as the Minutemen aren't scheduled to return to Conte Forum for the rest of the year.

UMass fans need to suck it up and watch championship? An NIT run certainly looks feasible, ditto A-10 tourney.

MARZELLI from page 10

So seriously, what is it that you want before you'll finally quit pissing and moaning, shut up and support the school – YOUR school - that needs loyalty in any way shape or form it can get? The hell with the fact that you don't like the coach, you don't think the players are playing hard or whatever ridiculous, jaded and bitter reason you come up with you justify your non-support. The Minutemen played a crucial game with Richmond over the weekend, and after my colleague at this paper called out the fan base to show up in support, no one did. The student sections were empty, the sparse crowd made no noise and on the same day, Rutgers drew 8,000 fans to the RAC to watch them fall to 1-6 in conference play. Awesome.

But hey, just do what you do and keep on keepin' on. Whine, cry, complain, threaten to stop contributing to the alumni fund, stay as far away from the Mullins Center as possible, write letters to John McCutcheon calling for a new coach, post this article online and call me a "hack" or just yearn for the good old days when it wasn't so hard and emotional and time consuming to be a UMass fan, I don't care. In the end, you are letting your school down, and you should be ashamed of that, regardless of any circumstances you may create in your mind to justify it.

There are eight games left in the season, and it looks like the Minutemen will once again be forced to go forward without the support they deserve – 15 players and six coaches against the world. But in the end I know of two Collegian boys who are planning on loving every last game for the simple, direct and honest reason that the team playing wears UMASS on its chest – a reason that's always been good enough for me.

Mike Marzelli is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at Marzelli@DailyCollegian.com.

B.C. topples UMass

HOCKEY from page 10

the right shoulder of Warner to make it 2-0.

The backhander has gone the way of the dinosaurs," York said. "For him to do that, it just shot me back on the bench. You just don't see it. [Having] the skill level to do that, that's roofing a backhander. Wow."

The Eagles earned a three-goal advantage when Pat Gannon scored his first career goal. With heavy traffic in front of the net, Chris Collins sent a shot towards the goal that was deflected in front of Warner. As Warner scrambled to position himself, Gannon was able to knock the puck past the diving UMass goaltender at the 9:41 mark in the second period.

UMass wasn't able to recover from that goal, and just 42 seconds later, Ryan Murphy centered a pass to Eaves, who flaunted his scoring ability again by sniping a 40-footer over Warner's shoulder, making the score 4-0 and virtually ending the contest.

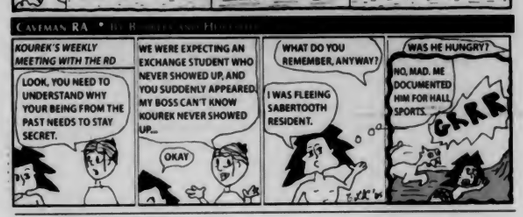
"It seems like when we get behind by a few goals, we become very disorganized, and that is our biggest struggle right now," Cahoon said.

Stephen Gionta added his fifth goal of the season to give the Eagles a five-goal advantage in the second period, and the five goals was the most BC has scored through 40 minutes all season.

The Minutemen will take the ice next at Northeastern on Thursday night at 7:00 p.m.

Natural, Healthy, and Smart!
Dr. Lee Kane
Chiropractic Physician
Participating provider for student insurance, BC, automobile insurance & most others.
Amherst Family Chiropractic
Center for Natural Health
Tri Town Sq. • Amherst
549-1500

Rent One of Ours
No additional fee for 21-25 year old drivers
• Cars
• Passenger Vans
• Trucks
• Direct Billing to Insurance Companies
• Free Local Pick Up
• Locally Owned and Operated
549-RENT (7368)
POTTERS
at North Amherst Motors
Collision Repair Center
On Bus Route • One Mile North of UMass



BUY YOUR TEXTBOOKS AT HALF.COM
AND SAVE UP TO 40% OFF* THE LIST PRICE.
How great is this? Find great savings on new or used textbooks you need this semester. Go to half.com and enter the titles or ISBN numbers. That's it!
Save an additional $5
on a purchase of $50 or more.
Redeem this coupon by entering this code:
AMHERST2005
at half.com
For a limited time, first-time buyers only. See conditions below.
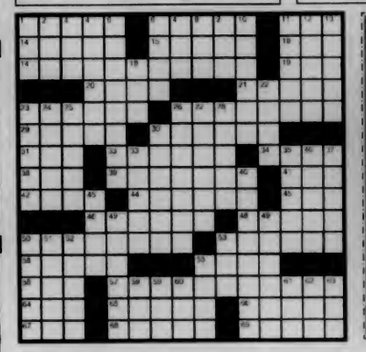
half.com™ by ebay
*Claim based on comparison of average selling price (excluding shipping and handling) for top 10% of textbooks (by unit volume) sold on Half.com from August 1st-September 11, 2004 and listed as "brand new" by the seller, with list price for same title. Textbooks are defined as undergraduate and graduate textbooks and exclude reference books and novels/literature.
Offer valid for $5 off a purchase of $50 or more at Half.com only. Offer valid for first time buyers only. Order value must be a minimum of $50.00 before the discount is applied and does not include shipping, handling, taxes or insurance. This coupon cannot be combined with any other coupon, discount, gift certificate, or promotion. Any potential refund will not include the coupon or its redemption value. Void where prohibited. Open only to U.S. residents 18 years of age or older. Promotion subject to change without notice. Offer expires on March 31, 2005 at 11:59:59 EST.
© 2004 eBay Inc.

Quote of the Day

"Hollywood is a place where they'll pay you a thousand dollars for a kiss and fifty cents for your soul."



-Marilyn Monroe

ACROSS
1 Barbie and Ken, e.g.
6 Buckle
11 Insane wonder
14 Heap of Dickens
15 Book before Joel
16 Arthur or Lillie
17 Casual party
19 Horse's relative
20 At any time
21 Personal preference
23 Perceived
26 Lacking notoriety
29 Muse of verse
30 Nosey insect
31 Burns poem: "O Sharter"
32 Spanish dictator
34 Beat it!
38 Play for a fool
39 Epee wielders
41 "___ Town"
42 Chilean cash
44 Cultural
45 Citrus cooler
46 Pickpocket's pick
48 Citrus fruits
50 Emphasizes
53 Wave tops
54 Total number
55 Remove rind
56 Suitable
57 Being a typical example of
64 Not judge's call
65 Fido's friend
66 Spine-tingling
67 Lacking moisture
68 T-bone or strip
69 Hang in loose folds

DOWN
1 Used spades
2 Product of mine
3 Ignited
4 Most up-to-date
5 Hit the road
6 Mask: stair
7 Plat section
8 Volcanic dust
9 Told you so!
10 Separated
11 Take down a peg
12 Adam and Benjamin
13 Slackens
18 H.S. dropout's second chance
22 Lamenter's comment
23 Arrange
24 Wipe from memory
25 Tides
26 Family of seed-eating birds
27 Language variation
28 Native New Zealander
30 Saddle part
33 Film spools
35 Embers
36 Ledger examination
37 Lack of hair
40 Scampered
43 Writer Wister
47 Daisylike flowers
49 Old coot
50 Burn with hot liquid
51 Sot
52 Full of fussers
53 Eccentric wheel
55 Swine meat
58 Quantity of gold
59 Now ___ seen everything!
60 Herbal drink
61 Personal pension $
62 Bike
63 Holy smoke!

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

UMASS YOGA
Starts January 31st
Monday/Wednesday
12:30 – 1:45 pm Power Yoga (1-3)
2:00 – 3:15 pm Restorative (1-2)
Tuesday/Thursday
1:00 – 2:15 pm Yoga Basics (1-2)
2:30 – 3:45 pm Intermediate (2-3)
4:00 – 5:15 pm Yoga Basics (1-2)
TAI CHI
Starts February 8
Tuesdays 7:30 – 8:30 pm
*ENROLL BY JAN. 31 AND SAVE !!!
TO REGISTER
Campus Recreation, Boyden 215
413-545-0822
www.umass.edu/umim

Want to take your Business to New Heights.....
Advertise with Us
The Daily Collegian

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Perhaps you should throw away that meat that has been hanging around for a while.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Remember to do introductions today. It seems to have slipped your mind a lot lately.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Right now, someone is thinking exactly the same thing you're thinking.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Your dream last night pertains to something you have been worried about.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Today is the perfect day to write a letter. A good, old-fashioned letter.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
That new bruise of yours resembles Mr. Potato Head.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Today someone new is going to im you. Of course it could just be a porn pop-up too.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Don't worry about that big zit on your face. It's not as apparent as you think it is.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
The zipper on your bag is broken and this could cause you some difficulty.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Good thing you were paying attention for a few minutes today.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Never limit yourself to half of anything, especially a nice, big cookie.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You might have lost something cool in the snow this weekend.

Don't let your business get swept away by waves of competition
Advertise with the Collegian
545-3500

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Apartment for Rent

Amherst two bedroom condo on busline $75+. Call Paul 413-687-1416

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms; hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Auto for Sale

1994 Geo Prism Runs Well 123K Bluebook $1430.- Asking $1150.- 413-323-7682

Auto for Sale

1998 Pontiac Grand Prix 68,000K New Tires Excellent Condition $5000.00 256-3756

Childcare

Early Riser Needed 7:00am to 8:15pm 2 to 4 days a week. Occasional afternoon and Evenings. For 8yr old girl. $10.00 an hr. Please call 584-8312 maria.gallo@umassmed.edu

Employment

Top Boys Sports Camp in Maine! Play + coach sports Have Fun Make $$$ Camp Counselors Positions available Summer 2005 Apply Online www.campcobbossee.com or call 1-800-473-6104

Employment

Prestigious Trail's End Camp- Pennsylvania Summer Camp – Guaranteed Experience of a Lifetime; Limited openings for Sports Specialists, Crafts Specialists, Waterfront Counselors (Lake and Pool) and General Counselors; June 19th – August 14th – Gain practical experience working with kids. www.trailsendcamp jobs.com

Top Boys Sports Camp in Maine! Play & Coach Sports * Have Fun * Make $$$ Camp Counselors Positions Available Summer 2005 Apply Online www.campcobbossee.com or call 1-800-473-6104

Employment

Zear Outdoor is seeking applications for 2005 Seasonal raft guides. No experience necessary, will train (weekends in Feb-March). A positive Customer Service attitude and knowledge of outdoor recreation a plus. Application deadline: Feb 8th call 413-339-4010 or see www.Zearoutdoor.com/jobs.htm EOE

Companion for elder wanted, weekends and part-time. Cheerful and light-hearted a PLUS! $10/hr, 413-268-0051

JV Lacrosse Coach Amherst it's mid March to early June Playing experience required coaching experience preferred PJ Position Roger Jones 549-3983

Employment

Drivers & Kitchen Help Wanted. Must be able to work 20hrs A week. Apply at DP Dough, Amherst.

"Bartending" $300/Day Potential. No Experience Nesc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Entertainment

DJ for Hire Mission 101 Ent. Contact Fredi at 413-687-3849

Roommate Wanted

Roommate Wanted Preferrably Girl Brandywine Apts. 495.00 a month + utilities Heat & Hotwater included Call Jess at 413-281-8097

Female Puffton 1 Room $400.00 Negs. 617-921-7740

Services

Need Just Evacuation and Repatriation Coverage? Check out BETA! $250,000 Evacuation, $25,000 Repatriation COST is $18 for 6 MONTHS! Online enrollment, emailed verification of coverage www.betins.com

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house Certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

Travel

Spring Break 2005 Only 6 weeks left! Lowest Prices Biggest Parties Earn 2 Free Trips Exclusive with Sun Splash Tours www.sunsplashtours.com 1800-426-7710

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $499! Award Winning Company! SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, & Florida! Best Parties, Best Hotels, Best Prices! Limited Space! 1-800-234-7007 www.endlesssummertours.com

Travel

SPRING BREAK '05
SAVE $100 PER ROOM
Clip & Send or Use Code: PRMMI - Online
1-800-426-7710

Wanted

Screen/Script writers needed for local Film Company. Fifthowner@hotmail.com

Snowboard events intern $50/day stipend. For job description email jfriends@dever-field.edu

Want to place an ad in the Collegian? Call our business department: 545-3500

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, JANUARY 31, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Minutemen fall short to Spiders

UMass folds in clutch situation

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball (10-8, 4-4 A-10) team had seen this all before.

With under a minute left on Saturday afternoon, the Minutemen trailed visiting Atlantic 10 rival Richmond (9-9, 4-3 A-10) 65-63 and were given several chances to either tie or win the game. However, ineptitude from the line, a missed layup, and a blown play thwarted any comeback. UMass ended up losing the game 67-63.

Richmond	67
UMass	63

"That was the first time we found ourselves in that position and didn't come through," UMass coach Steve Lappas said. "We couldn't get a defensive stop when we needed one, and a couple of plays in the last minute made the difference."

The loss was the first time the Maroon and White dropped a game within five points all season. Previous to Saturday, UMass had gone 7-0 in close games but against Richmond, everything fell apart at the wrong time.

With 42.2 seconds remaining in the game and the Spiders leading 65-63, senior guard Anthony Anderson was fouled on a three-point attempt. Anderson, who is 76.2 from the line this year, proceeded to miss all three shots. Maurice Maxwell, who scored a team-high 18 points in the contest, grabbed an offensive rebound but missed the ensuing layup.

The Minutemen were able to stop Richmond's next offensive possession, but lacked a timeout to slow the pace and call a play. Sophomore swingman Artic Bowers received the ball, drove to within five feet of the three-point line, and jacked up a prayer with 10 seconds on the clock. The shot bounced harmlessly off the left side of the rim, where it was rebounded by Spider forward Jermaine Brucknor, who was immediately fouled.

Brucknor missed the first of a one-and-one attempt, but the rebound was tipped and Richmond point guard Daon Merritt reeled in the ball and was fouled. Merritt made both of his free throws, putting the game just out of reach with a mere five seconds to go.

"My first thought was, why did I ever attempt to do this for a living. You have no control over anything in your life," Richmond coach Jerry Wainwright said. "The big play for us was the tip-out. It ran time and gave us a chance to get up by four."

From the get-go, it appeared that UMass had complete control over the game. Right after a quick defensive stop, Rashaun Freeman caught a lob pass and jammed home the first points of the game. For the next 10 minutes, the Minutemen controlled the tempo, fueled by their inside force.

UMass jumped out to a quick 14-4 lead with Freeman netting all eight points he would have in the game. However, in the midst of the run, Freeman picked up two fouls that caused Lappas to bench him for the rest of the half.

Sophomore foward Rashaun Freeman dunks the first points of the game against Richmond on Saturday. Freeman scored eight of the Minutemen's 14 first points, his only eight points of the game.

Maxwell hit a three with 10:07 left in the half, putting the Minutemen up 22-11, but this shot would be the last offensive spark UMass would see until senior point guard Chris Chadwick hit a layup with 2:32 left in the half.

During this scoring hiatus, the Spiders went on a 19-0 scoring spree and capitalized on the absence of Freeman's inside presence.

"He's (Freeman) is very difficult to guard, we usually double-team him," Wainwright said. "It helped us get back in the game when he got his second foul, it gave us a little bit of a better match up."

The Spiders would jump out to 33-26 lead at the half.

In the second half, Richmond extended he lead to 12 before UMass started chipping away. With 8:34 left in the game Maxwell went coast-to-coast and delivered an explosive dunk to bring the Minutemen within four.

UMass could not complete the comeback as Jamaal Scott paced the Richmond offense with 19 points while grabbing seven boards.

Notes: The Minutemen added transfer Dante Milligan from the University of Pittsburgh on Saturday. Milligan is a 6'8 forward from New York, N.Y. and sat on the bench with the Maroon and White during Saturday's game.

Fan base needs a reality check

Mike Marzelli

As a sports writer for this fine publication, I've covered Massachusetts men's basketball for two seasons now and have enjoyed every second of it. I've seen good games and bad games, monumental wins and soul-sucking losses and everything you could possibly imagine in between.

My current beat partner and I have left for Washington D.C. at 3 A.M., returned from Olean, N.Y. at 6 A.M., flew to Miami without sleeping and split the cost of the entire trip out of our own pockets each time. Why? Because in the end we are fans of the game, enjoy the team and its coach and ultimately, above all else, love our school. So with that in mind, I've decided it's time for an agonizing reappraisal of this UMass basketball situation.

I'm exposed to rampant criticism of the current state of the Minutemen almost every day. Whether it's coming from another media outlet, a fellow student, a disgruntled alum or an anonymous no-name on a fan message board, the message is always loud and clear: "UMass basketball sucks!" or "fire Steve Lappas!"

So now, I'm here to turn the tables and to set the record straight. The Minutemen do not suck and, believe it or not, neither does Steve Lappas. Those who suck are the so-called "fans and supporters" who wouldn't know maroon and white from orange and purple, and couldn't find their way to the Mullins Center if it was connected to their living room. Every single one of you should be ashamed of yourselves, and there is no doubt in my mind that you know who you are. You have truly evolved into the fellowship of the miserable, and it's never been more clear that UMass would be better off without you.

To be quite honest, there is just no excuse for the blatant fair-weather fans that infest this university. You might as well become Yankees fans, but in reality you probably already are. For the last two seasons the Minutemen haven't given you, the card-carrying members of the so-called "UMass fanbase" a reason to watch them, and I will not dispute that.

But from the very outset, this season has been different, and in the end it still hasn't made a difference. You wanted a winning team? Well, you got one. You wanted good players? You got a bunch of them, including the potential Atlantic 10 Player of the Year. A marquee win? You were probably there, trying to get on television, so you saw it. A chance at postseason and a shot at the A-10

See MARZELLI on page 8

Eagles crush Minutemen

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

CHESTNUT HILL – The difference between the two teams was obvious. On paper, there weren't many similarities between the Massachusetts hockey team and No. 1 Boston College Eagles.

The Minutemen (10-15-2, 4-10-2 Hockey East) entered the contest riding a five-game winless streak, and they hadn't won a Hockey East game since their Dec. 3 3-2 victory over Providence.

B.C.	6
UMass	0

The Eagles (17-3-4, 11-1-4 HEA) rolled into Kelley Rink on Friday without a loss of any kind since a 3-2 defeat from the hands of cross-town rival Boston University on Dec. 3, and were flying high after their 5-2 win in Amherst the night before.

So when the 60 minutes of hockey were over, and Boston College sent the Minutemen back across the state as 6-0 losers, it didn't seem to be much of a surprise.

"We didn't play as well tonight as we did [Thursday] night," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "We got a little bit disorganized as a result of their pressure and as a result of falling behind."

Still, there were a couple positive reasons of optimism for the Minutemen before the puck was dropped.

Ryan Shannon, the Eagles' second-leading scorer, was out of the lineup after injuring his right ankle during the first period of the game on Thursday, and Matti Kaltiainen, the only Boston College netminder with a loss this season, would start in goal instead of Cory Schneider, who registered the win at the Mullins Center.

Obi Aduba has a goal and an assist this year for the Minutemen. Aduba and the Minutemen lost 6-0 to Boston College on Friday.

But Kaltiainen, a 2001 fourth-round Boston Bruins draft pick, picked up where Schneider left off and made 19 saves in just over 53 minutes of work before being relieved by crowd-favorite Robbie Miller.

That summed up the night in a nutshell.

BC won with a complete team effort that was held in tact by a flurry of individual talent. The Eagles showcased that they can score at anytime, from anywhere and however they want.

"We've been playing well all year, but tonight the puck went in," a humble Boston College coach Jerry York said. "Earlier in the season, we had 50 shots and a 3-3 tie. I think this time, we just had some puck luck."

The scoring started when Patrick Eaves brought the puck from behind the Massachusetts net and centered it to Dave Spina, who beat goalie Tim Warner by knocking the puck home in the top-right corner of the net at 16:28 of the first period.

After the competitive opening frame, though, the Eagles broke the game wide open in the second by scoring four goals on only 11 shots.

None of those goals were more impressive – in the game and perhaps the entire season – than when Eaves skated with the puck across the blue line down the left side and backhanded a tough-angle shot past

See HOCKEY on page 8

Tough trip for UMass

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Be it poor shooting from the field or tough crowds the Massachusetts women's basketball team traveled to the ends of the state of New York and came up empty-handed.

Despite coming away with nearly nothing to show for their seemingly endless hours on the road—and now falling below .500 in the Atlantic 10 East division—the Minutewomen (11-9, 4-5 A-10) certainly haven't fallen apart. Although they sport a losing record in their conference, the Maroon and White are still in second place in the A-10 East. However, their chances of catching Temple (17-3, 9-0 A-10) in the East are slim.

SBU	49
UMass	35

The dreaded turnover statistic came back to haunt UMass this weekend, as they committed a total of 50 turnovers over the two-game span. Together, St. Bonaventure and Fordham have a combined record of 14-27, yet the Minutewomen were out-scored by a combined 93-79. That, coupled with the fact that they shot a mere 29 percent from the field over the two outings, made for a rough weekend altogether for the Minutewomen.

But how they dealt with the ball within the confines of the court wasn't the only concern, at least in last Friday's affair, as the Minutewomen were part of yet another game with a "Field Trip Day" billing, this one taking place in Olean, N.Y.

One has to throw out the record books when in in Olean, home to some of the noisiest fans in the northeast. Friday's matchup against the St. Bonaventure Bonnies (8-12, 3-6 A-10) was no exception.

The shrills of the schoolchildren in the stands helped the Reilly Center reach a new attendance record for a women's basketball game at 1,741. While it may be debated what impact the crowd had on how well the teams performed, what cannot be argued is the offensive performance of the Minutewomen—they had their lowest point total since 2001.

Hot-handed guard Stefanie Collins caught fire from beyond the arc, nine of her 11 points coming from three-point land, in the Bonnies' 49-35 upset of the Minutewomen.

Forward Tory Vyborny presented problems for UMass down low, achieving a double-double with a game-high 17 points and 11 rebounds. Tamara Tatham led the Minutewomen with 11 points.

Fordham	54
UMass	44

UMass tied a season-low for points scored in one half when they headed into the half trailing 20-14. While the Minutewomen had overcome larger deficits this season, they were unable to bounce back in the second half. The Bonnies went on a 13-2 run over the first three minutes of the second, putting them ahead 33-16, and never looked back following the stretch.

Whatever skills the Minutewomen used in their successful win over Fordham two weeks ago weren't enough to complete the season sweep of the Rams (6-15, 2-6 A-10) on their home court yesterday, as they fell victim to yet another double-digit loss, a 54-44 loss to the Rams.

Monica Mack led the scoring on the day with 15 points, including eight of ten from the free throw line. Jada Jefferson (14 points) and Jade Leitao (11) rounded out the double-digit scoring for Fordham, while Katie Nelson led the Minutewomen with 10.

The Rams got after UMass early, embarking on a 19-0 run midway through the first half to put the score at 23-5.

Point guard Monique Govan had a steal and a rebound against Fordham last night. UMass dropped two in New York over the weekend.

FEBRUARY

Student Union Gallery hosts art fundraiser

ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 4

TUESDAY	WEDNESDAY	THURSDAY
• High: 17° • Low: 11	• High: 37° • Low: 8°	• High: 35° • Low: 21°

DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

The best athlete that nobody knows about

SPORTS, PAGE 12

The Daily Collegian

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 2005 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXV ISSUE 70

UMass student reflects on living with a seeing-eye dog

BY KIMBERLY SEYMOUR
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With curly blonde hair, clear blue eyes and standing 5-feet 4-inches, Kristina Constant is what some might call an all-American girl. A 22-year-old junior attending the University of Massachusetts, she awakes each morning to another day full of classes and assignments. The only difference being when Kristina opens her eyes, she cannot distinguish the numbers on her alarm clock or glance around to see where she tossed her keys the night before.

At the age of eight, doctors diagnosed Kristina with retinitis pigmentosa, a degenerative eye disease. The disorder is more commonly known as rod-cone dystrophy, because it more accurately describes what is happening in the early stages of the disease. Most people affected with rod-cone dystrophy are night blind by age nine and legally blind by the age of 15. The disorder is a symptom of a larger illness known as Laurence-Moon Bardet-Biedl Syndrome. The disease involves many other problems, some of which Kristina is personally dealing with each day.

One of the associated troubles with Laurence-Moon Bardet-Biedl Syndrome involves an irregular kidney contour, which is a consequence of the failure of the fetal kidney to develop normally. Right now, Constant is being monitored, in the future she may need a kidney transplant. Also, one of the ways doctors combat rod-cone dystrophy is with Vitamin A. Unfortunately, too much Vitamin A in the system can create severe liver problems, even lead to liver failure.

"I had to choose between my liver and my eye sight and I chose to lose my vision," Kristina said.

Having come from a close family, she found a lot of support within her home. Kristina is from South Hadley, where she lives with her mother Carol, father Rick and younger sister Virginia. 14. Carol, 49, works at the Wistariahurst Museum in Holyoke while 58-year-old Rick is a building contractor and chairman of the Board of Selectmen for their town.

Sarah Swords of Princeton walks with her seeing-eye dog last fall. A blind UMass student, Kristina Constant, also relies on a seeing-eye dog to get around campus.

Rick Constant said like any parent, upon discovering Kristina's disability, he and Carol worried about whether or not she would be able to adapt to both the physical and social changes that lay ahead.

"She's had her tough times," said Rick. "I mean, it was hard for her to begin using her cane because she just wanted to be like everyone else. She would trip and things haven't always been easy. In high school she would drop a pencil and have trouble finding it, with kids making jokes saying "it's over there" while just pointing, knowing she couldn't see where."

Looking back at her life before coming to college, she said the most difficult time she has had was at South Hadley High School.

"I could see more, but [actually] high school was probably the worst years of my life," she said. "Most people wouldn't talk to me. I basically had very few friends because I was blind."

In most ways, Kristina is like anyone else. Expertly knowing the interior of her house, she can freely walk without her cane just as well as someone with their vision. Her sister Virginia is particularly helpful. If Kristina can't find a shoe or needs something to be read aloud to her, she is always accommodating.

Kristina also had an older sister named Kelly who carried Laurence-Moon Bardet-Biedl Syndrome. Tragically, at the age of 10, Kelly went into surgery for an unrelated problem and was given the wrong dosage of medication, going into cardiac arrest and passing away. At the time of her death, she already had kidney disease and a much more serious case of the syndrome than Kristina does today. Kristina was only seven at the time.

When Kristina was 18, her family discovered something was seriously wrong beyond her current diagnoses.

"It took me three hours one day to read one chapter of a book," she said. "My parents took me to an eye doctor and he did all of these tests, we found out I had less than five degrees of peripheral vision, so I couldn't even see a whole word at one time."

At that time, Kristina began doing what many would consider unthinkable, she began preparing to go blind. At the young age of eight, after the discovery of retinitis pigmentosa, she began to learn Braille, knowing she would lose all of her vision in the future. At 18, she applied for a guide dog from Fidelco, a seeing-eye dog school located in Bloomfield, Connecticut. The only guide school in New England, Fidelco is a non-profit organization that raises and trains German Shepard guide dogs to assist blind men and women. Originally founded in 1960, it started as the Fidelco Breeder's Foundation, donating dogs to other guide schools. In 1981, the owners began to train the dogs as well.

The school is known for having created its own breed of German Shepards, who are particularly suited by physical structure and temperament for the work that they do. Fidelco is a pioneer organization in the way they train the dogs, using a home-based training program. This means that instead of training the dogs at Fidelco, and then giving them to the new owner, the dogs are brought to the location where they will live and be working in the future and taught on site. Ultimately, the dog's work is incredibly important because the owner's lives are in their hands when critical day to day decisions, like crossing a street, need to be made. No dog is placed with an owner until the trainer trusts the dog to guide them while blindfolded on location.

After the training is complete, the dogs are then placed with a foster family for about six months. The family will teach them to be sociable and to deal with all environmental situations. At the conclusion of the training, the dog is then returned to Fidelco to work with a guide dog trainer at the facility for another three weeks before being placed with a new owner.

Kristina attended UMass, living on campus and using a cane, for three months before she was assigned her first dog. Liam, a German Shepard, became Kristina's eyes. Unfortunately after six months, he was diagnosed with stress related colitis and could no longer function working at a place like the university. He was reassigned to assist an elderly gentleman back in Connecticut.

See KRISTINA on page 3

UMass says male birth control pill underway

BY MARK JEWELL
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON – A Norwegian company seeking to develop a male birth control pill has signed a licensing agreement with the University of Massachusetts Medical School covering research that could lead to a drug to block sperm's ability to swim and fertilize an egg.

The method that led to the long-term deal announced Monday could expand the decades-long search for a male pill by targeting a protein found only in sperm cells.

Researchers at UMass in Worcester and elsewhere say that approach carries far less risk of side effects than manipulating a man's hormones, the avenue that has attracted the most research aimed at finding alternatives to condoms and vasectomies.

"You wouldn't think there would be side effects because there is no other place in the body where these specific proteins are formed," said Dr. Louis De Paolo, associate chief of the National Institute of Child Health and Human Development, an arm of the National Institutes of Health that has funded male contraception research. "They could make very useful targets for regulating fertility."

Terms of the deal with Oslo-based SpermaTech AS aimed at developing a drug based on the UMass-patented contraception approach were not disclosed.

"We are all very excited about this effort, because the contraceptive pills now available are based on hormones, which float around in the body and have significant side effects elsewhere," said Bjorn Steen Skalhegg, who helped found the Norwegian company in 2001.

Risks from hormone therapy include harming the prostate gland and permanently reversing sperm production.

SpermaTech said it is searching for a molecular compound to block the so-called Cs protein, and is meeting with large drug companies to find a development partner.

Such a drug potentially could take the form of a pill, implant, patch or gel, and take as long as a decade to develop, De Paolo said.

"The challenge will be to come up with

See CONTRACEPTIVES on page 4

Philosophy gets outstanding marks

BY JEN GORSON
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Graduate Philosophy program at University of Massachusetts recently received outstanding marks on an influential survey of graduate philosophy programs.

The Philosophy Gourmet Report, similar to a US News and World Report based exclusively on Philosophy, gave the graduate philosophy program at UMass a spot among universities such as Stanford, Harvard and Yale.

The Gourmet Report is an important service for students considering a graduate program in philosophy. The report not only gives general rankings, but also breaks down the quality of specific fields.

When prospective graduate students are weighing their options, high ratings in a certain area could lead them to choose one program over another school with an overall higher ranking.

The Gourmet Report publishes a survey every two years of the graduate philosophy programs throughout the English-speaking world. The names of philosophy faculty are first sent out in a list. Eminent professional philosophers are then asked to rank the faculty members on a five-point scale, without knowing which university they are affiliated with. The faculty rankings determine the survey's rank of each program. This year, 266 distinguished philosophers completed the survey. UMass professors often participate in the evaluations.

Phillip Bricker, head of the department at UMass, admits the survey's methodology is a "mixed bag." When faculty are ranking their colleagues at universities frequently across the country, sometimes they go on hearsay rather than on their judgment of the philosopher's work.

"Reputations are being recorded, and they tend to reinforce impressions," Bricker said. "However, it's a small enough profession where most people know of one another."

Brian Leiter, editor of the Gourmet Report, seems to agree. "Students should not hesitate to ask departments they are considering to provide detailed and comprehensive information," he said on the survey's Web site. "As a prospective student, about to embark upon a multi-year investment, you are entitled to detailed information."

Nevertheless, the Gourmet Report is a decisive resource for philosophy students, and to be sure no one at UMass is complaining, the philosophy department ranked 27th out of 66 Ph.D. programs in the United States and 33rd out of 105 ranked programs in the English-speaking world. The report also placed UMass in the top ten to fifteen internationally in three specialty fields: metaphysics, epistemology and the history of early modern philosophy.

The high rankings are especially notable because the department has a remarkably small faculty relative to other schools; 12 philosophers in comparison to the usual twenty or more. Although, flying colors is nothing new for philosophy at UMass. "It's just a step or two up in the rankings from the last time they did it," said Bricker.

So what's the secret to the philosophy department's success? Bricker notes that the philosophy behind the philosophy program at UMass is to be selective.

"We tend to focus on core areas in analytic philosophy, such as metaphysics. Though we might offer a broad range of philosophy courses for undergrads, we don't employ a specialist for every field," Bricker said.

The philosophy department is currently hiring and hopes to continue to grow in both rankings and numbers in the coming years.

Bricker adds that another strength of the graduate program is that "we give a lot

See PHILOSOPHY on page 2

Prosecutors rest their case against priest

BY DENISE LAVOIE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAMBRIDGE, Mass – Prosecutors rested their child rape case against Paul Shanley on Monday after a former classmate of his accuser testified that the former priest and the boy left Sunday school classes together on several occasions.

Prosecutors have said Shanley, one of the most notorious figures in the clergy sex abuse scandal, would pull the boy from catechism classes at St. Jean's parish in Newton in order to rape him in the church confessional, pews, rectory and bathroom.

Brendan Moriarty, who attended CCD classes with Shanley's accuser in the 1980s, said several boys were frequently sent out of the classroom when they became rowdy, including Shanley's accuser. He said he recalled seeing Shanley and his accuser leaving the classroom together.

After prosecutors called their final witness, Judge Stephen Neel threw out one of the three child rape charges at the request of Shanley's attorney. That leaves him facing two counts of raping a child and two counts of indecent assault and battery on a child. The maximum sentence would be life in prison.

Shanley's lawyer, Frank Mondano, will begin presenting his case on Wednesday or Thursday. The judge said Mondano only plans to call one witness, Elizabeth Loftus, a well-known psychologist who has challenged the reliability of recovered memory.

Shanley's accuser, now a 27-year-old firefighter, says he remembered in early 2002 that he'd been repeatedly raped and molested by the former priest from 1983 to 1989 at St. Jean's. He says he recovered his memory after talking with Greg Ford, a close friend who also accused Shanley of raping him at St. Jean's in the 1980s.

Ford and two other alleged victims were dropped from the case by prosecutors before it went to trial, leaving just the one accuser to testify against the former priest.

Earlier Monday, a psychologist testified that it's "not common, but it's not at all rare," for adults who suffer trauma as children to repress memories of the experience.

Former Catholic priest Paul Shanley sits in court Nov. 2003 at a hearing for the investigation into child sex abuse charges against him.

Dr. James Chu, an associate professor at Harvard Medical School, said repressed memory is more common among people who suffered repeated trauma as children than in those who suffered a single traumatic event.

"It really is more this repeated trauma that tends to be forgotten by some mechanism," Chu said.

Under cross-examination by Shanley's lawyer, Frank Mondano, Chu acknowledged that there is an intense debate within the psychiatric community about the validity of repressed memories. He also conceded that false memories can be implanted in a person's mind through repeated suggestions by someone they trust.

Menino discusses Super Bowl plans

BOSTON (AP) — Mayor Tom Menino warned the city's colleges on Monday that the rowdiness that marred recent sports celebrations won't be tolerated on Super Bowl Sunday.

Menino met with representatives from 27 colleges and universities — including the presidents of Boston University, Northeastern University, Emerson College and Suffolk University. He urged them to clamp down on drinking and take swift action against students who cause trouble.

"We're giving them a strong message: zero tolerance," he said. "If they don't want to take consequences against their students, we'll find ways we can take consequences against the students."

Menino declined to say what action he would take. He's also sending letters to liquor stores, warning them against selling large quantities of alcohol to students.

Police Commissioner Kathleen M. O'Toole said officers will be out in force and coordinating with the Department of Corrections in case there are mass arrests. She said the security plan will be similar to one used during the final game of the World Series.

One weapon police won't be carrying is the pepper pellet gun that caused the death of 21-year-old Emerson student Victoria Snelgrove after the Red Sox's American League pennant victory against the New York Yankees.

O'Toole said police will have other options, including pepper spray or gas canisters.

"We certainly don't want to leave officers with guns only or sticks only," she said. "We always look to use the least force available to us."

John McLaughlin, chief of police at Fisher College in downtown Boston, said the school is planning extra patrols. Northeastern and Boston universities are hosting alcohol-free game-night parties, raffling off electronics and other prizes to deter rowdiness.

-Associated Press

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief: Peter Foundas
Managing Editor: Mike Martelli
Business Manager: Rich Pacheco
Production Manager: Cory Rosenberg
News Supervisor: Meghan Healy
Advertising Manager: Tiffani Stupiński
Editorial Production: Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor: Michael Busack
Comics Editor: Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor: Yousef Mumayyer
News Editor: Erika Loxley
Photo Editor: Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor: Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager: Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising: Marty Pappus
Distribution Manager: Josh Kuggans
Finance Manager: Hitak Shah
Accounting Clerk: Virginie Frecaut
Human Resources: Sandra Marquez
Assistant Operations: Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising: Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business: Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance: Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production: Rachael Bruno
Graphics Artist: Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living: Matthew O'Rourke
Asst. Arts & Living: Chris Gazzara
Assistant Editorial: Allison Edles
Assistant News: Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News: Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo: Megan Bronster
Assistant Sports: Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian (USPS 325-340) is published Monday through Friday during the academic year, except during vacations and examination periods. The Collegian is published semi-weekly during the summer session. Periodicals postage paid at Amherst, MA 01002. Subscription rates are $40 per semester. The Collegian has been the College Media Association Pacemaker winner in 1974 and won the Hearst Corporation Pulitzer Prize competition in 1987. The Collegian has been awarded All-American honors since 1994. For advertising rates, see the information page. Offices are located in Room 113 of the Campus Center.

Production Crew
On staff today

Night Editor
Erika Loxley
Photo Technician
Megan Bronster
Copy Editor
Michael Busack
Production Supervisor
Samantha Nielsen
Production Staff
Nicholas Belanger, Matthew Reed

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Boston Judge says newspaper erred

By Tiffeo Emery
Associated Press

BOSTON – A judge suing the Boston Herald for libel testified Monday that he never said that a 14-year-old statutory rape victim must "get over it," and that he feared for his family's safety as the paper continued to publish articles.

Judge Ernest B. Murphy, 61, said in his testimony that the quote, attributed to him in a series of Herald stories in 2002, was "absolutely preposterous." The stories led to hate mail and death threats against his family.

Murphy, in his first extensive public remarks since suing the Herald and four of its reporters, denied that he said the girl was raped and explained that the statutory rape charge arose from sexual relations between the girl and her brother's older friend.

The disputed remarks took place in a closed-door meeting. Most of the brief meeting, he said, concerned a charge that would have resulted in the 17-year-old suspect being sent to prison for a minimum of five years; something Murphy objected to in the meeting and again publicly when he sentenced the teenager to probation instead.

Murphy testified that he was not callous toward the victim during the meeting, but rather expressed concern for her welfare and said it was a "terrible shame" that no counseling was available for her. He said there was nothing confrontational about the meeting.

The Herald attributed the quote to Murphy in a series portraying the judge as lenient toward defendants. The full quote – "She can't go through life as a victim. She's 14. She got raped. Tell her to get over it." – was widely reported across the country. David Wedge, the lead reporter on the story, discussed it on Fox News' "The O'Reilly Factor."

The newspaper has stood by its reporting.

Murphy said he was shocked and angered by the initial story in the Herald, saying "I didn't recognize myself" in the paper's description of him as lenient.

Murphy also angrily denied that he derided a 79-year-old robbery victim in an unrelated case, saying the comments he made – also in a private conference with lawyers – were "ripped from context" when they later appeared in the Herald. The trial judge, Charles Johnson, struck those words from the record after an objection from the Herald's lawyer.

When Murphy went on a Caribbean vacation with his wife and youngest daughters, he got word of more articles and a Howie Carr column blasting Murphy. The column prompted a posting in a Herald chat room suggesting that Murphy deserved to have his daughters raped.

Firefighters working at risk

BOSTON (AP) – Most firefighters who died fighting fires in recent years were working under substandard conditions - arriving too late and without enough help or resources, according to a Boston Globe analysis published Monday.

And most were entering burning buildings where there was no one inside to save.

The newspaper examined federal investigative reports from 52 fires around the country that killed 80 firefighters between 1997 and 2004.

The Globe found that in just 35 of the 52 fires, departments were able to get one firefighter to the scene within 6 minutes.

In 27 of the fires, four firefighters were able to get to the scene within 6 minutes, the minimum force recommended by the National Fire Protection Association.

The manpower standard for safe and effective work at a building fire - 15 firefighters arriving within 10 minutes - was met in only 18 of the fires.

In 14 of the 52 fires, there was a suspicion that someone might be inside the burning buildings. In only six of fires was there actually anyone inside.

The deaths studied did not include those from heart attacks or motor vehicle accidents. The incidents involved a mix of volunteer and career fire departments in cities like New York and Memphis, as well as small towns.

Some fire chiefs questioned whether they should stop sending firefighters into burning buildings if they can't there soon enough and with enough people to do the job safely.

"We're a can-do organization. We give it the old college try," said Chief Ronald J. Siarnicki, former chief in Prince George's County, Md., who keeps count of line-of-duty deaths as executive director of the National Fallen Firefighters Foundation.

"But maybe we need to stop accepting a five-person crew to cover an entire town. Maybe we need to say, 'We don't have the resources to do this job.' We're losing firefighters, and there are so many near misses," he told the Globe.

The number of fires in the United States has declined sharply, but the number of firefighter deaths are steady at about 100 per year, not including Sept. 11. More than half of those deaths were from heart attacks and motor vehicle accidents.

Each death is unique, but delays and low staffing add to the risk, said Vincent Dunn, a retired New York City deputy fire chief who examined the Globe's findings.

"The more firefighters you have, the faster you can put out the fire," he said. "Chances of a firefighter's death increase the longer a fire burns."

In Massachusetts, the firefighters' union estimates the state has lost about 1,000 out of 13,000 firefighters since 1981. That's when a state law took effect known as Proposition 2 1/2, which limits property tax increases.

During that time, the population has increased and departments have taken on added duties such as ambulance calls.

The number of full-time firefighters nationwide is essentially unchanged, but the volume of emergency calls has doubled.

Other hazards identified by the Globe include shortages of equipment, such as self-contained breathing apparatus, and use of risky tactics beyond the capacity of small departments.

Courtesy Ilja Kaplunt

Firefighters enter into a training exercise in France last year.

Dept. gets high marks

PHILOSOPHY from page 1

of attention to our students. We mentor them, and we have an excellent placement record."

Overall, this is promising news not only for the department, but for the reputation of the university as a whole.

"This recognition speaks highly of the university's commitment to supporting top-quality faculty and scholarship in philosophy," Bricker said. "We're very pleased to be ranked among the top philosophy programs in the country."

Iraq counting election ballots

By Jason Keyser
Associated Press

BAGHDAD – Iraq's interim leader called on his countrymen to set aside their differences Monday, while polling stations finished the first-phase count of millions of ballots from the weekend election that many Iraqis hope will usher in democracy and hasten the departure of 150,000 American troops.

From the counts by individual stations, local centers will prepare tally sheets and send them to Baghdad, where vote totals will be compiled, election Commission official Adel al-Lami said. Final results could take up to 10 days.

With turnout in the vote still unknown, concern was focused on participation by Iraq's Sunni Arab minority, amid fears that the group that drives the insurgency could grow ever more alienated. Electoral commission officials said turnout in hardline Sunni areas was better than some expected, though they cited no numbers. A U.S. diplomat warned that Sunni participation appeared "considerably lower" than that of other groups.

Guerrillas claimed to have shot down a British military C-130 Hercules transport plane that crashed north of Baghdad just after polls closed Sunday. Al-Jazeera aired an insurgent video showing a missile being fired and flaming wreckage purported to be that of the plane. No missile impact was shown, and the footage's authenticity could not be confirmed.

All 10 military personnel on the flight were missing and presumed dead – which would be Britain's heaviest single loss of life of the war – Defense Secretary Geoff Hoon said.

The video came from the "Green Brigade," a previously unknown arm of the the National Islamic Resistance in Iraq. Another group, Ansar al-Islam, issued a competing claim of responsibility. The British government would not comment on the insurgents' claims, saying the cause of the crash was still being

See ELECTIONS on page 3

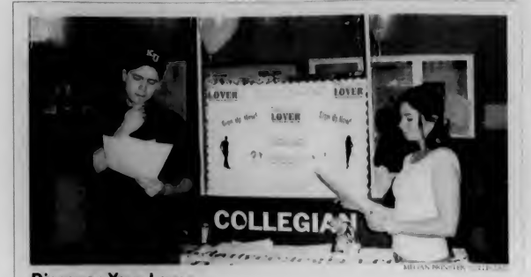
Courtesy Reuters

Iraqi police celebrate in Basra on Monday, a day after the country's elections, which occured successfully at most polling locations.

Want to Save Money on Textbooks?

We want that too! That's why we work with faculty to find the best values for your textbooks, offer many titles at discounted prices, and offer as many used books as we can. Check us out before spending your money somewhere else!



JEFFERY AMHERST
COLLEGE STORE
Downtown Amherst
Behind the Jeffery Amherst Bookshop
253.7816
textbooks@jeffbooks.com

JAN 22-FEB 6
8:30-8 MON-SAT
12-5 SUN

A Member of the Independent Association of College Stores

Dance Stuff
Starting a dance class?
Go to Dance Stuff for all your dancing needs
220 N. Pleasant Street
253.5201

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
NOW HIRING
WebMaster
The Collegian is looking for someone to maintain its website. If you have any experience with HTML, online advertising or web design apply now!
Freshman and sophomores strongly encouraged to apply
All applicants should call:
(413)-545-3500
Ask For Rich

Megan Bronster – Collegian

Discover Your Lover

Michael Meekin and Rachel Bruno of the Daily Collegian watch over the paper's "Discover Your Lover" table in the Campus Center Concourse yesterday. Three men and three women who sign up for the contest will be chosen for a free date by Collegian readers on Feb. 8.

Election results on the way

ELECTIONS from page 2

investigated.

In his first news conference since the elections, Iraqi interim Prime Minister Ayad Allawi called on Iraqis to join together to build a society shattered by decades of war, tyranny, economic sanctions and military occupation.

"The terrorists now know that they cannot win," he said. "We are entering a new era of our history and all Iraqis – whether they voted or not – should stand side by side to build their future." He promised to work to ensure that "the voice of all Iraqis is present in the coming government."

Three U.S. Marines were killed in fighting south of Baghdad on Monday, after two Marines were killed on election day. At least 44 people were killed in violence Sunday, when there were nine suicide attacks, most near polling sites in Baghdad.

The country was already focusing on goals almost as challenging as the election itself: forming a new governing coalition once the vote is known, then writing a constitution and winning trust.

The main Shiite clerical-backed faction in the race was already claiming a strong showing in the election. Officials of the United Iraqi Alliance said they expected to win at least 45 percent of seats in the 275-member National Assembly. Local officials of the parties within the alliance said the list swept some southern cities, winning 90 percent of the votes in Najaf and 80 percent in Basra.

The claims could not be confirmed, and the Alliance had been expected to run strong in the Shiite heartland. Going into the vote, the list headed by Allawi was also considered a main contender.

A powerful showing for the Alliance, which was endorsed by the Shiite Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, could make Sunnis even more reluctant to accept the results of the election – particularly if Sunni participation turns out to have been low.

Although turnout figures were unavailable, a U.S. diplomat briefing reporters on condition of anonymity said "good anecdotal information" indicated that "Sunni participation was considerably lower than participation by the other groups, especially in areas which have seen a great deal of violence."

In the heavily Sunni town of Tikrit, Saddam Hussein's hometown, 48-year-old history teacher Qais Youssif said no member of his family had voted.

"The so-called elections were held in the way that America and the occupation forces wanted," Youssif said. "They want to marginalize the role of the Sunnis. They and the media talk about the Sunnis as a minority. I do not think they are a minority."

The Iraqi Islamic Party, a leading Sunni faction, feels the vote was not inclusive "because an important segment of the Sunni Muslim community didn't take part," said party official Naser Ayel al-Ani. Large, heavily Sunni sections of the country were unable to cast ballots, and in some places lack of security forced polling places to open late or not at all, officials said.

In neighboring Jordan, King Abdullah said in an interview with CNN on Monday that Sunni participation was "a lot lower than any of us hoped."

On Sunday, the electoral commission said it believed that turnout overall among the estimated 14 million eligible Iraqi voters appeared higher than the 57 percent, or roughly 8 million, that had been predicted before the vote. Organizers said 93 percent of the 280,000 Iraqis who registered abroad turned out to vote.

Dog helping blind student

KRISTINA from page 1

Consequently, Kristina received another dog, Star, who has been with her for three years now. Star is a five-year-old German Shepard from the Fidelco training facility.

"It's a very close relationship. It's sort of like a child," she said. "At least that's how I felt when I lost Liam."

Kristina is the primary caregiver for Star. She makes sure Star is fed and takes her out to use the bathroom when necessary. During the day, Star wears a coat that asks people not to pet her because she is working, but when Kristina and she go home to her dorm, Star is treated like any other pet.

"When the harness is off she's a pet, but when the harness is on she's working," Kristina said.

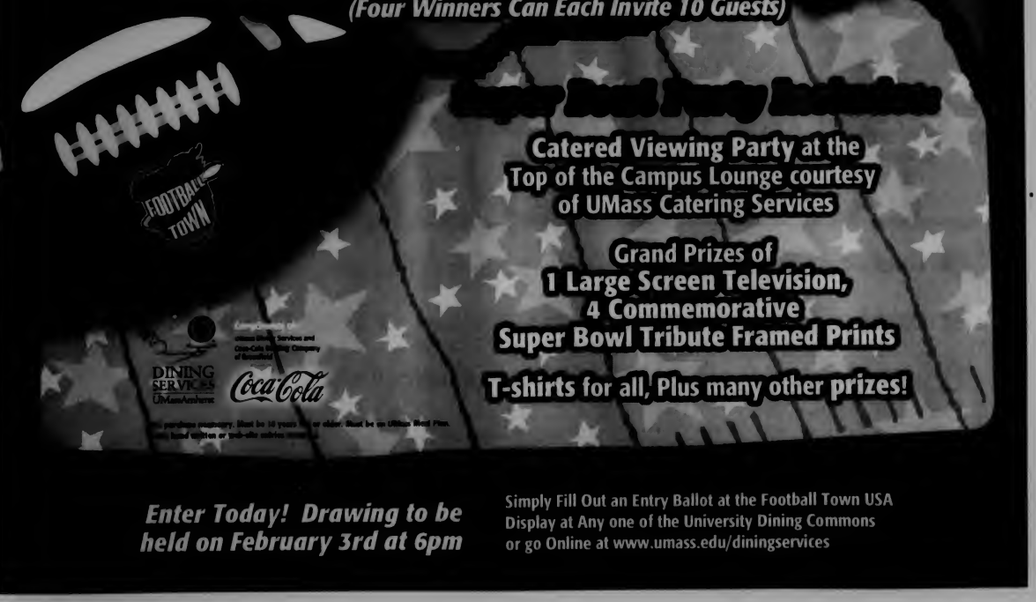
Kristina remembered a time when she went to Washington D.C. with Star to do legislative work for the National Federation of the Blind. She tapped once on her hotel door saying the word "home" so Star would remember where the door was. When Kristina and Star returned to the hotel later that day, she said "home" again and Star knew exactly where to take her. This is just one example of the level of intelligence that seeing-eye dogs are capable of.

Kristina is not the only one who loves Star. Her father said he feels at ease knowing his daughter has a companion with her at all times.

"I like the idea of Star," Rick said. "He's a very gentle German Shepard, but it would give pause to someone with bad intentions because of the reputation of the breed. People love dogs. They see Star and want to ask about him. It's a great way for her to meet people and for them to see Star more than [Kristina's] disability."

Last year, at the age of 21, specialists diagnosed Kristina yet again with another vision disorder, this time macular degeneration. In other words, at the same time that retinitis pigmentosa deteriorates the retina from outward toward the inside of the eye, macular degeneration weakens the retina from the inside working its way outward. It seemed as though the two working together were taking her vision away quickly.

Although Kristina will lose her vision completely over time, as of now she can see shapes and colors in good light. This is extremely helpful in maneuvering around a large campus like UMass Amherst. The summer before her freshman year, her parents took her to the campus and brought her around for a day with her cane to become acclimated with the general set up of the buildings.



When she first received Star, Kristina worked on campus with her before the school year began to help show Star where to walk. Some of the commands are left, right, find outside, find inside, come to heel and come around. Guide dogs are taught what is called intelligent disobedience.

"She takes all of her directions from me," Kristina said. "If I'm walking and I have to cross a street, we'll stop at the curb and listen to see when the cars stop. If I say forward and a car is coming, Star won't go forward to protect me."

See KRISTINA on page 4

HAMPSHIRE FITNESS club
JOIN NOW!
Winter Special
15 Week Student Special $179
What do you get?
*New Indoor Cycling
*Full sized indoor pool
*Aqua aerobics
*Cybex Nautilus circuit
*Cybex free weights
*Full court Basketball
*Volleyball
*Indoor Tennis
*Cardio
*Saunas
*Jacuzzi
*Yoga/Pilates
*Aerobics/Step/Bosu
Competitive Basketball
Mon. & Thurs. Evenings
Competitive Volleyball
Wed. & Sat.
ON THE BUS ROUTE

UMass Dining Services and Coca-Cola Invite you To Enjoy
"The Big Game"
on Sunday, February 6th and the Chance To
Co-host Your Own Super Bowl Party!
(Four Winners Can Each Invite 10 Guests)

Super Bowl Party Includes:
Catered Viewing Party at the Top of the Campus Lounge courtesy of UMass Catering Services
Grand Prizes of 1 Large Screen Television, 4 Commemorative Super Bowl Tribute Framed Prints
T-shirts for all, Plus many other prizes!

Enter Today! Drawing to be held on February 3rd at 6pm

Simply Fill Out an Entry Ballot at the Football Town USA Display at Any one of the University Dining Commons or go Online at www.umass.edu/diningservices

U.N. critical of Sudan leaders

By Daniel Balint-Kurti
Associated Press

ABUJA, Nigeria – Sudan said Monday that U.N. investigators concluded that genocide was not committed in the country's western Darfur region during a nearly two-year crisis, and the government and rebels committed to reopening peace talks within weeks.

At U.N. headquarters in New York, diplomats confirmed that the report did not find that Sudan committed genocide, but they said it was very critical of Sudanese government actions. The report was expected to be circulated in New York on Tuesday.

The United States has accused Sudan's government of directing militia fighters who attack civilians in what Washington calls a genocidal campaign in Darfur, where a nearly two-year crisis has left tens of thousands of civilians dead.

U.N. investigators have written a report on the allegations, which Sudan's Foreign Minister Mustafa Osman Ismail said undermines the U.S. genocide claims.

"We have a copy of that report and they didn't say that there is a genocide," Osman said on the sidelines of an African Union summit in the Nigerian capital, Abuja.

Diplomats at the U.N. headquarters in New York confirmed the report did not find that Sudan had committed genocide, but they said the conclusions were very critical of the Sudanese actions.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan delivers a report to the United Nations at a conference last November.

The diplomats spoke on condition of anonymity.

But a top negotiator for the rebel Sudanese Liberation Army said Monday: "If genocide means killing systematically people in one area, then there is genocide.

"For us, there is a genocide. Nobody can argue about it," Abakar Mohamed Abu el-Bashar said by telephone from London.

Meanwhile, the Sudanese government and Darfur insurgents said they will relaunch peace talks in Abuja in February, raising hopes for a negotiated end to the conflict that three earlier peace conferences and a cease-fire agreement have failed to calm.

Sudan's Darfur tumbled into war when rebels took up arms in February 2003.

The most recent Darfur peace conference began Dec. 11 in Abuja, but rebels boycotted meetings with government delegates two days later, alleging a new government offensive. The talks broke down entirely within weeks.

Darfur's smaller insurgent group, the Justice and Equality Movement, said Monday it would attend the talks if AU negotiators it says have treated them unfairly are "serious and objective," said Khalil Ibrahim Mohammed, a top rebel official.

Mohammed also said the insurgents' leadership wanted other intermediaries to join the talks, which have previously been held by the AU.

UMass studys male contraceptive a compound that blocks the protein in the sperm without blocking other proteins in the body," said Dr. John K. Amory, an assistant professor of medicine at the University of Washington with expertise in male contraceptive development.

CONTRACEPTIVE from page 1

In addition to potentially carrying few if any side effects, such a drug would be faster-acting than hormone therapy, which requires two to three months to affect male fertility because sperm cells require 72 days to fully mature, Amory said.

A 1998 research paper by Dr George Witman, a UMass professor of cell biology, described the discovery in rat sperm of the Cs protein within sperm cells. After sperm cells form in the testes, the protein is inactivated as the cells travel through a coiled tube in a man's body called the epididymis.

The protein causes sperm cells' tails to undulate, enabling them to potentially reach the female egg.

Witman and a UMass colleague, Dr. Juvenal San Agustin, eventually found that a protein nearly identical to the one in rat sperm also is found in human and mouse sperm.

A team from the University of Chapel Hill is conducting research similar to the UMass team that also involves targeting protein specific to sperm cells. That protein is a different form than the one targeted in the UMass research.

Student thankful for K-9

KRISTINA from page 3

Kristina has been a very active student since coming to UMass and during her freshman year, when she played in the drumline pit of the marching band. Unfortunately, when she returned for her sophomore year, she found she could no longer read the music and she did not want to continue playing if she could not fully participate. That did not, however, stop her from surrounding herself with music and she is currently a member of the UMass choir.

When decision time came for choosing colleges she wanted to attend, her parents thought it would be best for her to go to a location with a small campus. She applied to five colleges: Roger Williams, Merrimack, Smith, Mt. Holyoke, and the University of Massachusetts. Although accepted to several of them, she found UMass had the best disability services program and the administration officials were encouraging and willing to help her.

"We looked at several small colleges but when it came down to it, UMass had all of the necessary resources on hand," Rick said. "They had Ginger, who's blind, on staff. They were fully equipped to make resources available. It outweighed our concerns [about the campus size]."

With a major in history and a minor in education, Kristina hopes to become a rehab councilor for the blind.

"A lot of councilors for the blind that aren't blind themselves don't encourage blind people to fulfill their dreams. I want to help," she said.

While she works towards her goals, she is busy spending her time living as any other college student does. She is aware life is more difficult for her than for many of her peers, but she keeps a positive attitude and does not take anything for granted. She takes buses into town, goes on dates to the movies and does her own grocery shopping.

"If I go to a store I usually have someone come with me to tell me what I'm looking at," she said. "In the dining halls, I try to figure out what the food is, and if I can't, I'll either ask someone working there or just get a sandwich or pasta because those are the easiest to find."

Kristina has a special software program, JAWS for Windows, to help her with her computer work. The program reads everything on the screen out loud, which is how she retrieves her e-mail and writes papers. She also has a Braille writer, which looks and works very similar as a type writer.

For taking notes in class, Kristina uses a similar device that will record her notes for her in Braille. For hand outs in classes that are not Braille or read aloud, she has a scanner attached to her computer where she can scan the paper and the JAWS program will read it to her. Many appliances are now made for people who are visually impaired, including talking alarm clocks and wristwatches.

A typical day for Kristina begins fairly early. She wakes up and feeds Star before taking her out to get some air. She typically has two classes a day and uses the Franklin dining hall for meals. In her spare time, she enjoys listening to books on tape and reading Braille. In the past, she has attended classes spreading from one end of campus to the other, including in the Fine Arts Center, Bartlett Hall, Hills South and Boyden Gymnasium. She frequently makes trips to the library and the student center and said it usually takes her about 15 to 20 minutes in good weather from her dorm to her classes.

She has a single in the Brooks Hall, located in the Central Residential Area. Entering the room, the first thing you notice is Star, lying on the floor peacefully sleeping. A closet stands immediately on your right, with the bed further against the wall. Straight ahead is a table holding an alarm clock, the Braille writer, and papers. The whole left wall is mainly a long desk, with the expected desktop computer, scanner and books. There is one window, directly ahead, dressed with a colorful curtain.

Every other Saturday, Kristina volunteers as a mentor for the Partners for Youth with Disabilities program. The group, made up of 20 to 30 children with disabilities, meets at the Greek Cultural Center for three hours. The day typically consists of a guest speaker and a recreational activity. The children who attend have a variety of disabilities, three of whom have visual impairments like Kristina.

Over the course of her life, she has volunteered with a number of organizations for the disabled and for the blind, bravely facing her obstacles head on by trying to help people in similar situations overcome their own barriers.

Kristina had only received her first dog shortly before she was to attend a conference on retinitis pigmentosa in Minnesota, and had to change flights half way through her trip, a daunting task for any traveler.

"She's a very good kid," her father said. "We worry about her sometimes, with her going on trips to Springfield and even places as far as Minnesota on her own; it takes a lot of energy."

Throughout all of her obstacles, Kristina is determined to live her life as any other young adult would and her family is determined to help her achieve her dreams. And like any other 22-year-old dealing with coming into their own and discovering what they want from life, she knows if she ever needs anything, not to hesitate to ask.

"It's the small things we have to remember," said Rick. "We don't leave things out in the middle of the floor, like the vacuum, or if we do, we tell her about it. We can't leave cabinet doors open because she might poke an eye out. But none of this is an inconvenience, it's just part of being a family."

THE
BOLTWOOD
PROJECT™
(35 years of service—and counting!)
A STUDENT / COMMUNITY SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAM
(an RSO and Dept. of Landscape Architecture & Regional Planning sponsored prog.)

REACH OUT—AND BECOME A SPECIAL FRIEND TO PEOPLE WITH SPECIAL NEEDS
Your life will NEVER be the same!
••EARN 1-2 CREDITS ••GAIN VALUABLE EXPERIENCE ••REWARDING, CHALLENGING, and FUN
Spring Semester 2005 — Recruitment Nights
You must attend ONE of these meetings. No exceptions, even if you have participated before!
6:00-8:00 PM (Note: Prompt starting time!!!)
Room 163C of the Campus Center for all meetings •Jan 31 (Mon) •Feb 1 (Tues) and Feb 2 (Wed)
•Assignment notification ONLY Thurs, Feb 3rd @ Boltwood table CC Concourse
No telephone inquiries. YOU (or a friend) must pick up the notification letter!!!
Volunteer, while earning credit!

ALUMNI
UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST 1863
"Leaders in the Making" Scholarship

SOPHOMORE & JUNIOR STUDENTS

The "Leaders in the Making" Scholarship Program was created by the Alumni Association to support the academic and career pursuits of promising sophomores and juniors. Students from diverse campus populations whose records suggest that they will develop into alumni with admirable leadership qualities upon graduation are encouraged to apply.

Four recipients will be selected by the Alumni Association Student Affairs and Scholarships Committee based on their application and will be awarded $2,000 towards their Fall 2005 tuition bill and fees.

This multi-part application must be completed in its entireity and returned to the Alumni Association no later than 5 p.m. on Friday, February 11, 2005 for consideration. No exceptions will be allowed.

Don't pass up this great opportunity. Pick up an application today!

EXTROVERTS WANTED UMASS AMHERST IS IN SEARCH OF TOUR GUIDES

1. Lead campus tours for students and families interested in the UMass Amherst Campus.
2. Paid hourly position with a minimum commitment of 5 hours a week including some weekends.
3. Serve as panel speakers, hosts, and tour leaders at on and off campus yield activities such as Open Houses and College Fairs.
4. Conduct informational interviews with prospective students and their families.

UMASS AMHERST
To find out more about the position or to pick up an application visit us at the Campus Center Concourse from January 31st-February 4th. Applications are also available at the Visitors Center. Application deadline is February 4th, 2005

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

"Not another SGA movie"

Zach Oelschlegel

Knowing Hollywood's love for drama, I'm going to begin writing fewer editorials and start writing screenplays. My first picture will be based on the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA), something I'm sure Hollywood (or at least Springer) would love to get its hands on. The characters have been developed, and I will give them real names when casting occurs. I hope you enjoy the sneak peek of this potential blockbuster.

The movie begins inside a Registered Student Organization (RSO) office at the University of Massachusetts Student Union. Huddled around what appears to be a card table, the potentially racist speaker and the corrupt school official discuss something that seems to be extremely secretive. A tape recorder lies beside them, the red light on, making a recording of everything that is said inside the RSO office.

The potentially racist speaker and corrupt school official look at each other and smile.

"Recording and making copies of this conspiracy will be the smartest thing we've ever done," says the potentially racist speaker, chuckling to himself.

"Agreed," replies the corrupt school official. "And they'll never get the whole story, as we'll answer every question with a well put 'No Comment.'"

The camera shifts from atop the RSO office to the probing minority, who stands outside the RSO office with his ear against the door, struggling to make out what's going on behind the doors. All of a sudden, his eyes bulge out, and he yelps, "Oh no! I've got to alert the Office of Angry Minorities!"

He runs out the door, trying to recall where the Corrupt School Official told the potentially racist speaker he could make tapes of the conspiracy. The lights fade out and come back to a campus in uproar. There are shots of students at the dining halls arguing with one another, while others laugh at the newspaper headline that reads "SGA to remove appointed angry minority seats from completely useless task force."

The next scene begins the following day on the steps of the Student Union, as the office of angry minorities and the angry minorities caucus hold a rally. Here, the outspoken Latina, disgruntled minority professor, and token white protestor make their first appearances. While the latter two have minor roles, the Outspoken Latina is the main player here, and surfaces later in the movie after everyone thinks she is gone. She correctly incriminates the corrupt school official and potentially racist speaker at the rally, to then rail against every white senator in the SGA.

The movie continues later that night at the weekly SGA meeting. Here, the potentially racist speaker calls for order, only to receive a vicious volley of ad homonym insults from the angry minorities caucus. From the ashes of this debacle the outspoken Latina rises and demands for the resignation of every white person in the room, calling them racists. Next, the overly charismatic president makes his first appearance holding a ham sandwich, and makes a rule that only people with the ham sandwich in hand are allowed to speak.

In a moment of comic relief, the ultra-conservative senator also appears here, and is the first one to speak holding the ham sandwich, only to forget the rules by taking a bite out of it after he is done talking.

Meanwhile, the corrupt school official calls a press conference to clear up any confusion. However, when asked his involvement with the situation, he answers "No comment, next question please."

This answer stays with him for the rest of the press conference, to assure more ambiguity to his involvement with the conspiracy, and to waste everyone's time.

The next few minutes of the film are shots of the campus stewing. Among the students that care about the controversy can be heard arguments regarding whether or not the potentially racist speaker is really a racist. Among the other 90 percent of students can be heard conversations on the chances of the Red Sox re-obtaining via trade shortstop Nomar Garciaparra.

The climax of the movie occurs at the next SGA meeting. Here, the overly charismatic president drops a bombshell. He provides footage of the potentially racist speaker at the ultra-conservative senator's house playing beer pong and making racist jokes regarding the Venezuelan olympic team. How this footage was obtained becomes another matter, but the potentially racist speaker denies all involvement and claims: "It was some other guy my height and weight wearing the same clothes and red hat that I was at the party."

The meeting adjourns with a vote of no confidence in the potentially racist speaker, and more characters pointing fingers and calling each other racists.

My idea for an ending is still unclear. A lot of questions persist regarding the outcome that the movie couldn't really answer itself.

For instance, will there ever be a speaker that isn't potentially racist? Will the outspoken Latina make a triumphant comeback into the wild world of the SGA? Will the office of angry minorities ever be happy? Will the corrupt school official be involved in yet another action against the office of angry minorities, and continue to make dubious answers regarding his participation? Will there be an SGA meeting where the word racist is not mentioned?

I'm hoping that I can come up with a happy ending. Odds are, however, that my conclusion will be as ugly as the rest of the story and I'll be stuck writing a sequel entitled "Not Another SGA Movie: Part Deux," which unfortunately would probably have the same plot. Figures.

Zach Oelschlegel is a Collegian columnist.

Paved with good intentions?

Mike Sances

The Jan. 18 installment of The Washington Post's "White House Briefing" directs us toward several news articles analyzing President Bush's plans for Social Security, all of them negative. Yet while he is either lying or simply flat-out wrong about a Social Security crisis, the authors go on to guess that what's actually driving the plan is the President's benevolent goodwill.

In the words of two Time Magazine reporters quoted in the piece, "Just as Bush believes democracy has the power to transform places like Iraq, so too is he convinced that privatization of Social Security could recharge America's future."

Notice that the President doesn't even need to bother justifying his own mistakes anymore—the press will do it for him. While the line about "transforming the Middle East" as the goal of the Iraq war had to be suggested to them, it was only after the other reasons for the war fell apart.

Not that intent really counts for anything—it doesn't, and any discussion on Social Security or any other policy should avoid wasting ink on whether the agent of that policy "means well" or not.

The same must be said for the war in Iraq. Whether Bush lied or not before the war is really a minor point, and indeed wasn't much of an issue before it began. The war is an atrocity, and the President, as the chief cause of the war, must be judged accordingly. The line between first and second-degree murder is thin, shrinking so much as to vanish completely when replicated on a scale as large as what we've been doing in Iraq.

With regards to Social Security, the crime has not yet been committed, rendering intent even less of an issue. To be sure, when a killer lunges at you with a knife, you waste no time contemplating whether he may be divinely inspired. You do whatever you can to avoid the blow.

If intent is irrelevant, why are there many who spend their time trying to explain the motivations behind Islamic terrorism?

The war [in Iraq] is an atrocity, and the President, as the chief cause of the war, must be judged accordingly.

Good question. Arguing over whether the Sept. 11 hijackers were inspired by hatred of freedom, want of liberty or American policy towards Israel, may indeed be nothing but a diversion away from real issues and their potential solutions. Regardless of why terrorist attacks are carried out, no one has ever argued against the perpetrators being brought to justice.

That's not to say that a successful anti-terrorism policy can afford to ignore the causes of terrorism, but these causes do not excuse terrorist acts any more than a president's hidden benevolence would excuse a war.

It just sometimes happens that the terrorists' given justifications for committing acts of mass murder strike a chord with the American public—which is probably why those in power try so hard to conceal them, blithely insisting that they hate our freedoms instead.

In case the reader is unaware, the three main reasons given for the Sept. 11 attacks were American military bases in Saudi Arabia, UN sanctions against Iraq, and American support for Israel's occupation of the Palestinian territories. It would be wrong to deny these policies our attention simply because of their source. Indeed, we should have been opposing them for years, and there were in fact many who did so independent of any dead Americans.

Bringing these policies up invites cries of appeasement, which is curious, because after all, it is we who are the aggressors. It is also a fact that our bases in Saudi Arabia were quietly removed back in 2003. Where were the cries of appeasement then?

Nothing can ever justify what was done to this country on Sept. 11, 2001, but Americans would do well to think on what could possibly justify our behavior toward the rest of the world, the Middle East in particular. As just one example, the sanctions against Iraq in the 90's resulted in the deaths of tens of thousands of innocent children. Regardless of our intent, regardless of how some would exploit this fact to promote their own ends. Was it the right thing to do?

Mike Sances is a Collegian columnist.

Different leader, same struggle

Yousef Munayyer

There is a fine line between having hope and being naïve.

Who ever believes that the recent election of Mahmoud Abbass will make a significant difference on the so called "peace process" undoubtedly falls on the naïve side of that line.

Many believe the "peace process" — which should be called the "piece process" since it has only entailed the incremental confiscation of greater portions of Palestinian lands — has suddenly been revitalized. A miracle of sorts was bestowed on the peace loving hawks of the Israeli government now that the roadblock on their mythical road map, Yasser Arafat, has passed. A new age is upon us, they claim; an age of democracy. This seems to be the theme of the year. Election under occupation, which is being force fed down the throats and into the minds of countless people, is the newly adopted perverse definition of democracy.

The situation for Palestinians has never been a struggle for democracy. Rather there has been an undoubted consensus among Palestinians; they were handed from one colonizer to the next, from the Ottomans to the British to the most recent Zionist oppressor and the only goal is national liberation. For Palestinians, the age of decolonization, which reached the rest of the Middle East, has passed them over like a dark angel over a bloodstained door.

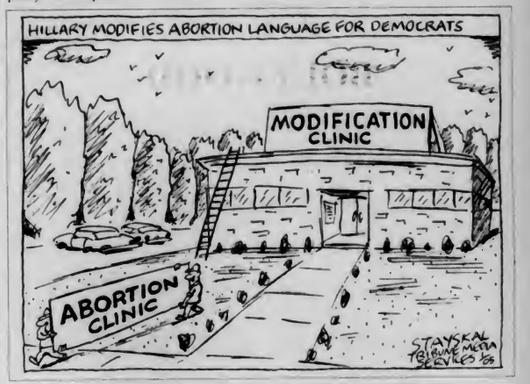
Mahmood Abbass, Yasser Arafat or any other individual will not change the identity of the Palestinian. This is why Yasser Arafat was marginalized and also why Abbass will likely follow the same fate. Both leaders are in a difficult position. The fact that Arafat has died does not change the aspirations of the Palestinian people. They are not willing to give any more and the other side also has no new concessions to make.

Abbass, also known as Abu Mazen, is stuck between a rock and hard heads. The rock being the determination of hardened Palestinians, made callous and angry by their displacement in 1948 and 1967 and the ongoing illegal occupation. The hard heads being the leaders in Tel Aviv who want "peace" but are willing to give nothing for it, they are just willing to take less.

Pause to think of that for a moment. Say I take everything that belongs to you and then offer 22 percent of it back so that you will leave me alone. Would that satisfy you? Would 50 percent satisfy you? Not if you had dignity, not if you had an identity and not if you had any connection with what you have lost. Israel's attempt to silence Palestinians with their bogus "offer" only further fuels the fire of resistance. The failure to make any serious concessions only further prolongs the conflict and does an injustice to the human beings on both sides.

Many believe the "peace process" — which should be called the "piece process" since it has ony entailed the incremental confiscation of greater portions of Palestinian lands — has suddenly been revitalized.

Israel is stuck with a tremendous problem. It is changing demographically. Half the people under the control of Israel do not have rights as citizens. Israel has to make a move but it knows it can not make an offer the Palestinians can accept and even worse, it can not make an offer its own people can accept. This Sunday, thousands of protesters took to the streets of Jerusalem to protest the removal of Zionist colonies in the West Bank and Gaza. These protesters prove two things: one, there exists a place on the Israeli political spectrum to the right of its current prime minister and two, and they could never live under Palestinian government. If the colonies are going to remain, Palestinian land in the prospective "two-state solution" would be smaller in area and further divided.



Still there remains no answer for Jerusalem and no answer for the right of return. Both of these are questions that have never been answered and cannot be answered so long as the status quo continues. Abu Mazen can not answer them. In fact Abu Mazen can contribute little if anything new to the peace process. What will most likely evolve in the coming months is the continued agitation by Israel of the Palestinian population for the same strategic purposes as it had last summer when it carried out illegal assassinations to provoke a response. At that point Abu Mazen, much like his predecessor, will step aside because there is no room for politicians in armed struggle.

To me it seems Israel prefers armed struggle; it keeps working towards it, holds greater weapons and has only gained land from it in the past. The continued derailment of the "peace process" results in the "piece process", the goal of which is the elimination of Palestinian nationalism. Abu Mazen is a middle man whose constituents want what the Israelis refuse to offer.

An Israeli member of parliament spoke at UMass this past fall and said that Israel always held three things dear: one, democracy two, its Jewish character and three, the Occupied Territories as part of Israel. He then told the audience that the last part had to change if there would be a solution.

His analysis is flawed. With over 80 percent of the population living on less than 20 percent of the land, a bi-national state is the only solution which can end struggle. The question for Israel now is how much more of its "democratic" character is it willing to loose to a culture of oppression and apartheid before it realizes that its ethnocentric character is at the center of the problem?

Yousef Munayyer is a Collegian editor.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

A CALL TO ALL SOUTHWEST RESIDENTS, PART II

After spending the long winter break away from campus, many students are looking forward to catching up with friends and having a good time as the spring semester unfolds. Of course, the beginning of spring semester also marks the winding down of football season.

This Sunday, many UMass Amherst students will be hanging out with friends and having a good time as they sit down to watch the Super Bowl. In Southwest, it is likely that each great play made by the Pats will solicit those familiar tower-rockin' cheers that remind all Southwest residents what it means to have 5,500 neighbors.

We, the executive board of Southwest Area Government, your elected representatives, will also be enjoying the game and cheering on the Pats. We encourage all Southwest residents to forget stressing over homework for one night and enjoy the game as well. Furthermore, we encourage you, as we did in the days before the onset of the World Series, to enjoy the game in a safe, celebratory and nondestructive manner.

As we continue working diligently to plan what may be the best Southwest Week yet (for updates on Southwest Week check www.swagumass.com), Southwest Area Government is committed to representing you, our constituents, in the best light to the rest of campus and to the university administration. We can do this most successfully when we show the enormous amount of intelligence, talent and skill that our constituents embody.

For this reason, we implore all Southwest residents to be responsible and exercise good judgment as you and your friends celebrate this upcoming weekend and the remainder of the semester. Together, we can use our actions to demonstrate that the Southwest Residential Area is a great living area and an exciting, engaging community to be a part of. If you have any comments or concerns, please e-mail us at swag@stuaf.umass.edu.

SWAG executive board:
Aimee Falardeau
Kraig Moore
Mina Safain
Bridgette Payne
Amy Ciaramitaro
Gina Safain

TASERS: A SAFETY ISSUE

UMass police officer Robert Thrasher maintains that taser guns are "not dangerous" and a "very humane tool" (Daily Collegian, Jan. 31). This is an irresponsible misrepresentation of the state of knowledge about the safety of tasers, which warrants immediate action.

An Amnesty International report on tasers from two months ago (Nov. 30, 2004) notes that there have not been enough studies about the medical effects of taser shocks to conclude that they are not lethal.

According to the report, tasers have been found by coroners to be one of the causes of death in at least five cases in the U.S. and Canada, and a possible cause of death in at least seven others.

The potential lethality of tasers has led Amnesty to repeatedly urge the suspension of their use unless further studies can demonstrate their safety, despite their acknowledged usefulness as an alternative to lethal force.

This brings up a second concern: tasers are touted as less lethal alternatives to deadly force, but this is not how they are actually used. The Amnesty report documents the widespread abuse of tasers in situations that do not call for use of lethal force. Thrasher presents tasers as an alternative to batons, which is not their intended use. This widespread abuse has had the effect of raising the threshold of what is considered acceptable and routine use of force, weakening compliance with codes of police conduct.

A third concern is the handling of the decision to acquire tasers. There was no public discussion in the UMass community about the appropriateness of the purchase before the decision was made, nor were student governments consulted in the process. This approach to decision making, always a problem at UMass, takes on special urgency in this life-and-death matter.

The same can be said for misrepresentations by UMass officials: they are common enough, but they're especially serious in this case. Officer Thrasher should be immediately removed from the police force, not only because of his irresponsible remarks, but also to ensure that potentially lethal weapons are not operated by people who are unaware of the consequences of their use.

Uri Strauss
President, Graduate Student Senate

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

reative cause

UMASS ARTISTS RAISE MONEY FOR STUDENT UNION GALLERY

By Rebecca Watkinson
Collegian Correspondent

"And those who were seen dancing were thought to be insane by those who could not hear the music."

This quote is one of the many quotes that will be displayed alongside some of the amazing artwork at the Student Union Art Gallery this week.

For those students who are artists, or enjoy perusing through art galleries, or even just want to support a worthy cause on campus, the Student Union Art Gallery is hosting their first annual auction and raffle all of this week from Jan. 31 to Feb. 4.

Headed by the Director of the Gallery, Graduate Student Liz Unterman, this event will raise money in order to directly benefit the art gallery.

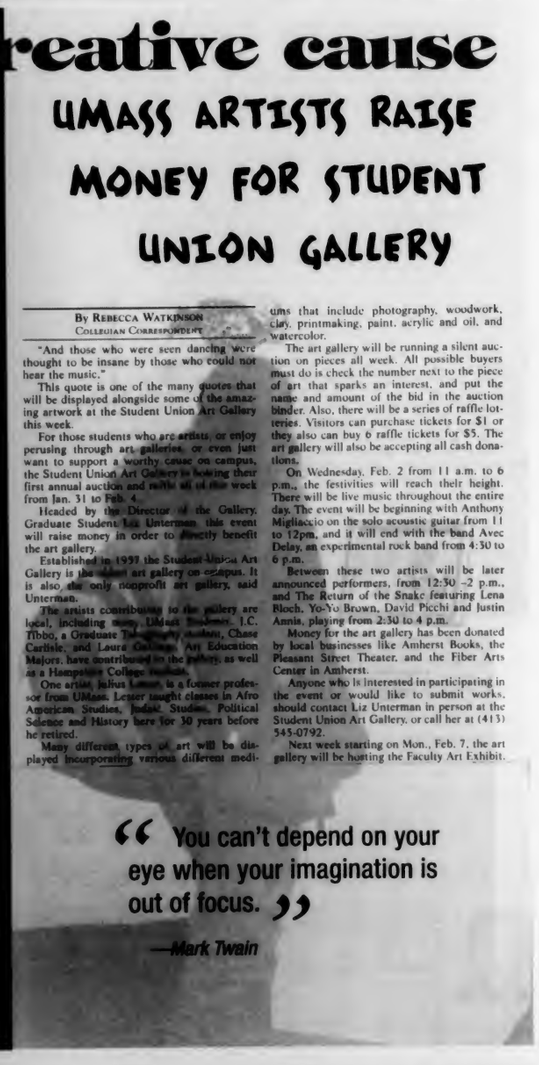
Established in 1997 the Student Union Art Gallery is the oldest art gallery on campus. It is also the only nonprofit art gallery, said Unterman.

The artists contributing to the gallery are local, including many Liddell Students. J.C. Tibbo, a Graduate Teaching Faculty student, Chase Carlisle, and Laura Gallegos, Art Education Majors, have contributed to the gallery, as well as a Hampshire College graduate.

One artist, Julius Lester, is a former professor from UMass. Lester taught classes in Afro American Studies, Judaic Studies, Political Science and History here for 30 years before he retired.

Many different types of art will be displayed incorporating various different mediums that include photography, woodwork, clay, printmaking, paint, acrylic and oil, and watercolor.

The art gallery will be running a silent auction on pieces all week. All possible buyers must do is check the number next to the piece of art that sparks an interest, and put the name and amount of the bid in the auction binder. Also, there will be a series of raffle lotteries. Visitors can purchase tickets for $1 or they also can buy 6 raffle tickets for $5. The art gallery will also be accepting all cash donations.



On Wednesday, Feb. 2 from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m., the festivities will reach their height. There will be live music throughout the entire day. The event will be beginning with Anthony Migliaccio on the solo acoustic guitar from 11 to 12pm, and it will end with the band Avec Delay, an experimental rock band from 4:30 to 6 p.m.

Between these two artists will be later announced performers, from 12:30 –2 p.m., and The Return of the Snake featuring Lena Bloch, Yo-Yo Brown, David Picchi and Justin Annis, playing from 2:30 to 4 p.m.

Money for the art gallery has been donated by local businesses like Amherst Books, the Pleasant Street Theater, and the Fiber Arts Center in Amherst.

Anyone who is interested in participating in the event or would like to submit works, should contact Liz Unterman in person at the Student Union Art Gallery, or call her at (413) 545-0792.

Next week starting on Mon., Feb. 7, the art gallery will be hosting the Faculty Art Exhibit.

"You can't depend on your eye when your imagination is out of focus."

—Mark Twain

MASTERS OF FAST FOOD DISGUISE

America's golden arches 'fess up about trans fat

By Laura Beil
The Dallas Morning News

Two years after McDonald's own deadline for reducing trans fats, the french fry has thus far snatched defeat from the jaws of victory.

The heavyweight among fast food chains had announced with fanfare that the amount of trans fats in its cooking oil would be cut almost in half by February 2003. After that, a more ambitious goal: McDonald's planned to eliminate this form of disease-causing grease, right down to the last McNugget.

Today, however, an order of fries remains as trans-laden as ever, leaving consumer advocates with a supersized disbelief.

"It's astonishing," says Michael Jacobson of the Center for Science in the Public Interest. He and many other nutrition experts now feel burned for their accolades in September 2002, when McDonald's announced its intention. "If a big company holds a press conference, you'd think they would have planned things out."

They thought they had, says company spokesman Walt Riker. Despite the best intentions, McDonald's found that an oil change wasn't so easy, he says. "We realized we needed additional testing."

One of the main problems was that the oil formulated in 2002 appeared to alter the taste of McDonald's fries. The popular fries are a company hallmark, with a taste and crispness on an almost sacred plane. The fries are such a state secret, Riker won't even discuss the components of the oil they're fried in.

The news is better for chicken lovers. McNuggets and other chicken products are now fried in an oil that is about 15 percent lower in trans fat.

Riker won't say when trans fats will be phased out. "It's still a work in progress, so I don't want to get into any specifics."

McDonald's has been using trans fats since 1990. At the time it turned trans, the company was looking for a way to reduce the saturated fat and cholesterol coming out of its fryers. Trans fats are, before a chemical transformation, vegetable oil. The hope was that the trans fats would be no harder on a customer's health than canola or corn oil.

But the evidence against trans fat was already gathering, and it has now become one of the major controversies in the American food industry. The new U.S. Dietary Guidelines, released just this month, urge Americans to keep their trans-fat consumption as close to zero as possible.

The problem is that trans fats have a singular ability to harm the heart and blood vessels.

"It's not something we were evolved to encounter," says Dr. Meir Stampfer from the Harvard School of Public Health. "It's something new for our metabolism."

Unlike most other forms of fat, the vast majority of trans fats are artificially made. They form when a liquid vegetable oil gets bombarded with hydrogen. The liquid becomes solid, giving baked goods a full, buttery feel in the mouth.

The discovery has been a boon to the food industry. Partially hydrogenated oils, as trans fats are called, can extend the shelf life of manufactured goods. In the fast food industry, hydrogenated oils mean fryers don't have to be changed out as frequently.

These traits would all be easy to swallow if trans fats didn't also increase the odds of a heart attack. Both saturated fat and trans fat raise the level of LDL, the form of cholesterol that contributes to heart disease. But trans fat also lowers the level of HDL, which protects against heart disease.

"It's doing two bad things," Stampfer says. Plus, he says, some research suggests that trans fats also raise the level of triglycerides, a form of fat in the blood. Maybe three bad things.

Researchers began to suspect the danger of trans fat more than two decades ago. One landmark study in 1997 from Stampfer and his colleagues found that women who consumed the highest levels of trans fat had a risk of heart disease about 30 percent higher than those who ate the lowest levels. By 1999, the federal Food and Drug Administration voted to require trans fats to be listed on food labels, a measure that will take effect next year. An analysis from the Office of Management and Budget has estimated that 10 years after the new labels appearr, by discouraging trans fat use, they will yearly spare 7,600 to more than 17,000 people from heart disease.

With disclosure looming, the food industry has begun scaling back on trans fats. Plano-based Frito-Lay has now removed trans fats from all its products, as have many other major food manufacturers. But few companies have the social and business weight of McDonald's. In 2002, experts were overjoyed that the world's largest restaurant chain had become an ally in the trans fat war.

"It was consistent with McDonald's being a leader in many areas," says CSPI's

See MCDONALDS on page 9

Jackson faces potential jurors

By Linda Deutsch
Associated Press

SANTA MARIA, Calif.— Dressed in a bright white suit and a jewel-trimmed vest and belt, Michael Jackson on Monday stood before the first group of prospective jurors who could decide his fate on charges he molested a teenage cancer patient and plied the boy with alcohol at his Neverland Ranch.

The pop superstar, accompanied by four defense lawyers, stood and smiled as he faced prospective jurors for the start of jury selection in what could become the most sensational celebrity trial the world has ever seen. He greeted the clerk with a handshake at the courthouse in this small coastal city in central California.

Outside, fans from around the world pressed up against a chain-link fence and shouted words of encouragement, holding up signs that read, "Dear God, Please Give Michael Justice" and "France Supports and Loves MJ."

Fans danced and sang a Jackson song attacking the district attorney and booed a woman who held a sign backing the accuser.

Santa Barbara County District Attorney Tom Sneddon, whom Jackson has derided in a song as a "cold man" with a vendetta, did not come to court. A deputy represented the prosecution.

Jackson, 46, is charged with molesting a teenage boy, then 13, now 15, and plying him with alcohol.

On Sunday, Jackson issued a court-approved video statement on his Web site, predicting he would be acquitted. His parents also spoke out in his defense Monday, saying the young accuser was after his money.

"I know my son, and this is ridiculous," his mother, Katherine Jackson, said in an interview broadcast on CBS' "The Early Show." She said people who believe her son is guilty "don't know him."

Judge Rodney Melville told the first group of 150 prospective jurors that they might have to serve for about six months, but that it was an important duty.

"Most of us have relatives who have fought and died to protect this service," Melville said. "Freedom is not free. Jury duty is part of the cost of freedom."

The first group was predominantly white. About a quarter appeared to be Hispanic. There were only three blacks.

Sixty-six members of the first group asked to be excused, but during questioning by the judge two changed their minds. A woman who said she was eight months pregnant was excused from the case.

Five hundred more prospective jurors were to be processed later Monday and on Tuesday and Wednesday.

Those not excused will fill out questionnaires, and then will be questioned individually by the attorneys. The judge wants 12 jurors in addition to eight alternates.

The small-town feel of the jury pool was apparent during questioning. One woman ran a pet shop, while another was in local real estate. One woman said she could get a medical excuse from her doctor across the street. A few said they have friends who work at Jackson's Neverland ranch.

Prospective jurors were addressed with nine-digit numbers in court.

One woman said she worked at an elementary school where she dealt with "people that need counseling for molestation."

Other prospective jurors said they had to care for sick relatives or had too many job responsibilities. One woman said that at 75, she was "just too old."

"You don't look a day over 60," the judge replied.

The woman said she was willing to serve if she had to, but noted she had "a multitude of illnesses."

When another woman said she had to be home every night to care for her mother, the judge told her that she would be home every night.

"Don't they lock juries up, too?" the prospect asked, inquiring if the judge could guarantee she would get home.

"Oh yeah, I'm going home every night," said Melville, who intends to end each day of trial by 2:30 p.m.

One man said he couldn't serve because his employer wouldn't pay him while he was on jury duty.

"Your employer doesn't pay jury service?" asked Melville.

"He's an attorney, no sir," the man said.

Associated Press Writer Tim Molloy contributed to this report.

Jackson dominated popular music charts throughout most of the past three decades, earning him the honorary title of "the King of Pop", despite much controversy over his fascination with children.

Online shopper? Ask an Attorney

Ask the Attorney

Michele L. Leaf

Q: I found a web site for the purchase of gifts with great prices, but I never heard of the company before. Is it safe for me to buy online?

A. The first thing you should do is make sure that there is a street address and telephone number for the company listed on the internet site. Some web sites make it very easy to place an order, but give no information about return policies or customer service. If you can determine where the company is located you can check with the Better Business Bureau or the state's attorney general's office to see if there is any history of complaints.

A legitimate business has nothing to fear in giving information about the business location. One problem for consumers is that it may be impossible to return items or get refunds if the business is not located in the U.S. One common problem with internet purchases is delay in filling orders. Many internet merchants are able to keep prices low because they do not have warehouses or actually stock merchandise. As a result there may be an unanticipated problem in obtaining goods from suppliers. By law, retailers are required to ship an order within the time stated on the web site. If a company does not promise a time it must ship the order within 30 days. If this is not possible, the customer can consent to the delay or cancel the order for an immediate full refund.

Although a business practice may not be against the law, it may amount to poor customer service. Having a good legal remedy is of little consolation when the merchant doesn't deliver a gift as promised.

Whenever you make an internet purchase, it is important to make sure that your credit card information is protected. Before paying, confirm that the server is secure so that your credit card number will be encrypted and inaccessible to third parties. In order to further guard against fraud, it is recommended to obtain an additional credit card for exclusive use on the internet. Since the card will not be used for regular purchases disruption can be minimized, and any fraud will be more quickly noticed.

Although your credit card is protected from fraud by the credit card issuer, and you can't be held responsible for unauthorized charges, this protection often will not apply to charges made in other countries. If this is a consideration, check with the card issuer before making the purchase. Happy shopping!

The information contained in this article refers to Massachusetts law and does not constitute legal advice. Please submit legal questions to asktheattorney@stuaf.umass.edu. If you need legal advice, seek out an attorney who can give you advice based upon your circumstances and applicable law. Fee paying UMass Amherst students with questions may call the Student Legal Services Office at 545-1995 to arrange and appointment, or come to 922 Campus Center to pick up more information.

GOT ARTS?

Looking for writers. Call Mike, Matt or Chris at 545-[illegible]

BUY YOUR TEXTBOOKS AT HALF.COM

AND SAVE UP TO 40% OFF* THE LIST PRICE.

How great is this? Find great savings on new or used textbooks you need this semester. Go to half.com and enter the titles or ISBN numbers. That's it!

Save an additional $5 on a purchase of $50 or more.
Redeem this coupon by entering this code:
AMHERST2005
at half.com
For a limited time, first-time buyers only. See conditions below.

half.com™ by ebay®

*Claim based on comparison of average selling price (excluding shipping and handling) for top 10% of textbooks (by unit volume) sold on Half.com from August 1st-September 11, 2004 and listed as "brand new" by the seller, with list price for same title. Textbooks are defined as undergraduate and graduate textbooks and exclude reference books and novels/literature.

Offer valid for $5 off a purchase of $50 or more at Half.com only. Offer valid for first time buyers only. Order value must be a minimum of $50.00 before the discount is applied and does not include shipping, handling, taxes or insurance. This coupon cannot be combined with any other coupon, discount, gift certificate, or promotion. Any potential refund will not include the coupon or its redemption value. Void where prohibited. Open only to U.S. residents 18 years of age or older. Promotion subject to change without notice. Offer expires on March 31, 2005 at 11:59:59 PST.

© 2004 eBay Inc.

Keep your eyes on the fries, trans fat still hides in the food

MCDONALDS from page 6

Michael Iacobson. But February 2003 came and went with only a brief news release announcing an extension in the deadline. Months passed.

Finally, in September 2004, Iacobson's group grew restless from two years of waiting. The organization bought full-page ads in The New York Times with the headline "A Broken McPromise." They skewered that restaurant chain over others. Iacobson says, because "McDonald's made the mistake of saying they were going to do the right thing, and then not doing it."

The company nonetheless has not relegated the effort to the back burner, Riker says. "We're going to work until we get it right." And he points out that McDonald's has recently taken other steps to make menus healthier, such as offering apple slices and salads, and reining in portion sizes.

Dr. Dean Ornish, for one, believes these are more than just claims for public relations. For almost 30 years, the Ornish has touted the benefits of a diet very low in fat. In 2002, the devoted vegetarian was one of the many experts who praised McDonald's for abandoning trans fats. He's now consulting with the company on ways to make its food better for the 23 million Americans who eat it each day.

"I think they remain committed to achieving the trans fatty acid goal," says Ornish, who runs the Preventive Medicine Research Institute in Sausalito, Calif. "The truth is that it was easier to reduce it in some products than others."

A trans-fat deflation on the chicken products didn't affect the taste, he says, but not so with the potatoes. And he says he understands why the company can't compromise the taste of its famous fries. "It's their signature item."

But there are other complicating issues as well, Ornish says. McDonald's has to make sure that an oil formulation has enough farmers to fill the supply. Once apples made it to the menu, McDonald's suddenly became the largest purchaser of apples worldwide, Ornish says.

So the company can't just fry its food in a different oil, which would be a natural way to reduce trans fat. Frito-Lay, for example, switched to cottonseed and corn oil. Canola oil would also work. However, Ornish says, there's not enough canola oil in the world to meet McDonald's' demand.

Agricultural researchers are scrambling to help McDonald's and other industries find ways to wean themselves of trans fats, says Robert Reeves, president of the Institute of Shortening and Edible Oils. (Citing proprietary information, oil supplier Cargill Inc. would not discuss its collaboration with McDonald's in the trans-fat reduction.)

Some manufacturers, Reeves says, have moved to oils already available. Others are tinkering with ways to hydrogenate their oils without creating quite so much trans fat in the final product, or altering oils through other means. Plant researchers are also trying to develop varieties of oil seeds that produce more stable oils without need for hydrogenation.

What will work for each company, he says, depends on what kind of food they sell. "It's preserving the attributes that consumers have wanted and in fact demanded," Reeves says. And it's not just a question of taste: hydrogenated oils also improve texture. "If you had a french fry that was rather limp, it would not look good to the consumer."

What remains, then, is McDonald's' french-fry challenge: pleasing the palate along with the arteries. Customers can only hope the final product will be truly golden.

Statistics show that there is not enough Canola or Cotton Seed oil in the world to service the McDonald's Corporation's needs.

Small size big at exposition

By Stanley Miller II
Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

LAS VEGAS — The artists who design our high-tech toys are making the next generation of gadgets smaller, lighter, with more storage capacity and better battery life.

There might not have been "one big thing" that dominated this month's 2005 International Consumer Electronics Show. That would be difficult with thousands of exhibitors, more than 130,000 attendees and more than 1 million square feet of show space.

But despite the lack of any revolutionary inventions, there is a lot to look forward to this year if the devices on display keep the promises of their spec sheets and product managers.

The consumer electronics industry is trying to catch up with the success of Apple Computer and its popular iPod, which has become a default term for digital music player.

There were dozens of competing players and for good reasons: according to the Consumer Electronics Association, sales of digital music players doubled in 2004 to nearly 7 million units.

No one was willing to boldly predict that their player would supplant the iPod, but everyone wants a piece of the action.

For example, iRiver launched a promising new digital music player at the show called the H10. The name might not rival the iPod, but its features, design and price might.

The H10, which will be available at the end of the month for $280, weighs 3.4 ounces and measures 3.8 inches long by 2.2 inches wide by 0.6 inches deep. It has five gigabytes of storage, a bright color screen for viewing digital images and a built-in FM tuner.

The device works with Windows Media Player 10 and can synchronize music, photos and playlists with a PC over a USB 2.0 connection. The H10 is compatible with several digital download services, including MSN Music, Musicmatch, MusicNow, Napster and Wal-Mart Music.

Most impressive is its promised battery life: up to 150 hours of playtime.

For people who need more storage space, Sony announced the latest addition to its line of Network Walkman digital music players called the NW-HD3.

COURTESY MILWAUKEE JOURNAL SENTINEL

Though not as recognizable as a name brand, many consumers say that the H10 may potentially overshadow the success of the iPod.

Again, the name isn't very inspiring, but the combination of a 20-gigabyte hard drive, up to 30 hours of battery life and a choice of five colors is promising.

The Network Walkman player is compatible with Sony's Connect music service, but it also works with basic MP3 music files, which can be transferred over a USB 2.0 connection.

And for active (or careless) users, the new players have Sony's shock protection technology called G-Protection in case they're dropped and to prevent skipping if they're being jostled around. The players are scheduled to go on sale next month for $350.

A digital video camcorder adds a new dimension to vacations, family gatherings and other special events. And Sony's new DCR-PC55 Mini DV Handycam is small enough to conveniently tag along for more casual occasions, with a profile that is slightly larger than a deck of cards.

Despite its small size, the DCR-PC55 still uses the popular mini digital videocassettes. The camera also has a 10x zoom and a 3-inch liquid crystal display for lining up shots and reviewing footage.

This camcorder, one of six models Sony announced at the Consumer Electronics Show, is compatible with a desktop cradle called a Handycam Station, which charges the cameras and connects them to a computer or TV.

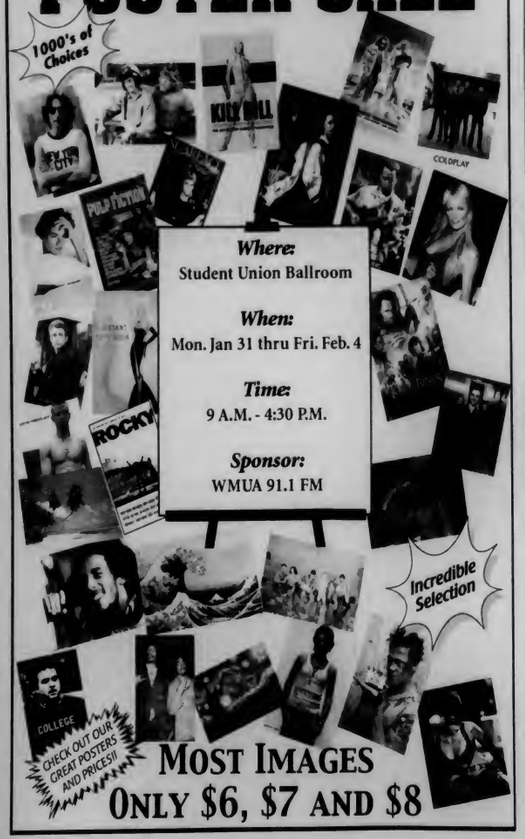
The cradle-camcorder combination is an attempt to better integrate the camera into a home computing setup. Often, camcorders sit on a shelf or in their travel bags until needed, but the Handycam Station can change that.

The DCR-PC55 will come in silver, black, red and white when it ships next month for $800.

Another eye-catching digital camera was a water-resistant model from Pentax called the OptioWP.

It's a 5-megapixel camera that the company says can take high-quality pictures under 3 feet of water without any additional underwater housing.

Pentax says every seam in the camera is protected with rubber sealant, and it's interlocking designed resists dust, pressure and moisture. Even the camera's 3x zoom lens is sealed within the body of the camera.



The OptioWP shouldn't burden active outdoors enthusiasts or travelers, measuring 4 inches by 2 inches by 0.9 inches and weighing 4.2 ounces. In addition to 10 megabytes of internal memory, the camera accommodates a Secure Digital card to store images. The camera is scheduled to ship in April for $400.

The Casio QV-R62: A 6-megapixel digital camera with a 3x optical zoom, a 2-inch LCD and Casio's proprietary Exilim technology for quick picture taking. Available this month for $400.

Wireless carriers are gearing up for video-on-demand services and the companies that make mobile phones showed off several models that can handle downloading and displaying that kind of content.

Sanyo showed off its MM-7400, which can stream audio and video at up to 15 frames per second as well as take still images and record 30-second video clips.

THE BIGGEST BACK TO SCHOOL
POSTER SALE

Where:
Student Union Ballroom
When:
Mon. Jan 31 thru Fri. Feb. 4
Time:
9 A.M. - 4:30 P.M.
Sponsor:
WMUA 91.1 FM

MOST IMAGES
ONLY $6, $7 AND $8

ALUMNI ASSOCIATION

ATTENTION FACULTY AND STAFF

Do you know a Senior that is deserving of the Alumni Association Senior Leadership Award? Please help us identify deserving students by nominating them today!

The Senior Leadership Award was established by the UMass Amherst Alumni Association to recognize graduating seniors at UMass Amherst who have demonstrated outstanding leadership and service to the campus. Seniors who have made major contributions in areas such as academic excellence, student organizations, athletics, campus jobs, or community and volunteer services are eligible. In addition to active involvement in the life of the campus, eligible candidates must demonstrate a serious commitment to their academic pursuit.

Nomination forms are available online at UMassAlumni.com/students. For any additional information, contact Melanie Corbeil in the Alumni Association at 545-2317.

Deadline: Wednesday, February 9, 2005 - 5 p.m.

STSTRAVEL.COM
Join America's #1 Student Tour Operator
CANCUN
ACAPULCO
JAMAICA
BAHAMAS
FLORIDA
SPRING BREAK 2005
Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Travel Free
1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

Discover Your LOVER
The Collegian Dating Game

Sign Up Now!
Sign-ups will be held in the Campus Center Concourse TODAY through Thursday Feb. 3rd from 11-2

Win A Free Date!

3 lucky Men and 3 lucky Women will be selected to go on blind dates. Collegian readers will vote online to select who will date whom!

Look in the Arts Section for:
The 3 Men on Tuesday, February 8th
The 3 women on Wednesday, February 9th

Start voting online Wednesday, February 9th
www.dailycollegian.com

Harrison talks down on Mitchell

By Eddie Pells
Associated Press

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. — Even without the pads on, New England safety Rodney Harrison delivered quite a blow.

Asked whether he will say anything to Eagles wide receiver Freddie Mitchell, who dissed the Patriots' secondary last week, Harrison took his shot.

"What would I say?" he said. "It's Freddie Mitchell."

And with that, Super Bowl week was on.

The Eagles and Patriots, two teams with very little history or animosity between them, opened America's big football celebration with a nice bit of trash talking Sunday at the first of the dozen or so news conferences that will take place during the week.

This was Harrison's first chance on the Super Bowl stage to respond to Mitchell. Last week, the Eagles receiver said he couldn't name any of the Patriots defensive backs except for Harrison, about whom he said, "I've got something for him."

Harrison, who has spent much of his 11-year career playing the us-against-the-world card to anyone who would listen, found his perfect foil in Mitchell, who let political correctness take a back seat and greased the wheels for this Super Feud.

"You're always going to find one jerk out of the bunch. Just like Vanderjerk. Mike Vanderjerk," Harrison said, referring to Colts kicker Mike Vanderjagt, who earlier in the postseason suggested the Patriots were ripe for a loss. "You're always going to find one guy like that who wants some attention and wants to do something to try and stir up the emotions of the game."

Not surprisingly, Mitchell was unavailable at the Eagles' media opportunity Sunday. Also not surprisingly, coach Andy Reid tried to sidestep the inevitable questions about how he reacted when he heard what Mitchell said.

"That's between Freddie and I," Reid said.

Meanwhile, Eagles quarterback Donovan McNabb understandably took his teammate's side in the fray, framing Mitchell's comments as meaningless blather made during the tedious bye week.

"Freddie didn't mean anything by them. It's sad that people have to blow them up to make them into a story," McNabb said. "Freddie apologized. If someone needs those comments to get up for a game like this, they don't need to be here. This is the Super Bowl, this is the ultimate."

The Mitchell-Harrison imbroglio took at least a temporary bite out of the other main "football" stories of the week: whether the Eagles will get lost in the hoopla of playing in their first Super Bowl since 1981 (Reid said he'll give the players their freedom, treat them like adults); whether the Patriots, seeking their third title in four years, are on the verge of a dynasty (Coach Bill Belichick insists the past has nothing to do with this week); and, most notably, whether Eagles star receiver Terrell Owens will deem his injured ankle sturdy enough to play.

Owens, who tore up the ankle Dec. 19 and has missed the last four games, has not received clearance to play from the surgeon who operated on his ankle.

Nevertheless, the receiver hasn't ruled himself out of the game and his status has become the overarching theme of the buildup to the big game.

"It seems like everyone talks about the Patriots, then when they talk about the Eagles, it's what T.O. will do," McNabb said. "If he plays, you'll talk about him. If he doesn't play, you'll talk about him anyway."

Reid said Owens has been steadily increasing his work and will try to "do a few things" at a light practice Monday, but his availability won't be determined until much later in the week.

And while there will almost certainly be an entire week to speculate on Owens, it's hard to know how long the Mitchell mess will last.

Even if it was only for a fleeting day, it was good stuff.

"When he says something like that, he's disrespecting our whole defense," Patriots linebacker Willie McGinest said. "Not only Rodney, but me, and Teddy Bruschi and Mike Vrabel and all the rest of us."

But especially Harrison.

"Maybe he was drinking before he started talking," he said. "That was clearly a mistake, because no one in this league would attack somebody a week before the Super Bowl."

Owens close to playing in Super Bowl

By Rob Maaddi
Associated Press

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. — T.O. is almost a go.

Terrell Owens, the Philadelphia Eagles' All-Pro receiver, practiced Monday for the first time since injuring his ankle last month, moving closer toward returning for the Super Bowl.

"I won't say anything outside of He looks great. He looks great. He looks great," Eagles safety Michael Lewis said.

Owens took part in less than one-third of the team's 30 plays, getting a pass each time he ran a route. Just last week, Dr. Mark Myerson, the surgeon who operated on Owens' right ankle in December, said he would not clear him to suit up against the New England Patriots on Sunday.

"We limited what he did, but he did it well, and he did it with the team," Eagles coach Andy Reid said. "He moved around pretty well. I'll have to see how he does before we decide whether he'll play."

Owens hasn't played since he severely sprained his ankle and broke his leg in a game against Dallas on Dec. 19. He's expected to be on the field when the Eagles resume practice on Wednesday.

In his first season with the Eagles after eight years in San Francisco, Owens led Philadelphia with 77 catches for 1,200 yards and 14 TDs.

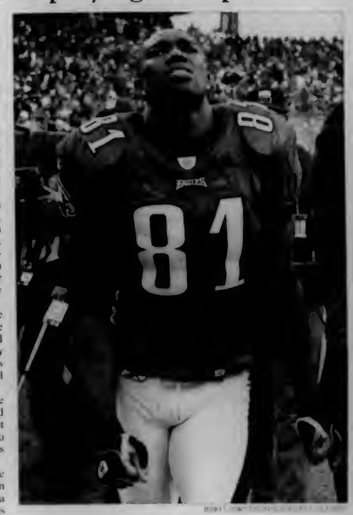
"It's always a lift when you can get anyone out there, an added weapon," quarterback Donovan McNabb said. "He did make some big plays for us. He did an excellent job of coming in and presenting a different type of feel for our passing attack."

Myerson inserted two screws in Owens' ankle and a plate on the outside of the ankle three days after he was injured. Owens was told after surgery that he had only an outside chance of returning for the Super Bowl, which was 6 1/2 weeks away at the time. But he rehabbed vigorously, hoping to help Philadelphia win its first NFL championship since 1960.

After a check-up last week in Baltimore, Myerson said that while he's pleased with Owens' recuperation, the operation requires a recovery period of eight to 10 weeks. Myerson added that any attempt to accelerate the rehabilitation process poses the same risk for injury.

The final decision on Owens' status will come down to the player, Reid and the team's medical staff.

"Could the same injury occur? Yes," Reid said. "But he won't damage it any further than he already has."



Owens wasn't available for comment. He's supposed to take part in Tuesday's interview sessions.

"He looked pretty smooth out there," tight end L.J. Smith said. "He's not trying to push it. He's getting his timing down and he caught a couple balls."

The injury to Owens was a devastating blow for a team that dominated the NFC and clinched the No. 1 seed in the conference after just 14 games. Owens invigorated the Eagles with his attitude, enthusiasm and stellar performance, adding a swagger to a team that desperately needed a personality.

With him, the offense was extremely potent, averaging 25.4 points in 14 games. After Owens was injured, the Eagles lost the last two regular-season games in which most starters hardly played and others were rested.

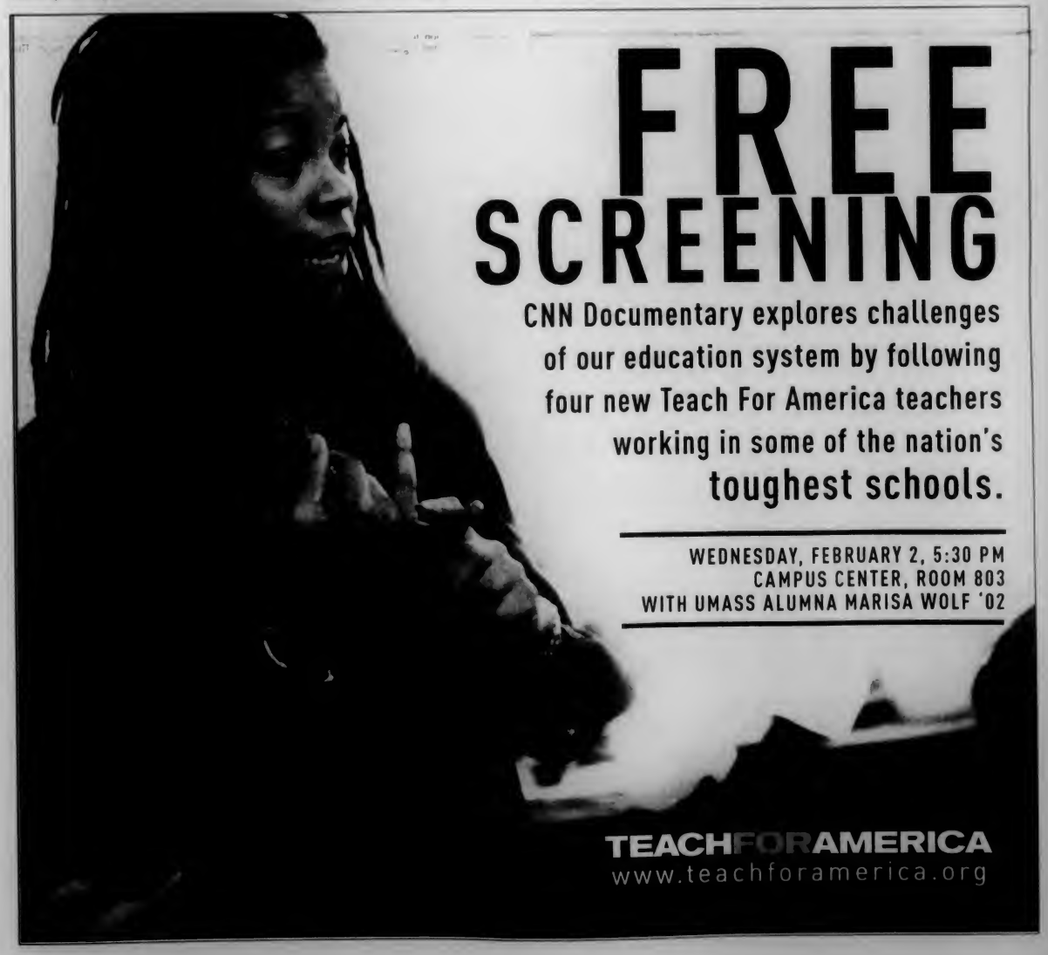
But the Eagles are 2-0 without Owens in games that matter. While the offense hasn't been dominant without Owens, they've scored 27 points in each of their playoff games against Minnesota and Atlanta.

Terrell Owens was injured on Dec. 19, in a game against the Cowboys. Owens is expected to return for the Super Bowl.

Boston gives zero-tolerance to rioters

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — Mayor Tom Menino warned the city's colleges on Monday that the rowdiness that marred recent sports celebrations won't be tolerated on Super Bowl Sunday.



Menino met with representatives from 27 colleges and universities — including the presidents of Boston University, Northeastern University, Emerson College and Suffolk University. He urged them to clamp down on drinking and take swift action against students who cause trouble.

"We're giving them a strong message: zero tolerance," he said. "If they don't want to take consequences against their students, we'll find ways we can take consequences against the students."

Menino declined to say what action he would take. He's also sending letters to liquor stores, warning them against selling large quantities of alcohol to students.

Police Commissioner Kathleen M. O'Toole said officers will be out in force and coordinating with the Department of Corrections in case there are mass arrests. She said the security plan will be similar to one used during the final game of the World Series.

One weapon police won't be carrying is the pepper pellet gun that caused the death of 21-year-old Emerson student Victoria Snelgrove after the Red Sox's American League pennant victory against the New York Yankees.

FREE
SCREENING
CNN Documentary explores challenges of our education system by following four new Teach For America teachers working in some of the nation's toughest schools.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 5:30 PM
CAMPUS CENTER, ROOM 803
WITH UMASS ALUMNA MARISA WOLF '02

TEACHFORAMERICA
www.teachforamerica.org

Brown brings in D-1 talent for 2005 season

FOOTBALL from page 12

[illegible] 49ers quarterback Ken Dorsey. Humphrey comes from a long line of outstanding signal callers in Mississippi, including Dorsey and Tennessee Titans wide receiver Drew Bennett.

Meggett, a 6-foot-1, 205-pound defensive back and the nephew of former New England Patriots and New York Giants running back Dave Meggett, left after three years remaining and is taking an assistant job at West Virginia in his hometown of Morgantown. A highly touted receiver coming out of high school, Meggett was ranked as one of the top 150 players in the country by Prep Star Magazine as a senior and was the only player in New York to make Prep [illegible].

Dawson, a 6-0, 200-pound defensive lineman, redshirted for Coach Mills' first year with more than a year remaining at UMass. A local product out of Cambridge Rindge and Latin High School, Taylor wrestled and played football for six seasons, beginning in seventh grade, and won three league championships on the mat before eventually settling on football.

UMass finished 2004 at 6-5 in its first season under new head coach Don Brown. The Minutemen return their top two players at all 11 positions on defense, and lose only two starters on offense as they look to earn their second Atlantic 10 title in three seasons.

The Maroon and White's 2005 season is tentatively scheduled to kick off with a conference battle at Richmond on Thursday night Sept. 1, followed by the home opener at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium against Albany. Dates and times of these games have yet to be announced.

Bonnies are no slouch

WOMEN'S HOOPS from page 12

[illegible] would extend their winning streak to a school record 21 games.

BONNIES PICKING UP STEAM

"No. [illegible] surprise. The [illegible] is that it's St. Bonaventure's University is [illegible] of two-time winning streaks. They are winners of four of their last seven, and [illegible] 10-2 in conference play. Co-third in the A-10 East with a 3-6 conference record (8-12 overall).

At home, Olean, N.Y. [illegible] one of the toughest places to play in the A-10, [illegible] outside the Weber County news [illegible] attendance record for a women's game that was set last Friday against Massachusetts.

The defensively-sound Minutewomen had an unusually tough time dealing with the outside shooting of point guard Stefanie Collins, who went three of six from beyond the arc.

Although the former A-10 Rookie of the Year proved to be a menace, it was the inside skill of forward Tory Vyborny (17 points, 11 rebounds) that helped the Bonnies to a victory that on paper looked more like a high-scoring football game than a low-scoring basketball affair.

BEHAVIORAL HEALTH NETWORK
HUMAN SERVICES RESIDENTIAL STAFF
Direct care staff needed for all shifts, day, evening, weekend, overnight (asleep/awake), full, part time and relief positions available in Hampshire County and surrounding communities. Assist individuals with developmental disabilities in their homes, day/vocational programs, respite sites or residential programs. A High school diploma or equivalent, accesses to reliable transportation preferred. Experience helpful but not mandatory, on-going training available. Generous benefit package at 30 hours. Salary: $9.00- $9.73/hr
Please send cover letter and resume to:
Attn: Program Directors
Behavioral Health Network,
492 Pleasant St.
Northampton, MA 01060
AA/EOE

Swim team has huge regular season finale

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Perfect, seamless, flawless. These are all adjectives that describe the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving season as it capped off an undefeated regular season with a win over Fordham last Saturday. The Minutemen outscored Fordham 175-120 on their way to the ninth undefeated season ever posted by a men's UMass swimming and diving team.

For a team that has revolved around being in first place, UMass proved once again why it won the last four Atlantic-10 championships. The team was led by senior Dylan Smith, who was a force, placing first overall in three individual trials (1000-yard freestyle, 200-yard butterfly, 500-yard freestyle) and accounting for 27 points. This marks the fourth time this season that Smith has placed first overall in the 200-yard butterfly.

Help also came from sophomore Jake Hogue and senior Justin Zeimetz. Hogue won two individual events (100-yard breaststroke, 200-yard breaststroke) and came in second in another (200-yard individual medley). Zeimetz was a part of a first place 200-yard medley relay, and came in first in the 50-yard freestyle and the 100-yard freestyle. The 200-yard medley relay was also made up of senior Matt Woodward, sophomore Mike Cordes and sophomore Evan Swisher, who won it with a time of 1:36.96. Individually, Swisher placed first in the 200-yard backstroke and finished second in the 100-yard backstroke. In the diving portion of the meet, freshman Reuben Rappe placed first in the three-meter event and second in the one-meter diving.

On the women's side, UMass came up short to Fordham, losing 123-175. Regardless of the loss, strong performances turned up from Sophomore Nicole LeBarge and Senior Colleen Wasson. As she had in five previous meets, LeBarge placed first in the 50-yard freestyle and second in the 100-yard freestyle. Wasson was consistent in placing second in the 200-yard breaststroke, 100-yard breaststroke and 200-yard individual medley. The diving segment included two wins by Melissa Pond and Mary Jenkins in the three-meter diving event.

Women's head coach Bob Newcomb is hopeful that their hard work will payoff in the long run.

"This team has attitude as far as training goes," coach Newcomb said. "One attribute is that they are very team oriented and that is very important if you want to succeed in this sport especially."

Both teams will have a break this weekend as they prepare for the Atlantic-10 championships on February 16-19 in Buffalo, NY. The men have won the past four championships and are looking to complete their "drive for five," as the women hope to add a second the program. The men and women's swimming and diving teams completed one of the best seasons in the history of the program.

FILE PHOTO/UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

The UMass swim team celebrates defeating Boston College on Jan. 22. The Maroon and White finished its season strong in the Bronx on Saturday.

Iasiello dominates right under the radar attend.

IASIELLO from page 12

"I wanted to go to a big school in a quiet town, and not be too far from home," she said.

After a visit to Amherst, meeting the team and sitting down with Coach Orlando, Jennifer decided that come the Fall of 2001, she would attended the University of Massachusetts, Amherst.

"I wanted to be a key player", Jennifer said, "and UMass gave me that opportunity".

Being a freshman in college can be quite a difficult time in the life of a student. Balancing education, social time, and everything else can be overwhelming. Yet the life of an athlete means that there's even less free time for you.The very mention of freshman year brings a smile to Iasiello's face, almost as if she is recalled the entire experience in a quick flash.

"When I came here I wanted to please everyone, and prove myself to the team," she mentioned.

Jennifer had to fill into an unusual role for her, being second best on the team.

"When I came here there was another girl from Rhode Island here, Christina Bizon, and she was the champion in the Hammer Throw at both indoor and outdoor, so I fell into a secondary role," said Iasiello said.

Yet soon enough, Jennifer would have the forum to prove herself. Freshman year Iasiello did a phenomenal job in her secondary role. Once again her achievements piled sky high: 4th place in the hammer throw at the A-10 Outdoor Championship (147'5"), 6th in the weight throw at the A-10 Indoor Championship (45'1"), 15th in the weight throw at the New England Indoor Championship (46'3") and 10th in the hammer throw in the New England Outdoor Championship (151'0").

Yet the following year Jennifer's friend Christina would transfer to conference rival URI, and her role would become more vital to the team.

"When she transferred there a lot of my teammates were like ' There goes ten points, because Crissy is on our rivals team', so I felt I needed to step it up for my teammates," said Iasiello.

The opportunity to step up confronted Iasiello in the Atlantic 10 Outdoor Championship on Early May of 2002. It was there that Iasiello was marked an underdog in the hammer throw and face to face in competition with her former teammate, friend, and defending champion Christina Bizon. Iasiello admits that her teammates seemed to already had conceded victory to their former teammate, but Jennifer had no plans on going out without a fight. Going into the final throw Jennifer was in 3rd place till another competator on their final throw knocked her back to 4th.

Iasiello credits that for lighting her competitive fire.

"For some odd reason, after that I became really determined, and I said to myself, 'I' am not losing this competition," she mentioned.

She still recalls turning to a male teammate right before she began to warm up to throw and saying to "I'm going to win this now". What pursued was a throw of 154 feet and 2 inches (or for a football fan 51 yards), a throw that any punter would be happy to kick, a personal record for Iasiello, an accomplishment that would win her the Atlantic 10 Outdoor Championship in the Hammer Throw.

"I just remember hearing my name being announced as Atlantic 10 Champion and throwing up the number 1, and 225 pound Coach O jumping around in excitement," she smiles at the memory of her day in the sun. "It's a feeling I still reflect on to this day."

When asked about what she wants to achieve this year, Iasiello says, "I want to go out on top. I want to do the best I can. I don't know what the competition is like this year, and I really don't care. I just want to beat my best."

"The best part about Jen is I never have to worry about her", said Coach O. "I know she's always prepared mentally, and it's nice to know that she is a big time performer, the bigger the event, the better the throw."

It's with this attitude that Jen will embark on her senior year of Track and Field.

"Hopefully we can get her to beat the school record," Coach O said. "That would be special."

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
NOW HIRING
FOR
Special Issues Coordinator & Promotions Manager
Boost your resume,get real business experience, earn cash, and have some fun!
Possibility of receiving internship credits
Now accepting applications. Come to the Campus Center Basement Rm 113 or call 545.3500 and ask for Tiffany.

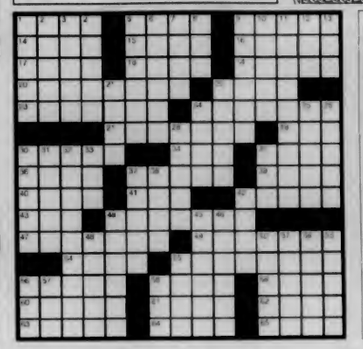
ALUMNI ASSOCIATION
ATTENTION ALL SKIERS & SNOW BOARDERS!
The UMass Amherst Alumni Association and the Blandford Ski Area present
UMASS Amherst Days February 4 and February 18
All day lift tickets (8:30 a.m. - 4:00 p.m.) are just $10 with your Student ID!
For directions and information, visit SkiBlandford.org
You were. You are. UMASS.

Get Minutemen scores on your cellphone!
with our new wireless services

Go to www.dailycollegian.com and look for the "Wireless Services" link

Quote of the Day

"It's better to help people than garden gnomes."



-Amelie

ACROSS
1 Backups
5 Racetrack shape
9 Raised, as the ante
14 Conspire
15 Soft drink
16 Old Scandinavians
17 Musical medley
18 Branch of math
19 Loses footing
20 Measure of electrical power
22 Tailor's line
23 Force into bondage
24 Skater's milieu
27 Dictionary
29 Khaki shade
30 Miniature
34 Actor Chaney
35 Conceal
36 Ice-cream holder
37 Buff
39 Wicked
40 Presley's middle name
41 Oolong or Darjeeling
42 Bring to bear
43 Iron Sea rule
44 Foundation for a highway
47 Layered board
49 Mimic
54 Disposition
55 Receding seas
56 Rant and rage
58 Markdown event
59 Landlord's due
60 Entertain
61 Exploiter
62 Otherwise
63 Skinflint
64 Scottish loch
65 Low grades

DOWN
1 Delivered an address
2 Worn out
3 Makes dirty
4 Barfly's perch
5 Musical span
6 Whirlwind or whirlpool
7 Landed
8 Fall behind
9 Hidden
10 Bear breed
11 Uncivilized
12 Kreskin's forte
13 Plaines, IL
21 Mural site
22 Doughy pastry
24 PC symbol
25 Lowest point
26 Prepared to play
28 Epic war story
30 Rascal
31 High-minded
32 Unknown author
33 Author Deighton
35 Spell
37 Tolerated
38 Main part of a bud
42 Correct a manuscript
44 Lodges
45 Gideons, gifts
46 Dying coals
48 More unfavorable
50 Weary
51 Dancer Fred's sister
52 Not at all relaxed
53 Senator Kefauver
55 Facilitate
56 Shepard or Houston
57 PA nuclear accident site
58 Baltimore paper

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NEW!! Wireless Internet
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
February Special!
$1.50 PBR Bottles; Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
TUES. ·Tonight is Trivia Night! starting at 9pm
WED. ·Busted Vaccum
THU. ·Apollo Sunshine
FRI. ·Irish Sesiun
"Come Play Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. · N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

Want to increase the size of your Piggy bank?
Advertise with The Daily Collegian
and watch your profits grow
Contact our advertising dept. 545-3500

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You've got to drop it like it's hot, drop it like it's hot.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Today you are going to hear a very interesting piece of news.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Perhaps a little meditation will help clear your mind.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
There is nothing special in store for you today. Better luck tomorrow.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Creative things are going to come flying out of your head all day long.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Try not to wander around in circles all day long.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Time to sit down and watch a movie the whole way through. Do not fail.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Lots of people will be stopping by your room now that it's nice and cozy.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Don't let your friend be stolen away by that person of the opposite sex.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Today, a childhood memory will come back to haunt you.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You should wear your hat of many colors all the time.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Keep that smile on your face all day long, because you have a lot to be happy about.

Don't let your business get swept away by waves of competitors
Advertise with the Collegian
545-3500

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

APARTMENT FOR RENT

1 bedroom available North Amherst $425 includes heat & electric, bright, clean, washer/dryer in Condo on bus route 1 mile to UMass female preferred Call Liz 508-367-8893

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms; hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Amherst two bedroom condo on busline $75+. Call Paul 413-687-1416

AUTO FOR SALE

Geo Prism Runs Well 123K Bluebook $1430.- Asking $1150.- 413-323-7682

1998 Pontiac Grand Prix 68,000K New Tires Excellent Condition $5000.00 256-3756

CHILDCARE

Early Riser Needed 7:00am to 8:15pm 2 to 4 days a week. Occasional afternoon and Evenings. For 8yr old girl. $10.00 an hr. Please call 584-8312 maria.gallo@umassmed.edu

EMPLOYMENT

Movie extras, actors, models! Make $100-$400/day No experience required, FTPT, All looks needed! 1800-340-5939 Ext. 1054

Zvar Outdoor is seeking applications for 2005 Seasonal raft guides. No experience necessary, will train (weekends in Feb-March). A positive Customer Service attitude and knowledge of outdoor recreation a plus. Application deadline: Feb 8th call 413-339-4010 or see www.Zvaroutdoor.com/jobs.htm EOE

Companion for elder wanted, weekends and part-time. Cheerful and light-hearted a PLUS! $10/hr, 413-268-0051

EMPLOYMENT

Top Boys Sports Camp in Maine! Play + coach sports Have Fun Make $$$ Camp Counselors Positions available Summer 2005 Apply Online www.campcobbossee.com or call 1-800-473-6104

JV Lacrosse Coach Amherst it's mid March to early June Playing experience required coaching experience preferred Pd Position Roger Jones 549-3983

Top Boys Sports Camp in Maine! Play & Coach Sports * Have Fun * Make $$$ Camp Counselors Positions Available Summer 2005 Apply Online www.campcobbossee.com or call 1-800-473-6104

EMPLOYMENT

Drivers & Kitchen Help Wanted. Must be able to work 20hrs A week. Apply at DP Dough, Amherst

"Bartending" $300/Day Potential. No Experience Nesc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

ROOM FOR RENT

Bedroom for rent in spacious house in Leverett Call Brett 413-219-5808

ROOMMATE WANTED

Roommate Wanted Preferably Girl Brandywine Apts $495.00 a month + utilities Heat & Hotwater included Call Jess at 413-281-8097

SERVICES

Female Puffton 1 Room $40.00 Nego. 617-921-7740

SERVICES

Need Just Evacuation and Repatriation Coverage? Check out BETA! $250,000 Evacuation, $25,000 Repatriation COST is $18 for 6 MONTHS! Online enrollment, emailed verification of coverage www.betausa.com

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992

TRAVEL

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house Certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

TRAVEL

Spring Break 2005 Only 6 weeks left!.. Lowest Prices Biggest Parties Earn 2 Free Trips Exclusive with Sun Splash Tours www.sunsplashtours.com 1800-426-7710

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $499! Award Winning Company! SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

TRAVEL

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, & Florida! Best Parties, Best Hotels, Best Prices! Limited Space! 1-800-234-7007 www.endless-summertours.com

WANTED

Screen/Script writers needed for local Film Company Fifthowner@hotmail.com

Snowboard events intern $50/day stipend. For job description email jfriends@dept.tucklt.edu

With your friend Happy Birthday in the classifieds! Student discount. Call 545-3500 or visit us in the Campus Center Basement 9am - 4pm

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 2005

SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Behind the scene dominance

By Dan Hillman
Collegian Staff

There's a place out behind Rudd Field that is not on any campus map. As a matter of fact, the place doesn't exist unless you are told it is there.

It is a stretch of open field that in the autumn lies lazily under the quickly balding changing trees of the season, alone and silent, in the summer it's undetected, and in the deep winter lies untouched. It has thick, leveled grass, and is mostly used by locals and their dogs. On the far corner of the field there is a rust cage that is slouched over by years of being deprived, and in front of that elderly cage there is an imperfect concrete platform, one which was made just a few years ago by throwing Coach Bob Otrando, because there was none. It is here that you can find a normal girl, with an extraordinary ability and her coach six days a week striving hard to be the best at what she does.

Jen Iasellio is much like any of the 20,000 undergraduate students at UMass. She is a senior, she lives off campus with some friends, and is an Exercise Science major. She has little to no clue about what next year will bring for her. Yet there is one thing that Jen is fairly certain of, her desire to be the best at the Hammer Throw.

"I want to go out on top," Jen says with a determined look on her face.

In a large University where the alumni and students attention tends to be paid mostly toward a rebuilding basketball program and a football team stuck like so many other collegiate football programs, in the purgatory of Division I-AA, our University boasts one of the premier individual college athletes in New England. Jennifer Iasellio grew up in Barrington, Rhode Island, a small New England town, much like any other. According to Jennifer the only highlight in Barrington is the Dunkin' Donuts.

COURTESY OF MASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Senior thrower Jennifer Iasiello

"It's the kind of town that everyone knows each other, and is a nice place to grow up," she says as she protects her eyes from the sun.

It was there that her mother, Susan, and her father, Anthony, raised Jennifer. Jennifer first sport was softball, she use to catch in middle school and early on in high school, and it was there that she gained her competitive drive. Yet, her desires to be part of a competitive team lead her to trying out Track and Field. Initially she joined the indoor track team in the winter, yet by the time the trees began to blossom and the birds began to chirp it was decision time for Iasiello.

"My Track coach asked me to stick around for the spring season and try it out, and from that point on, Track won out," she said.

It was in High School that Jennifer went under the tutelage of Bob Gorley. A man Jennifer credits for teaching her the art of the Hammer Throw.

"He kept things positive and taught me what I needed to know. My mother was a gymnast and my father was a swimmer, so they didn't know anything about it," she mentioned.

Jennifer also gives credit to Bob for opening her eyes to the fact that her abilities could take her elsewhere. "Colleges look for this," she recalls her coach saying in a conversation with her back in High School, "If you can do it well they will offer you a scholarship", and with that in mind, Jennifer began to pledge all her efforts to being the best.

After four years of High School at Barrington High, Iasiello left her imprint on the track and field program. Throwing the discus, the shotput, and the hammer thuckily for Iasiello Rhode Island is one of the few states in the nation in which the High School Athletic Committees recognize the event), Jennifer left the school with a laundry list of achievements. Four year letter winner, school record in the hammer throw (151' 7") and weight throw (47'), All Division, All Class from 1998 to 2001, All State in 99 and Senior Captain, just to name a few of her many achievements.

Jennifer gained the attention of most major schools in the country, as she was national ranked.

"Before I became serious about Track, the only schools I was looking into were small local Rhode Island schools, but once Track took off, letters started pouring in from everywhere, and coaches were calling asking me to visit and telling me they would give me scholarships, it was crazy," Iasiello said.

Yet Jennifer had an idea of where she wanted to See IASIELLO on page 10

Brown reels in talented bunch

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts football coach Don Brown announced on Monday that seven players have been added to the team's roster for the start of spring practice. Six of the players are transfers, with five coming from Division I-A schools.

Offensive linemen Brent Caldwell (Syracuse) and Jon Carnes (Rutgers), quarterback Taylor Humphrey (Hawaii), defensive back Michael Meggett (West Virginia) and defensive lineman Lateef Taylor (Cincinnati) will be eligible to begin practicing with the team immediately and can participate in the 2005 season per NCAA transfer rules, which state that a player does not lose a year of eligibility if he transfers from down a division, from Division I-A to Division I-AA.

Tailback Shawnn Gyles (Northeastern) follows Brown from Brookline, and will sit out the 2005 season for the Minutemen. Gyles will then have two years of eligibility remaining when he returns in the spring of 2006. He will be remembered by Huskies fans for having one of the most spectacular debuts in college football history after carrying five times for 172 yards and four touchdowns in his first collegiate game against Stonehill College.

Wide receiver Victor Cruz (Patterson, N.J.) was recruited by UMass out of high school, but chose instead to attend prep school at Bridgton Academy. He will enter the program with four years of eligibility, and is the only player of the seven who is eligible to be redshirted.

Cruz shares a hometown with new Minuteman teammate Cesar Rosario, and also played AAU basketball with UMass sophomore guard Art Bowers in New Jersey.

"Obviously this groups increases our depth at all positions," Brown said. "Competition breeds success and all of these players will have chances to earn playing time in their careers at UMass."

MATTHEW BRENNAN/COLLEGIAN

UMass head football coach Don Brown goes over plays at practice with Steve Costello. Brown added seven players to his roster yesterday.

Caldwell, a 6-foot-3 299-pound lineman played in six games for the Orangemen in 2003 and has one year of eligibility remaining, while the 6-foot-4 279-pound Carnes can play three seasons at UMass after seeing no action over two years at Rutgers. Both were named Offensive Lineman of the Year at the high school level, while also starting three seasons apiece for their respective high schools.

Humphrey, a 6-foot 205-pound quarterback who redshirted behind Timmy Chang, the NCAA's all-time leading passer, for the Rainbow Warriors, has four years of eligibility left after a stellar prep career at Miramonte High School in California, where he owns the career passing record once held by current San

See FOOTBALL on page 10

Lappas inks transfer from Pitt

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

As the Massachusetts men's basketball team went through its warm-up routine on Saturday afternoon, before it fell 67-63 to Atlantic 10 rival Richmond, there was an extra person on the bench in street clothes and a bandaged hand.

His name is Dante Milligan, a transfer swing-forward from the University of Pittsburg and the first new player to commit to the Minutemen for the 2005-'06 season.

Milligan stands at 6-foot-8 and weighs in at 200 pounds, yet his size is a bit deceiving. Milligan is a shooter and is poised to add a sizable small forward to an already forward-laden UMass squad. However, due to NCAA rules, Milligan can not play for the Minutemen until the end of the 2005 fall semester.

While at Pittsburg, Milligan has seen limited time and actually redshirted his freshman year, but traveled with the Panthers during their Sweet 16 run. This season, Milligan has been plagued with an injured thumb and has only played in five games. Over those contests, he has averaged 1.4 points and 1.2 rebounds in a combined 23 minutes of play. The last time he played for the Panthers was on Dec. 18, in a 73-42 route of Coppin State.

Milligan was a highly touted recruit out of Trinity-Pawling High School in Pawling, N.Y. Coming out of high school Milligan was ranked as a top-100 recruit. He was ranked No. 28 by HoopScoop, a recruiting journal and was listed at No. 100 by The Sporting News/Rivals.com website. He was also listed as a three-star (out of five) recruit by this same site.

"We are very excited to have Dante as a member of our program," Lappas said to UMass media relations. "He was a top-100 recruit coming out of high school and we are looking forward to getting him back on the basketball court with our team at UMass."

Milligan earned two varsity basketball letters from Trinity-Pawling and put together two solid seasons. As a junior he averaged 17 points per game (ppg) and 10 rebounds per game. His stats took a bit of a dip his senior year, but his 16 ppg and seven boards per game were still good enough to lead his team to a Founders League and a Tri-State League title.

After his senior season Milligan earned several accolades including: being named All-New England, All-Founders League, and Tri-state All League. He was also an honorable mention for the 2003 McDonald's All-American team.

Milligan also has experience outside the high school realm as he was a member of the Long Island Panthers AAU team. The Panthers, led by head coach Gary Charles, are one of the premiere AAU squads in the nation. He won the Las Vegas Big Time tournament in 2001 with the Panthers.

He garnered more tournament experience before college as he played in the Wendy's Big Apple Game in Chicago and the Pittsburg Hoops Classic. He also attended the Adidas ABCD camp and participated in the Three Stripes Tournament.

Pittsburg media relations mentioned that Milligan also was a camp counselor at the New York Knicks basketball camp.

Not to be confused as a one-dimensional athlete, Milligan also lettered in track and field and cross country in high school.

Temple dominating the A-10

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Can anybody stop the Temple Owls?

As of February 1, 2005, the answer looks to be no, at least within the Atlantic 10 Conference.

Boasting a perfect 9-0 record (17-3 overall), a No. 24 ranking in the polls, a remarkable coach in Dawn Staley, two outstanding forwards in Kamesha Hairston and Atlantic 10 Player of the Year candidate Candice Dupree, and winners of 14 straight games (and 16 of their last 18), the Owls are clearly the dominant breed of the A-10.

Following last Sunday's affair, TU looks to be in the driver's seat for the top seed in next month's A-10 tourney, and it couldn't have come on the heels of a more exciting game than the one that went down this past Sunday.

Coming into Philadelphia's Liacouras Center, the Xavier Musketeers and Temple were the only two teams in the A-10 that remained unbeaten, and both stood at the top of their respective East and West divisions.

With the waning seconds of the game winding down and both teams caught in a 62-62 deadlock, the fans began to chant "Kamesha," and Hairston delivered. The scorer of a career-high 31 points and five steals on the day, it was the final two that allowed the Owls to escape victorious.

After a key Dupree block with five seconds to go, Hairston caught a Hail Mary of a pass from Ari Moore, and nailed the ensuing layup as time expired.

Hairston's last-second heroic efforts earned her Big Five Player of the Week honors.

With rematches against Massachusetts and St. Bonaventure, two teams they manhandled in the first meeting, left on their schedule, along with Dayton, Duquesne, Rhode Island and two against St. Joseph's, the Owls could very well go undefeated through the rest of the A-10 season. If so, they

See WOMEN'S HOOPS on page 10

Hockey East: the best of the best

Jeff Howe

There has never been much of a debate as to which conference is at the head of the class in NCAA Division I hockey.

Hockey East, a breeding ground for professional talent, diehard fans, Hall-of-Fame coaches and conference depth from top to bottom, is at it yet again.

The top four teams — Boston College, Boston University, Maine and New Hampshire — are separated by four total points as the final month winds down.

There are few things that hold true during New England winters: the snow falls, the temperature drops and Hockey East action heats up.

Call it cliché, but the regularity of intense competition bet-ween these schools is as cliché as it gets.

But is there anything else more fun to watch?

The rivalries that carry on year after year, built on respect but mostly hatred, are ringing true again.

New Hampshire still hates Maine, BU still hates BC — although, everyone pretty much hates BC — UMass and Maine have developed a rivalry over the past few years, Northeastern still feels like the unwanted middle child of the three Boston-based schools, and Lowell is showing the league not to forget about them, either.

Just take a look at the last week of league-action.

UNH and Boston College squared off Tuesday, putting a pair of unbeaten streaks on the line at Conte Forum.

Neither team broke as they played to a 2-2 tie, improving the Wildcats' Hockey East unbeaten streak to 10 games and the Eagles' overall unbeaten streak to 11 games.

BC won another two games over UMass to improve its streak to 13 games, but UNH lost its momentum during Friday night's visit to Lowell's Tsongas Arena.

The River Hawks were unfriendly hosts as they made a huge statement to all the doubters who didn't give much credibility to their own 14-game unbeaten streak.

Danny O'Brien power the River Hawks' attack by scoring a pair of goals and notching a couple assists during the 7-0 drubbing.

But as the scene shifted from Lowell to Durham on Saturday night, the Wildcats flexed their muscle in front of a raucous crowd of 6,501 at the Whittemore Center and bombarded Lowell with five third period goals to break a 3-3 tie and blow the Hawks out of the arena as 8-3 losers.

The team everyone should be nervous about, though, is Maine. The Black Bears haven't lost a Hockey East contest since Nov. 12 at Northeastern, a streak that is currently at a league-best 11 games.

With a relentless forecheck and a suffocating zone trap, the Bears have been one of the toughest teams to score on for some time now, and Jimmy Howard is one of the most reliable playoff goalies in the nation right now.

Last season's 1-0 triple-overtime shutout victory over the Minutemen in the Hockey East championship will validate that.

So as the regular season winds down, the usual suspects should once again host opening round playoff games at their respective arenas, but more than ever, the top seeds won't have an easy go of it due to the hot play of the bottom tier of teams.

Lowell will likely be the fifth seed, as its rocky start dug them too far into a hole to crawl out of this late in the schedule.

And with Northeastern having its best year since 2001-02, the Huskies are trying to lock up the six-seed, which would currently pair them with Maine during the first round. Maine coach Tim Whitehead admitted earlier that he is concerned with how tough NU plays his club.

With the top of the standings too tight to make any forecasts at this point, one thing can still be certain: when the FleetCenter ice is cleared after the Hockey East champion is crowned on March 19, that team will have an inside track to Columbus for the Frozen Four.

Jeff Howe is a Collegian columnist.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

David Leaderer has four goals this year for UMass. UMass plays in the Hockey East, arguably the best conference in college hockey.

The Daily Collegian

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 2005 · NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 · VOLUME CXV ISSUE 71

Traditional African gospel pays visit to UMass

ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 5

TODAY · High 18 · Low 11°

THURSDAY · High 38 · Low 20°

FRIDAY · High 40° · Low 20°

DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

Enough with the talking, just let T.O. play

SPORTS, PAGE 10

MassPIRG hosts 'RipOff 101' to reveal the high cost of university textbooks

By Dan Terk
Collegian Staff

Yesterday the Massachusetts Students Public Interest Resource Group released the second edition of "RipOff 101," a survey to study the most widely purchased textbooks at dozens of colleges and universities nation wide.

The survey is an extension of the original study released in January 2004. The first part of the report surveyed popular textbooks at 10 West Coast colleges and universities. This second edition is "the most comprehensive study of college textbooks to date," according to Marcin Wolynski, an intern with MassPIRG.

The study found that due to rising costs, textbooks now contribute to one-fifth of the total price of public institutions at an average of about $900 a year. This limits the number of low and middle-income students from attending the public universities that they are suppose to be able to attend.

The statistics put forth by the study "confirm what all students know," Wolynski said. The price of textbooks has increased four times over the rate of inflation since 1994. New editions of books cost 45 percent more than old editions, and are often printed unnecessarily by publishers. According to MassPIRG's data, one of the most "egregious examples" is "Calculus: Early Transcendental, 5th edition" published by Thomson Learning. A new copy of the 5th edition (used in many University of Massachusetts classes) costs $132.26; a used copy of the fourth edition can cost anywhere from $11-$100 at many online sources, yet 76 percent of mathematics professors feel "that the new editions are justified half the time or less."

DAN TERK/COLLEGIAN

Marcin Wolynski of MassPIRG holds a copy of "RipOff 101: Second Edition."

Adding insult to injury, this same book can be purchased by a student in Britain, Africa or the Middle East for only $62. It is this type of artificial price increase that MassPIRG is fighting against. "Thompson apparently does not like American students," says Wolynski.

In addition to arbitrary price increases and unjustified new editions, many publishers take part in bundling. As the report stated: "bundling costs a bundle," and many textbook are only available in a bundle that often includes CDs, study guides and other resources that at first glance may seem helpful. These extra materials are only used by 24 percent of professors while 65 percent say that they are "never" or "rarely" used. These textbooks would have a 10 percent price reduction if sold alone, yet they are rarely available alone.

See TEXTBOOKS on page 3

New picketing code stirs controversy

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Recent revisions to the University of Massachusetts' picketing code have rallied students and faculty after top administrators implemented the updated code despite extreme opposition.

Eduardo Bustamante, President of the Student Government Association, has vehemently opposed the updated code, claiming that it is a "violation of [a] student's rights." The new clause indicates that students may not picket or protest inside an academic building claiming that non-peaceful picketing is disruptive to university workers.

According to Bustamante the proposed plan was discussed in a meeting, comprised of a committee that has campus-wide representation and the updated code was unanimously rejected.

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano and Chancellor John V. Lombardi implemented the code Jan. 21, stating that, "any demonstration within a campus building is inherently disruptive." As of Feb. 1, that particular clause was dropped from the code, according to News Office Director Ed Blagdeszuski. Now all violent picketing is not tolerable.

Gargano and Bustamante have not been in contact since the plan was implemented, but in an open letter from Bustamante to Gargano, he expressed his disgust with the code and that it is a severe violation of university policy.

Gargano issued a statement to the Massachusetts Daily Collegian via e-mail encouraging students to voice their opinions, but to have respect while doing it.

"Freedom to protest does not constitute freedom to disrupt," he said. "The change to the picketing code prohibits disruptive demonstrations inside buildings."

According to Gargano and university policy, any student who chooses to disregard the rule will face the Dean of Students and possible expulsion — a sanction that Bustamante disagrees with all together.

In an open letter to Gargano, Bustamante criticized his lack of commitment to the university, specifically the students. "I got the impression that you used our talents to advance your own agenda," he wrote. "I witnessed your attempts to silence the student voice on some occasions."

Bustamante said he feels that this code is sending the wrong idea to students. "Students are supposed to come here and voice their opinions actively," he said, "now this is like telling them to act passively ... these are not the kind of people we want to produce for the real world."

Gargano said in the e-mail that these new regulations are "intended to bring civility to demonstrations." Additionally he mentioned that previous demonstrations have

See PICKET on page 2

UMass Waste Management enters Recycle Mania contest

By Dan Terk
Collegian Staff

The Office of Waste Management at the University of Massachusetts has entered Recycle Mania, a friendly recycling competition that 50 other colleges and universities nationwide are also taking part in.

UMass choose to participate in Recycle Mania in order to improve its already notable recycling program. The competition is designed to "inspire students through school pride" and provoke them to be more conscious as to what they recycle and what they throw out said John Pepi the General Manager of the office of Waste Management.

"It is difficult," he said, "to motivate students to recycle." It is because of this fact that Recycle Mania was started by Ohio and Maine universities four years ago. Similar competitions between residence hall have been sponsored by the University's own Office of Waste Management in past years. These programs however did not show a great increase in the quantity of recycling.

DAN TERK/COLLEGIAN

Hundreds of pounds of cans and other aluminum products get packed and baled in the UMass recycling process, from bin to market.

The winning school receives a Recycle Mania trophy and a form of "bragging rights." All of the schools that do not win must take out an ad in their universities newspaper promoting the winning school. This is one of the major incentives for students to help in the recycling effort.

The competition has two categories: pounds recycled per student and pounds recycled per total pounds of trash generated. Pepi is not sure if we will be able to win the first category but he thinks he have a good chance in the later.

UMass currently recycles 54 percent of all waste, which ranks the campus as one of the top ten in the nation. Yet only 10 percent of the waste from residence halls is recycled, a number Pepi hopes to be increased to 20 percent. Even worse is that one-third of all the trash thrown out in the residence halls could actually be recycled.

At times students have complained about the recycling on the campus, yet Pepi believes this is simply due to a miscommunication. The trucks that pick up recyclables and trash look the same, therefore many students think that recyclables are actually being thrown out, but this is not true. Also there have been instances that custodians have been seen throwing out recyclables, yet this is not the policy of the Office of Waste Management. If any students want to report any discrepancies about the recycling infrastructure on campus they should feel free to contact the Office of Waste Management.

A campus wide promotion is planned including radio and TV spots, signs, banners, and support from Resident Assistants. "My goal," according to Pepi, "is to take another step forward in recycling and waste management with the students help."

Weekly standings of all the schools as well as more information can be viewed at www.RecycleMania.org.

Career Development Institute director stands trial for fraud

By Adam Goldick
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD — When Gretchen Ortiz was being kicked out of her apartment and needed a new place to live with her two children, it was Gerald Phillips who helped her out.

The director of the city-run Massachusetts Career Development Institute got her a new apartment in a building owned by his brother, paid her rent and utility bills and got her a job wrapping muffins at the bakery operated at the job training center he ran.

But Ortiz's testimony Tuesday in the federal corruption trial against Phillips also portrayed her one-time boss as a controlling figure who threatened to stop supporting her unless she stopped seeing men who were interested in her.

Phillips is on trial with three other former MCDI employees for allegedly bilking about $50,000 from the agency. Prosecutors say Phillips gave Ortiz a no-show job, money, furniture from MCDI and pressured her for sex.

Ortiz acknowledged the help she received from Phillips, and said she sold an MCDI computer that Phillips gave her. She told jurors that she and Phillips would joke about having sex, but she turned down several of his advances.

She said they had sex twice — first in a motel, then several months later at her apartment on her birthday.

"It was quick," Ortiz said through a Spanish interpreter when asked about going to the motel with Phillips, who has not been charged with any sex crimes.

Although the two didn't have an ongoing romance, Ortiz said Phillips was upset when she dated a man named Ricardo.

"He said he didn't want Ricardo to come by because he didn't help me in any way," Ortiz said. She said Phillips threatened to stop paying her bills if she continued seeing Ricardo.

When questioned by Phillips' attorney, David House, Ortiz said Ricardo had pushed her and Phillips later saw to it that she got a restraining order against Ricardo.

But Ortiz said her relationship with Phillips soon became strained, despite his almost daily visits to her apartment when he would help take care of her children.

In order to avoid him, she said she once hid in a closet, then returned to her home in Puerto Rico in late 2000.

Shortly after coming back to Springfield in 2002, Ortiz said she called the FBI when the father of her children told her Phillips was looking for her. At the time, federal officials were investigating Phillips as part of a citywide corruption probe.

Bush's health secretary accuses some states of mismanagement

By Laurie Kellman
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush's new health secretary accused some states yesterday of mismanaging their Medicaid programs and cheating the federal government and taxpayers of as much as $40 billion over a decade.

"We need to have a very uncomfortable but, frankly, necessary conversation with our funding partners, the states," said Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt. "State officials have resorted to what I would refer to as a variety of loopholes and in some cases accounting gimmicks that shift the cost that they claim to pay to the taxpayers of other states."

He said that if the federal government doesn't persuade states to close those loopholes, they will shift as much as $40 billion in what officials describe as a shell game in which the federal government repays states for supposedly spent money.

COURTESY OF WWW.GOV

President Bush's health secretary accused states of cheating the federal government up to $40 billion in the last decade.

The tough talk previewed Bush's budget proposal, due next Monday, in which he has said he will look to control popular benefit programs to save money. Programs like Medicaid are among the biggest and fastest-growing parts of the budget but are also widely popular and difficult for politicians to cut.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Peter Foundas
MANAGING EDITOR Mike Marzelli
BUSINESS MANAGER Rich Pacheco
PRODUCTION MANAGER Cory Rosenberg
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Healy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Tiffany Sugalski
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Samantha M. Nielsen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Michael Busack
CAMPUS EDITOR Alyson Zillmann
EDITORIAL EDITOR Yousef Munayyer
NEWS EDITOR Erika Lovley
PHOTO EDITOR Alex Demosthene
SPORTS EDITOR Bob McGovern
CIRCULATION MANAGER Kristen Weiss
CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING Marty Pappas
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Josh Kagano
FINANCE MANAGER Hirak Shah
ADVERTISING CLERK Virginie Frecaut
HUMAN RESOURCE Sandra Marquez
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Josh Greenberg
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASSISTANT FINANCE Thomas Hecht
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Rachael Bruno
GRAPHICS ADVISOR Charlie Higgins
ASSOCIATE ARTS & LIVING Matthew O'Rourke
ASSOCIATE ARTS & LIVING Chris Gazzara
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Allison Edles
ASSISTANT NEWS Julie O'Donnell
ASSISTANT NEWS Dan O'Brien
ASSISTANT PHOTO Megan Brinster
ASSISTANT SPORTS Jeff Howe

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SUBMITTED. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE. BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1907, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today
NIGHT EDITOR
Meghan Healy
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Andrew Roberts
COPY EDITOR
Matthew Reed
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Cory Rosenberg
PRODUCTION STAFF
Nate Freedman, Josh Wesser

The Pope remains hospitalized because of shortness of breath

By Victor Simpson
Associated Press

ROME — Pope John Paul II was rushed to the hospital urgently Tuesday night after he suffered inflammation of the throat and had difficulty breathing while battling the flu, the Vatican said.

Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said Pope John Paul II was hospitalized "mainly as a precaution."

"The flu which the Holy Father was suffering for three days this evening became complicated by an acute laryngeal tracheitis and larynx spasm crisis," a Vatican statement said Tuesday. "For this reason urgent admission to Gemelli Polyclinic, which occurred at 10:50 p.m. today was decided."

Tracheitis, an inflammation of the trachea, requires hospitalization and usually a breathing tube to keep the airway clear. The spasms are likely a complication from the respiratory illness he's had.

It's possible his Parkinson's disease has made his condition more serious and his breathing more labored.

A Vatican official told The Associated Press on condition of anonymity that the pontiff, who has had the flu since Sunday, had apparently suffered a "breathing crisis."

A close member of the pope's staff, American Archbishop James Harvey, said the pope had congestion and a slight fever during the day.

A State Department official, who asked not to be identified, said the pope would be held overnight for observation but there was no indication he was gravely ill.

Cars with Vatican license plates were speeding toward the Catholic hospital, where the pope had been taken, according to an AP correspondent at the scene.

It was the same Rome Catholic teaching hospital he was taken to when he was shot in the abdomen in 1981 and at which he has undergone several operations.

Navarro-Valls told the Italian news agency ANSA that the pope was in his room in an apartment set aside for him at the hospital, which is near the Vatican.

The frail pontiff has Parkinson's disease, which makes his speech difficult, as well as chronic hip and knee problems.

He was last seen in public on Sunday, when he made his regular noontime appearance at his window overlooking St. Peter's Square and released a dove in a sign of peace. He appeared remarkably lively, but his words were barely audible.

COURTESY ANSA

Pope John Paul II remains hospitalized after being rushed to the emergency room experiencing flu-like symptoms Monday afternoon.

Rev. Shanley back in Mass. as trial closes

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

BOSTON — At the height of the clergy sex abuse scandal, Paul Shanley was brought back to Massachusetts in handcuffs, accused of raping four boys while he was a priest at a suburban church in the 1980s.

The former "street priest," known for his long hair and ministry to troubled youth, became the poster boy for abusive priests as dozens of people filed civil lawsuits saying Shanley had also molested them.

But as Shanley's criminal trial winds down this week, there is only one accuser left, and prosecutors are fighting to convince a jury the man's repressed memories are real.

"It all hinges on the credibility of this one victim," said Michael Cassidy, an associate professor at Boston College Law School.

The trial is one of a handful of criminal cases that prosecutors have been able to bring against priests accused of molesting young parishioners decades ago.

Most of the priests accused in lawsuits avoided criminal prosecution because the alleged crimes were committed long ago, so charges were barred by the statute of limitations. But Shanley moved away from Massachusetts, stopping the clock and allowing authorities to arrest him in California in May 2002.

Archdiocese personnel records showed that church officials knew Shanley advocated sex between men and boys, yet continued to transfer him from parish to parish. He was defrocked by the Vatican last year.

The case started out with four accusers who made nearly identical claims of abuse.

They all said Shanley molested them between 1979 and 1989 at St. Jean's parish in Newton, telling similar stories of being taken from religious classes under the ruse of being "disciplined."

But all four men also said they'd repressed memories of the abuse and recovered them only after the clergy sex abuse scandal broke in Boston in January 2002.

In July, prosecutors dropped charges related to two alleged victims. Then, on the day jury selection began, they dropped charges related to a third victim, leaving only one man to testify against Shanley.

Lombardi and Gargano stand by unpopular code been disruptive and prevented university workers from doing their jobs.

PICKET from page 1

Both Gargano and Blagezueski agree that noisy demonstrations are uncalled for and unnecessary in a working environment. Bladegzeuski, however, added that peaceful picketing is welcomed anywhere on campus.

"The attempt always was to get at the disruptive demonstrating," Bladezeugski said, "and [some behavior] disrupted university business that concerned staff and workers."

Gargano added that certain picketing behavior will not be tolerated. Increasingly, campus demonstrations, particularly those in the Whitmore Administration Building, have become highly disruptive and intimidating to the staff trying to do their work," Gargano said. "There were more instances of banging on doors, pounding on windows and yelling and screaming in a menacing manner, all of which resulted in creating a very threatening environment. Freedom to protest does not constitute freedom to disrupt."

Bustamante and Graduate Student Senate President Uri Strauss wrote an open letter to Lombardi expressing extreme opposition for the code and expressed anger about his inefficiency to listen to the student body.

"In sum, these changes are draconian in nature and will only further diminish the respect students have for those who are responsible for the management of this school," they wrote. "Your attempt to unilaterally impose an unconstitutional requirement in the code of student conduct does nothing to further our mission at the university."

ANDY TARCZYNSKA/COLLEGIAN

The new picketing code states that violent protests "will not be tolerated" inside campus buildings because of faculty members being disrupted.

The University of Massachusetts Amherst
Commission on Campus Diversity
and
Chair Orlando Taylor

Extend an invitation to the UMass Amherst Community to attend
a Public Forum on Campus Diversity and listen to presentations from the Campus Community

Thursday, Febuary 3, 2005
4:00 to 6:00 p.m.
Campus Center Auditorium
(Please note that there is limited seating)

For more information,visit the Campus Diversity Web Site
www.umass.edu/campusdiversity

Clinton named head of Tsunami relief

UNITED NATIONS (AP) — U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan selected former President Clinton on Tuesday to be the U.N. point man for tsunami reconstruction, saying no one could better ensure that the world doesn't forget the needs of the countries devastated by the Dec. 26 disaster.

Clinton said in a statement that he looked forward to serving as Annan's special envoy starting next month.

Soon after the disaster, President Bush named Clinton and his father, President George H.W. Bush, to head a nationwide private fund-raising effort to help the 11 countries affected by the tsunamis. The disaster killed more than 157,000 people and displaced millions of others.

Clinton said he will continue to focus on his work with Bush "to urge people to contribute to this cause, and the two of us hope to visit the region together later this month."

COURTESY CNN.COM

Former President Bill Clinton named head of Tsunami relief.

U.N. spokesman Fred Eckhard said Annan wanted to appoint a special envoy not only to focus on the cleanup and reconstruction but to help resolve conflicts with rebels in the two worst-hit countries — Indonesia and Sri Lanka.

This would give Clinton a chance to use his political skills to tackle longstanding conflicts with rebels in Indonesia's Aceh province.

—Associated Press

Faculty distraught over book prices

TEXTBOOKS from page 1

"This is a class issue," Professor Tony Guglielmi, the Director of the Undergraduate Economics department said.

The increased textbook prices are following a general trend of the increase in public education. According to Guglielmi "public education is in jeopardy in this state." Guglielmi vehemently encouraged other professors and faculty use old editions and nonstandard books to both lower the costs of books for their students and to set an example to the publishers. He also added that most of the textbooks are "not worth the paper they are printed on."

Barak Sered, the Secretary of University Policy of the Student Government Association, also spoke about the need for faculty help. The SGA hopes to have the proposed textbook rental system partially implemented by the Fall 2005 semester. Sered conveyed that if the "faculty were a true ally [the rental system] could get off to a secure start." The current plan is to start with general education classes and then work from there. A book would have to be used for six semesters in order for the program to be successful.

Both Sered and Gugliemi made it clear that faculty cooperation is essential. The rental system could save students 75 percent of textbook costs.

To view the entire report or to see what you as a student can do to help this cause visit www.MakeTextbooksAffordable.org.

Thousands couldn't vote in Iraqi election

By Sally Buzbee
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraq's interim president said Tuesday that tens of thousands of people may have been unable to vote in the country's historic weekend election because some polling places — including those in Sunni Arab areas — ran out of ballots.

As clerks pounded vote-count tallies into computers to compile final results, President Ghazi al-Yawer also said chaos and a power vacuum in Iraq mean U.S. forces need to stay for now, even though a new government will be formed after the results are known.

If true, the allegation that many voters were turned away could further alienate minority Sunnis, who already are complaining they have been left out of the political process.

"Tens of thousands were unable to cast their votes because of the lack of ballots in Basra, Baghdad and Najaf," al-Yawer, himself a Sunni Arab, said at a news conference. Najaf is a mostly Shiite city but Basra and Baghdad have substantial Sunni populations.

Elections officials acknowledged that irregularities kept people away — including in the volatile northern and heavily Sunni city of Mosul — and they called the fact unfortunate. Security worries in Sunni areas were partly to blame for the fact that some polls did not open and ballots were too few, they said.

COURTESY AP.COM

Thousands of Iraqi's were unable to vote in Sunday's election because as certain areas ran out of ballots.

"The elections took place under difficult conditions and this undoubtedly deprived a number of citizens in a number of areas from voting," said Abdul-Hussein al-Hendawi, who heads the Iraqi electoral commission.

At his news conference, al-Yawer was asked whether the presence of foreign troops might be fueling the country's Sunni-led insurgency by encouraging rebel attacks.

"It's only complete nonsense to ask the troops to leave in this chaos and this vacuum of power," al-Yawer said.

He said foreign troops should leave altogether only after Iraq's security forces are built up, the country's security situation has improved and some pockets of terrorists are eliminated.

"At the end of this year, we will witness the beginning of the decrease of forces and not their withdrawal," al-Yawer said. The president has been a strong critic of some aspects of the U.S. military's performance in Iraq, including the three-week Marine siege of the former Sunni rebel stronghold of Fallujah in April.

Sunday's election, which occurred without catastrophic rebel attacks, raised hopes that a new Iraqi government would be able to assume greater responsibility for security, hastening the day when the 170,000 U.S. and other foreign troops can go home.

The first visible reduction could come as soon as March, when thousands of U.S. troops whose tours were extended prior to the election are due to go home. If commanders allow the full rotation out and others are not brought it, it would shrink the overall force to about 138,000.

Student Activities Center
UMassAmherst
UP TO THE MINUTE

February 4:
Something Every Friday:
The Grudge
Eve's Bayou
Campus Center, Rooms 163C & 174-76, 9pm. FREE

February 5:
West Indian Bash
Come dance the night away with a festival of West Indian music: reggae, calypso, and soca. Student Union Ballroom, 9pm. $8 UMass Amherst students/ $12 general public

February 6:
Sunday Night Movies:
The Grudge
Eve's Bayou
Campus Center, Rooms 163C & 174-76, 8pm. FREE

February 7:
Stonewall Center Reception for LBGT People of Color
A chance to network and build an LBGT ALANA group. Stonewall Center, Crampton House, 7pm.

February 8:
Jazz History
A live jazz performance by the Department of Music and Dance. Cape Cod Lounge, Student Union. 11:15am - 1pm. FREE

Student Businesses are open for the semester!
Located in the Student Union: the Bike Coop, Campus Design and Copy, Earthfoods Cafe, People's Market, and Tix Unlimited. Located in the residence halls: Greenough Sub Shop, Sweets 'N More (Field), and Sylvan Snackbar (McNamara).

UMass Amherst Calendar of Events: www.umass.edu/studentsfirst

Hey Juniors, Seniors, Grads and Commuters

PROBLEM

Hassle of grocery shopping, cooking and cleaning up. So many things to do - so little time.

SOLUTION

Now accepted at:

- All Dining Commons
- Bluewall Coffee Bar
- Bluewall Eatery
- Marketplace Café
- Fresh Express
- Hatch Food Court
- Southwest Café
- Whitmore Cafe
- Physical Plant Café
- Pita Pit
- Earthfoods
- Greenough Snack Bar
- Sylvan Snack Bar
- Sweets-n-More Snack Bar
- Starbucks Coffee Cart

Sign up today!
Online at www.aux.umass.edu/diningservices

DINING SERVICES
UMassAmherst

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" -Voltaire

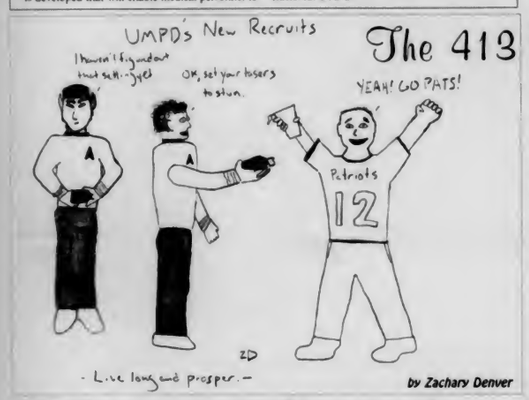
EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

No rush to computerize patient medical records

It is truly a wonder that, in the times we live in, computerized medical records are not a common practice among doctors and hospitals. President Bush recently announced on Thursday that healthcare professionals are behind the times, saying "we've got fantastic new pharmaceuticals that help save lives, but we've got docs still writing records by hand" in an article that appeared on cnn.com. One goal of the Bush Administration this term is to aid in the "computerization of health records".

While moving ahead with technology at light speed may sound like a great idea, there are too many things that need special consideration that computerization may not be the right solution for.

There are many aspects in the healthcare world that have been made easier and more accessible through hooking up to computers and the internet. For health insurance companies, patients are now able to check the status of claims online. For dental offices, patients can be given a burned CD to take home detailing the steps and actions required for certain procedures previously recommended to them by their doctors. Although these are all minor perks that come with modern-times, it is very difficult to see how this would be played out in a clinic or hospital given strict patient confidentiality laws.



As it stands now, medical records are private and highly confidential. No one has authorization to look at them unless clearance is given by the patient. If these records are placed online, there is an extremely high risk that an unauthorized person may gain access to them. Once the technology is developed that will enable medical personnel to put patients' records online and still be compatible with other medical networks, the concern is raised to develop further technology to ensure privacy and appropriate security measures.

In cases where a medical emergency arises, on-call medical information is essential to the patient's health. Granted, having all their information, including medications, past medical history and advanced directives available with a click of a button to come up on a screen is very helpful. However, this technology already exists and is used in more appropriate ways than just at a hospital or doctor's office.

For example, one device called MyVoiceID is essentially a portable personal medical directory. It is pre-programmed by the patient and with the push of a button, reveals everything emergency medical personnel would need to know in order help the patient. This is one of many devices that all offer the same services, which the patient carries on them at all times. Therefore, there is minimal risk of security issues arising and pretty much ensures that the appropriate people will be hearing the information at all times.

In theory, while the wide-scale computerization of patient medical information is a very good idea, there is too much to take into account that may hinder the patients' rights. This is something that should definitely be pursued, but at a much slower pace than the Bush Administration is currently pushing for.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

by Zachary Denver

End of the 'Gay Best Friend'

Thomas Naughton

When you get stuck with a job that you don't want, the best thing to do is quit. This is my two-weeks notice to straight girls everywhere: I am closing up shop. I will no longer be offering my services as Thomas Patrick Naughton, Gay Best Friend (GBF). Do not be mistaken; I am not hetero-phobic.

I do not have a secret vendetta against women; I used to fool around with them. My female friends need not worry; I'm not jettisoning you from my life in favor of only being surrounded exclusively by gay men (there aren't enough bottles of Advil Liquigels in the world to survive those living conditions).

My female friends will not be affected by my resignation as GBF because they are not crass and vapid idiots who would expect such a service from me. To all of my friends, regardless of sex, I am TPN, GBF (Great Best Friend). Too many acronyms?

As gay culture emerged in the 80's, burgeoning in all its glory, straight women were faced with a new reality: there are men out there they can't have, and what's more, these men are after other men. Most straight women are intelligent and were not in the least bit concerned when facing their new reality. Reason being, these men who wanted other men were not men that they were attracted to because they were not attracted to women.

Straight men might think women are stupid, but this is the ultimate proof that women are very smart creatures; they know not to go guns-a-blazin' into a losing battle. The smart women just took it with a grain of salt, decided to dress cuter and hope for the best. All's fair in love and sex.

The other girls, the ones who were subconsciously threatened by a man they couldn't have, did what American people do when they can't have something they want: they take it anyway. Enter the Gay Best Friend.

Who is the GBF? "He's like, totally my dream come true," the crass vapid horrible girls will say. "I've so totally always wanted a Gay Best Friend to go shopping with! Oh my god!"

The rumors are true. When gay men wake up in the morning, they think only of taking young straight women shopping so they can comment on their new outfits. They think of getting pedicures, highlights and facials all in the company of apt young blonde women who will pout and talk smack about their own boyfriends while downplaying any mention of their Gay Best Friend's love interest (being gay is also a phase so their relationships aren't valid anyway). They look at their favorite Paris Hilton photo and mimic her tilted-head stare of vacancy in the mirror and try on super cute dresses because all gay men dress in drag. After all, all gay men want to be women.

Straight men might think women are stupid, but this is the ultimate proof that women are very smart creatures; they know not to go guns-a-blazin' into a losing battle.

Gay men are women, right? They just have penises and are all so gorgeous and are really into following around straight girls so they can suggest great summer lipstick shades.

What a pile of crap. If that is what a gay man is supposed to be, then I must be something other than gay. When I wake up in the morning, I think about going running, washing my face and taking my Zoloft. Nothing pink ever enters the picture. Zoloft tablets are peach; that's as close as I'm going to get.

My best friend, Airline, is a drag queen and even he doesn't do any of the above when he wakes up. Whenever I wake him up, he usually looks around for something; he winces and squints while fumbling for something near his bed. He's never looking for a pink cell phone to call his Best Girlfriend to go over to Forever 21 so they can buy dresses and talk about how shocked they are about Brad and Jen. He's never looking for a makeup case or a nail file. Actually, that's a lie; he sometimes looks for a nail file so he can dig my heart out for waking him up, but most of the time he is just looking for something to throw at me so I'll come back in 20 minutes.

I'll concede something here: its not all the straight girl's fault. Television has ushered in this image of gay men like Will and Jack from "Will and Grace," who are two of the stupidest characters in the history of television. Then reality T.V. has given us "Queer Eye For The Straight Guy" with Carson Kressley, who is a fabulous guy, but he, like Will and Jack, is an individual not necessarily indicative of the entire gay community. Flip a few channels and you find Steven Cojocaru, who masquerades as a gay male, but he's really an alien.

What are women supposed to think? More importantly, what are gay males supposed to think? If you ask me, both groups have been duped into thinking that they need to act this way with each other or for each other. What if I went around trying to get black males to befriend me on the basis that "I so totally want a friend that is good at basketball"? That doesn't serve anyone. As for me, I was never any good at being a Gay Best Friend anyway.

For those of you future GBF's out there, I say this: Start charging. When these girls have to start paying for the dress and the conversation, they'll run back to their girlfriends, girlfriend.

Thomas Naughton is a Collegian columnist.

Open your eyes to the world

Colin Jones

We all do it. It's kind of hard not too, really. We live our lives going about our own business, conducting ourselves in the manner we have learned to as a result of our experience. We're reluctant to break out of our shells and we resist change of any kind. Change represents the unknown, something that we're all afraid of. But it is through interactions with the unknown, doing things we haven't done before, extending our personal boundaries and opening our minds to new ideas that we learn about life.

The world isn't a big place; it's actually shocking just how small it is. I was fortunate enough to live fur a semester in Ireland and go on a two-week tour of Europe. For the most part, day-to-day life in Ireland was boring. The classes were very easy and undemanding. All of the international students were grouped together, so many of the people around me didn't speak English as their first language and were very introverted. But I lucked out. I had great roommates and some of the best times I had were just hanging around with my roommates doing nothing but talking.

Even if you've got nothing else, having people who truly and genuinely are your friends is enough.

I learned more than I ever have during those five months. All that time gave me a chance to take a step back and think about things. I learned what was important. Even if you've got nothing else, having people who truly and genuinely are your friends is enough. The satisfaction that you get from the relationships you have with people, your friends and your family, is worth far more than any level of wealth or status you could ever hope to achieve.

We're all different, but we're all the same. One of my roommates, a Frenchman from Lyon, came to visit me recently. Although we did go to Boston and New Hampshire, as well as a party or two, for the most part we just sat around shootin' the bull, like always. Over the course of our conversations, I was surprised to find that he was wrestling with the same things as I was, many of the same things that I suspect all of us are. What's coming up next? Where are we headed and what are we going to do? Is there life after college? Thinking about the future creates feelings of both excitement and apprehension.

Ultimately, no matter where you go, people are the same. The vibe of a place can change. The culturally imposed ins and outs of social conduct can vary. I can attest to this personally, having been born in Texas, and having lived in Illinois, California and Massachusetts. People may carry themselves differently, but they want the same things that all of us do. To find their place in the world and to know that it's better for having them in it; to find love, and happiness, and to one day have a family of their own.

What we've got to do is stay true to ourselves, and have faith that things will work out for the best. What you put in is what you'll get out. We're all here to help each other; we just don't know how we do it. There is no way for us to know how our actions, no matter how small they seem, can have profound impacts in ways we can't imagine. Give up your seat on the bus for the old lady. Hand the guy in front of you the piece of paper he dropped. Fate is a strange thing. Good actions tend to snowball, creating a ripple effect.

It's weird the way it works. A friend of mine arrived in Ireland the day before I did. When he was going into his building, he spoke to a guy standing outside smoking a cigarette. They started talking, and the next day he introduced us. I found out that the kid had an empty room in his apartment, so I took it. Now I have a friend in France who I can visit whenever I want. If it weren't for the simple kindness of sharing a cigarette, I wouldn't be where I am today.

Colin Jones is a Collegian columnist.

U.S. propaganda at its finest

Andrew Freeman

Karen Ryan is a busy woman — on television news she's been seen announcing on the dangers of SUVs, the benefits of drugs like Excedrin and the importance of not smoking while pregnant.

Especially notable are her highly favorable pieces on President Bush's No Child Left Behind Law and recent Medicare Prescription drug law. There's only one problem with the telegenic Ms. Ryan — she's not a real reporter.

President of the Karen Ryan Group, a former television reporter, now produces "video news releases" — essentially advertisements that are made to appear as actual news footage, for whoever contracts her. These videos are sent to television news programs, which will occasionally use them for broadcast. Her clients include businesses, interest groups and the federal government, which under Bush has spent taxpayer money on promoting his policies.

The federal bureaucracy is not supposed to be politically active, as its duty is to the country, not to the president. Yet government agencies have, in recent years, crossed the line. In March 2004, at the start of the presidential race, the Treasury Department calculated the cost of John Kerry's tax proposal, declaiming that "hard-working individuals and married couples" would face a tax increase of $477 billion. Former Treasury official Pamela Olson explained the rationale behind this politically biased report to The Wall Street Journal: "The obligation at the Treasury Department is to advance the President's legislative agenda."

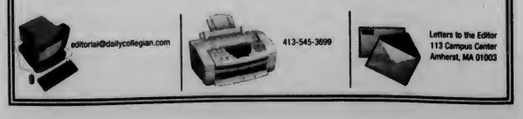
The Treasury Department's website lists its duties and responsibilities as producing currency, regulating banks, collecting taxes and handling bonds and the debt — nowhere is the President's legislative agenda mentioned. Yet this doctrine (the bureaucracy must do everything it can to advance the President's goals) is at work throughout the Bush government. The most flagrant expression of this is the production of propaganda.

In May 2004, Congress' investigative agency, the General Accounting Office, ruled that the Bush Administration had violated laws against "covert propaganda." The Department of Health and Human Services had hired a public relations firm to produce VNRs promoting Bush's prescription drug bill — two of the three videos starred Karen Ryan. The videos were broadcast by at least 40 stations in 33 markets, according to The New York Times, and with no mention of the source of the report on the tapes, many viewers would conclude they were real journalism.

Other examples abound. The Office of the National Drug Control Policy in early 2004 distributed VNRs, which were used by over 500 stations, warning about the dangers of marijuana and other drugs. The Census Bureau last March released a VNR about Women's History Month, narrated by none other than Karen Ryan. And The Washington Post reports that up until October, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention had been sending out a VNR about the flu vaccine.

The incident that has gotten the most press, however, has been the bribing of Armstrong Williams, a conservative columnist and commentator, who was given over $240,000 by the Education Department. In exchange for this sum, Williams promoted the President's education policy, specifically the NCLB law.

According to USA Today, Williams was required to "regularly comment on NCLB during the course of his broadcasts." His conflict of interest was never disclosed during the broadcasts, and Ketchum, the public relations company that hired him, was also producing VNRs for the Department of Education. Although some people believe columnists should not be held to high journalistic standards, readers still ought to know, at the least, whether the columnists' opinions are being bought and paid for.



The Bush Administration's willingness to propagandize, indeed engaging in any behavior that promotes their goals, extends much further than VNRs. Donald Rumsfeld proposed an Office of Strategic Influence to spread disinformation among foreign journalists to aid the War on Terror. The invasion of Iraq was predicated on intelligence reports of weapons of mass destruction that had actually been "sexed up" and misrepresented to create the faulty impression of an active nuclear weapons program; the Administration stood by while its accomplices in the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth slandered John Kerry, a documented war hero.

Democratic governments are not supposed to propagandize — the American public ought to be able to judge a law on its merits, without the bureaucracy covertly producing favorable journalism for it. VNRs and other propaganda methods utilized by the government are expensive and unethical. Worse, they indicate an insidious ideology in the current administration — that it is acceptable to do anything, including mislead the American public, to accomplish their goals.

Andrew Freeman is a Collegian columnist.

SUBMIT A LETTER OR OPINION

In order to be considered for publication, all submissions must include the writer's name, address, and telephone number or e-mail address. Letters should be no longer than 450 words in length and addressed as 'Letters to the Editor.' Commentaries should be no more than 750 words and addressed as 'Editorial/Opinion.' Submissions may be edited for clarity and condensed. You may write, fax, or e-mail your submissions to:

editorial@dailycollegian.com | 413-545-3699 | Letters to the Editor, 113 Campus Center, Amherst, MA 01003

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Raising their voice

South African choir brings gospel to the FAC

By Matt O'Rourke
Collegian Staff

Directly following an appearance on the stage of the famed Carnegie Hall in New York City, the Soweto Gospel Choir is preparing to grace the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center stage with their vocal power, compelling stage presence, and spiritual energy.

Hailing from the Soweto township in South Africa, the gospel choir has drawn comparisons by critics to some of the most acclaimed choral groups, such as Ladysmith Black Mambazo, who were featured on Paul Simon's "Graceland" album.

The Soweto Gospel Choir recently had the opportunity to share a stage with such musical notables as Peter Gabriel, Bono, and Jimmy Cliff at the 46664 Concert in Capetown, South Africa, organized by Nelson Mandela. They have also recently received the American Gospel Music Award's "Best Gospel Choir" bid in 2005.

Though the Soweto choir finds their music mostly rooted in gospel, the musical phenomenon also performs such familiar songs as "Amazing Grace" and Cliff's "Many Rivers to Cross."

Fusing a wide variety of inspirational material with traditional dancing, the choir provides a rich cultural experience that people stretching across a variety of ages have the ability to enjoy.

The band also introduces diversity in language into their fast paced act. The momentum of the band is consistent throughout the show, providing a high-energy tone to the event.

The choir will perform at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall on Monday, Feb. 7. This UMass performance coincides with the release of the group's debut American album titled, "Voices From Heaven" released on Shanachie Entertainment.

"Voices From Heaven" delivers a vast range of musical expression from traditional African a cappella, called Mbube, to church hymns. Highlights also include heavily percussive tracks, with members performing solos that are rounded out by the bright overtones of the choir. As can be expected, the most powerful instrument is that of the human voice, which is beautifully explored throughout the album.

Soweto is a post-apartheid economically deprived region. The Soweto Gospel Choir made use of joyful and uplifting music, allowing the choir to achieve success in the region, as well as to attain international acclaim.

The choir also recently created their own charity to help organizations that provide AIDS orphans establishments with funding that otherwise they would not receive. The charity, named Nkosi's Haven/Vakini, which is named for Nkosi Johnson, an 11 year-old boy who addressed the United Nations in an AIDS conference that was televised worldwide. Johnson subsequently succumbed in his battle with AIDS in 2001, at the age of 12.

The Soweto Gospel Choir will also perform at 10 a.m. on Monday Feb. 7 for children ranging from grades three to 12.

Information from sowetogospelchoir.com was used to compile this report.

Soweto Gospel Choir
Feb. 7
Fine Arts Center
UMass
$15, $10 and $7

'Voices from Heaven'

The men and women of the Soweto Gospel Choir have set out on a world tour. Some of their proceeds will be donated to their charity, Nkosi's Haven/ Vakini. The charity was founded in memory of Nkosi Johnson, a 12 year-old victim of AIDS.

COURTESY ISA/J ARTISTS (2)

Mixed reviews for Barlow's 'Emoh'

Dinosaur Jr. bassist releases first full-length solo project

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

Lou Barlow has been a lot of things in the past twenty years. From his beginnings as bassist for alt-rock heroes Dinosaur Jr. to the large output of his acclaimed, influential indie-rock outfit Sebadoh to his experimental group The Folk Implosion (who had mainstream success with the song "Natural One" in the mid-90s) to his lo-fi solo albums both under his own name and the name Sentridoh. However, on his list of accolades hi-fi singer/songwriter had never made the cut — until now.

Lou Barlow
'Emoh'
Merge

On "Emoh," which is being marketed as Barlow's first "real" solo album, the indie-rock talent gets a bit poppier than before and sounds a whole lot better then most of his fans are used to; however he hasn't sold out to go the way of the MTV singer/songwriter. Nor, as the title wryly suggests, has he decided to follow the irritating, beaten path of Dashboard Confessional. Barlow has his stamp all across the album, even though it sounds unlike most of his best-known material. The electric guitar is all but gone and the entirety of the album is focused on Barlow's voice and acoustic guitar, with other instruments and sounds brought out only as accents to the stripped-down tracks.

